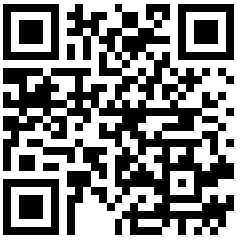
This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

Google™ books

https://books.google.com



Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Per. 256 d. 768

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

BRIGHT. BREEZY. BIGGEST. BEST.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY G. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

NO. 470. FOR WEEK ENDING JANUARY 1ST, 1898. ONE PENNY.

NURSES OF GREAT BRITAIN AND DR TIBBLES' Vi-Cocoa

Merit, and Merit alone, has made the Food Beverage, Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, a Proved Success, and the remarkable unsolicited evidence from Nurses in all parts of the country, here with published, supports our statement that its merits have been recognised to an extent hitherto unknown in the history of any preparation. One thing is certain. Nothing has ever been discovered that can approach it in giving lightness of heart, joy of life, fleetness of foot, and that general feeling of comfort which only comes from a full capacity to enjoy every pleasure, moral, intellectual, and physical.

MEDICAL TESTIMONY.

The LANCET says: "Vi-Cocoa must be assigned a place in the front rank of really valuable foods, since it is the embodiment of the numerous principles contained in malt, hops, kola, and cocoa. . . . Of distinct value as a restorative and stimulating food."

The BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL says: "Vi-Cocoa is a very palatable beverage of great stimulating and sustaining properties."

The most remarkable Testimony ever published: NURSES AND DR. TIBBLES' VI-COCOA.

A Real Pick-Me-Up.
Nurse F. GEORGE, Devonport, Hill, Congleton: "I have tried Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, and think it is a real 'pick-me-up,' and intend to use no other."

Gives Great Satisfaction.
Nurse WILKINSON, 30, Russell Street, Clitheroe: "Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa gives every satisfaction, and I shall not fail to recommend it to my friends and patients."

Both Meat and Drink.
Nurse WEAVER, The Parsonage, Rickmansworth, Herts: "My brother has tried Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, and thinks it is both meat and drink."

Great Benefit to Invalids.
Nurse VILLAGE, Linton, near Maidstone: "I have proved Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa to be of great benefit to Invalids, as it is so easily digested."

The Best ever Tasted.
Nurse E. BOWDEN, 8, Evershot Road, Tollington Park, N.: "I consider Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa the very best cocoa that I have tasted. I find it more refreshing and more invigorating than any other. I have been giving it to my patients, and shall certainly recommend it to both my patients and personal friends."

For Excellence.
Nurse GILKES, 11, St. Paul's Square, Southsea: "I think Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa is excellent, and very good for those who suffer from indigestion. This I know practically."

No Praise Too High.
Nurse SAFFREY, The Cottage, Haddesden Road, Belvedere, Kent: "I am pleased to say I think more of the merits of Dr. Tibbles' than even the praise already bestowed upon it."

For Physical and Mental Suffering.
Nurse CLARE "The Laurels," Langley: "I have much pleasure in bearing testimony to the value of Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, as I find it most beneficial to persons suffering physically and mentally. It is most nutritive and extremely pleasant to take, and I shall strongly recommend it to my patients."

Nourishing and Stimulating.
Nurse HARRINGTON, Coxhoe, Durham: "Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa possesses good nourishing and stimulating qualities. I shall certainly recommend it to my patients and friends."

Invaluable for Night Duty.
Nurse WILCOX, Bradford Street, Birmingham: "I always take a cup of Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa when on night duty."

Highly Pleased with It.
Nurse ROBERTS, Ryecroft Villa, 20, St. James's Street, Southport: "We are highly pleased with Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa. I think it possesses good nourishing and stimulating qualities. I shall recommend it to all my patients and friends."

Refreshing, Stimulating, Pleasant.
Nurse SUNDERLAND, Shewview Villa, Cheam Road, Sutton, Surrey: "I have tried Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, and find it a refreshing, stimulating, and pleasant beverage. I shall have pleasure in recommending it to my friends and relations."

Finds it Excellent.
Nurse SCHOFIELD, Rathgar, Dublin: "I have tested Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa and find it excellent, and will recommend to my patients and friends."

For Sick Room and Breakfast Table.
Nurse B. BEASLEY, 31, Blenheim Gardens Reading: "I wish to say that I have found Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa of great value both in the sick room and on the breakfast table. I use it myself, and can honestly say that it is the most genuine and superior cocoa that can be obtained. I always advise my patients to try it, and when they do they find that it is better and suits their digestion better than any cocoa they have ever tried. I shall always have great pleasure in recommending Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, as I am sure it has no equal."

Likes It Very Much.
Nurse SESSIONS, Cotteswold House, Cirencester: "I have tested Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, and like it very much. I shall have pleasure in recommending it to all my patients and friends."

DR TIBBLES' Vi-Cocoa

IS APPRECIATED BY MILLIONS, AND AS A WINTER BEVERAGE IS UNEQUALLED.
It can be TESTED FREE, and those who try it buy it.
Address (a Post-card will do), but mention Short Stories.
DR TIBBLES' VI-COCOA LTD., DO, 61, 62 BUNHILL ROW, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

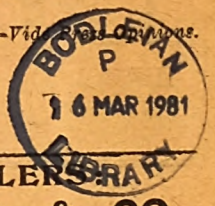
BURMAH CUP.

THE "FIN-DE-SIECLE" NON-ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGE.

SPARKLING! REFRESHING!
INVIGORATING! INEXPENSIVE!

A DELICIOUS BEVERAGE TO USE ALONE, OR MIXES WELL WITH WINE OR SPIRITS.—Vide Testimonials.

ALLY SLOPER'S "Warrant of Appointment," January 16th, 1897.
"Honourable Mention," July 17th, 1897.
ALLY SLOPER'S "Award of Merit," September 25th, 1897.



Wholesale from Aerated Water Manufacturers and Bottlers, Chemists, Family Grocers, etc., throughout the Kingdom. Retail at all Bars and Refreshment Houses at prices of good Lemonade.

INVENTOR AND SOLE PROPRIETOR:

WILLIAM GUILFORD, F.O.S.,

FORMERLY

"FERGUSON AND FORRESTER,"

GLASGOW.

BY SPECIAL APPOINTMENT TO

H.R.H. THE PRINCE OF WALES.

LONDON BOTTLERS:

Messrs. N. PAUL & CO.,

Mineral Water Manufacturers,

KING'S ROAD, ST. PANCRAS, N.W.

This is the oldest firm of Mineral Water Bottlers in the World. Established in Geneva in connection with Schweppe & Gosse in 1789, and in Bow Street, London, as Paul & Burrows, in 1802. The business of Charles Hodgson, established in 1801, is now incorporated with the firm of N. PAUL & Co.

Head Office: 129, BATTERSEA RISE, S.W.

JOHN PHILLIPS, AGENT.

The Best Hair Dye

in the World for Lashes, Eyebrows, and Hair on the Head, with Moustache and Beard. For Ladies' Hair and for all Colours. Had at 3s. 6d., post 3s. 9d., of ALEX. ROSS, 62 Theobald's Road, High Holborn, London, W.C. Spanish Cantharides for fallen hair, 3s. 6d. 5s. 6d. & 10s. 6d.

NOSE MACHINE.

This is a contrivance by which the short cartilage of the nose is pressed into shape by wearing the instrument an hour daily for a short time. Price 10/6, sent free for stamps. ALEX ROSS, 62, Theobald's Road, London, opposite Bedford Row. Est. 1850. Parcel free from observation.

7/6 THE "WAVERLEY" SALOON GUN. WITH 100 BALL CARTRIDGES. 7/6

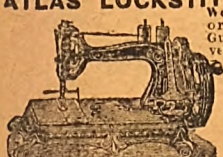
THE "WAVERLEY."

100 Birds or Rabbits can be killed with this gun at a cost of 1/-. Will penetrate a one-inch deal board at 75 to 100 yards; each gun bears the legal proof-mark. Price Lists free. W. R. JACKSON, Arms Manufacturer, 8, Park Avenue Rd., Tottenham, Middlesex. Mention Short Stories.

TO THE DEAF.

A Gentleman who cured himself of Deafness and Noises in the Head after fourteen years' suffering, will gladly send full particulars of the remedy post free. Address B. CLIFTON, Amberley House, Norfolk Street, Strand, London, W.C.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.



Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 182B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.; 63, Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14, High Rd., Kilburn.

FREE Send stamped addressed envelope for Price List and receive free, Our Allios Gold Imitation Diamond Pin, in case, for Lady or Gent. Send four stamps to cover packing, etc

RENNIE & CO., Dept. 11, Croy Place, Glasgow.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably"

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

MR. CLAUDE CARTER, of Thorn House, Johnstone, N.B., says: "Your Tablets much reduced my weight and I have been waiting to see if it was permanent, and so it has proved."

MR. CANHAM, 87, Alexandra Road, Norwich, says: "Tablets cured my wife two years ago of extreme stoutness. It has never returned.

MARION TAYLOR, of Church Farm, St. James, Halesworth, says: "Have lost quite two stone."

A. PEEL, of Darley Hydro, Matlock, writes: "They have reduced and benefited me a good deal."

MISS MONEY, Broadway House, Newbury. "I am greatly reduced in weight."

MR. G. LOVE, 4, Kirk Street, Peterhead. "I think them wonderful not only to reduce fat but as a medicine."

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

£20 Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.

Tobacconists Commencing. See Illd. Guide (239 pages) 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000. Tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers.

WADE'S WONDERFUL OFFER

A WATCH FOR NOTHING.

For particulars send for one of my illustrated catalogues. To induce you to send for this I guarantee to supply one of my half-hoop "Black Star" Diamond 18-carat Gold-cased Ladies' Rings for the nominal sum of 1/6. The ring is equal in appearance to one costing 5 guineas. The watch I give away free of charge and the list price for it is 40/-, being composed of Solid Silver cases, and is a reliable time-keeper. This offer is strictly genuine, and I have thousands of testimonials thanking me for my free gifts. Send at once enclosing Postal Order for 1/6, and string size of finger, and address

W. W. WADE,

Gold Exchange, Hammersmith, London, W.

DR. MACKENZIE'S

Deliciously and expensively perfumed, the most luxurious Soap in the World. Produces a most lovely complexion, eradicates spots, pimples, and all imperfections, makes the skin exquisitely clear, and produces the healthy bloom so much desired. It is absolutely harmless, and each tablet is accompanied by a medical certificate.

ARSENICAL 6D. & 1S. PER TABLET.

This Soap prevents the growth of superfluous hairs, removes wrinkles, feeds the skin. You can get it at all the Stores and first-class Chemists. The Family Doctor says it is the most economical beautifier known to Modern Dermatology. It clears away all pimples, spots, redness, or roughness, and makes the skin smooth and clear as a baby's. Use it in the bath and for all Toilet purposes; it is most delicious.

For irritable or sensitive skins it is matchless and delightfully soothing.

MADAME PATTI sends her best thanks for Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap, which she finds most excellent—Craig-y-nos Castle, South Wales.

SOAP.

Use also Dr. MACKENZIE'S "ARSICAL" Face Lotion. Beware of many Imitations. Have Dr. MACKENZIE'S OF HOME.

Short Stories

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON

No. 470.] [One Penny.

For the Week ending January 1st, 1898.

A Triple Crime.

The Theatre de la Folie in Brussels was crowded with a brilliant audience in honour of the reigning favourite, Léontia, a dancer of bewitching grace and beauty. The Duc de Simeuse was said to have discovered her and she had quickly become the rage.

"Who's the tall man with Colonel du Berry?" asked a lady in the stalls.

Her husband looked at the stage-box and saw the two men in question. The colonel was a well-known figure in fashionable circles, but the other, a man of striking appearance and distinguished bearing, was a stranger.

"Oh, that's the Comte de Fervacques, I expect. They say he's a millionaire and a widower to boot. He's just come from Paris, and will be quite an acquisition."

Facing the box occupied by the colonel and his friend was one containing two ladies, the younger of whom soon attracted the latter's attention. In answer to his inquiries he was told that they were the Duchesse de Simeuse and her daughter Thérèse, and at the sound of the name a curious expression passed over his face.

"Do you know them?" asked the Comte de Fervacques.

"Oh, yes. They are charming. I am going to a large ball there on the twenty-fifth."

"Could you get me an invitation?" asked the other after a pause.

All rights reserved.

Digitized by Google

His friend laughed. "I've no doubt I could, but, mon ami, you are just too late in the field, for the lovely Thérèse is engaged to the young Baron Vanlinden."

"That will not make their society any the less charming to me."

Thérèse de Simeuse was considered cold and proud. Her beauty was of the essentially aristocratic type, with regular features, delicate nostrils, and small, shapely ears. Her eyes were perfect in form and colour, but their usual expression was unemotional, and the haughty poise of her small head showed her full appreciation of her exalted rank. But under this cold exterior beat a warm heart, and were hidden the generous impulses of a noble nature. The knowledge of her mother's sufferings at the hands of a weak, dissipated husband, had made her grave beyond her years, and had lifted the charmed veil that hides married life from most young French girls.

The night of the ball at the Hôtel Simeuse arrived. It was a most dazzling affair, and among all the representatives of rank and beauty, none were more observed than the lovely daughter of the house, and the reputed millionaire Henri, Comte de Fervacques.

"This is our dance, I think, Mademoiselle?" he said with a courtly bow.

She laid her hand upon his arm and they took several turns round the spacious room, then he led the way to the balcony where all sorts of luxurious lounges had been arranged in a perfect bower of roses and heliotrope.

"I cannot get rid of the idea that we have met before, Mademoiselle," he said, looking fixedly at her.

"Not that I am aware of, Monsieur le Comte, both your name and features are perfectly strange to me."

"It is not to be expected that Mademoiselle would remember me, but no one could ever see her face and forget it," he rejoined, lowering his voice to an almost caressing tone.

She flushed angrily and her eyes fell before his expressive glance, then proudly raising her head she said coldly:

"I am neglecting my duties as daughter of the house. Kindly take me back to the Duchess."

He obeyed with a smile that was not good to see, and a little later when he saw her with her fiancé, smiling, radiant and gracious, he turned on his heel with the unspoken resolve: "She shall recognise me yet!"

Baron Wilhelm Vanlinden was a young man of large fortune, irreproachable character and distinctly prepossessing appearance. The engagement between him and Mademoiselle de Simeuse had been long desired by the two families, and happily had proved most acceptable to the young people themselves. He had adored Thérèse from his boyhood and she now returned his affection with an ardour that few would have given her credit for.

The Comte de Fervacques soon established himself on terms of intimacy at the Hôtel Simeuse. His unlimited wealth made him a most useful friend to the extravagant old Duke, and his charming manners and graceful attentions rapidly ingratiated him with the long suffering Duchess. Thérèse alone seemed to shrink from him, and repulsed all his friendly overtures with chilling civility. She listened unmoved to all his thrilling recitals of adventure in the wilds of America or the snow-clad Steppes of Russia, and all the resources of his fertile brain had as yet been taxed in vain to awaken the slightest warmth in her manner to him. In fact the only two beings for whom she evinced any feeling were her mother and her fiancé.

One Monday morning about ten o'clock Henri de Fervacques received a visit from a lean, sallow-faced Irish-American, who was nominally his secretary.

"Have you found out anything?" said the Count in English as soon as the man had locked the door behind him.

"Yes, my lord," was the prompt reply. "Baron Vanlinden is a member of a secret political society, the rules of which are most strict, and they are bound by a solemn oath not to reveal their movements even to save life itself. There is to be a meeting at Mechlin on Friday evening to which Vanlinden and his friend Van Scheen are going disguised as pedlars. The password is Pro Patria and each member wears a little iron cross like this."

"Malone, you're a treasure," said de Fervacques taking the badge from his hand. "How did you find all this out so soon?"

"That's my secret, sir. Gentlemen's valets are often rather talkative, and besides, I've not been a member of three secret societies myself for nothing."

"Have you the names of the president and chief members?" Malone handed him a rather dirty piece of paper on which was written the needful information. The Count took it with an approving nod, and after giving Malone a handsome sum of money, dismissed him, and prepared to act upon the knowledge he had acquired.

The next evening Baron Vanlinden and his friend Van Scheen were dining together when a letter was handed to the former. He opened it, read it with evident surprise and then passed it to his companion.

"Well, what do you think of it?"

"Oh, it's only a precaution. The chief has heard something that makes him extra careful. That's all," said Van Scheen.

The note was as follows:

Leave Brussels on Thursday night instead of Friday. Go to the Hôtel du Lion, five miles this side of Mechlin, and stay there until you hear again from me. The landlord is to be trusted.

This was duly signed and sealed with the mystic token of their order, so there was nothing to do but to obey. Vanlinden felt a strange misgiving, but his friend had no scruples, and as they expected that the next meeting would be fraught with important issues there was the more need for caution and obedience.

On Tuesday it was announced that the Comte de Fervacques had left for Paris by the night train; but his valet could have told a different tale. De Fervacques left the train alone two or three stations from Brussels and made his way in a hired carriage to the Hôtel du Lion, an unfrequented wayside inn, kept by a man of bad reputation, on the outskirts of a straggling villiage near Mechlin.

Vanlinden and his friend started as directed on the Thursday night, disguised as pedlars and each wearing the badge of the order inside his vest. They walked part of the way and arrived at their destination both tired and hungry. The landlord of the Hôtel du Lion gave them the pass-word and took them up to their room, which was as dreary as such rooms generally are. There was a large fire which, while looking cheerful, brought out the damp, fusty smell of an unused apartment with imperfect ventilation, and caused the moisture to stand out on the discoloured walls. The supper was laid and the food was well cooked, so they settled down to make the best of their compulsory quarters. The wine was quite above the average, and to counteract the depressing effect of their surroundings they drank pretty freely of it, and both fell asleep over the fire soon after supper.

Digitized by Google

At the same hour an aged priest was saying his nightly office in his oratory not many hundred yards away, when the window of the adjoining room was forced open, and a man dressed as a pedlar, wearing a mask and a curious iron cross on his breast, entered stealthily, and falling upon the kneeling figure, stabbed him in the back. His cries brought his faithful housekeeper to his aid, and she came face to face with the murderer, who, while giving her full time to observe him, flung her upon the ground, and inflicted two or three slight flesh wounds in her arm and shoulder. She fainted from fright, and the assassin departed hurriedly by the way he came in. He at once made his way to the Hôtel du Lion, was admitted by the landlord, and then crept softly up to the room where the two friends were still sleeping after the drugged wine. He drew Vanlinden's handkerchief from his pocket, wrapped the blood-stained knife in it, and placed it carefully on the person of the man he meant to ruin.

A few minutes later Henri, Comte de Fervacques, left the Hôtel du Lion, and made his way to Paris as fast as the night express could carry him.

The next day, Brussels was scandalised by news of the most startling nature. An aged priest had been brutally murdered while at his devotions, by a man dressed as a pedlar, who had been arrested at the Hôtel du Lion, with a blood-stained weapon in his pocket, and had been identified by the priest's servant, owing to a curious iron cross he wore. The supposed pedlar turned out to be no less a person than Baron Wilhelm Vanlinden, who refused to give any explanation of his presence in that neighbourhood on the night of the outrage.

Thérèse de Simeuse was at first stunned by the terrible intelligence, then she set her wits to work and obtained permission to visit her lover in the prison.

"How good of you to come, dearest!" said Vanlinden. "It shows me that you do not believe this awful accusation, though I fear things look very black against me!"

"How could I think such a thing for a moment, Wilhelm," she said fondly. "There is some horrible mistake, but it will be quite easy to prove your innocence, of course!"

"I'm not so sure about that, my dear one," he said sadly.

"Why not? What do you mean?" she asked with sudden alarm.

"Simply this. I am not at liberty to explain either my presence at the Hôtel du Lion or my reason for wearing this disguise."

"But you will be able to at the trial?" she persisted, as she knelt at his side and looked up piteously into his pale, strained face. "Think of what is at stake, dear, our life's happiness, your own honour and that of your family."

"Dearest, my honour is just that which demands that I should not break an oath even to save my life, and," he pursued more tenderly, "you would not have me secure our happiness by breaking my word, I am sure. I know you to well for that."

She did not answer for a moment, and the sound of her low sobs alone broke the silence of the prison-cell. At last she raised her head and said with resolute look, though her voice was still weak:

"No, mon bien-aimé. You could not do that. We must find some other way of saving you."

The trial was drawing near before the Comte de Fervacques returned from Paris. He had heard the terrible news, and was loud in his denunciations of the iniquity of the charge, and eloquent in his expressions of sympathy for Mademoiselle de Simeuse and her parents. He had several interviews with Vanlinden and did his utmost to persuade him to explain his movements on the night of the murder, but in vain, the young man's fortitude was impregnable, alike to the pleadings of his own heart for love and life, and to the terrors of death held over him by his counsel and friends.

"It is no use waiting for him," said De Fervacques to himself as he left the prison one day, "if he would have spoken he would have been imprisoned, if not hanged for treason, and then the marriage could never have taken place, but as he won't, it must be done the other way!" With that he went and asked for a private interview with Mademoiselle de Simeuse on a matter of vital importance.

Thérèse de Simeuse received him with her usual hauteur, and coldly requested to know the reason of his strange request.

"Mademoiselle, I have just come from Baron Vanlinden. He persists in this obstinate silence which, I fear, will cost him his life. Can you do nothing to induce him to clear himself?"

"Impossible, Monsieur le Comte, I could not ask the baron to act in opposition to his own judgment and sense of duty. His innocence must be established," she continued passionately. "There was no motive for the crime. His blameless life must tell in his favour! It can't be that the law is so blind. My father has engaged the most eminent counsel to plead his cause."

"And all that will be of no use unless he can explain his mysterious presence in that neighbourhood, or else can produce the real murderer," said De Fervacques in a tone of calm conviction.

"You are hard and cruel," she murmured.

"No, my dear mademoiselle, far from it. I am deeply grieved for your sake, if for nothing else, and I am convinced of Vanlinden's innocence;" and he added in a low tone, "I can prove it!"

"You? You can prove it?" she exclaimed breathlessly, starting to her feet, and coming towards him with out-stretched hands. "And you will do so? You will not let him die?"

"No, I will not let him die," he began slowly.

"Ah, may God bless you for those words, and forgive me for the ill-will I have borne you!" she interrupted, as the tears of joy forced their way into her kindling eyes.

"Yes, I will do it," he said gently, taking both her hands in his, "on one condition."

"And that is?"

"That you become my wife the day of his release, and swear never to reveal my part in the transaction."

"Never!" she cried, striving to free herself from him. "Never! my heart has not deceived me, you are base and treacherous! No, a thousand times no!"

"Then you will let him die a felon's death, rather than marry one who loves you, as his cold nature could never love. One whom no oath, however sacred, would keep silence if you were the prize of speech!" he pursued passionately, still holding her in his firm grasp. "Don't shrink from me, Thérèse, I love you with the passion of my life; I don't ask you to love me yet, but only to give yourself to me in return for his life."

The vehemence of his words and the singular magnetism of his presence, the helplessness of her position, and above all the fear for her lover, made her brain reel, and she would have fallen if he had not put his arm round her at that moment. The act restored her failing faculties; with a shudder she withdrew from his embrace, and, darting to the other side of the room, cowered on the sofa like a creature at bay. De Fervacques said no more, but kept his eyes fixed on her with an expression that at once repelled and dominated her.

Digitized by Google

"At least you will give me time to consider?" she faltered.

"You may have till to-morrow night, but if you betray me, remember, Vanlinden dies!"

He left her with a courtly bow, and entered his carriage with a triumphant smile, for he knew the game was won.

The next morning Thérèse rose pale and exhausted after a sleepless night of agonised perplexity, and, accompanied by her maid, went to see the solicitor in charge of Vanlinden's case.

"My client is in a most serious position, Mademoiselle. I cannot ignore the gravity of the case. If he persists in this course of obdurate silence it will be impossible to save his life, unless, of course, the real murderer can be found," he replied in answer to her anxious inquiries.

"Then you think that is the only chance?"

"The only one, Mademoiselle."

She left the office with a stunned, dazed feeling as if part of her were dead already, and every time she closed her aching eyes, the vision of her lover, dead at the hands of the executioner, rose before them, and his voice seemed to sound in her ears: "You might have saved me, if you would."

That night the Comte de Fervacques received a scented, coroneted note which ran as follows:

"MONSIEUR LE COMTE DE FERVACQUES.

"I accept your terms and pledge myself to marry you in return for Baron Vanlinden's release, providing that you will allow a month to elapse between his acquittal and the day you claim me as your wife. My feelings to you remain unaltered and unalterable, but a de Simeuse never broke her word.

"THÉRÈSE DE SIMEUSE."

"I don't like the delay," he said musingly after he had read it, "but I suppose I can trust her, and it's better not to drive her too far or she might baulk my plans by making a tragic exit from this world's stage. I must now procure the proofs of the young man's innocence," he concluded with a curl of his mobile lips.

He took a slip of closely written paper from a drawer in his writing table, and a small bottle from a curious silver casket that stood on a richly carved cabinet, and took them both to his dressing-room. There he effected a complete change in his appearance, and presently sallied forth under cover of the dusk, looking like a dirty, shabby artizan, towards the slums of the city. Here he sought out a man who had served his ends in the past, but whose craving for absinthe had kept him from turning to any good account the hush-money he had received for his dirty work, and was now on his last legs both physically and financially.

A very short interview sufficed to persuade the besotted outcast to copy the confession of murder that De Fervacques placed before him, under a promise of a hundred pounds and means of escape before the police should be put on his track. As he wrote the last words with his shaky, almost illegible scrawl, the man behind him pressed a handkerchief steeped in chloroform over his mouth and nose, and when that had done its deadly work, he drew a piece of rope from his pocket and strung the unconscious form up to a hook in the ceiling and left the house posting the important document on his way home.

The cunningly contrived plot worked without a hitch. In consequence of "information received," Baron Vanlinden was acquitted by the authorities with many apologies on the following day. No inquiry was instituted as the supposed suicide of the self-convicted murderer. A life like his was of no account in a great city, and it must be confessed he left none to regret him.

The Duc de Simeuse, acting upon cleverly insinuated calumnies veiled with expressions of deep regret, from the Comte de Fervacques, at once announced his determination of breaking off the engagement between Baron Vanlinden and his daughter unless the mysterious conduct of the former could be satisfactorily explained to him. This was, of course, impossible, and the poor young baron left Amsterdam, en route for New York within a week of his release without having been permitted to have an interview with his former fiancée.

On the appointed day a most magnificent ceremony celebrated the sacrifice of Thérèse de Simeuse on the altar of Henri de Fervacques' base passions.

A couple of months later he entered her exquisitely appointed boudoir, as she sat aimlessly toying with a jewelled fan.

"Madame la Comtesse," he began with a bow that had more mockery than courtesy in it, "you said you did not remember ever having seen me before we met at the Hôtel Simeuse: let me now refresh your memory. Fifteen years ago, when you were a child of six and I was a lad at school, I saved up my pocket money to buy you a bunch of roses and give them to you as usual on your walk. I asked you to kiss me, but you clenched your little hand and pushed me away saying that 'You did not kiss street boys!' I was then Pierre Démar, the son of a poor country doctor, but I swore to humble you before I died, and now that your life is indissolubly linked with mine, let me tell you that you are no countess, for, in the eyes of the law, I am but Pierre Démar still!"

"You have tricked and deceived me, I shall denounce you!" she almost screamed in her rage and mortification.

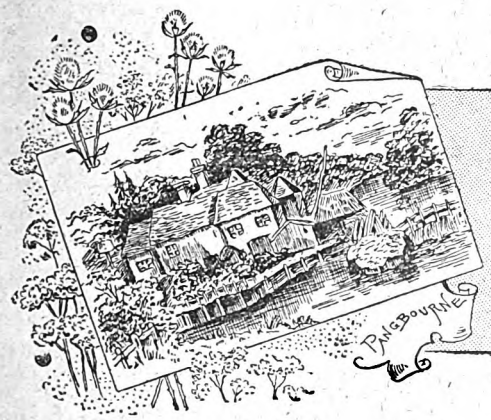
"And proclaim your own shame to the world, for you and your charming father have been living on my money for nearly a year past," he said with cutting emphasis and brutality.

"But my presence need not inconvenience you," he continued calmly, "for I am sick of the tame conventionalities of European life. I am going to start for the East to-night, and you can return to your parents, or send for Vanlinden, whichever you prefer. You are nothing to me now that you have served my purpose. I leave you to enjoy your freedom," he said with a sneer, "on the modest income that can be saved from the results of your father's dissipation, as I feel sure the pride of a de Simeuse would not allow you to take anything from the hands of Pierre Démar."

As suddenly as he had flashed his brilliant personality upon the fashionable world of Brussels, so unexpectedly did he vanish from the scene of his remarkable triumphs, to pursue his devious course under other skies, and possibly re-appear in some of his former haunts before the curses which followed his name had died away on the trembling lips that uttered them.

MARY FERMOR.

Digitized by Google



THE MUMMY'S FOOT.

FOR want of something better to do, I stepped into the shop of one of those dealers in curiosities, or dealers in bric-à-brac, as they are called in Parisian slang, so perfectly unintelligible to the rest of France.

No doubt you have peeped through the windows of some of these shops, since it has become the fashion to buy old furniture and the smallest stockbroker thinks he must have his room in the style of the Middle Ages.

It is somewhat like the shop of a dealer in old iron, an upholsterer's store, an alchemist's laboratory, and a painter's studio, all in one. In these mysterious dens, where a prudent twilight filters through the shutters, what is most notoriously ancient is the dust. The cobwebs there are more authentic than the guipures, and the old pear wood there is younger than the mahogany that arrived only yesterday from America.

My bric-à-brac dealer's shop was a real Capernaum. All the centuries and all the countries seemed to have made an appointment to meet there. A red Etruscan lamp stood upon a Boule cabinet with ebony panels severely set off by filaments of copper; a sofa of the time of Louis XV. carelessly stretched out its slender legs under a solid table of the reign of Louis XIII., with heavy convolutions of oak, with carved foliage and mythological monsters intermingled.

The ribboned cuirass of a suit of damasked Milan armour glittered in a corner; cupids and nymphs in biscuit, grotesque Chinese images, Dresden and old Sevres cups encumbered the stands and whatnots.

On the serrated shelves of dressing-tables beamed some immense Japanese dishes, in red and blue patterns heightened by hatchings of gold, side by side with some of Bernard Palissy's enamels, representing snakes, frogs, and lizards in relief.

From the overflowing cabinets escaped cascades of Chinese silk with its silvery sheen, waves of brocatel riddled with luminous specks by an oblique sunbeam; portraits of all ages smiled through their yellow varnish in more or less tarnished frames.

The proprietor was careful to follow me along the tortuous passage between the piles of furniture, restraining with his hands the dangerous sweep of my coat-tails, and watching over my elbows with the restless attention of the antiquary and the usurer.

A singular figure was that of the proprietor; his immense head, as smooth as a knee and fringed by a scanty aureola of white hair, which was set off more sharply by the light salmon colour of his skin, gave him a false air of patriarchal good-nature, corrected, however, by the glittering of his two little yellow eyes, that quivered in their orbits like two louis-d'or upon quicksilver. The curve of his nose had an aquiline outline that recalled the Jewish or Oriental type. His hands—lean, thin, veined, full of sinews sticking out like the strings of a violin, with nails that resemble the claws that terminate the membraneous wings of bats—moved with a sort of senile oscillation uncomfortable to look at; but these nervously twitching hands became as firm as steel pincers or lobster's claws, as soon as they took up any precious object—an onyx cup, a Venetian glass, or a Bohemian crystal plate. This old fellow had such a profoundly rabbinical and cabalistic air that he would have been burnt three centuries ago for his looks.

"Won't you buy something of me to-day, sir? Here is a Malay creese with its blade undulating like a flame; look at these grooves for draining off the blood, these teeth pointing backward for tearing out the entrails when the dagger is drawn out; it is a ferocious weapon, a fine specimen, and it would show well in your collection; this two-handed sword is very handsome; it is one of Joseph de la Hera's, and what superb work there is on it!"

"No, I have enough arms and instruments of carnage; I should like a little figure, some sort of thing that would do me for a paperweight, for I can't endure all these manufactured bronzes that the stationers sell, and that are invariably found on every desk."

The old gnome, rummaging through his ancient lumber, spread out before me antique bronzes, or what he called such, bits of malachite, little Hindoo or Chinese idols, a kind of Oriental plaything of jade, the incarnation of Brahma or Vishnu, wonderfully suited for anything but this divine employment of holding newspapers and letters in place.

I was hesitating between a porcelain dragon quite constellated with warts, with its throat garnished with fangs and bristles, and a very abominable little Mexican fetish, representing the naked god Huitzilopotchli, when I chanced to notice a charming foot that I took at first for the fragment of some antique Venus.

It had those beautiful and tawn reddish hues which give to Florentine bronze its warm and lovely look, so preferable to the verdigris colour of the common bronzes that might well be taken for statues in a state of decomposition! a satiny gloss there was over its contours, polished by the loving kisses of twenty centuries; for it must be a Corinthian brass, a work of the best period, perhaps a cast of Lysippus.

"This foot will just do for me," said I to the shopkeeper, who looked rather ironically and slyly at me, as he handed me the desired object so that I might examine it more at my ease.

I was surprised at it's lightness. It was not a metallic foot, but a foot of real flesh—an embalmed foot, a mummy's foot. By looking at it closely, the grain of the skin could be distinguished and the almost imperceptible figuring imprinted by the woof of the bandages. The toes were small and delicate, with nails as perfect, fine and transparent as agates. The great toe went off slightly from the others, in the antique fashion, and gave it an easy look—the lightness of a bird's foot. The sole, hardly streaked by a few invisible hatchings, showed that it had never touched the ground, and had only come in contact with the finest mats of Nile reeds and the softest of panther-skin rugs.

"Ha, ha! So you want the Princess Hermonthis' foot," said the shopkeeper, with a strange sneer, fixing his owlish eyes upon me; "ha, ha, ha! for a paperweight! An original idea, the idea of an artist. Anybody telling old Pharaoh that his beloved daughter's foot was to be used for a paperweight would certainly have astonished him, when he was having a mountain of granite dug up to put in it the triple coffin painted and gilded and all covered with hieroglyphics and beautiful pictures of the judgment of souls," added the queer little man, in a low tone, and as if talking to himself.

"How much will you sell me this fragment of a a mummy for?"

"Ah, as dear as I possibly can, for it is a splendid piece. If I had its mate, you wouldn't get it for less than five hundred francs. There is nothing more rare than the daughter of a Pharoah."

"Of course, it is not common; but how much do you want for it? First, I warn you, though that all the treasure I possess amounts to just five louis. I will buy anything that cost five louis, but nothing for more than that. If you should search all my pockets and my most secret drawers, you wouldn't find another single bit of money."

"Five louis for the Princess Hermonthis' foot is very little; very little indeed, for an authentic foot," said the dealer, tossing his head and rolling up his eyes. "Well, take it, and I will give you its wrapper into the bargain," he continued, winding it within an old scrap of damask; "very fine, real damask, Indian damask, that has never been dyed over; very strong and soft it is," mumured he, as he passed his fingers over the frayed fabric, a remnant of commercial habit that caused him to praise up an object that he himself thought only worth giving away.

He slipped the gold coins into a sort of mediæval alms-bag hanging at his belt, and repeated: "The Princess Hermonthis' foot to be used for a paperweight!" Then, fastening his phosphoric eyes on me, he said to me in a voice as strident as the miauling of a cat that has just swallowed a fish bone: "The old Pharaoh will not be pleased; the dear man loved his daughter."

"You speak of him as if you were his contemporary. Old as you are, you do not go quite back to the pyramids of Egypt," I answered him laughingly, from the threshold of his shop.

I went back well content with my acquisition. To avail myself of it at once, I placed the foot of the divine Princess Hermonthis upon a pile of papers—the rough draft of some verses—an undecipherable mosaic—erasures, articles begun; forgotten letters posted in the drawers, a mistake often happening to absent-minded people. The effect was charming, odd and romantic.

Quite satisfied with this adornment, I went out into the streets and walked about with the gravity and pride befitting a man who has the ineffable advantage over all the people he elbows, of possessing a piece of the Princess Hermonthis, Pharoah's daughter.

I considered everybody supremely ridiculous who did not own, like myself, a genuinely Egyptian paperweight, and it seemed to me a sensible man's true business should be to have a mummy's foot on his desk.

Fortunately, the meeting with a few friends made me think of something else besides my infatuation with my recent acquisition. I went off to dine with them, for it would have been difficult for me to dine by myself.

When I came home in the evening, my brains being somewhat stimulated, a gentle whiff of Oriental perfume delicately tickled my olfactory apparatus—the heat of the room had slightly warmed up the matron, the bitumen and the myrrh, in which the embalmers had bathed the princess's body. It was a faint perfume, though very penetrating, a perfume that four thousand years had been unable to evaporate.

The dream of Egypt was eternity. Its odours have the solidity of granite, and last as long.

Soon I was drinking full draughts from the black cup of sleep. For an hour or two everything remained opaque—oblivion and vacancy overwhelmed me with their dark waves.

However, my intellectual obscurity cleared up, and dreams began to touch me in their silent flight. The eyes of my soul were opened, and I saw my chamber just as it was in fact. I might have thought myself awake, but a vague feeling told me that I was sleeping, and that something strange was about to happen.

The odour of myrrh had increased in intensity, and I felt a slight headache, which I very reasonably attributed to a few glasses of champagne that we had drunk to the unknown gods and our future success.

I looked at my room with a feeling of expectation not in the least justifiable. The furniture was quite in its place, the lamp was lighted upon the table, subdued by the milky whiteness of its glass globe; the water-colours shone under their Bohemian glass, the curtain hung languidly, everything looked asleep and still.

But, after some moments, this quiet apartment seemed to be disturbed. The woodwork creaked furtively, the log buried under the ashes suddenly spurted a jet of bluish gas, and the discs of the oateras appeared like metallic eyes, intent, as I was, upon the things that were going to happen.

My eyes turned, by chance, towards the table where I had placed the Princess Hermonthis' foot. Instead of being motionless, as becomes an embalmed foot four thousand years old, it moved, quivered, and hopped over the papers like a frightened frog—one would have thought it in contact with voltaic pile. I heard very distinctly the hard rap made by its little heel, as hard as a gazelle's hoof.

I was rather displeased with my acquisition, prefering sedentary paperweights, and not considering it very natural for feet to walk about without legs, and I began to feel something that was much akin to fear.

Suddenly I saw the folds of one of my curtains move, and I heard a noise of somebody hopping on one foot. I must confess that I was hot and cold alternately; that I felt an unknown chill run down my back, and that my hair, standing on end, made my nightcap rise up in the air.

Digitized by Google

The curtains were half opened, and I saw coming towards me the strangest figure that can be imagined. It was a young girl, very dark café-au-lait coloured, like the bayadere Amani, of perfect beauty and of purest Egyptian type. She had almond-shaped eyes, with corners drawn up, and eyebrows so black they looked blue; her nose was of delicate cut, almost Greek in its fineness, and she might have been taken for a bronze statue of Corinth, if the prominence of her cheekbones and the slightly African expansion of her mouth had not indicated, beyond all doubt, the hierogliphic race of the banks of the Nile.

Her slender and spindle-turned arms, like those of very young girls, were circled with some sort of metallic and glass rings. Her hair was all in plaits, and upon her breast hung an idol in green clay, whose whip with its seven lashes indicated Isis, the conductor of souls. A gold plate glittered on her forehead, and some tracery of paint peeped through her coppery cheeks.

As for her costume, it was very strange. Imagine a dress of wrappings, covered with black and red heiroglyphics, stiffened with bitumen, and apparently belonging to a freshly unswaddled mummy.

By one of those leaps in thought so frequent in dreams, I heard the crackled and hoarse voice of the bric-à-brac dealer, who was repeating like a monotonous refrain the sentence he had pronounced in his shop with so enigmatic an intonation: "The old Pharoah will not be pleased; the dear man loved his daughter."

There was one strange circumstance that did not much reassure me: the apparition had only one foot; the other leg was broken off at the ankle. She directed her course towards the table, where the mummy's foot was moving and jumping about with increased activity. Reaching there, she leant upon the edge, and I saw a tear come into her eyes.

Although she did not speak, I clearly discerned her meaning. She looked at her foot—for it was certainly hers—with an expression of coquettish sadness infinitely graceful; but the foot leapt and ran to and fro, as if impelled by springs of steel. Two or three times she stretched out her hands to seize it, but did not succeed in doing so.

Then there took place, between the Princess Hermonthis and her foot, which appeared to be endowed with a separate life, a very odd dialogue, in a very ancient Coptic, such as might have been spoken some thirty centuries ago among the tombs of the Country of Serapis. Fortunately for this evening, I knew Coptic to perfection.

The Princess Hermonthis said, in a tone of voice as sweet and vibrating as a crystal bell: "Well, my dear little foot, you keep running away from me. yet I took good care of you. I bathed you with scented water in an alabaster basin; I rubbed your heel with pumice stone dipped in palm-oil; your nails were cut with gold pincers and polished with hippopotamus' tooth. I was careful to choose for you painted and embroidered shoes with the points turned up, which made you the envy of all the young girls of Egypt. You had on your great toe rings representing the sacred scarabaeus; and you carried the lightest body a lazy foot could wish for."

The foot answered in a sulky and grieved tone: "You know very well that I no longer belong to myself. I have been bought and paid for. The old shopkeeper knew what he was about. He is still angry with you for having refused to marry him. It is a trick that he has played you. The Arab who broke open your coffin in the subterranean pit in the necropolis of Thebes, was sent by him. He wanted to prevent your going to the meeting of the people of the dark in the lower cities. Have you five gold pieces to redeem me?"

"Alas! no. My gems, my rings, my purses of gold and silver, all have been stolen from me," replied the Princess Hermonthis with a sigh.

"Princess," then exclaimed I, "never have I unjustly retained anybody's foot! Although you have not the five louis which it cost me, I give it back gladly. I should be in despair at making a cripple of so amiable a person as the Princess Hermonthis."

I said this speech in a sort of troubadour tone, that must have surprised the beautiful Egyptian. She cast on me a glance of gratitude, and her eyes lighted up with a bluish glitter. She grasped her foot, which this time submitted, like a woman about to put on her shoe, and adjusted it on her leg with much skill. This operation finished, she walked two or three steps in the room, as if to assure herself that she was really no longer a cripple.

"Ah, how pleased my father will be, he who was so disconsolate at my mutilation, and who, from the day of my birth, set a whole people to dig me out so deep a tomb that it might preserve me intact until that supreme day when souls must be weighed in the scales of Amenti. Come with me to my father; he will receive you well; you have restored me my foot."

I thought this proposition a matter of course. I put on a dressing-gown with great figures, which gave me a very Pharaonic air. In haste, I incased my feet in Turkish slippers, and I told the Princess Hermonthis that I was ready to follow her.

Before starting off, Hermonthis took from her neck the little green clay figure and laid it upon the scattered papers that covered my table.

"It is only right," said she smilingly, "that I should replace your paperweight."

She held out to me her hand, which was as soft and cold as an adder's skin, and we departed. For some time we shot with the rapidity of an arrow through a fluid and greyish medium, in which outlines scarcely visible passed on the right and on the left. For a moment, we saw only water and the sky. A few minutes later, obelisks began to loom up, and massive buildings and steps, bordered by sphinxs, became visible on the horizon.

We had arrived. The Princess led me before a mountain of rose granite, in which was an opening so narrow and low that it would have been difficult to distinguish from the fissures of the stone, if two stelæ decorated with sculpture had not made it evident. Hermonthis lighted a torch and started off, walking ahead of me.

There were corridors hewn out of the living rock. The walls, covered with panels of hieroglyphics and allegorical processions, must have busied thousands of arms during thousands of years. These corridors, interminable in length, led into square chambers, in the middle of which were made shafts, which we descended by means of steps or winding stairs. These shafts brought us to other chambers, whence diverged other corridors, variegated, likewise, with hawks, coiled serpents, the tau, the crook, mystic boats, prodigious labour that no living eye was to look upon, interminable legends in granite that the dead alone had time to read in eternity.

At last we came into a hall so spacious, so enormous, so measureless, that the end of it could not be perceived. As far as the eye could reach, extended rows of monstrous columns, between which quivered livid stars of yellowish light—these shining points revealing incalculable depths.

The Princess Hermonthis still kept hold of my hand, and graciously saluted the mummies of her acquaintance. My eyes grew accustomed to this dusky twilight and began to discern objects.

I saw, seated upon their thrones, the kings of the subterranean races, tall, dried-up old men, wrinkled, of parchment hue, black with naptha and bitumen, adorned with golden head dresses, barbed with breastplates and gorgets, studded with precious stones, with eyes fixed like those of a sphinx, and with long beard whitened by the snows of the centuries. Behind them their embalmed people stood, in the stiff and constrained postures of Egyptian art, preserving eternally the attitude perscribed by the hieratic codex. Behind the people their contemporary cats, ibises, and crocodiles mewed, flapped their wings, and sneered, made more monstrous still by their swaddling bands.

All the Pharaohs were there, Cheops, Kephren, Psammatichus, Sesostris, Amenophis—all the dark lords over the pyramids and tombs. Up on a more elevated platform sat King Chronos, and Xisuthrus, who lived at the time of the flood, and Tubal Cain, who preceded him.

The beard of King Xisuthrus had grown so that it had already wound seven times around the granite table on which he leant, musing and somnolent.

Farther away, in a dusty vapour, through the mist of eternities, I could vaguely distinguish the seventy-two pre-Adamite kings, with their seventy-two nations, now forever banished.

Having allowed me to enjoy this dizzy spectacle for several minutes, the Princess Hermonthis presented me to Pharaoh her father, who nodded to me very majestically.

"I have found my foot again! I have found my foot again!" cried the Princess, clapping her little hands with all the marks of frantic joy. "This is the gentleman who gave it back to me!"

The Keme races, the Nashi races, all the black, bronzed, copper-coloured races repeated in chorus: "The Princess Hermonthis has found her foot again!"

Xisuthrus himself was moved. He raised his heavy eyelids, passed his fingers through his moustache, and cast upon me a glance burdened with the weight of centuries.

"By Oms, the dog of hell, and by Tmei, the daughter of the sun and of truth, this is a brave and worthy boy," said Pharaoh, pointing towards me with his lotus-tipped sceptre. "What do you want for your reward?"

Emboldened by that audacity belonging to dreams, in which nothing appears impossible, I asked for the hand of Hermonthis. The hand for the foot seemed to me an antithetical reward in very good taste.

Pharaoh opened his glassy eyes wide in surprise at my jest and request.

"What country do you belong to, and how old are you?"

"I'm a Frenchman, and I'm twenty-seven years old, venerable Pharaoh."

"Twenty-seven years old, and he wants to marry the Princess Hermonthis who is thirty centuries old!" cried at once all the thrones and all the circles of nations.

Hermonthis alone did not appear to find anything unreasonable in my demands.

"If you were only two thousand years old," replied the aged King, "I would very willing give you the Princess; but the disproportion is too great; and then our daughters must have husbands that last. You don't know any longer how to preserve yourselves. The last ones brought here, hardly fifteen centuries ago, are now nothing more than a pinch of ashes. Look; my flesh is as hard as basalt, my bones are bars of steel. I shall be at the last day of the world with the same body and face I had when I was alive. My daughter, Hermonthis, will last longer than a bronze statue. Then the wind will have dispersed the last speck of your dust, and Isis, who succeeded in finding the fragments of Osiris, would be troubled to bring your body together once more. See how vigorous I am still and what a grip I have," said he, shaking my hand in the English fashion and making my rings cut into my fingers.

He gave me such a squeeze that I woke up, and I saw my friend Alfred, who was tugging at my arm and shaking me to rouse me out of my sleep.

"Well, you sound sleeper, must I carry you out into the street and let off some fireworks in your ears? It is past noon. Don't you remember you promised to come and take me to see M. Aguado's Spanish pictures?"

"Dear me, I had forgotton all about it," said I while dressing. "We will go there at once. I have the tickets here on my table."

I stepped over to get it; but imagine my astonishment, when instead of the mummy's foot I had bought the day before, I saw the little green image put in its place by the Princess Hermonthis.

Seymour Laird.

Digitized by Google

THEY sat side by side on a big hearth-rug, gazing into the glowing coals. The one was a young man of perhaps twenty-eight, and the other an old dog of perhaps ten. That's not a criticism on the poverty of the English language. It simply shows how much more a dog can "get out of," or perhaps "put into," ten years than a man.

They sat there, anyway—young or old, young and old—and they gazed into the coals. And the young one blew great clouds of smoke out of a briarwood at the old one. But the old one did not mind. He was acclimatised.

It was in the cosy bachelor apartments of Neil Richards. Neil was a fellow who had succeeded, by dint of presumable study, money, and late nights, in getting through college in a commendable manner, seven years before. Since that time he had been engaged in the financial business. Not exactly as a legitimate broker, nor as a negotiator of loans, nor again as a pawnbroker, but in that pleasant line which on a business letter head, if he had owned such a thing, would have been expressed something like this: "Neil Richards, Income Spender, Pleasant Street, Easyville." Anyway, he had been travelling, intermittently, to improve himself, as the phrase goes, since the day he calmly, and with the most approved senioric gravity, tucked a sheepskin under his arm, and discarded his cap and gown.

But after his peripatetic streak, he went back again at last to his old rooms, in his favourite seat on the hearthrug, with his dog beside him and—in love. The fellows at the club had said several weeks past, as Richards would excuse himself, get up, and go out about nine o'clock of an evening: "Funny about Neil, isn't it? He leaves us every night at nine o'clock, and goes home, and they say he sits down and talks to that old dog General of his till midnight. Surely he must be in love."

And the fellows were right. Neil was hopelessly, fearfully, and miserably in love. Her name was Dorcas—Dorcas Howland, not a particularly pretty name, nor a particularly pretty girl, but a girl with such a wealth of sweetness, tact, common sense, and intelligence, that more would have made her a curiosity.

Neil had seen her at what is known as a large affair one evening, two months ago, was presented, murmured his platitudes, had a waltz, and immediately put her on a pedestal. He had seen her a few times since, once driving, when he received a bow that kept him absent-minded for a week, and on a few other occasions at the house of a friend, where he had passed some of the shortest quarter hours of his existence talking to her.

And that was as far as he had gone. It isn't exactly strange, then, is it, that when a man almost deifies a girl he has known only two months, he should like to sit down on a hearth-rug and talk to an old dog he has known for ten years? A club, brandy-and-sodas, gossip, and late hours are no solace at all, under such circumstances.

But we left them on the hearth-rug gazing into the coals. "You see, General, it's like this: I'm in love—desperately in love—and Miss Howland doesn't care a rap for me. Probably thinks I am just like the rest of them, looking for her money, when I'm really not. You understand, General, that I'm not?"

The General blinked sympathetically, and looked hard at the coals. Neil threw an arm affectionately round the dog.

"You see, I like to tell you these things, old boy, because you never say anything about them." There was silence for a few moments, while Richards meditatively pulled away at his pipe and the dog pensively thought of his puppy-hood and its loves. "She's so sweet and dainty!" at last continued Neil. "How she would brighten up a home for us, wouldn't she, General?" The dog turned his head, and looking at his master, reached one great paw over and laid it on Richard's knee. "Shake, is it, old man? Well, here goes. I thought you felt as I did. Now, General, you and I must scheme how to get her." The dog thumped his tail appreciatively on the rug, and they both went to work staring at the coals again.

And so they sat on, Neil solemnly meditative, the General silently sympathetic. It was a good hour later when Neil's pipe had burnt out, and the dog's head had drowsily fallen against his shoulder, that Richard heard the lift bell ring, and a moment after the upward rush of the car. Then, as the lift stopped at his landing, he heard the voice of old Barker saying: "Yes, sir, Mr. Richards is always in at nights now, sir. I am sure you will find him still up. Door to the right, sir; and do be careful sir, not to go to the left, as thems Miss Stevens' apartments, sir, and no one is allowed to disturb her, sir, till I takes her up her cup of tea, and the saucer of milk for the grey cat, sir, at half after——" but the remainder of the old man's loquacity was muffled by the sound of voices.

Digitized by Google

"Some of the boys come to drag me out on one of their infernal midnight romps, I suppose," said Richards to himself, with a discontented sigh. "They did that only three nights ago. Why can't they let a poor devil smoke his pipe in peace?"

Then as footsteps approached the door, he arose and surveyed himself in a long mirror at the end of the room. He did not look very presentable, he admitted. His hair was ruffled, his clothes were full of tobacco ashes, and he hadn't, when he sat down, even taken the trouble to don a lounging jacket, hence was in his shirt-sleeves.

"But who cares?" remarked Richard to himself. "If these stupid night hawks will come here at such an hour, they will have to take things as they find them. Suppose they will have something to drink, however." As he turned to the cabinet set in the side of the room, with his back to the door, and reached for decanters and glasses, a knock sounded, and a cheery voice shouted: "Oh, Neil,—I say, Neil,—I'm coming in."

"Come in if you must," was the reply. "Bring them all in; you are never alone. You and your gang are, without exception, the most unexcelled set of thoughtless, revelling, peace-disturbers I know of. You fellows have been at this thing for ten years," continued Neil, "you know you have, Bob" (still busy with the decanters). "Don't you ever intend giving it up? Why don't you fellows say something? This is no monologue."

By this time Richard had succeeded in extricating the troublesome decanters from the mass of bottles and glasses, and, turning round, faced the door. To his amazement, instead of the crowd of merry faces he had expected to see peering in at him, he saw only two. One was that of Bob Cutting, his chum, and the other —was that—of Dorcas Howland. The door was wide open.

She stood a little in front. Cutting was in the doorway.

The gleam from the dying coals, and the ruddy reflection from a lamp with a big red shade over in the corner, brought out every detail of her face and figure.

And Neil stood, with a decanter in each hand, coatless and dusty and speechless. The silence did not last long, however. Miss Howland smiled, bowed sweetly to Neil, and stepped into the room. "Good-evening, Mr. Richards," she said, and held out her hand. Neil managed in a dazed sort of way, to set down the decanter that was in his right hand without breaking it, and accepted the offered hand.

Bob Cutting looked on and smiled. "Too astounded to speak, Mr. Richards?" remarked the young woman. "Well, an explanation is due to you. Then you may not think me so utterly indiscreet as appearances would seem to warrant. Mr. Cutting, will you kindly try to put matters straight, and at the same time assure Mr. Richards that we are his guests? His accent, as I recollect it, is a pleasing one. 'For this is no monologue you know,'" and she smiled pleasantly at Neil.

"Yes," broke in Cutting, as Miss Howland paused; "you see, Neil, it's like this. It does look funny I admit, but I was walking home with Dorcas—er—Miss Howland, from some working girls' club she engineers, and we were chatting about picturesque bachelor apartments, or rather, I was describing some of them to her that I know the best, and I struck yours. I think I must have grown eloquent in my description, for Miss Howland insisted that she must see these famous apartments, of which, by the way, all the girls have heard. Knowing it would be all right, so far as you were concerned, I proposed we come over to-night and make you a call, though"—as he looked round the room—"I really didn't think she'd come."

Neil, during the recital, had quite recovered himself, and privately decided that if a man and a girl were willing to take the social risk he surely could meet them half-way. So he calmly placed the other decanter on a table, and turning to them, remarked: "I am very glad to see you. This is a little bit out of the ordinary, but the unexpected is quite often the pleasantest. Won't you sit down, Miss Howland? I am extremely sorry that your visit to my den couldn't have been made under more favourable circumstances, at one of my little teas, for instance. Under other than the present circumstance I should feel that an apology was due for my personal appearance. I am quite aware that I have no coat on, that my hair is untidy, and that I have a general and virulent attack of the malady bachelor-at-homeness. However, I shan't apologise."

And then the democratic Neil pulled up two big armchairs, and, having seen his guests cosily seated before the replenished fire, calmly and coatlessly resumed his place on the hearth-rug beside the General. Miss Howland looked surprised, but said nothing.

Then she reached over and patted the silky head of the dog.

He took the caress in a dignified sort of way, but nestled closer, if possible, to Richards. "What a handsome fellow," she softly said; "and how much he thinks of his master," she added to herself.

The three chatted away together about bachelor dens, people, and other generalities for some time, when suddenly Miss Howland rose and, turning to Cutting, said: "I wonder if you'd mind granting me one more favour. I wish to have a little talk with Mr. Richards alone." She paused a moment. "I know it's unconventional, but the rest of this is, also, and I know you won't take it amiss, will you?"

"Not at all," Cutting answered. "Suppose I manipulate the ivories while you have your talk. Don't feel that it must be abbreviated on my account, but when you get through, why, do as they do in the plays, ring for me, and, like the footman, I'll appear. Is it feasible?"

"Quite so, thank you," answered the girl, "it's so good of you." And, with a pipe in one hand and a tobacco jar in the other, Bob vanished through the door, and a moment later the click of billiard balls announced that he had found occupation.

The girl turned to Richards. He had risen with Cutting and had now donned a smoking jacket, in which somehow, he felt better equipped for his strange tête-à-tête. As his eyes sought hers she looked him frankly in the face, and simply asked:

"Mr. Richards, what do you think of me?"

Richards was silent for a moment, and then, with his eye on the dog at his feet, said:

"Shall I tell you frankly?"

Digitized by Google

"Yes, please do," answered the girl.

He looked up. "I think you have lots of courage, are a bit injudicious, and, of course, did not come here without reasons."

She smiled. "You are frank, but don't you think it rude to assume the rôle of inquisitor in your first remark?"

"But you asked me, didn't you?" he gently replied.

"Yes, I suppose so," she said.

She stood absently looking down at shaggy General, sleeping peacefully on the hearthrug. Richards watched her a minute, and then, stepping forward, said softly: "Please sit down, Miss Howland, and then you can tell me as much as you wish."

A grateful look flashed into her face as she took the big chair he offered her, and sank into it a little wearily. Leaning back, she scrutinised the well-cut, thoughtful face of the man. He had taken his place beside the dog again, and as he sat staring at the coals in the flickering firelight, he seemed even handsomer than ever.

She looked at him a moment, and without moving said: "Mr. Richards, I've come here to-night on a queer mission. I wish advice. I wish to tell you something about myself, and then I want you to advise me as to what you think I ought to do. I have come to you under circumstances peculiar, to say the least, for these reasons: First, because what I have seen of you has led me to think you honest, frank, and sincere; second, because your friends assure me I am right. This has led me to believe you will be willing to overlook what might be construed as unwomanly, and, in addition, will be willing to help me in trouble. Am I right?" she hesitatingly asked.

"Yes, Miss Howland, you are," he replied, "people who know anything about you could not misinterpret your actions. Don't think circumstances affect me; but just tell me plainly what I can do for you."

"I thought you would take it so," she said in a tone of relief. "And now I'll tell you what I wish to, and pray don't regard it as a girl's whim—as a peculiar girl's whim—but simply try to assume the rôle of a willing listener and an impartial adviser. You see," she continued, "I have no one to go to. I am alone in the world. My parents are both dead, and I live with an elderly aunt, who is as good to me as anyone could be, but with whom I have absolutely nothing in common." The girl smiled thoughtfully. "She likes her tea and cat, her Goldsmith and Thackeray, early hours, and to be left alone. I am different. She is sixty-eight, and that's the reason, I presume. Besides, she was never married. And now, Mr. Richards, I have come to the place where I hardly know what to say. It's about my marrying. A funny thing to consult you about, isn't it? You see, ever since I was a child it has been taken for granted that when I grew up I should marry a certain individual. My parents both considered it a settled matter, my aunt the same; and, I suppose, as a child, I followed the general example. That man was Bob Cutting. We played together as children, living in adjacent houses, and virtually grew up together. I remember we used to have mock marriage ceremonies at which he and I always figured as the principals, with some other youngster as the clergyman, and we always looked forward to the time when as 'grown ups' our marriage might be made 'real.' So matters drifted along. The children's play stopped a good many years ago; but Bob has kept coming to see me just the same.

"And now—well, he wished to carry out in earnest what was begun in play. A few nights ago he asked me to be his wife."

The girl leant forward and absently smoothed the General's head, as he lay there watching the coals. Presently she said:

"Mr. Richards, then, and not till then, did I find I did not love him. But," she added, "I did not tell him so. I said only: 'We've been friends since we were children. Come to me next Monday night, and I will give you my answer.'"

For a moment she sat without speaking; then she concluded:

"Mr. Richards, you are Bob Cutting's dearest friend. He has but one friend like you. No man has—no man can have—no man wishes more. I come to you and ask you, who know him so well, what shall I do?

"Shall I tell him on Monday night that I'll marry him, or shall I say 'no'? Is it selfish in a girl placed as I am to think of her own future, or ought I to give it up to him? He has been good to me; so good to me; I like him, but I do not love him."

And then she leant wearily back in her chair, and fixed her eyes on Richards. He did not look up. He did not seem to realise her presence.

She watched him, and he watched the red embers glow, crumble, and fade into ashes. The dog whined in his sleep.

Then, finally, Richard raised his head, and quietly said:

"Miss Howland, I think it would be very wrong for you to marry Bob. As you say, I know him well. He is a fellow with such wealth of love for those he cares for, that if he finds it is not reciprocated he is miserable Think what a lifetime of it would mean to him. And now, you see, in what I've said so far I've considered only Bob. I think you ought also to consider yourself. Two lives are involved; and why should they both be ruined? You are both young. If I were you I should tell Bob, in the kindest way possible, that I did not love him. He will grieve at first, but I think when he finds out you were not for him he will see that it's for the best, and afterwards thank you. And, as for yourself, Miss Howland, when you have done this you can say, 'I've done my duty; I've done right,' and some day"—the man hesitated—"and some day perhaps some other good man will come along, and ask you to marry him; and the past, with its Bob, and its trouble"—and again he hesitated—"and its visit to Richards and the General will be a ghostly vision, which happiness and sunshine will soon wipe away."

Digitized by Google

"Thank you," she said cordially. "You've been very good. You'll return my visit some time, won't you?"

Richard took her hand, and holding it for a moment, said quietly: "I thank you; I will come. But before you go, I want to ask you just one question. Don't answer it unless you wish to. You told me that you don't love Bob; is it—is it because there's someone else?"

She waited a moment, and then replied firmly:

"No; there's no one else."

A moment later Cutting joined them in response to Richards' summons. As he stood before the fire, pulling on his gloves, he looked at each other good-humouredly, and said: "I'm awfully glad that you have become better acquainted; but I hope you haven't been engaged in the pleasing occupation of condemning a mutual friend. I see you've made friends with General, also, Miss Howland," he concluded.

"Yes," she replied; "General and I are the best of friends," and she leant over and softly patted the handsome head. "And General's master and I are going to be, too, are we not, Mr. Richards?"

"Yes, we are going to be—that is, I hope so," Richards said slowly.

* * * * *

The next moment she was gone.

Of course it's obvious. Love does not need to be diagrammed. And, of course, a year later, when the big house had its awning, and its carpeted steps, and its music, and its flowers, all was quite as it should be. And of course their friends heard the Mendelssohn march, and threw rice, and wished them joy. And Bob Cutting was best man? Of course not. And did the Mother Grundies shrug their white shoulders, and say: "What a beautiful bride, but I wonder how she could have done it; they say she was engaged to another?" Of course they did. And that is love, and about the way it generally turns out. Of course. HARRY PECK.

Correct solution to the Picture Puzzle in PEARSON'S WEEKLY EXTRA CHRISTMAS NUMBER. Figure-key appears on Page 25. The list of winners will be found in PEARSON'S WEEKLY, dated January 1st.

Digitized by Google

BY GEORGE GRIFFITH. Author of "Valdar the Oft-Born," "Briton or Boer?" "The Outlaws of the Air," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XXIII.

HER LADYSHIP LOOKS BACK.

SHE took her hands from her ears and raised her head, half expecting to hear the banging of the guns and the continuous roar of the Nordenfeldt still shaking the air about her. But, instead, she heard nothing but the accustomed sounds of the yacht's engines, and the whistling of the surplus steam from the pipes, and the lap and swish of the waves against her sides as she drove through the water, for Lorrain had already signalled for half-speed, and was running down to join the Independencia.

She looked ahead to where the Dessalines had been, and saw only a few dark objects bobbing about in the midst of a grey swirl of water.

"Where is the other ship?" she said, looking up with wondering, frightened eyes at Lorrain. "I mean the one that you were fighting?"

"She's on her way to the bottom in two or three pieces," he replied, smiling one of his pleasantest smiles at her. "The last two shots from the dynamite guns blew up her boilers, and I suppose that broke her back. Anyhow, she went down almost immediately."

"And what about the unfortunate people on board her? Are those dark-looking things in the water yonder——?"

Lorrain nodded, and said:

"Yes, those are some of them. Niggers, and about the vilest specimens of their kind that exist. The sort of people who don't take prisoners, except to amuse themselves with in a humourous and lingering sort of way, you know."

"Ugh! I understand. Horrible! But aren't you going to save them? They can't do us any more harm now, can they?"

"Not until we'd rescued them, and fed them and set them free on land again. Then they'd take the first opportunity of returning our kindness after their own peculiar style," he replied with another laugh.

"No, your ladyship, I don't propose to rescue them any more than I would rescue a lot of drowning rats, or any other vermin. I don't belong to the Aborigines Protection Society. In fact, if the whole of that excellent body happened to be drowning with those niggers yonder, I don't think I should feel inclined to interfere with the apparent purposes of Providence. Ah, General, I was wondering what had become of you!" he went on, turning to the President, who was coming puffing up the bridge ladder.

"Ah, mi amigo!" he gasped as he reached the bridge, "what a wonderful vessel is this that you command so excellently, and what wonderful guns! She has the speed of a hawk and the talons of a vulture. If I had her I would sink all the ships Hayti has, then I would bombard Porte au Prince, invade this inferno of niggers by land, and in a week or two all the island would be mine."

"And in the meantime, General," laughed Lorrain, "it might be as well if we went on to San Domingo and saw how matters were getting on there, eh? I presume you intend to re-take your own capital by way of a beginning?"

"With your help, if you will give it me, Señor Don Francisco, assuredly that is the best thing to be done," he replied, holding out both his fat hands towards Lorrain. "Help me to do that, and anything that the Republic or its President can give is yours."

"We'll talk about that when we've got you settled in the palace again, General," said Lorrain good humouredly. "Of course you will understand that, although I am more than pleased to be able to do what I can in support of lawfully constituted authority, I didn't come here on a purely philanthropic expedition. However, that will do later on. Meanwhile, will you be good enough to order the Independencia to follow us to Santo Domingo? We had better hurry on before your friend Manuelo has time to make too much hay of the place."

As soon as the gunboat came within hail the General ordered her alongside and made a pompous little speech to those on board on the subject of the glorious victory that someone else had won for him. He then told them how he was going back to retake his capital from the rebels, or to lay it in ashes with the terrible guns which had blown the Dessalines out of the water. This, naturally, produced a cheer from the gallant sailors and marines and fugitive politicians, who began to feel very brave now that there was no longer an enemy to run away from.

Then the two vessels dipped their flags to each other with due decorum and ceremony, and the Minnehaha swung her bow round to the westward again and headed away for Santo Domingo, at twenty-five knots, followed by the Independencia, doing a laborious fourteen.

When Lorrain had handed her ladyship down from the bridge he told her with a meaning smile that her husband should be at once released, so that he could keep her company while he had a talk on business matters with the General. Of course he knew perfectly well when he said this that the very last person in the world she wished to see just then was her husband, but he had his own reasons for wishing them to have a little conjugal chat together, and when he had reasons he was not accustomed to consider either the wishes or the feelings of other people.

She was, however, spared the ordeal for the present, for Sir Langton saw fit to assert his outraged dignity by declining to leave his own state-room until Lorrain had apologised to him, and his wife had come to express her regret for what he called her improper and unwifely conduct. It need hardly be added that neither had the slightest intention of doing anything of the kind.

He had sent his message to his wife in a note by her maid. When she had looked over it she sent the girl back to say there was no answer for the present, and then she walked aft, tearing the note into little pieces, and when she reached the stern she leant on the rail and dropped them over into the swirl of water that was seething up under the flying vessel's quarters.

Then she stood there looking out over the yacht's long white wake, thinking of all that had happened on that momentous morning, and wondering what was to be the outcome of it.

There could be no mistaking Lorrain's intentions now. In that moment when the brief battle was at its height, he had either purposely or involuntarily dropped the mask that he had so far worn, and he was hardly the man to do anything without deliberate intention. He had told her in so many words that he did not intend to live without her, or let her live without him. If that meant anything it meant that he loved her, and would take her by force if necessary.

But there came another thought less pleasant and even more disquieting than this one: Did he really love her and want her for herself, or did he mean to take her only so that he might gain possession of the priceless treasure that so far she had never let out of her keeping night or day?

And her husband? What was to be his fate, now that he was not only superfluous, but an obstacle which she felt Lorrain would strike from his path with as little compunction as he had left the survivors of the Dessalines to drown?

During the short time that the battle lasted she had learnt to know him better than she could have done in a year of quiet acquaintance. She had heard him give the orders that had carried death and destruction with them as coolly as he would have told the steward to bring another bottle of wine to the dinner-table, and he had heard the whistling of the enemy's shells about his ship with as little concern as he had listened to the cries of the sea-birds which followed the yacht.

Morally and physically he was absolutely master of the situation, and she and her husband were as completely in his power as little Arthur Pendril—who was just then sobbing with the after-terror of the fight in his berth—was in hers and his.

She had herself deliberately faced the possible necessity of putting this helpless child out of the way rather than allow him to imperil the position she had so rapidly and so skilfully won. She had got him on board the yacht with the intention that he should never return to the world of civilisation, but she shrank in terror and horror from the double crime which would make her equal in wickedness to Sybil Viney herself.

And yet if Lorrain demanded such guilty complicity from her, how was she to resist? This, then, was to be the outcome of her first crime and the successful scheming that had followed. Her tortured thoughts went back to the night when she was cowering behind the screen in the Professor's study, and she said to herself: "I would give my soul to get that thing." Now she had got it, and it seemed as though the price were about to be demanded from her.

Sir Langton did not appear at lunch. She had not heard him moving in his state-room when she went to hers to wash her hands, and when she sat down to table Lorrain, seeing her look inquiringly at his vacant chair, said quietly and almost apologetically:

"I suppose you are surprised at not seeing your husband here, Lady Pendril. I regret to say that he has seen fit to adopt such a preposterous line of conduct that I have been compelled to place him in confinement for the present."

"In confinement!" she echoed falteringly, and looking at him with undisguised fear in her eyes. "Why, what has he done?"

"I had a talk with him while you were on deck," he replied, "and he behaved in a fashion that I can only describe as ridiculous. He roundly accused me of piracy and murder, and vowed that the first opportunity he had of communicating with a British consul or man-of-war he would denounce me and have me handed over to what he calls 'justice.'

"Naturally my own protection demanded that I should, for the present at any rate, make it impossible for him to carry out such absurd threats. As you know, the business we are on is one that requires a certain amount of secrecy, and any untimely misrepresentations of that sort might ruin the whole thing. At the same time, of course, I can promise you that he shall be released as soon as it is safe for me to do so."

There was a sinister, although almost imperceptible, emphasis on the word "safe" which sent a chilly shudder through her nerves, and set her wondering for the moment whether she had already seen her husband for the last time.

"I am very sorry," she said, looking down at her plate, "very sorry indeed, but of course you are master here, and he had no right to question your actions, at least, not while he was enjoying your hospitality. Would you like me to go and have a talk with him after lunch? Perhaps I can bring him to a more reasonable frame of mind."

"You can, of course, do so if you wish, Lady Pendril," replied Lorrain, in rather a chilly tone. "Personally, I should think it would be better if he had a few hours to himself to think things over and cool down a little. To tell you the truth," he went on with an added meaning in his look and voice, "your husband appears to be even more incensed against you, whatever reason he may have for that, than he is against myself."

"Then in that case," she said, returning his glance as steadily as she could, "perhaps I had better take your advice for the present."

When they went up on deck again after lunch the opening of the harbour of Santo Domingo lay dead ahead of the yacht, and the white buildings of the ancient city of Columbus were distinctly visible on the port bow. Lorrain again invited her ladyship on to the bridge and the General also climbed the ladder after them. The yacht was slowed down to twelve knots and steamed in towards the bar. About a mile from the city Lorrain stopped her and said to the General:

"I see they've got a red flag flying over the citadel. I suppose that means that the rebels have got the town at their mercy, and if so they must be turned out. Would you prefer to open fire now, or shall we wait for the Independencia? She'll be over an hour coming up yet, I should think, and we can knock the citadel about their ears by that time. What do you think, General?"

"I leave it all in your hands, amigo," replied the President. "You are commander-in-chief here. Do as seems best to you."

"Very well," said Lorrain. "I don't believe in losing time at anything, especially fighting, so I shall begin at once. Captain Peters, just see what sort of practice you and Mr. Lennox can make at that building there with a red flag above it, and hoist a couple more Dominican flags at the mastheads so that they can see who we are. Then they'll know what we've come for. We've got to make the place too hot to hold them by nightfall."

Digitized by Google

The exploding dynamite played frightful havoc.

"Right, seenyor!" replied the Captain, "there's mighty little difficulty about that. I reckon dynamite won't take much account of venerable ruins like that. If you'll run her in under the point there we'll be able to get a square sight at it and start the circus right away."

While the yacht was running into the desired position it became evident that her arrival, flying the flags of the lately expelled President, had created not a little excitement in the city. The ramparts and bastions facing the river and the bay mounted a few old muzzle-loading guns that were nearly as old as the century, and from the bridge of the Minnehaha men could be seen running to these as though to load and train them upon her.

As the range was considerably under a mile, Lorrain ordered the Nordenfeldt and two of the Maxims to play on the ramparts while the two forward dynamite guns and one of the after ones concentrated their fire on the citadel. As soon as the guns were loaded and trained, he gave the order to fire, and the beautiful, harmless looking yacht was instantly transformed into something like a floating volcano, spouting out clouds of smoke and sheets of flame, and hurling storms of projectiles on the ramparts and the citadel.

For a few minutes the ancient guns of the half-dismantled batteries replied with a fitful feebleness and shockingly bad aim, and then the fire from the city stopped entirely, for the simple but sufficient reason that those who had survived the brief storm of bullets had fled helter-skelter to the nearest places of comparative safety.

Lorrain at once ordered the machine-guns to cease firing, but the dynamite guns continued to throw shell after shell into the citadel and arsenal. The exploding dynamite played frightful havoc with the old mud and stone walls, and at last a couple of shells struck the signal tower, on which the red flag was flying, together. The force of the combined explosions sent the upper part of it flying in fragments far and wide, and when the cloud of dust and smoke had drifted away the red flag had vanished.

"I think that will do for the present," said Lorrain. "Cease fire, Captain, but keep all the guns loaded and trained, and be ready to open fire again the moment the flag goes up, if it does. Now, General, we'll wait for the Independencia. I think I see her smoke out yonder, and when she comes in you can send her captain ashore to demand the surrender of the town and the giving up the ring-leaders of the rebellion. If they refuse we'll just knock the place about their ears. I suppose your people ashore will have taken the hint and turned on the rebels by this time?"

"De veredad, amigo!" replied the General enthusiastically. "Of a certainty they will have done so or are doing so even now. You will soon hear the fighting in the streets. Your coming will give them new heart when they see how strong you are to help them, but you will not injure the town more than you can help, will you? It is somewhat ruinous in parts already, and it will cost a great deal to rebuild when we get back, and the treasury is not over full."

"That I can well believe, General," laughed Lorrain. "I don't suppose you'd be foolish enough to leave much behind you for that scoundrel Manuelo to steal. You are too good a president for that I should fancy."

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE PRICE OF VICTORY.

THE Independencia came bustling into the bay about an hour later, and during this interval there had been a cessation of hostilities, as though by common consent, but no messages had been exchanged between the yacht and the shore. Lorrain was far too good a tactician to risk any of his scanty crew by putting them, even for a few minutes, into the power of the rebels, and although the shore batteries had ceased to fire on the yacht, possibly in the fear of provoking further reprisals from her terrible guns, the temptation of firing on a boat might have proved too strong for the prudence of the semi-savages in possession of the city.

On shore, however, fighting was going on fast and furious. The brief, but deadly cannonade from the yacht had proved to the defeated party that the fugitive President must have returned with some mysterious, but very formidable ally, and when the Independencia was made out in the distance, steaming into the harbour decked, like the yacht, with Dominican colours, the correct conclusion was immediately arrived at that the Dessalines had been sunk, and that the available naval force was entirely on the side of the lately-fugitive President.

This particular revolution, like all others of its kind, was based on no worthy motives or deep principles involving necessary revolt against intolerable tyranny. It was simply the armed struggle of one faction with another for the spoils of office. It was, in fact, not unlike a general election in this country, saving for the fact that it was conducted with bullets instead of ballot-papers.

In such struggles there are always large numbers of combatants on both sides whose loyalty is a mere matter of expediency and opportunity. Whichever side is getting the best of it for the time being receives deserters in plenty from the other, and it often happens that on these the ultimate issue of the fight depends.

It had been thus during the night-attack which the insurgent leader had made on the city. As the President had explained to Lorrain, it was not the strength and valour of Doctor Manuelo, but the treachery and defection of his own people that had compelled him to take flight.

But now the balance was swaying the other way. A President who could take flight in the morning a beaten man, sink his pursuer out at sea and come back in the early afternoon and knock the citadel to pieces, was apparently a good man to be on the same side with, and so, when the Presidential standard was again raised by his more faithful adherents, not only did the deserters come flocking back, but some hundreds of the Doctor's officers and men came with them, and a very pretty little battle was the result.

This was about at its height when the Independencia steamed up the river with guns trained and men at quarters, making quite an imposing show. In obedience to orders she had received as she passed the Minnehaha, she dropped a boat flying a white flag as she came to a standstill off the now half-ruined citadel.

This boat carried an ultimatum from the President to Doctor Manuelo, demanding immediate cessation of hostilities and disarmament of the rebel forces under pain of bombardment. The taste that they had, had given them little appetite for more of the same kind, supplemented by the work of the eight quick-firing guns of the Independencia; and the dusky Doctor, under pressure amounting to threats from his principal supporters and the foreign residents in the city, threw up the sponge on condition that there should be no shootings or hangings afterwards, and that he and those leaders of the revolution who chose to do so should be permitted to retire into Haytian territory.

Whether or not this view of the situation would have commended itself to the President and his new ally it is hardly worth while to inquire, for while the boat was on its way to the Minnehaha the Government forces in the city, no doubt inspired by an added fervour of re-born loyalty, and a desire to atone for their earlier lapses, and possibly thinking, too, that dead revolutionists are more conveniently dealt with than living ones, took advantage of the lull in the fighting, and flung themselves in a furious assault on the inclosure in which the arsenal, citadel, and barracks stand.

This was now the last hold of the rebels, and they carried it with a rush, and settled the matter out of hand by a wholesale butchery, which ended with the suspension of Doctor Manuelo from the end of a pole thrust out of one of the lower windows of the citadel. It was not exactly in accordance with the rules of civilised warfare, but neither the state of Santo Domingo nor the world at large was any the poorer for it, and it had the advantage of simplifying matters a great deal.

Before sundown General Gregorio had landed and re-entered his capital with such pomp and circumstance of victory as the state of affairs permitted. The night was mostly spent in feasting and revelry, varied by a few summary executions and clearing up the streets, and by the following day Santo Domingo was little the worse for the revolution, save for the damage done to her antiquated fortifications and the loss of some hundreds of her citizens who had fallen victims to the coloured version of the divine rights of democracies.

The following day Her Majesty's cruiser Magicienne appeared off the harbour and sent a boat ashore. This incident was not unconnected with a lively desire on the part of the British and French consuls to know more than Lorrain felt inclined to tell as to the true origin and character of the Minnehaha, and the result was a considerable amount of hard swearing as to the perfect legitimacy of her action under the orders of General Gregorio in support of his lawful authority. It remained, however, for Captain Hiram Peters to settle the matter by producing the yacht's American papers, running up the Stars and Stripes, and referring the British commander to the United States Foreign Office. The correspondence on the subject is probably going on still.

Flung themselves in a furious assault on the inclosure.

As soon as this little matter was disposed of, Lorrain had a long and private interview with the General in the palace on the subject of the price to be paid for the timely assistance of the Minnehaha and her guns, and this, after a certain amount of boggling on the part of the President, and some very firm and plain speaking from Lorrain, took the form of a concession which conferred upon him the privilege of searching without let or hindrance throughout the territory of the Dominican Republic for any precious metals, gems, or treasure, with full permission to work all deposits that he might discover, and to export whatever he might find free of duty and without examination.

In consideration of this Lorrain undertook to exert his influence in the raising of a second loan of a hundred thousand pounds to assist the President in the carrying out of certain developments of the natural resources of the country which, by a curious coincidence, were mostly comprised within the limits of his own estates.

When this important document had been duly sealed, signed, and delivered with a dispatch wholly foreign to the official and commercial traditions of the Republic, Lorrain took it back with him on board the yacht, which was lying off the town with her guns still mounted and loaded. He found her ladyship on deck amusing herself with the boy, to whom she appeared suddenly to have taken a strange and, indeed, unaccountable fancy, which seemed in singular contrast to the sinister designs which had taken her to St. Thomas.

"You appear to be getting great friends," he said, as he came beside her chair under the awning. "It is a pity that your interests are somewhat conflicting."

She coloured slightly as she looked up at him and said:

"Yes, it seems odd, doesn't it? but he is really a very nice little fellow, in spite of his—well—extraordinary origin. I really don't see why we shouldn't try and make things pleasant for the poor little fellow while—while——"

"Well, while he's with us. Suppose we put it that way," said Lorrain, with a smile. "Of course the poor little chap will be lonely, but still we've given him a pretty interesting time so far; haven't we, young man?"

The boy—who was a slim, active, gracefully-built little fellow, with a handsome but not altogether agreeable face—looked up at him and said quite collectedly:

"Yes; it was great fun, and I like you and Lady Jessica very much for bringing me to see it. When are you going to have some more fighting and shoot the cannons off again? I shan't be frightened next time."

"Well, you seem to have got over your fright pretty quickly," laughed Lorrain, "and I think I could make a man of you if I had the bringing up of you. How would you like him for an adopted son, Lady Pendril?"

Her ladyship stared at him for a moment in silence, then she beckoned to the boy's nurse and told her to take him away for the present. When the boy had gone she said rather coldly:

"What do you mean, Señor Lorrain?"

"Just what I said," he laughed, "and that after all wasn't very much. But really you know you looked so nice—I mean, of course, the two of you made such a pretty picture—as I came along the deck, that somehow the idea came naturally into my mind. He seems a nice little fellow, and it would be a pity if anything had to happen to him."

"I think we won't talk about that, please!" she said a trifle sharply. "Sufficient unto the day is the—well—the wickedness thereof. And talking of that," she went on after a moment's hesitation, "may I ask what you have done with my husband? I've somehow got an idea that he is no longer on board the ship."

"You are perfectly right, Lady Pendril," he said, pulling a deck chair up beside hers, and letting himself drop gracefully into it. "The fact is, that until Sir Langton comes to a much more reasonable frame of mind, he is capable of interfering so very seriously with our plans that it will be absolutely necessary to keep him in confinement, either until he can manage to take a more sensible view of the situation or till we have accomplished what we wish to do.

"For instance, suppose he had managed by any means to communicate with the lieutenant of the Magicienne when he was on board examining our papers, what do you suppose he would have thought of an English baronet being kept in durance vile on board a private yacht, that had just sunk a warship and bombarded a city? Why, in half-an-hour we should have been under the Magicienne's guns, and probably the whole lot of us would have been under arrest, pending a visit to Kingston and an inquiry which might have had the most unpleasant result for us.

"Well, now, I felt almost certain that either the Magicienne, or some other cruiser, would put in here as soon as rumours about yesterday's doing got about, and as I don't believe in taking any chances, I took the liberty of sending your husband ashore last night and handing him over to my friend Gregorio. You needn't disquiet yourself in the slightest about him. He is perfectly safe and unable to do any harm either to himself or to anyone else."

"You—you have not—I mean, nothing has happened to him, I hope!" she faltered. "Of course, he is being well treated, and is comfortable as well as what you call safe. I cannot consent to any violence or ill-treatment, you know. Surely I have been wicked enough already in all conscience, without consenting to any more crimes, and you must remember that he is my husband after all, even if he has behaved absurdly and put himself in the way."

"My dear Lady Pendril," he replied with the most ceremonious politeness, "I can assure you that you need not have the slightest anxiety on your husband's behalf. As I have told you, he is perfectly safe, and I can assure you once more that the very best possible care will be taken of him. But now I will ask you to grant me your confidence in that matter, to leave it absolutely to me, believing that I shall do the best I can for everyone; and then, for the present, dismiss it from your mind, for I have come to talk to you about something else of great importance."

"Very well," she said in a somewhat steadier tone; for in spite of the obvious double meaning of his words she knew it would be hopeless to attempt to make him speak more plainly. She knew, too, that for the present, at least, Lorrain's power over her was practically as absolute as it was over her husband, what ever had become of him, and that nothing could be gained by showing weakness. "I know," she went on, "that you are master of the situation, and I, for one, am perfectly prepared to trust to your generosity. Now what is it? Anything about the treasure?"

"Yes," he said, unfolding the paper which he was carrying in his hand, "yes, it is about that. Here is an authority from the Government which we have just put on its feet again, giving us all the rights and powers we want to go and hunt up Don Christobal's treasure-chest and bring it away with us if we can find it. It grants us several other things as well, but that is the most important just now. I have made all my arrangements on shore for a start. I propose, if things remain quiet, as I expect they will, that we shall make up a sort of picnic up the river to-morrow—a little prospecting party, in fact—just to see if the chest is where it is supposed to be, and to locate it exactly. That, of course, we cannot do without your assistance. And now, Lady Jessica," he went on in a lower and softer tone, laying his hand with almost imperceptible gentleness over hers as it lay on the arm of her chair, "I have curbed my natural curiosity about this wonderful Gold Magnet of yours until now—that is to say to the very eve of the expedition which depends for success entirely upon its powers—do you not think I have been patient enough? Marvellous as what you have told me about it is, I have taken your word for it with absolute confidence. I have never even asked you to show it to me. May I not see it now?"

As he said this his hand closed with a gentle, caressing pressure over hers, which said a thousand times more than his words. She shivered a little in the hot, breathless, afternoon air, and, drawing her hand away from his, she got up almost wearily, and said with a not very successful attempt at a smile:

"Well, yes. I don't see why you shouldn't. After all, it would not be very much use to me without your help. If you will come down into the cabin I will show it to you."

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

TOM HENDERSON, THE MINER.

TOM HENDERSON sat alone in his rough cabin, buried in deep thought.

His elbows rested upon a board which covered the top of a barrel. Ever and anon he would stroke, or rather pull, the long, pointed beard which ornamented his chin. Then he would tap his forehead as though endeavouring to recall some scene of the long ago.

"I wish it would hurry up and get daylight; so that I could have another good look at the face that's here in this trinket," and he lifted a small gold locket from his improvised table.

"I know I have seen those features before," he muttered, "but where, I cannot tell. If my candles hadn't all burnt out I could be gazing at the picture now, but it won't be long to wait, because I can see a few rays of light stealing through the chinks of the wall.

"Funny that I should have picked up this thing on the mountain trail. Some poor pilgrim must have dropped it, 'cause I'll swear that none of the old men in camp ever 'toted' it about with them. I've seen some one that it puts me in mind of, but who, when, and where I've run acrost 'em, I don't know.

"Oh, pshaw!" continued the miner. "I don't see why I should be bothering my head about the matter. If it is the picture of some one I've seen in my younger days, it matters nothing to me, for hasn't Tom Henderson been dead to the world for many years?"

The lonely tenant of the cabin, however, could not shake off the fascination which the likeness seemed to possess for him, and again lifted the locket from the table. This time he turned it so that the feeble beam of morning which penetrated a small hole in the wall would fall directly upon it.

"It looks almost the same as my Margaret did when we were married. But it can't be her picture, for we never had anything of this kind in our house," he repeated. "Oh, there was a home!" and the voice of the miner choked with emotion as he recalled the scene.

"Home, wife, and daughter swept away in one night by the angry waters of the Missouri! Ah, well, it was the will of Providence! and I submit to the chastisement!"

With this remark Tom Henderson placed the trinket which had so much interested him in his pocket, and proceeded to start a fire in an old broken stove that he might cook a little breakfast before going down into the gulch to begin his day's labour.

The old rusty coffee-pot was steaming, and the salt pork was sizzling in the frying-pan when the door of the cabin was burst open, and a young man, perhaps twenty-five years old, fell prostrate upon the floor.

"Halloa! Halloa! What is this? Somebody in distress and hurt, too! There's blood all over him. Say, stranger, what is it? What's happened to ye? Who's been doing you up in this shape? Hey? Can't ye answer?"

A groan from the lips of the wounded man was the only response.

"You're hurt bad," observed the miner, bending over the form of his unannounced guest. "Hit hard, I should say you was! Why, somebody's been carving you up as though you was nothing more nor less'n a dead bullock.

"Tom!" continued the miner to himself, "I reckon you've got work enough right here in the cabin to-day without going down to the washings. This chap needs patching up mighty quick or else all the life that's in him will run out through the holes that some wicked cuss has made.

"Say, friend, ye speak, and let a poor 'pill-garlic' know who you are and how ye came to be in this shape? Wake up, man. You're in Tom Henderson's cabin, and there ain't a 'galoot' east nor west of the Sierras that would dare to trouble ye while you're in his keeping."

"Margaret, Margaret! Save her!" gasped the sufferer.

"Save Margaret!" exclaimed Tom. "Would to Heaven that I could have saved her years ago when she was calling to me for help from the cruel river. But who is your Margaret, stranger? Who is it, bearing that name, that needs a friend? Old Tom Henderson would lay down his life to help any woman who possesses that name."

"They have taken her somewhere. Torn her from my side and left me for dead." As though the exertion of speaking was more than the wounded man could bear he relapses into unconsciousness.

Tom made no attempt to recall the young man to his senses, for, as he muttered to himself: "The lad is not going to go under right away, I opinion, and he won't feel me patching him up half as much if I let him lay asleep."

Despite the rough manner of the miner, no woman's hand could more gently have dressed the wounds of the poor unfortunate than did he. Tenderly Tom lifted his guest and laid him on his own hard couch, and then he turned to partake of his breakfast, the preparation of which had been so unexpectedly broken in upon.

As he sipped the pot of strong coffee, Henderson soliloquised: "I wouldn't be afraid to gamble my pile that Jim Darnley has had a hand in this affair. I know that he with some of his crew are back again in these parts. Now, if I find that it is that villain's work there be considerable excitement in this camp, and old Judge Lynch will be master of ceremonies!

"Eh? what did you say?" asked Tom, as a moan from his patient attracted his attention.

"Where have you taken her? Give her back to me, or I will tear your heart out!" Thus exclaiming, the wounded man sprang to his feet, and clutched Tom fiercely by the throat.

"Hold on, hold on, stranger. You never was put up right to pull me to pieces, even in your best days, so how can ye expect to stand much show when you haven't more'n an ounce of strength. Take it easy, take it easy, and tell me what it is about this Margaret. I'm your friend, and will do all I can to help you and her too."

The stranger sank back upon the bed, but sat with glaring eyes riveted upon Tom. At length, as reason began to return, he murmured:

"Oh, yes; I remember all, now. The stage was stopped, a short fight ensued, I was struck down, and I saw my wife borne away in the grasp of one of the burly ruffians."

"What did you say?" exclaimed Tom. "'Stage held up!' It's funny I didn't hear anything about it. But then, how could I? I haven't been down to the hotel for a week. But how did you happen to tumble in here? The stage don't come within a mile of this place, it drives down through the canyon."

"I tried to follow in pursuit of the robbers who were bearing away my bride. Although it was dark, I noticed that they ascended the mountain. I crawled on after them, climbing higher and higher until I fell exhausted across your threshold."

"It's mighty funny how I happened to miss ye."

"Miss me?" feebly asked the wounded man. "What do you mean?"

"Mean? I mean that I climbed the trail after dark last night, and I didn't see anybody, but I picked up a mighty handsome picture. Maybe it belongs to some of the folks in the stage. Did you ever see it before?" and Tom Henderson drew the locket, which had interested him so much, from his pocket and handed it towards his companion.

"Why, it belongs to me, and that is the likeness of my wife."

"Say, young man," returned Tom, bending a look upon the stranger that was almost fierce in its intensity. "Is that the picture of your wife?"

"Yes, yes, it is."

"Then tell me what was her name before the parson made you two one."

"Margaret Henderson."

"And how old might she be, stranger?" The voice of the miner trembled as he asked the question.

"Scarcely nineteen."

"And was the young girl's father or mother alive when you married?"

"No, she was an orphan. Her parents were drowned during a flood along the banks of the Missouri, when my Margaret was but a child. She was rescued. Was found, so it was stated, floating on a piece of timber."

"Great Heaven! Is it possible!" exclaimed Henderson, excitedly. "Stranger, you stay here. Don't leave the cabin until I return."

"Where are you going?"

"To wrest from the clutches of that villain Darnley your Margaret, my Margaret, your wife, my daughter," and the infuriated miner rushed forth from the cabin, leaving his guest spellbound with astonishment.

About the hotel of Wagle's Pass were loitering the usual number of miners, gamblers, and chronic loafers.

The were absorbed in the interesting account of the robbery of the stage coach the night before, which was being retailed to them by a heavy-whiskered, beetling-browed individual, who claimed to be one of the victimised passengers.

"Whoever did the job, did it in good shape," remarked the narrator. "There were only three of them, but they called 'hands up' before any man of us could pull a gun. So you see, although I hate to cave in and shell out my dust without making a fight, I had to weaken, or else go under."

"But who was it held ye up?" asked one of the bystanders.

"That's what I'd like to know," was the reply.

"Then if you'd like to know who stopped that stage last night, I'll tell you!" It was Tom Henderson that spoke.

"Yes, boys, I'll tell you who it was. It was Jim Darnley, and there he stands! Up hands, Jim! I've got you covered!"

If the desperado had made an attempt to have drawn a weapon, he would have been a dead man in a moment, for the miner had thrust the muzzle of a revolver to within a foot of his temple.

"Yes, Jim Darnley! You and your gang held up that coach, and, what's more, not being satisfied with just robbing the passengers, you carried off a young woman to your den in the mountains. Now, mates, that woman is my daughter, and I'm here to compel this wretch to release her, and then see that he is made to pay the penalty of his many crimes."

"Darnley!" continued Henderson, again addressing the robber, "your hours of life are few, and the moments are speeding rapidly by. Unbuckle that belt of weapons about your waist, and let them drop. Then right about face and lead us to where you have confined your captive."

With an oath the bandit obeyed, for he saw no particle of sympathy in the stern faces of the men by whom he was surrounded.

"As I said a minute ago," remarked Darnley, "that when a man has got a gun pointed at you, you'd better come pretty near doing what he tells you to, so, you old 'cradle-rocker,' I obey orders. Come on, I'll turn the young woman over to you in short order, but I'll tell you on the 'straight,' that I wouldn't have bothered with her at all if I hadn't thought by her looks she had some rich folks in the East who'd be willing to come down handsome to get her out of my clutches."

The procession which wended its way up the mountain grew larger and larger, swelling its numbers by reinforcements from the miners, who dropped pick, pan, and spade to witness the release of their comrade's daughter and assist in the punishment which they felt sure would be meted out to the robber chieftain.

They climbed a steep trail nearly to the crest of one of the mountain-spurs, when Darnley halted and said:

"Within five hundred yards of here I have half-a-dozen men well-armed, who won't hesitate to shoot if they see me in this company. Now, if some of you fellows don't want to lay down to rest with an ounce or two of lead in your bodies you'd better let me go on ahead and arrange for your reception."

A derisive laugh followed this suggestion, but it was quickly checked by Henderson, who said:

"Mates, Jim is right! He and I will go on alone."

"Do you mean it, man?" asked the robber, looking with astonishment at the miner.

"Certainly, otherwise I should not have said so. But, mind you, Darnley, upon your treatment of me and my child depends your life and those of your band. Act square for once, and you may be allowed a chance to repent."

Digitized by Google

"All right, old man," answered Darnley; "I know I've got a pretty bad record among you fellows, but seeing that you are willing to trust me, you can depend upon it I'll act square! Have no fear, boys," he continued, addressing the miners: "your friend will come back inside of half an hour, none the worse for having travelled a quarter of a mile in the company of Jim Darnley, the road-agent."

Without hesitation, Tom Henderson followed the robber chief up the trail, leaving the group of miners wrapped in astonishment at his temerity. Nor had their wonder ceased when they heard him returning, and as he rounded a bend in the narrow path, they were elated to see that their bold companion was leading a young woman by the hand.

"Mates," began Tom, "this is my daughter, but she didn't expect to find a father up here in the mountains. I'll tell it all to you later on, if you'll come down to the cabin, for there is a person there the 'little one' is most anxious to see."

"Where is Darnley and his gang?" asked one of the group.

"They are making tracks down the other side of the mountain, and if they keep on going at the rate I saw them start, they'll be a great many miles away from here by sundown."

"What! Did you let 'em off?"

"That's just it, my friend," answered Tom. "They deserved hanging, every one of 'em, but it wasn't for us to place nooses round their necks. Two wrongs never make a right. Come to the cabin later on, and we will talk it all over." So saying the sturdy miner led his daughter away to place her in the arms of her wounded husband.

* * * * *

It was a joyful day in Tom Henderson's rough cabin. Joyful, yet that joy was mingled with sorrow, for the father, looking upon his children, could not help recalling the days when he was blessed with the presence of a true and noble wife, and master of a cosy, comfortable home.

"It is kind of strange," remarked Margaret, "that you should have picked up that locket."

"Yes, but not so strange as it is that we should meet in this way. What causes your trip here to the mines?"

"Nothing, but recreation, a journey for pleasure—but I am afraid that the rough experience through which we have passed will cause us to return home as soon as possible. And when we do, sir," went on the young husband, grasping the hand of the miner, "you must accompany us. I am possessed of sufficient of this world's goods to place us all beyond want."

"I, too, have been fairly prosperous," replied Tom. "I have stored away beneath that hearth-stone gold enough to make us all rich, but God knows when I was gathering it I never supposed that I should have the pleasure of sharing it with my daughter Margaret."

MARLTON DOWNING.

A HEARTLESS LITTLE MAID.

"Beware, young man, she is fooling thee; Beware, O, take care."

"No, I can never marry a man who smokes. The smell is so horrid; and, besides, I must be first in my husband's affections. I must have no rivals in the shape of dirty old pipes and ragged tobacco pouches."

"You shall have no rivals, Miss Fortesque. You can have none. You are more perfect than any pipe. Not even the little one I bought last year is for a moment to be compared——"

"No, I suppose not," she broke in, laughing mischievously; "at least, you say so now. But old sweethearts are dangerous, and men have returned to their old loves before now," and the blue eyes glanced merrily, and the little feet tapped the floor. I grew desperate.

"I will sacrifice anything you wish. I will, indeed. I will never smoke again. I will burn everything."

"Even the little pipe you bought last year?" she said, with a provoking smile.

I could have kissed or killed her at that moment.

"Even the little pipe I bought last year," I echoed sadly, and I think there must have been a tear in my eye. "I will place myself beyond the reach of all temptation. And then?"

"Then we will begin to think about it," she retorted, jumping up and moving towards the door.

"Think about it?" I said. "Do you realise what I am going to sacrifice? Can you promise no more?"

"I am afraid not. You see, I must prove you first. The spirit is often willing, but the flesh is weak."

"I will be strong," I cried; "and I may hope?"

"All men may hope. But you will be well watched, and one cigarette will shatter all your hopes. The house will now adjourn until the end of March, when we will reopen the debate. Good-bye; don't forget the little pipe," and she danced out of the room, turning round at the door to give me a mocking little bow and a smile that left me a raving maniac.

Slowly and sadly I went home and climbed up the stairs to my sanctum. I sat down in a comfortable chair and thought. There was a pipe on the table by my side; it was the little one she was so jealous of. The firelight fell on its glowing bowl, and I believe it winked at me. I took it up tenderly and stroked it. My eye wandered to the tobacco-jar. I reached out my hand and took the lid off. I filled the pipe, looking like a guilty thing. Then I went to the door and locked it and drew the curtains close over my window. I took a match and struck it, but I hesitated, and the match burnt my fingers and fell on the floor. I lit another, but again the voice of conscience whispered to me, and again I burnt my fingers! Then I swore loudly and hurled the pipe into a corner, and sent the match-box and tobacco jar after it.

My heart swelled with pride: I had conquered. A vast range of possibilities opened up before me. What might I do in the future with such a will of iron? I grew reckless, and began to revel in my new strength.

Digitized by Google

I rose and took a newspaper which I spread out on the table. Then I laid a box of cigars on it and two boxes of cigarettes; on the top of these one or two cigarette holders, and a dozen pipes of different sorts and sizes. After that I fetched the pipe from the corner and laid it reverently on the summit of the heap, "a sorrow's crown of sorrow"; over them all I softly poured the fragrant tobacco from my jar, and began to collect my pouches.

"They will smell," I murmured to myself; "but the sacrifice must be made complete."

Then I unlocked the door and drew back all the curtains and pulled up all the blinds. I was not going to hide my light under a bushel. I put myself in the direction of the fireplace, laid hold of the paper by its four corners, and shut my eyes. In a minute all would be over. I moved towards the fireplace, but, as I did so, a thought struck me, and I hesitated.

"Am I doing right? It will be a sinful waste. I will give all away to the poor. And then, ought not I to keep some of the things? That pouch my aunt worked for me? That pipe my brother gave me? The presents from various members of the family? No, it would hardly be quite right."

I hesitated and was lost.

There came a knock at the door, and Willoughby entered.

Willoughby is a great friend of mine—so far as any non-smoker can be a smoker's friend. I would not let him be a witness of my defeat. I put the newspaper and its contents hastily down on the table.

"What on earth are you doing, Johnson?" he cried.

"Oh, I'm just—just clearing up," I said, with an attempt at a smile. "The room gets in such an awful muddle, you know."

"Your tobacco looks as if you kept it on the floor," he said, flinging himself into a chair. "But I have something to talk to you about. We have always been great friends, but hitherto there has been one bar to the perfect communion of our souls. You smoke, I do not. At last that bar is going to be removed."

A cold sweat gathered on my forehead. He had guessed my intentions, or had Lil told him? She could not have been so mean as to publicly crow over her conquest! I feebly answered "Yes," with a mixture of assent and interrogation in my tone.

"Yes, old man," he said, rising and grasping my hand; "there is now nothing between us. I am going to—to smoke."

I looked at him in silent astonishment.

"Yes, old man, smoke. Why do you look so concerned? It is not very bad, is it?—I mean the beginning?"

I saw his enthusiasm die away as the reality rose before him.

"Oh, no!"

I replied in a tone that suggested a few survivors of the ordeal.

"You don't seem very glad," he said; "but I am going to let you teach me. What shall I start on? Quick, tell me. My courage is screwed up to the point. I can't wait a moment."

The fiend of malice entered my soul. If I were to suffer by seeing him smoke, and knowing that I must deny myself even a cigarette, he should suffer, too. I have some peculiarly rank cigars that I keep for my enemies. I gave him one.

He lit it, and pulled at it vigorously, talking the while to keep his courage up.

"Why don't you smoke, old man?" he said jovially. "I thought you could never resist the smell. Come, light up."

"I am going to give it up for a time—Lent, you know. Must give up something. Doctor's orders, too. Bad for the heart. Waste of money. Think of so many poor people who want for bread."

"What?" he cried; and he began to jeer at my infidelity.

I reviled him under my breath; but as he grew paler and ceased to chatter, I thought I was revenged, and even began to pity him.

At last he let the cigar out, and grew very thoughtful. I poured him out something to drink, and we both imbibed steadily for two hours. I, to drown sorrow and regret, and he to keep himself alive.

Then we both grew more cheery and communicative. He told me he thought he would never repeat such an experience, but did not see how to avoid it. Fact was, he said, he had promised some one—had promised a lady—to smoke. She had said she would not marry a man unless he smoked. Besides, smoking destroyed germs.

Confidence begets confidence, and told I him my story with tears in my eyes.

"I cannot do it," I cried.

"I don't think I can, either," he moaned. "But I must, or she will not marry me. How I wish we could exchange! You are in luck. What an excellent wife yours will make you! So considerate of your health, so thoughtful for the poor!"

"You are in luck indeed. She must be a sweet girl. So sensible. She's quite right about germs. Exchange is no robbery. Let's exchange. We will introduce each other. The rest will be only a question of time."

"It's a bargain!"

"I have perfect faith in your taste, but who is she?"

"I think you have met her. Lilian Fortescue. What on earth's the matter?"

I had sworn a loud oath at the mention of the name, and crushed a cigarette box to pieces with my fist.

"What's the matter," I cried. "Why, you fool, there's no need for any exchange. We have both been fooled by the same girl."

For a few minutes neither of us spoke, but Willoughby hurled a fresh cigar I had given him into the grate, and my hand slowly stole towards the little pipe I bought last year. It was still filled. I lit it, and after a few puffs, burst into laughter.

"Little fiend!" I cried. "She said the smell was so horrid, and she would have no rival in a dirty old pipe."

"She said it was so good for a man," he continued; "kept him quiet and out of mischief and always made him sociable."

"I suppose she wanted neither of us, and set us impossible tasks to win her."

Next morning we concocted the following note, and sent it round to her:

Dear Miss Fortescue,—We, the undersigned, finding it impossible to fulfil the tasks you have set us, have agreed to undertake one another's burdens, and so accomplish all that you desire.

Your obedient slaves,

JOHN WILLOUGHBY.
WILLIAM JOHNSON.
HAROLD DOMBY.

Digitized by Google

By WINIFRED GRAHAM.

Author of "Through the Valley," "A Slave of Routine," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XV.

MARRIED.

MRS. ALADROS was reading a novel. She did not look up as her husband entered.

"Well, Meresia," he said, "got through the great work?" She laid down the book, and turned to Alfonso.

"It is really very clever," she said; "I don't wonder it has made a sensation. There is so much quiet force and vigour in the writing. You did not know you were harbouring a genius. I suppose Mr. Serano will make a fortune out of this humble looking volume."

She pointed to the dull green cover, lacking any sign of ornamentation.

"He has made plenty of money already through his pen, but he never told me. I suppose he's the sort of beggar that can put his hand to anything, and have the wit to do it well. The strange thing is, he has no literary ambition whatever. To make a name as a writer holds no attraction for him. He is crazy about doctoring people, and his book shows remarkable knowledge of medical science. It appears he has studied, and now is starting a practice in town. He is a great loss to me. As a secretary I had absolutely no fault to find with him. But one can't expect a fellow with Serano's brains to stick long at that sort of work."

"No, and now he is bound to set on. His lucky star is in the ascendant!" said Meresia. "Nothing succeeds like success. I am very glad, for his past was a sad one. Bertie told me only the other day how bravely he bore his loss of fortune, and what a trial it was to him going back to his humble home and forgotten parents. He hated that year in Madrid. The monotony of a gaoler's life—to a man of his spirit, with artistic feeling—must have been purgatory."

"So Haydon knew Serano before?"

"Yes, they are old schoolfellows; he and Bertie were at Eton together."

"What does Haydon think of him? Has he read the book?"

"Rather!" replied Meresia. "Bertie is most enthusiastic about the new lion! He says that even as a boy Mr. Serano had that quickness and resolve which so often enables him to carry through an enterprise that no one else would attempt; yet hurry is the last word one would associate with his actions. It is more a cool promptness of action, an implicit faith in himself."

"He owes me a debt of gratitude," said Aladros, "for bringing him back to England."

"I always feel as if Mr. Serano were our property," laughed Meresia. "You really get a little reflected glory, Alfonso. The story of the gaoler and the valet seems to have leaked out, and enhanced his triumphs. All sorts of romances hover round the name of José Serano. Some people say he has been imprisoned as an Anarchist, and that you proved his innocence, got him out of gaol, and set him on his feet again. Others tell me he was a waiter at the Savoy, a footman, a crossing-sweeper, and a scene-shifter. Some believe him to be the son of a Spanish nobleman, and that good, respectable little lady, Miss Betts, who called herself his aunt. By-the-way, you know those Merrimans we met in the summer, they were relations of hers. Mr. Serano hardly ever visits them. They were not very nice when he was poor, yet Gregory Merriman is a good deal with him, somewhat to his mother's consternation, who believes that all authors are morally irredeemable."

"You are full of information," said Aladros, amused at Meresia's talk. "What else do people say?"

"That I am the heroine of José Serano's book."

Her husband's heavy brow contracted as she spoke.

"How do you know all this?"

"Oh! Elizabeth repeats a good deal."

"Elizabeth is here too much, gossiping," he replied. "She is so observant, always studying her fellows aggressively, and tattling."

"But it is not an unkind scrutiny, and she only repeats what is amusing. Elizabeth does me good, I like her social nature—her quickness to make friends. She is always willing to extend her circle of acquaintances when it includes interesting people, and the lucky ones who come under the category of those worth knowing. I can't imagine London without Elizabeth."

"She is too self-reliant for a woman," said Aladros.

"Your ideas of women are quite dreadful, you would like them to be all submissive and humble like me. The fact is, though Elizabeth pretends to be absolutely indifferent to public opinion, she is extremely anxious to be liked and appreciated. She knows you are not her friend, and I sometimes think it annoys her, and makes her shock your prejudices out of revenge. She has not been here for three days."

Digitized by Google

"I offended her last time."

"My dear Alfonso, that is not the reason. Elizabeth was very ill, nerves and all sorts of other ailments. I feel quite anxious about her. She has had to give up hunting, and is under a London doctor, who is doing her no good."

Aladros was standing at the window, his large frame seemed to block the wintry sunshine.

"Miss James is not exactly dying," he replied.

"No, I suppose not; but I should like to know what she is doing."

"Then I'll tell you. At this moment she is stepping out of a hansom, looking the very picture of health, and ringing at our bell with the strength of an Amazon. She has taken a strong tonic since we saw her last."

"You are not going?" cried Meresia, as Aladros moved towards the door.

"Yes. You need not say that I am in."

She greeted her friend joyfully. "Why, Elizabeth," she cried, "how well you look!"

"Isn't it wonderful? I am a resurrection, my dear! That stupid doctor was treating me quite wrongly, and every day I felt myself getting worse. I took your advice, and went to see Dr. Serano. He knew exactly what was the matter, hit the right nail on the head, cured my insomnia, gave me back my complexion, and here I am, a walking advertisement for your doctor-author. I'll make his fortune for him by recommending him to all my friends. But I suppose he has made that already through his wonderful book. I am quite sorry he is not English. I've asked him to one of our dinners next week; his personality is most fascinating, so different to the usual run of——"

Elizabeth checked herself. "Spaniards," said Meresia, smiling. "You nearly made an awkward slip, but I know you don't like foreigners, nor do I, though I married one. People often marry the thing they most dislike. Mrs. May, who has been married three times, always, as a girl, had a great prejudice against widowers, clergymen, and people with red hair. She was the second wife of her first husband; the next was a dean; and the third, who still survives, has a Paderewski crop that is positively scarlet!"

"Don't tell me these painful things, Meresia, or you will give me a relapse. I want to hear about yourself."

"There is nothing much to hear. I am not wildly elated with the joys of matrimony, nor am I the sorrow-seeking problem nurturer of book fame, who a few months after marriage keeps a consoler of the opposite sex in constant attendance. I just jog along naturally, and now that I am always with Alfonso, I do not find him particularly terrifying. I don't quarrel, because I confess I am a little afraid. He can be so alarmingly important, so crushingly dreadful, and so satirically blood-curdling if I disagree. I suppose in a way he has sapped my individuality, just as you prophesied. He imbues me with his theories and ideas, till they actually become my own. I adopt them against my better judgment. You don't know how many shoots have sprouted since we settled down.

"He still talks as if the great crimes were little, and the small ones immense. Political errors are unpardonable, murder is permissible under many circumstances. For instance, if we were beyond the pale of civilisation, and I were displeasing to him, he would remove me as a matter of course. Alfonso has never committed a murder because he respects the law; or else from a moral point of view there are numbers of tiresome people he would gladly put out of the way. I often wish he would not talk like that to me, it undermines my intellectual powers, turns sense and reason topsy turvy. I'm afraid I have not a very strong head; things prey on me so."

"You are not as young in heart as in years, Meresia, or you would not notice his talk. But everything is taken seriously, and you are too ready to meet your husband halfway, to drink in all he tells you, when a little laughter would show him and you the folly of it. Alfonso is a morbid man. Don't enter into his imaginativeness, or you will get no peace of mind. But here am I, an unmarried woman, giving advice! How you must be laughing at me in your sleeve!"

"Indeed, I am not, Elizabeth. What you say is very much to the point, singularly true. Do you think I have altered since I married?"

"A little, perhaps! You are more of a woman; but I still treat you as the little girl in the white and clover dress, who got engaged under my chaperonage. You were not so well known then, and you did not live in town. Now your dresses are chronicled in the Society papers, and the green eyes, and the golden voice, each get their share of printed approbation. It is worth living—is it not—to be the rage, if only for one season?"

"As cynical as ever!" laughed Meresia. "Do not mock an old friend. Besides, you know, I don't live for Society. It is a very nice, etcetera—a sweet after more wholesome fare; but one would not like a dinner all of confectionery."

"That is why you puzzle people. You have mastered the art of moderation. No one really likes a perpetual round of sweets. People get horribly tired, but they will not own it. So the pleasure routine goes on, till it is a drag and a labour; only there are so few Meresias to find this out and tell the world. I wonder if, some day, moderation will desert you. I shall be sorry, for it is always edifying to have an example!"

"I am not the least moderate in some things. The other day I saw a man ill-treating a horse. I had him prosecuted, and he was put in prison. It was a great nuisance, and I have to keep his wife and children while he is there, for they are very poor. People called me a fool, but I cannot endure cruelty. I would much rather the man had picked my pocket, or broken into my house; I could have forgiven that!"

"You are a strange contradiction, Meresia; one never knows how things are going to take you. You will be swept along by the tide of circumstances, but you won't reach the shore till you have done a good many foolish things, and some wise ones."

Elizabeth got up to go, and fastened her furs as she smiled on Mrs. Aladros.

"Good-bye, dear, and thank you for recommending that clever Dr. Serano."

Meresia went to the window and watched Elizabeth drive away. The faint sunshine had gone, and a silvery mist crept over the houses. The leafless trees in the square looked gaunt and sorrowful as they stretched their unclothed arms to a colourless sky.

Some of the autumn's dead leaves rustled busily down the paths, hustled by vagrant breezes, as if racing the wind.

The whole wore an air of calm, for the leaves settled in a heap under a wheelbarrow, and nothing stirred in the street below. Meresia's face caught the reflected peace. Her eyes half closed—she was thinking.

"I wonder," she said, "why I so dreaded marriage with Alfonso. I must have known of something, something that has not happened yet."

Someone entered the half dark room and shadowed her.

"Wrapt in abstraction," he said, and she saw it was her husband.

"Yes, a mere ideality, of no practical use."

"Everything is abstraction," he continued, speaking in slow meditative tones.

"Even man?" she asked.

"Man is a genus," he replied, "but may be raised to the genus animal, thence to organised being, thence to created being, thence to matter in the abstract, and so on—till——"

Digitized by Google

"Oh, don't!" cried Meresia, "that sounds so dreadfully complicated."

"Things must be absolutely empty, or absolutely complicated, but I don't think it matters which. Shall we ring for tea?"

"Yes," said Meresia.

And Aladros rang, while she changed the gloom into the warm shaded light of incandescent gas.

CHAPTER XVI.

ANARCHISM.

A FOOTMAN placed a pile of papers on a table—daily papers, society journals, magazines—for Meresia was a great reader. Many of her ideas on life and her fellow-creatures were formed from the literature of the day. Consequently she held human nature in no very high esteem.

She took up the Daily Debater, and glanced at the headings of the articles.

"Spanish Anarchists" caught her eye. "Extraordinary statements of how they are treated."

The subject excited her interest, and she settled down to read the information, but she was not prepared for the shocking stories alleged to have taken place in a Madrid prison, with the knowledge and consent of the Spanish authorities. The incidents, told in the simplest language as true, turned Meresia hot and cold, with burning faintness and frozen horror, as she read. The writer was, he stated, leading a campaign of indignation organised by the Anarchist communists of London, in reference to the atrocities practised upon their brethren in Spain. His identity was not divulged, but as Meresia scanned the lines in voiceless wonder, she traced the familiar hand of José Serano.

She followed the details as if in the throes of a nightmare, not realising the tortures, yet shuddering involuntarily.

"Compressing the head, belabouring the flesh on throat and temples, inflicting the gag, flogging, keeping the prisoners running on foot without granting them sleep, food, or drink." Such were the things her mind feebly followed, and halted at the sickening account of redhot irons applied to the flesh.

"It can't be true!" she cried, crushing the paper in her hand; "it is a vile libel. Alfonso will know; Alfonso will tell me!"

The word "judge" caught her eye lower on the page, and compelled her to read further. Her face had grown absolutely colourless, she went slowly with faltering footsteps to her husband's room.

He was writing letters, and looked up as she entered with a smile, holding out his huge hand, which Meresia did not take.

"Have you read this, Alfonso?" pointing to the column in the Daily Debater.

"No."

"Is it true," she asked, "that a man would be kept in a Spanish prison eight days without eating or sleeping, with a gag applied to him, his nails cut off, and his body bruised with blows?"

"What manner of man?" asked Aladros.

"A man who could not even speak Spanish, accused of being an Anarchist, one who on being brought to the judge asked for an interpreter. The military judge shrugged his shoulders, made a sign, and the man was dragged back to his dungeon. Alfonso, you—you are a military judge, tell me, for goodness' sake, you had nothing to do with all this fiendish injustice."

A pause.

"And if they did take him back?" said Aladros, "you don't know what followed."

"Yes, it is here, in all its hideous detail. They chained him to a wall, where the hangmen, the private gendarmes, could kick and insult him. They were allowed to put a wooden cylinder in his mouth, made like a horse's bridle, and fastened by strings behind his neck. Then these wretches whipped him along, and promised him something worse."

She caught her breath, waiting for Aladros to speak.

"Anything more?"

"Finally he lost his reason from sufferings and torture. But there are many other cases equally revolting. One of the victims was tortured into accusing other innocent prisoners; he knew his accusations were false, but he was helpless, for they burnt him with irons and made him speak! Oh! tell me you know nothing of all this—that it is a series of shameful lies!"

"I don't see that it matters to you, Meresia, one way or the other."

"Not matter to me! When you are my husband?"

"It is not a woman's business, and it served the felons right. They merely got what they deserved. I have seen worse things than what you tell me."

He smiled—his hard, cruel, merciless smile—and turned again to his letters, dismissing the subject.

Meresia stood watching him—the paper still in her hand—an awful loathing crept over her, a giddy sensation came in her head, and a choking in her throat. She felt an overwhelming desire to strike him, only the idea was so absolutely absurd.

She pictured the scenes vividly to herself, and in each the pitiless scorn of Alfonso Aladros played a prominent part.

"Why are you waiting?" asked her husband.

"I thought perhaps you might have something to say, some explanation or excuse. Don't you want to read the article? I expected you would answer and contradict it, but that is impossible—now——"

"It does not interest me," he replied. "My name is not mentioned, I suppose?"

"Then you were the judge?" said Meresia. "Were you in court when some of the gendarmes even left the hall exclaiming: 'Assassins! assassins!' and when the examining magistrate opened a door by striking it with his foot, and pushed the prisoner out of sight? After that, immediately the hangman got hold of him, and took him to an upper room, from whence—a few moments later—came loud screams of agony. The judge called for another prisoner to be brought into court, that the conseil might pay no attention to what had just passed."

"Really, Meresia, you tire and disturb me! I came to England to rest and forget the duties and responsibilities of my position. I know all this, it is not news to me, nor is it my fault that it has got into the hands of the English press. I have always done my best for the Spanish Government, and one cannot let these dogs of Anarchists treat us like children. We must serve them as they would serve us, without pity or consideration. Your methods are different in England—less severe, less final. I remember the case you speak of perfectly, so now I hope your curiosity is satisfied, and that you will let the subject drop."

"But it is too horribly inhuman to imagine!" she gasped. "Can't you see what it is to me?—to learn that you——"

But she broke off sharply, unable to control her voice, which in its shocked scorn and painful trembling sounded sweeter than ever to Aladros. He was suddenly aware that Meresia felt upset at what she had read.

"Why, my poor little darling, how pale you look!" he said, pushing back his chair and raising his cumbrous body to its full height. He drew her towards him, but she pulled away, and shrank back, consumed by horror at his touch.

"Your hands are red with blood," she said. "You are worse than a murderer!"

Alfonso laughed aloud.

"I do believe you are almost angry with me," he said. "One would think you were in sympathy with these blackguards we have been unnecessarily discussing."

"Of course I am in sympathy with anyone who has suffered such vile treatment!" retorted Meresia with blazing eyes. "Who would not be?"

Digitized by Google

"England is so lenient, and it is all what you are accustomed to. We won't discuss it any more, if it troubles you. But these things are not worth bothering about. Just banish them from your mind."

His coolness staggered Meresia. She was maddened by the thought of his cruelty, and disgusted at his utter lack of feeling.

Mere contact with him, the fact of breathing the same atmosphere, seemed stifling her. She threw open the door with a defiant gesture, and left the room.

Aladros shrugged his great square shoulders, and returned to his writing. Meresia's attitude amused rather than annoyed him, for he could not realise she was in earnest. It was a pose, a part, pretty and effective, if a little tiresome. She was such a child, and her views were in his eyes so utterly grotesque and ridiculous.

To fuss over people she had never seen—criminals, who were rewarded according to their works! What could their sufferings be to her? Surely he knew what was right and just without Meresia's interference. It appeared surprisingly funny and audacious to Aladros, who suffered his actions to be criticised by none.

Could he have seen into his wife's heart and read the secrets there, it might have stirred even the iron nerves of an Aladros to something of shame or remorse.

Instead he dismissed the whole incident lightly from his mind, and lit a cigar, before continuing his letters.

Meresia's moderation deserted her as she flew upstairs. Her mind was racked with a tormenting conflict. She had felt absolutely convinced that her husband was innocent of those frightful charges. But not only had he acknowledged himself guilty, but shown his contempt for her sympathy, her horror, as if she had been a silly child, of no account. She was bitter against him to a degree; her loathing and hatred took shape and substance; it seemed to transform her from a young and lovable woman to an excitable she-fiend. Her breathing was the quick, sharp panting of one labouring under rage and pain. She knew now what the promptings of her instinct had foretold. The cruelty of the man to whom she had given herself made all that was good in Meresia tremble and shrink, though at the time she was in ignorance of the cause.

She had noticed, since their wedding, that José Serano, in spite of her husband's kindness, endured Alfonso politely, but despised him in his heart. She often wondered at the coldness of the younger man, to whom Aladros was sincerely attached. Once she mentioned this to her husband.

"Poor José can never forget he has been my valet," Alfonso told her; "the barrier is broken, but the remains are always lying in his way. He stumbles against them, and they remind him of the old position."

To-day, as Meresia paced the corridors, feverishly the truth formed itself, like the coloured pieces of a kaleidescope, into a whole, and the picture was far from pleasant.

José had used her husband as a means of reaching England, where he had been educated with all an Englishman's horror of brutality and torture. He knew the secrets of the gaol, and they had made him bitter and revengeful. No wonder he burnt to expose the crimes of injustice.

She must see José and question him herself.

Meresia's blood was up—she would have stopped at nothing—her indignation knew no bounds, and her heart burnt within her. If Serano hated his master, his hatred could not have been greater than the wife's for the husband. She ordered the carriage, and put on her furs; they were particularly becoming to Meresia.

Aladros heard her hurrying down stairs, but he did not trouble to inquire where she was going. Only when the brougham had driven away he wondered why she had not asked him to accompany her.

"Perhaps, after all, she was really rather cross over that article," he said. "Who the devil could have written it? Not Serano, I'd take my oath! A Spaniard never reviles his own countrymen; besides, he is too busy with his patients to give a thought to the grievances of Anarchist Communists! He may have talked imprudently in journalistic circles, and some sensation seeker gathered the fragments together with judicious pumping, in the hopes of making a scandal."

In the meanwhile Meresia, whose first rage had subsided into morbid and bitter meditation, reached the doctor's house, to find he was engaged.

"I'll wait," she said. "Say I must see him. I am not a patient."

She was shown into a private room, and left to the chaos of her own thoughts and the monotonous ticking of a large clock, supported by bronze devils with grinning faces.

Meresia turned her back on these sinister figures, and thought of Aladros.

"What was Hell?" she wondered, "with its thousand representations, its disputed existence, its pictured spirits of evil, malice, and uncleanness. Surely those infernal regions, vaguely imagined by some, must be a home for the tyrants and oppressors—the cruel, bloodthirsty men, like Alfonso Aladros."

Her gloomy reflections occupied a full hour before the door opened, and José Serano stood in her presence.

Meresia rose, pale and beautiful in her heavy furs, which, being loosened, slipped away from her figure, and left her unfettered to battle for the truth.

She held out her hand to José, and he noticed that it trembled.

"What is the matter?" he asked, in his quiet, kindly voice.

The green eyes were raised to his, full of a new indescribable misery. Meresia tried to speak, but her voice failed, and for answer she drew the article from her pocket and spread it on the table.

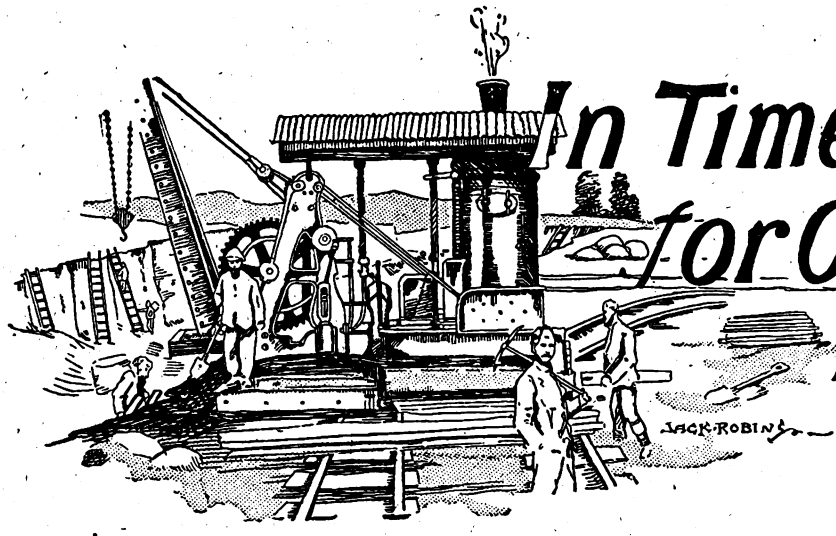
(To be continued.)

KEY TO THE PICTURE PUZZLE In "P.W." Extra Xmas Number.

20	102	61	21	12	32	42	37	86	59	50	55	34
36	100	38	81	69	105	73	40	77	57	107	95	67
97	9	3	53	101	72	7	87	19	27	23	46	15
106	64	93	11	22	5	26	43	70	116	17	89	112
117	33	49	78	114	113	98	66	90	80	110	41	25
104	94	108	76	115	96	4	99	8	48	1	68	52
75	111	30	14	24	6	84	62	44	79	10	45	92
28	85	51	91	88	71	60	13	56	29	65	82	31
2	58	35	54	63	47	18	74	83	103	109	39	16

Digitized by Google

Picture Solution will be Found on Page 13.



In Time for Once in his Life

THE fierce midday sun was pouring down in full force upon the barren, sandy district in which one of the greatest triumphs of modern engineering, the Baltic Canal, was in process of construction. The men had just knocked off work for their dinner, and some were taking advantage of the meagre, indifferently cooked food sold in the canteen, while others, notably the Italians, were preparing their own meal. The dark-eyed sons of southern Europe, with their gaily coloured head-gear and picturesque appearance, formed a bright spot in the monotonous scene. As they cooked their macaroni they talked and gesticulated in the vivacious and excited manner usual to them, but which gave them an appearance of quarrelling among themselves to the more phlegmatic Germans, who plodded silently through their dinner or smoked the pipe of peace as a digestive

A tall, stalwart Holsteiner, with honest blue eyes and a frank, open countenance that told of no past other than that of a healthy, uneventful youth, and a square jaw beneath a firm. resolute mouth, that gave fair promise of success in whatever he might undertake, was climbing up one of the ladders that led from the deep cutting.

His thoughts were evidently pleasant ones, and had brought a smile to his lips. When he reached the top he shaded his eyes with his hand, and looked towards the road which led from the works to the few houses in the neighbourhood. Over the chaos of sand-heaps, stones and machinery, he saw a sight which made his heart beat quicker, and a soft light come into his eyes.

A small figure was walking quickly along, and he knew every turn and bend of the girl's head, every movement of her arm as she swung the empty basket at her side. It was Doris, the innkeeper's daughter, who had been to take the chief engineer his dinner to the red house on the hill.

Now she was on her way home, and Wilm Lorensen made up his mind to forego his dinner, if need be, so that he might accompany her.

But the pleasure quickly faded from his face, for there, a few yards from him, was the Italian, Peretti, scrambling up the bank with all speed, fired no doubt by the same intention as himself.

Wilm Lorensen set his teeth and determined to forestall him. He hated Peretti, for his smooth tongue and soft voice found favour with the women, and of late, Doris had seemed only too willing to listen to the wonderful tales he could tell of his sunny home and the gay, careless lives led by his countrywomen. Lorensen was a man of few words himself, but in his heart he had long made up his mind that Doris was to be the sunshine of the little homestead where they would settle down later on and live as their fathers had done before them.

He started off, and on his way noticed a third pair of eyes fixed on the girl he loved, and those belonged to his countryman, Peter Svensen, a slow-blooded, sleepy fellow, the butt of his comrades, who contented himself with looking, and made no attempt to follow her.

The nimble Peretti was first; but Lorensen, nothing daunted, resolved that if he couldn't have her to himself he would not leave her with that grinning Italian.

"Good-day, Miss Doris, may I walk a little way with you? I am going to Holtenau."

"Eh, mate," sneered Peretti, "where are your eyes? The young lady has an escort already. You go your own way and don't try to spoil sport."

"If Doris herself tells me to go, I will, but not unless," doggedly returned the German.

The girl was twirling a marigold between her white teeth, and looked roguishly from one admirer to the other, and then said:

"As far as I know the road is open to all that like to make use of it."

"Yes, of course," agreed Lorensen, gruffly adding, "more's the pity," with a look at his rival.

"Caramba!" said the Italian scornfully. "He is a German boor! Peretti will not quarrel before a lady. Ah! if you were only to see our beautiful, sunny land you would never wish yourself back in this desert!"

"I should dearly like to see it, Peretti, but I think it would be too hot for me there."

"Sunshine, sunshine every day, and dancing in the moonlight by night!" he went on ecstatically. "To see the girls with their corals, their scarfs and their castanets! Necklaces, bracelets, and rings of coral!"

"I think coral is very pretty," said Doris. "I saw a lot at the Kiel fair last year."

"One of our snug northern homes is better than all your coral and finery," put in Lorensen.

Digitized by Google

"Oh, yes, snowed up for half the year!" laughed the Italian. "The blue sky is our roof-tree and our curtains are the branches of camelias and olives."

"Shut up!" said Wilm crossly. "I'd rather have a blade of yonder coarse grass than all your olives and camelias!"

Doris objected to this contempt for the beautiful flowers she had so seldom seen, and that only made her lover more quarrelsome.

"I don't know why you Italians don't stop in your beautiful, sunny land," he grunted.

"But there is one thing in which you Germans excel us," continued the irrepressible Peretti, "and that is, your women! Their hair is like the ripe corn, their eyes like the skies above, and their smile as peaceful as the moonlight. Our women are too fierce, too restless, too wild! I adore German women!"

Lorensen now began to whistle loudly, but the Italian was not to be driven from the field, he only remarked blandly:

"Comrade, look here, if my talk wearies you, you needn't stop to hear it. The road is open and the young lady and I can get on very well without you. Can't we?" he added, turning to Doris.

"Lorensen wants to see my father, I expect," replied the girl, "so it would be foolish to turn back now we are so nearly there. The way has seemed very short to-day. Good-bye," she said smiling at Peretti, "and as you have told me such pretty stories, you may have that," taking the marigold from her lips, "I have nothing better to offer you. Camelias and myrtle don't grow in our poor soil here."

They had reached the little inn which stood close to the new canal cutting, and, having taken leave of Peretti, who went away kissing the flower and murmuring his ecstasies in his musical mother-tongue, the other two passed through the house into the garden where stood three tall elm trees close together, and under whose shade were rude benches and wooden tables, where the host, an old sea-captain, did a thriving trade among the workmen and engineers.

Lorensen's mood was a stormy one, and he could not find words to express his disgust at the girl's conduct.

"Don't you want to see father?" she asked, after a pause.

"No. I'm off."

"Off? Where?"

"Away from you, you shameless flirt!" and he made a move as if he were going; but she followed him and laid her hand on his arm.

"Why are you so cross, Lorensen? Just because I let that fellow chatter to me?"

"Because you like that black devil! Anyone can see it by the way you look at him. Well, there are plenty of other girls, that's one thing!"

Doris looked at him and shook her head, saying:

"Lorensen, you are really too silly."

"Yes, but I'm not blind, I watched you all the way, and then you gave him your flower! You—you——" he stopped short, choking.

"And why did I do all that?" she asked, bravely going up to the enraged man. "Why? simply to protect you from the results of your foolish jealousy! You don't care how you insult Peretti, and father says Italians are dangerous people to offend."

"Oh, you needn't trouble yourself about me," he said sulkily.

"Then it doesn't matter if Peretti sticks a knife into you when your back is turned? That's what they do when they're angry."

"Oh, you can talk fast enough! Why you've turned poor Svensen's head with your false ways."

Doris laughed outright. "Well I never! Fancy you being jealous of poor Svensen!"

"You lead every man by the nose, you flirt!"

"I am good friends with all, if that's what you mean. You're very cross to-day. Good-bye, then."

He turned to go, and something in his face made her make one more attempt to pacify him.

"You know very well, Lorensen, that though I joke with all, I only love one." Her voice trembled a little and her blue eyes glistened as she said these words.

After a moment's struggle with his ill-temper, he turned penitently towards her, thoroughly ashamed of his conduct, and, taking both her hands in his, said:

"Doris, I'm only a plain fellow, I've no coral to offer you, nor pretty stories to amuse you with—but I did think that in a year or two—we, you and I——" he stopped and his eyes said the rest.

"Yes, Lorensen, and so did I. You know I don't care for all those things really."

"Then you will put up with me as I am, and you don't mind waiting a little while for me to make a home for you?"

"I want you just as you are, and I'd rather wait all my life for you than marry anyone else."

The remainder of the interview was of a description that need not interest outsiders, and a few minutes later Wilm Lorensen was making his way back to the works, with a light heart and swinging gait, for Doris was now his very own, and she had promised to meet him that night on her way from Friedrichsort, when they could enjoy their new-found happiness undisturbed.

There was no one to be seen on the dusty road, but crouching behind a sand heap was Peretti, and with murder in his eyes he watched Lorensen's happy face as it passed him. The Italian felt instinctively that his rival had stolen a march upon him, and with a curse he turned from him, and regained his place in the cutting.

When work was resumed Lorensen felt the want of his dinner, and, contrary to his custom, drank pretty freely from the flask that he carried at his side. As Svensen passed him wheeling a heavy barrow, a feeling of compunction prompted him to say:

"It's hot work; have a drink, Svensen?"

The latter was lost in thought, and at first did not understand what had been said to him; however, he refused the proffered drink, and went on his way, absent-mindedly, as was his wont. Suddenly he stopped and looked down into the cutting, measuring the distance as it were with one hand, and thereby endangering the safety both of his barrow and himself.

"Svensen, you blockhead, what are you doing?" shouted the overseer. "Look alive, man, we're waiting!" Then he added to himself: "That fellow gets lazier every day!"

"Oh, he's in love!" said a cheeky youth standing near. This remark was greeted with a roar of laughter and one asked:

"How do you know that?"

"Why, the man he lodges with told me that he brushes his hat every Saturday and sleeps with a book called 'Advice to Lovers' under his pillow."

Fresh peals of laughter were called forth by this conclusive evidence; but Lorensen looked after the clumsy retreating figure with a touch of sympathy and compunction. While he was in the act of cheering himself with another pull at his flask, a barrow struck him violently from the back and made him stagger on to the very brink of the cutting. With a great effort he righted himself, and, shouting angrily as he turned round: "Can't you look where you're going, you fool!" he saw that it was Peretti. Was it an accident? Doris's warning came back to him, and the horrible thought chained his tongue.

Digitized by Google

The others began to swear at the Italian for his clumsiness, but he burst forth fiercely:

"Why did he get in my way? It's his own fault, he should have moved."

"That's no reason for trying to kill a fellow," said the others.

"Caramba! Who've I killed? I must wheel my barrow, and whatever is in the way, be it man, wood, or stone, it must move or take its chance!" So saying he shook his fist at Lorensen and went off cursing under his breath.

Just then Svensen came up, saying anxiously:

"Oh, you're all right, Lorensen? I saw what he was up to and I wanted to come and warn you, but somehow I was too late."

As he stood there like a great shame-faced schoolboy, the others laughed again and said chaffingly:

"You should have come a bit sooner, old man; you couldn't expect Lorensen to hang over the side till you come to pull him up."

"No, I was too late, as usual. I don't know how it is, but I never am in time for anything. Perhaps I shall be some day."

"Then you must wake up, and especially when you go courting."

"So I will," he answered almost briskly. "That I will."

When tea-time came Svensen, instead of joining his companions, brushed himself up, washed his face and hands carefully, and started off to the inn at a most unusual pace. He was quite out of breath when he arrived, and not a little nervous when Doris came to ask him what he would have. When she brought the beer he had ordered, he timidly asked her to stay and keep him company while he drank it, as he had something to say.

"Well I can't stay long, for I have to go to Friedrichsort for my father this evening."

"What do you thing of me, Miss Doris?" he said at last, fidgetting on his chair.

"Of you, Mr. Svensen?"

"Yes, of me."

"Well, they all say that you are an honest, upright man, and I'm sure you are."

"Yes, Doris, I am honest. And now, if you'll listen, I'll tell you the truth."

In halting, broken sentences he told her his story—how his father had been lost at sea and his mother had never cared for him. His childhood and youth had been loveless and lonely, and at last he had taken his life into his own hands and found work on the canal. There he had first seen her, and with her had come the first real sunshine into his heart. She had never laughed at his awkward ways, and always had had a kind word for him when they met. If only she would accept his love he would work for her night and day, and hold up his head among his fellows.

"Dear Mr. Svensen——" she began.

"It has cost me a great deal to say this, Doris; but I can't rest till I've told you, for I love you as I never loved anything on earth. Don't laugh at me!"

"How could I laugh? You are doing me a great honour——"

"But—you won't?" he faltered, with a stricken look on his face.

"I should have been proud to be your wife, as any woman might be, but—but you've come too late, Svensen."

"Too late—too late, again!" he murmured hopelessly.

"Yes, I'd given my heart away before I ever saw you. Don't be angry with me! You don't know how it hurts me to say this——"

He rose quickly, shook himself, passed his hand over his eyes, and again repeating the fatal words: "Too late," turned away, saying gruffly: "Yes, yes, it's all right. I'd no business to come. Good-night," and without another word he was off. Doris gazed sadly after him, as he stumbled down the road, not seeming to see or care where he went.

He crawled away to a lonely part of the deep cutting and threw himself down behind a heap of stones, alone with his misery. One by one the busy sounds of the day were hushed. The sun was setting, but its rays did not penetrate to where he was. He felt stifled after a time, and an irresistible longing for the sea came upon him. He climbed up and made his way to the coast, where the waves were glowing in the sunset.

He threw himself down under the shade of some stunted bushes with a sense of relief. Who had come before him? was now his thought. Had Peretti won Doris's affections? He hoped not, for he knew him to be a bad man; yet he had often seen them together.

The time passed almost unperceived by him, and the moon rose, flooding sea and land with her soft light. For a while all was silent, then he heard footsteps, and saw Doris in the distance walking with a man whose arm was round her waist. Svensen's heart beat till he could hardly breathe as he eagerly sought to discern the face of his successful rival. Thank Heaven, it was not Peretti, but his own countryman, Wilm Lorensen! He could hear her merry laugh and the deep tones of her lover's voice as they came towards him. Suddenly, a dark figure rose some distance behind them, and appeared to be stealthily gaining upon the unconscious pair. Svensen's love for Doris made him keen to scent danger for her, and he felt something was wrong. They had a gate to pass through, and he realised that if he could get there before they did, the harm might be averted. For once he would be in time. Oh, if only he might be! With every nerve strained he ran silently behind a hedge, keeping his eyes on the dark figure that was making for the same goal as himself. Svensen was first, and as the figure came up he saw something bright flash in its hand.

He dragged the man out into the moonlight and recognised the features of Peretti. With iron hand he held the Italian in his grasp, but the bright blade descended on his breast and all was dark before his eyes. He had just time to shout hoarsely "Lorensen beware!" then there was a sound of rapidly retreating footsteps and all was silence.

He did not know how long it was before he opened his eyes to see the face dearest to him on earth bending over him, with tears of pity in her eyes.

He heard Lorensen's voice asking him questions, but he could only say the one word: "Peretti." Then he took their hands and tried to put them one in another, and with a final effort he raised himself a little:

"God bless you, my girl. It's best so. Thank God, I was in time for once!" And, with a happy smile, he died.

M. F.

Digitized by Google

Story of a Potato, Three Young Persons, and an Old Musician.

Mdlle. Aglae, milliner, was in high spirits on a particular Sunday morning, at a time, too, when she was preparing potatoes for dinner. She sat at the open, sunny window, high up on the fifth floor, and looking out on the Rue Lepie, Paris. Quite by accident, one of the tubers slipped from her hand. It fell straight and heavy on the new silk hat of a passing gentleman, and the chapeau was staved in.

This gentleman had come direct from his hatter, and, of course, was furiously indignant at the disaster to his new and shining head-gear.

He looked upwards, and saw a window on the fifth floor hastily slammed down. He waited no longer for any further indications of the defaulter. Full of passion, he rushed up the stair, determined to inflict condign punishment on the villain who had knocked his hat into a shapeless mass.

A few springs, and he was at the second stair landing. At that very moment a door opened, and out popped a gentleman in such hot haste that he actually rushed into his arms. They stared at each other as if about to resort to more violent measures, when an exclamation burst simultaneously from both:

"Anatole!"

"Edgar!"

Anatole Baudruche and Edgar Bricheton were old college chums. They had never met since their student days—that is to say, for over twelve years. This mutual recognition had the effect of cooling their anger, and at once they entered into friendly conversation.

"Good gracious!" exclaimed Edgar. "What is the matter with your hat?"

"Don't speak of it," replied Anatole. "A potato from a fifth floor window has played the very deuce with it."

"And you are going up to restore the potato? Well, that is generous."

"Not at all. I only wish to point out the consequences to the guilty individual, and endeavour, if possible, to obta in some recompense for the damage."

"Oh, as to that, you may save yourself the trouble," said Edgar.

"And why?" demanded the astonished Anatole.

"Why? Because Bidoche is a cantankerous old dog. He would close the door in your face before you could utter a word."

"Bidoche?"

"Yes, the one who dropped the potato. It could have been nlo other person. Everybody quarrels with him, the od wretch. and it is a general belief that he purposely makes himself disagreeable."

"You live here, then?"

"No, but my aunt has apartments, and she tells me that not a day passes but what she has a skirmish with Bidoche. Now, if you wish to have it out with the old curmudgeon, I will be delighted to accompany you. There is strength in union."

Anatole and Edgar mounted three more flats. They stopped before a door from which deep yet melodious sounds were issuing.

"Here you are," said Edgar. "The villain has got a bassoon now."

He gave a determined pull at the bell, and the bassoon suddenly ceased. They heard the clatter of his wooden shoes on the floor. Then the door was opened, and there appeared a little old man, with a pleasant, laughing countenance, holding the above-mentioned instrument in his hand.

"Well, gentlemen?" smilingly asked the little man.

"M. Bidoche, I presume?" said Edgar.

"Yes, the scoundrel Bidoche," added Anatole, shaking the deformed hat in one hand, and with the other thrusting the potato under the nose of the astonished musician.

"M. Bidoche?" said the little old man with courteous amazement. "I do not know him!"

"What!" exclaimed Edgar, "are you not Bidoche?"

"No," he answered with the most provoking good nature, "There must be some mistake, my name is Molesquin. I am solo bassoon in the orchestra of the Theatre des Gobelins, and I only moved into this house to-day."

"Oh, hang it!" exclaimed Edgar, "just to think that the old scoundrel has cleared off when we were about to chastise him for all the trouble he has caused!"

"Then," said Anatole in a more humiliated mood, "it was not you who threw this potato?"

"I never eat potatoes," replied the musician, still smiling; "I only partake of green vegetables. However, if you gentlemen care to enter my humble apartments, I will play you over my part in the Tour de Nesle. It contains some remarkable passages, which I am sure will do you good to hear."

Anatole and Edgar both felt they had some amends to make to the old gentleman, and considered this could be the best accomplished by accepting the cordial invitation. So into the house they walked, and when seated, the musician, delighted with their company, offered them cigarettes. The musician then took his position at the stand, and, grasping his instrument, at once began to execute the bassoon part of the Tour de Nesle.

As he grunted out the notes, Edgar at first could scarcely refrain from laughter at the comic incident, but gradually he assumed an appreciative countenance, and ultimately went nearly off to sleep. As for Anatole, seated as he was beside the open window, with the precious potato in his hand, he could not get his mind off the catastrophe to his hat. He paid little attention to the music. All at once, however, a loud false note from the bassoon caused him to start. At the same time the potato escaped from his hand, bounced out of the window, and fell from the height of five storeys.

* * * * *

Mdlle. Aglae was greatly alarmed at her carelessness in allowing the potato to fall. She hastily closed the window, so that in the event of an accident nobody could suspect her. Then she sat down, not without anxiety, to await developments.

Great was her fear as she heard the footsteps of two men rapidly ascending the stair. "It is the police," she thought. Her heart beat wildly and a cold sweat broke over her forehead. She imagined she was about to hear a loud knock at the door.

Digitized by Google

However, the noise of the footsteps ceased, and she heard the door-bell of her neighbour ringing. The door was opened, and after a few moments closed on the visitors, whoever they were.

Although she regained somewhat her serenity, she dared not yet stir. She feared that the guardians of the peace, having ascertained the innocence of her neighbour, would lose no time in calling her to account.

She hastened to conceal the basket of potatoes, which might have served to convict her, and then, in anticipation of the police, assumed a bold, defiant attitude. After waiting a few moments more, and hearing no other noise but that of the persistent bassoon, she now felt quite sure of her safety. Nevertheless, she desired to make assurance doubly sure. So she picked up her milk-can, slipped down-stairs on tip-toe, and walked straight to the dairy.

Mdlle. Aglae now felt she could at least establish an alibi. She purchased her milk, and, perfectly at ease, returned to her house, carefully guarding the contents of the pitcher. Suddenly she received a sudden shock. At the same time she was splashed with milk from head to foot. The potato which had slipped from the hand of Anatole fell with remarkable precision into the milk can.

"Murder!" cried Aglae. "What miscreants there are, to be sure." And she shot up the stairs, quite prepared to attack the first person she met. This person was Anatole.

* * * * *

Anatole was, of course, alarmed at the flight of the potato. He had no desire to listen longer to the bassoon, especially when he recollected the police regulations forbidding anything to be thrown from the windows. Up he rose and made a sign to Edgar, who, however, had fallen asleep. He rudely awakened him, and taking a hasty good-bye with the bassoon soloist, to whom they promised, out of politeness, to come at a future time and obtain lessons on the instrument, they made a rush for the door.

The moment the door opened Aglae was on the landing. Aglae and Anatole faced each other—Aglae with the milk streaming from her face and hair, Anatole with his chapeau sadly battered. A moment's consideration, and the situation was understood.

"Sir," exclaimed Aglae, "you are a wretch!"

"And you, madame, have fingers like putty," retorted Anatole.

"And you are most impertinent."

"And you are not so polite as I could wish. Let me give you this advice, madame, when one cannot peel a potato without letting it fall from a five storey window, one should never attempt to cook: one should dine at a restaurant."

"I have no lessons to receive from you, sir."

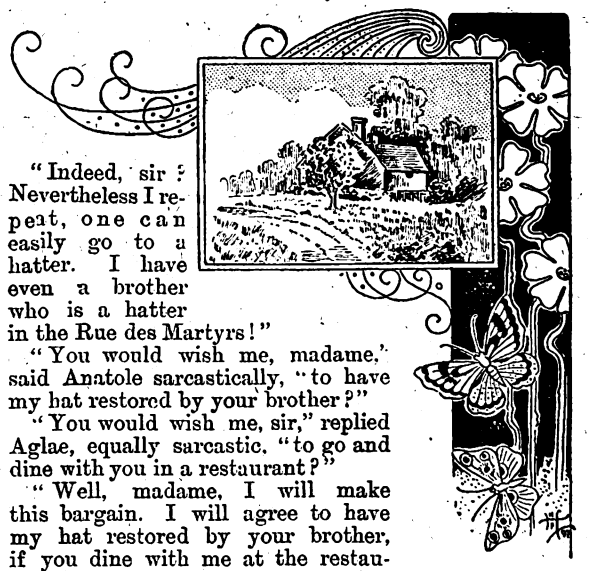
"Indeed, madame? Still I repeat it—one should dine at a restaurant. I even know a very good house on the Place Pigalle; yes, madame, I do."

"Very well, sir, just go there."

"A pretty spectacle indeed I would make at a restaurant with my hat battered out of all shape."

"Well, sir, when one's hat gets into that condition, one can easily go to a hatter."

"I have no lessons to receive from you on that score, madame!"



"Indeed, sir? Nevertheless I repeat, one can easily go to a hatter. I have even a brother who is a hatter in the Rue des Martyrs!"

"You would wish me, madame," said Anatole sarcastically, "to have my hat restored by your brother?"

"You would wish me, sir," replied Aglae, equally sarcastic, "to go and dine with you in a restaurant?"

"Well, madame, I will make this bargain. I will agree to have my hat restored by your brother, if you dine with me at the restaurant."

"Very well, sir, I will agree to dine with you at the restaurant if you have your hat restored by my brother."

"And I," put in Molesquin, who had as yet said nothing, but had been listening with astonishment. "I will pardon you for interrupting my dear studies on condition that you accept from me a box at the Theatre des Gobelins."

"We accept," cried Edgar, who by this prompt intervention cooled the ardour of the disputants, and turned the conversation into a milder channel. Molesquin withdrew to his house.

"In the first place, madame," said Anatole, "allow me to introduce you to my excellent friend Edgar Bricheton, my old fellow student."

"What!" exclaimed Edgar. "I have never been at college!"

"Now, now, you called yourself just now Edgar Bricheton."

"I? Never in my life," he replied, "my name is Paul Dupont. Then you are not Anatole Baudruche?"

"Not at all; my name is Henri Durand."

"Then," said Edgar, "we do not know each other!"

"That makes no difference now," said the pretty Aglae, "since you have already become acquainted with each other."

The two young men admitted the justice of the remark, dropped the conversation, and enjoyed some pleasantries over the circumstance which had brought them together.

So they dined at the restaurant, and Anatole had his hat repaired by Aglae's brother, and they all enjoyed the performance of the Tour de Nesle.

* * * * *

The incident had still a more pleasant termination. Anatole married Aglae, and they still preserve the blessed pomme de terre that brought them together. Not long after, too, Molesquin took for a wife a little chorus girl of the Theatre des Gobelins.

LOPEZ SURRANE.

Digitized by Google

GLOVES FOR EVENING WEAR.

Silk Gloves, 20 Button Length Jersey, 1/4, 1/10 and 2/4 per pair. Silk Gloves, 33in. long, 1/10 and 2/10 per pair. In Black, White, Cream, and all Light Shades.

Long Glacé Kid.

The L. G. Co.'s "Ernestine" quality White Kid Gloves: 12 Button Length Mousquetaire, 2/5; 16 Button Length, 2/11; 20 Button Length, 3/10 per pair.

The L. G. Co.'s "Ellaline" quality Kid Gloves, in White and Light Shades. 12 Button Mousquetaire, 2/11; 16 Button Length, 3/11; 20 Button Length, White only, 4/11 per pair.

Long Suède Gloves.

The L. G. Co.'s "Merveille" quality.—12 Button Length Mousquetaire, 1/9; 16 Button Length, 1/10; 20 Button Length, 1/11 per pair. In White, Cream, Biscuit, Tan, and all Light Colours.

The L. G. Co.'s "Cinderella" quality.—12 Button Length Mousquetaire, 2/11; 16 Button Length, 3/6; 20 Button Length, 3/11 per pair. In Black, White, and all Colours for evening wear.

Girls' Silk Gloves, 12 Button Length Milanese, 1/- per pair; 8 Button Length, Best Quality, Pure Silk, 1/3; 12 Button Length ditto, 1/6 per pair. In Black, White, and all Light Shades.

Gentlemen's Dress Gloves.

No. 505.—2 Button White Neapolitan Kid, 5/9 per half dozen; 1/- per pair.

No 513.—2 Button White Kid, Plain Points, Pearl Buttons, an excellent wearing glove, 9/6 per half-dozen; 1/3 per pair.

No. 523.—2 Button White or Lavender, with Black Tambour Points, 11/- per half-dozen; 1/11 per pair.

Boy's 2 Button White Kid Gloves, 1/- per pair.

Supplementary Departments: HOSIERY, FANS and FURS.

Send Post-card for New Illustrated Price List (56 pages.)

Postal and Post Office Orders to be made payable to The London Glove Company at the General Post Office.

THE LONDON GLOVE COMPANY,

45A CHEAPSIDE, LONDON, E.C.
Branch Warehouse: 83 NEW BOND STREET, W.

MAKE FRUIT WINES AT HOME.

Ask for MASON'S.

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. THE VERY BEST.

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

MASON'S GINGER WINE ESSENCE.

A Sixpenny Bottle will, in six minutes, make sixty glasses of Delicious, Non-Alcoholic Wine.
Agents Wanted.

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

MASON'S (NOTTINGHAM) COFFEE ESSENCE
(THE BEST MADE)

MASON'S WINE ESSENCES

are made in all Fruit Flavours, Ginger, Lemon, Orange, Blackberry, etc.

YOU WON'T BE DISAPPOINTED.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

SALE NOW OVER SIX MILLIONS YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

THE John Noble

HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES

Worn throughout the World,

are supplied in the following two good cloths:

I. John Noble Costume Coating, and in II. John Noble Cheviot Serge.

PATTERNS and New Costume Album sent POST FREE,

Model 876.

Smart Double-Breasted Coat with Velvet Collar, Tailor skirt, which drapes well. Price 10/6 complete. Sent carriage paid 10/6 and safely packed for 9d. extra. Skirt only 5/6. Carriage 6d.

JOHN NOBLE KNOCKABOUT FROCKS.

Thoroughly well made, with saddle top, long full sleeves and pocket. Lengths and Prices.

21 24 27 30 in.
1/6 2/- 2/6 3/-
33 36 39 42 in.
3/6 4/- 4/6 5/-

Postage 4d. extra.

'Brewer' Caps (all shades), as sketched, 1/-. Ladies' well-knitted Tam o' Shanters at same price.

COLOURS.—Black Navy, Electric, Brown, Ruby, Myrtle, Cinnamon, Fawn, Grey, Moss, Sage Green, Reseda, and Purple. SIZES IN STOCK are 34, 36, and 38 in. round bust (under arms). Skirts being 38, 40, and 42 in. long in front. Larger or special sizes made to measure, 1/6 extra. Mourning Orders executed and despatched within twelve hours.

Please mention SHORT STORIES when ordering. Bankers: London & Midland Bank.

JOHN NOBLE LTD., BROOK STREET MILLS, MANCHESTER.

ON THE BEST - - - - - AUTHORITY.

MR. M. MACKENZIE, of 42, Garfield Street, Bootle, Liverpool, has received a volume of Pearson's Magazine for the best anagram on the words: "Answers to correspondents."

A VOLUME of Pearson's Magazine will be sent to the reader who forwards this paragraph, legibly written, in the smallest space. All attempts to reach this office by Monday, January 3rd, in envelopes marked "SMALL."

S. L. G.—No, the Victoria Cross has never been awarded to a woman; it is not designed for female decoration. In Germany heroines are decorated with the Iron Cross, and in France with the Legion of Honour.

TONY.—Luckily for London, it is quite true that there are some beneficial results derived from fogs. Scientists say that when a fog subsides it deposits various chemical and irritating particles which were held suspended in the atmosphere, and clears it from what was prejudicial to man.

D. L. C. — Noblesse oblige means that noble birth imposes the obligation of high-minded principles and actions.

AGNES.—If you wish to become a nurse you must go through the three years' course of training. Mere attendance at classes would not suffice, as you seem to think.

KIT.—The cork tree is very seldom met with in England. In Goodwood Park, however, there are some very fine specimens.

D. A. P.—No, Blondin was not the real name of the celebrated tight-rope walker. Being of a higher class of society than persons adopting such a vocation usually are, he adopted that name in order to preserve his incognito. His real name was Jean François de Gravelet.

A. M. Y. writes: "You seem to be very well up in the origin of various institutions and customs, etc., I wonder if you can tell me something about the origin of the 'Punch and Judy' show?"————This show is a relic of an ancient mystery, "Pontius Pilate and the Jews." Types or symbols of Mr. Punch have been discovered amongst the hieroglyphics of Egypt; and Herculaneum and Pompeii have given up the puppet after being buried sixteen centuries, so that it would be almost impossible to say how or when it first originated.

A. C.—Grey horses are the longest lived; creams are decidedly delicate, and are seriously affected by very warm weather.

W. R. M.—The exact spot opposite to London on the other side of the globe is the ocean south-east of New Zealand, near a small island, which was given the title of Antipodes Island, in honour of its position with reference to the greatest city in the world.

J. M.—"Chamber music" is music fitted for performance in a room as distinguised from concert music, or any music depending on many performers and plenty of space.

COLD FEET.—A good remedy is to wear a sock of thick brown paper inside the boot or shoe.

S. W.—No, the doctors in Sweden never send bills to their patients, the amount of remuneration being left entirely to the generosity of the latter.

GEE-GEE.—The great bell of Moscow is not the largest in the world. The distinction belongs to the bell hanging in the Temple of Clars at Kiuto, in Japan. It is peculiar in having no clapper, and is struck outside with a sort of wooden batt ring-ram. In point of volume and tone, however, our own bell of St. Paul's Cathedral can beat any other in the world.

BOB.—The raising of silkworms may certainly be a source of amusement to amateurs, but certainly not a means of making money. The cocoons are sold by weight, and you would have to keep about 2,800 worms in order to obtain 12lb. of cocoons, so as to yield a pound of reeled silk.

A MOTHER writes that the other day her little boy picked up a £10 note in the street, and promptly brought it home to her, who, after making inquiries, succeeded in returning the note to its lawful owner. Judge her dismay, however, when the generous-hearted individual placed twopence in her hand, "as a reward for her honesty," which it is needless to say was refused with indignation—and I don't wonder at it. Individuals who consider a twopenny reward sufficient recompense for returning a £10 note do not deserve to be treated honestly. When a person finds anthing of value, his or her best plan is to take it off to the police-station, and should it ever be claimed, the owner is practically compelled to leave a sufficiently satisfactory reward behind for the finder.

KILKENNY.—In some of the farming districts of China, pigs are harnessed to small waggons and made to draw them. I never heard of this being done in Ireland, as you seem to suppose.

CURIOS would like to know what becomes of the enormous quantity of oakum which is picked in our various prisons.————Oakum is chiefly used for caulking ships; it is also largely used for surgical dressing in the hospitals of Great Britain and on the Continent.

GOLDSMITH.—Certainly there are other birds besides the cuckoo who do not build nests. The goat-sucker and curlew lay their eggs on the ground, and sometimes move them from place to place; many aquatic birds lay their eggs on the rocks; other birds avail themselves of holes in trees instead of building nests, which answer the purpose equally well.

M. C. S.—There are schools in England for the special benefit of those who stammer. We do not give such addresses, but any doctor would recommend one to you.

G. R.—It is not usual for a man and woman to shake hands when first introduced, unless in exceptional cases. However, it would be exceedingly rude to ignore a proffered hand.

W. F.—A "trice" is the sixtieth part of a second.

W. K. M. asks: "What is the 'golden rose'?"————It is a present made every year by the Pope to the Royal lady who has most distinguished herself by loyalty to the Pope and to the Church of Rome. This rose is made of pure gold, and is chiselled with exquisite workmanship, being valued at £2,000. The golden rose has been presented to the ex-Queen Isabella of Spain, and to the ex-Empress Eugénie of France.

A. T. C.—Your informant is quite right; there is a place where there is only six days in a week, namely, Chatham Island, in the South Pacific. The explanation is that time is lost when travelling eastwards, and gained while travelling west. Chatham Island is situated just on the line of distinction between times and dates; it is very near the Antarctic circle, and the days and nights seem to get mixed up, which does not matter so much as it would if it were a more populated country.

Notice to Competitors.

IN all Prize Competitions the Editor's decision is final. No correspondence will be entertained when once a competition is finished and the result published.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

FOOD FOR THE SKIN.

OTTO-FREEZ

BEAUTIFUL

TOILET SOAP.

The Best and Purest for Toilet, Bath and Nursery.

A Luxury for Shaving. Delicately Perfumed.

When used regularly, the skin becomes soft and beautiful. The great care which is taken whilst making OTTO-FREEZ Soap is the secret of its excellence. Only the purest materials are used, and the Wool Fat, which it is largely composed of, makes it a perfect Food Soap for the skin.

WINS ITS WAY EVERYWHERE.

OTTO-FREEZ BEAU-IDEAL SOAP, Price 6d. Tablet.

OPALINE SOAP, Price 4½d. Tablet.

IVORINE SOAP, Price 3½d. Tablet.

POSTAGE ON ONE TABLET 1d. EXTRA.

The Name "OTTO-FREEZ" is a guarantee of Purity and Excellence.

LADIES WHO VALUE THEIR COMPLEXIONS

Should always use good Soap. It is the PINK OF FASHION to wash with Otto-Freez Soap.

Special Presentation Boxes.

To introduce as many readers of this journal as possible to prove the superiority of OTTO-FREEZ SOAP, we will send three tablets (one of each kind packed in a pretty box) to any address in the United Kingdom on receipt of postal order or stamps for 1s., post free (which is much less than the usual price). We are so confident of it pleasing you, that should you not be satisfied we will return your money with pleasure. Send your order at once. Chemists, Grocers, and Stores sell OTTO-FREEZ SOAP.

BETTER NOT WASH AGAIN

Until you have got a tablet of OTTO-FREEZ SOAP. It makes the skin and complexion beautifully soft and velvety, and the face, neck, and hands fair as a lily. OTTO-FREEZ SOAP is delicately and expensively perfumed.

TRY IT.

OTTO-FREEZ SOAP COMPANY Ltd., LONDON, N.W.

Digitized by Google

Every Economical Housewife
uses
Tower Tea.
Tower Coffee.
Tower Cocoa.
IN PACKETS AND TINS ONLY.
SOLD EVERYWHERE.
WHOLESALE:
TOWER TEA LTD.,
5, JEWRY STREET, LONDON, E.C.

BELL ORGANS & PIANOS.

Unequalled for Purity of Tone and High Class Workmanship.
THE MOST RELIABLE INSTRUMENTS MADE.
Write for Catalogue and Terms, Cash or Easy Payments.
The Bell Organ and Piano Co. Ltd.
49 HOLBORN VIADUCT, LONDON, E.C.

SULPHOLINE LOTION.
For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.
SHILLING BOTTLES.

EPPS'S
GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.
COCOA

WHY BE FAT?
When a lady who has discovered a simple means of self cure for this distressing ailment without taking nauseous drugs or pills, will gladly send full particulars on receipt of stamped envelope.
MRS. TREVOR-WELLS,
"The Limes," Belmont Road, Lee, London.

A Stirring Story of Adventure.
JOHN OF STRATHBOURNE.
By R. D. Chetwode. Price 3s. 6d.

The Times says: "We can only say that had it appeared anonymously, it might have passed for the handiwork of Mr. Stanley Weyman, and it would be difficult to give higher praise. It is a romance of the days of Francis I., and it has this in common with 'A Gentleman of France,' that the hero's unselfish devotion and dauntless courage change the scorn of a fair and high-born damsel into sentiments of the fondest affection. But there the resemblance ends. Mr. Chetwode has too much spirit and originality to be indebted to anyone for his ideas. . . . There are striking pictures of feudal France when justice slumbered during the civil wars, when bands of brigands ravaged unprotected districts with impunity, and each noble if he could muster sufficient following did what seemed right in his own eyes."

Catalogues of Novels by Popular Authors will be sent on application.

London: C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., Henrietta Street, W.C.

CHOICE. CHIPPY. CHEERFUL. CHEAP.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY G. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

NO. 471. FOR WEEK ENDING JANUARY 8TH, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

Beecham's Pastime Parcel

BIG VALUE FOR ONE SHILLING, WITH A PRIZE COMPETITION FOR £100.

The Proprietor of Beecham's Pills, knowing that most readers of his Advertisements look for something startling at this time of the year, has made up a SHILLING PARCEL, which will surprise and please all those fortunate enough to get it.

CONTENTS:

TWELVE BRIGHT BOOKS, forming a delightful collection of tasteful and thrilling tales, by various authors of renown, in all 28 complete stories, set in good type, making nearly 600 pages of fascinating reading, and enlivened by over 300 illustrations.

THREE EXCELLENT SONGS, very tuneful, with complete music accompaniments, composed expressly for Beecham's Pastime Parcel, entitled, "To My Beloved," by ERNEST BROWNE; "A Winter Song," and "Sir Harold the Hunter," by A. G. COLBORN.

ONE BEAUTIFUL ETCHING, on India Paper, representing the charming picture, "A Mother of Three," by HENRIETTA RONNER, suitable for and well worth framing, being equal, if not superior, to anything sold by the trade for one shilling.

ONE MOST ARTISTIC TEAR-OFF CALENDAR FOR 1898. The views on this are very pleasing, and no one will be tired of looking at them each day in the year.

THE £100 PRIZE COMPETITION. This is quite a remarkable puzzle competition. Entirely novel and of a fascinating character. It has been arranged in connection with "Beecham's Oracle," an assorted supply of which, expressly designed for this competition, will be included in each parcel. The burning of these mysterious puzzle Oracles will develop various secrets, which each purchaser of Beecham's Pastime Parcel is invited to unravel, and so stand to win the prize of £100. One competition paper (containing all particulars and rules) is enclosed in each parcel.

The demand for the Pastime Parcel will be very heavy, and, of course, the supply is limited. All applications will be dealt with as quickly as possible, the parcels being sent per parcel post, postage paid. Do not be uneasy about a little delay, as the competition will be open until February 5th, 1898.

Any reader of this paper ordering ten parcels to be sent together to the same address will be presented with a complete set of Beecham's Music-Folio (Vols. 1 to 12), the usual price of which is 2s. 6d.

Apply early, enclose Postal Order or Stamps for ONE SHILLING, writing your name and address clearly to

The Proprietor of BEECHAM'S PILLS, St. Helens, Lancashire.

CUT OUT THIS ORDER FORM, IT WILL SAVE YOU WRITING A LETTER.

To the Proprietor of BEECHAM'S PILLS, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Please send _____ (Name)

_____ (Address)

(No.) _____ Pastime Parcels. Amount enclosed _____

Digitized by Google

"Its food value is double that of Bread made from ordinary wheaten flour."—Lancet.

HOVIS BREAD

will not only help to improve your digestion and consequently your health, but will also bring back that energetic and happy feeling of good health. Man does not live a natural life, so a good portion of a natural food, in the shape of HOVIS, at each meal will largely counteract the bad influence that modern life has upon the health and digestive organs. This is not an idle remark, but a proved statement, daily being verified.

HOVIS is baked and sold by all good class Bakers. No loaf genuine unless stamped HOVIS. 6d. and 1/- samples of Bread and Biscuits sent on receipt of stamps by

S. FITTON & SON, Millers, Macclesfield.

MAKE FRUIT WINES AT HOME.

Ask for MASON'S.

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. THE VERY BEST.

MASON'S GINGER WINE ESSENCE.

A Sixpenny Bottle will, in six minutes, make sixty glasses of Delicious, Non-Alcoholic Wine. Agents Wanted.

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

MASON'S (NOTTINGHAM) COFFEE ESSENCE (THE BEST MADE)

MASON'S WINE ESSENCES

are made in all Fruit Flavours, Ginger, Lemon, Orange, Blackberry, etc.

YOU WON'T BE DISAPPOINTED.

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

The Best Hair Dye

in the World for Lashes, Eyebrows, and Hair on the Head, with Moustache and Beard. For Ladies' Hair and for all Colours. Had at 3s. 6d., post 3s. 9d., of ALEX. ROSS, 62 Theobald's Road, High Holborn, London, W.C. Spanish Cantharides for fallen hair, 3s. 6d. 5s. 6d. & 10s. 6d.

TRILENE REGd TABLETS THE ONLY CURE for STOUTNESS Registered by GOVERNMENT Price 2/6

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably"

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

MR. CLAUDE CARTER, of Thorn House, Johnstone, N.B., says: "Your Tablets much reduced my weight and I have been waiting to see if it was permanent, and so it has proved."

MR. CANHAM, 87, Alexandra Road, Norwich, says: "Tablets cured my wife two years ago of extreme stoutness. It has never returned."

MARION TAYLOR, of Church Farm, St. James, Halesworth, says: "Have lost quite two stone."

A. PEEL, of Darley Hydro, Matlock, writes: "They have reduced and benefited me a good deal."

MISS MONEY, Broadway House, Newbury. "I am greatly reduced in weight."

MR. G. LOVE, 4, Kirk Street, Peterhead. "I think them wonderful not only to reduce fat but as a medicine."

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

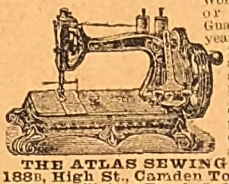
NOSE MACHINE.

This is a contrivance by which the short cartilage of the nose is pressed into shape by wearing the instrument an hour daily for a short time. Price 10/6, sent free for stamps. ALEX ROSS, 62, Theobald's Road, London, opposite Bedford Row. Est. 1850. Parcel free from observation.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.



Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 188B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W. 63 Seven Sisters Road, N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

£20 Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.

Tobacconists Commencing. See Illd. Guide (250 pages) 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000. Tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (30 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers.

FREE

Send stamped addressed envelope for Price List and receive free, Our Allios Gold Imitation Diamond Pin, in case, for Lady or Gent. Send four stamps to cover packing, etc.

RENNIE & CO., Dept. 11, Croy Place, Glasgow.

7/6 THE "WAVERLEY" SALOON GUN. WITH 100 BALL CARTRIDGES. 7/6

THE "WAVERLEY."

100 Birds or Rabbits can be killed with this gun at a cost of 1/-. Will penetrate a one-inch deal board at 75 to 100 yards; each gun bears the legal proof-mark. Price Lists free. W. R. JACKSON, Arms Manufacturer, 8, Park Avenue Rd., Tottenham, Middlesex. Mention Short Stories.

DR. MACKENZIE'S

Deliciously and expensively perfumed, the most luxurious Soap in the World. Produces a most lovely complexion, eradicates spots, pimples, and all imperfections, makes the skin exquisitely clear, and produces the healthy bloom so much desired. It is absolutely harmless, and each tablet is accompanied by a medical certificate.

ARSENICAL SOAP.

6D. & 1S. PER TABLET.

This Soap prevents the growth of superfluous hairs, removes wrinkles, feeds the skin. You can get it at all the Stores and first-class Chemists. The Family Doctor says it is the most economical beautifier known to Modern Dermatology. It clears away all pimples, spots, redness, or roughness, and makes the skin smooth and clear as a baby's. Use it in the bath and for all Toilet purposes; it is most delicious. For irritable or sensitive skins it is matchless and delightfully soothing.

MADAME PATTI sends her best thanks for Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap, which she finds most excellent—Craig-y-nos Castle, South Wales.

Use also Dr. MACKENZIE'S "ARSICAL" Face Lotion. Beware of many Imitations. Have Dr. MACKENZIE'S or none.

WADE'S WONDERFUL OFFER

A WATCH FOR NOTHING.

For particulars send for one of my illustrated catalogues. To induce you to send for this I guarantee to supply one of my half-hoop "Black Star" Diamond 18-carat Gold-cased Ladies' Rings for the nominal sum of 1/6. The ring is equal in appearance to one costing 5 guineas. The watch I give away free of charge and the list price for it is 40/-, being composed of Solid Silver cases, and is a reliable time-keeper. This offer is strictly genuine, and I have thousands of testimonials thanking me for my free gifts. Send at once enclosing Postal Order for 1/6, and string size of finger, and address

W. W. WADE,

Gold Exchange, Hammersmith, London, W.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

HIS ONE ROMANCE.

For the last thirty years, Herr Adolph Lebrecht, the registrar, had made his way to the office at precisely the same moment, and by exactly the same route, every morning of his life, with the exception of Sundays and public holidays. He always crossed the road at the same point, and the only deviation he ever made was entirely dependent on the weather. On fine mornings he stood for the space of two minutes to inhale the fresh breeze from the river when he reached the middle of the bridge; but when it was wet he went straight on, and occupied the extra time in divesting himself of his goloshes and mackintosh. For the registrar was not a strong man, and he had no one but his landlady to nurse him when he was ill.

So unfailing was his punctuality, that people on the route knew the time to a moment when he came in sight. He was a small, elderly man, of very ordinary appearance, and yet no one was better known or more noticed in that particular part of the city.

The children knew whether they were early or late for school by the place in which they met him, and old Frau Schmidt used to start her husband off to his place of business directly she saw the registrar coming round the corner. He thus unconsciously became a kind of human chronometer by which many others regulated their movements.

But there had once been a short period in which they would have found him a broken reed.

Five-and-twenty years ago, soon after he came to the city from his provincial home, when he was young and not bad-looking, with a tender longing for love and a passionate admiration for beauty hidden under his shy, awkward exterior, Adolf Lebrecht had once loitered in the path of duty and had suffered thereby.

For some inexplicable reason he had turned down a quiet side street one bright summer's morning, and as he passed one of the small villas of which the street was composed, he was struck by two quaint little plaster figures which adorned the gate posts.

They represented a grotesque, gnome-like little man and woman, the latter being in an angry attitude with a hand upraised, ready to strike her sulky companion.

Herr Lebrecht was amused and was just going to shake his fist at the little plaster shrew, when the fear of looking ridiculous made him cast an anxious look round to see if there were any spectators. It was a lovely morning, the blackbirds were singing as sweetly as they did in his old home, and the air was perfumed with the scent of the hawthornes and laburnums. No one seemed to be astir but himself, and with one more look at the funny little figures he started to walk on, when his eyes fell on a side window which looked out into the little garden.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

He was very short-sighted, and so far had not liked to spoil his appearance by wearing spectacles, still there was no mistaking a girl's figure at the window in question. The laburnum seemed to mingle with her golden hair, and he thought her sweet lips were parted in a smile, for he could see the pearly teeth between them; her sleeves were turned back, leaving the round white arms bare to the elbow.

He was much too shy to look long at this charming apparition, so he hurried on, but in his confusion nearly tumbled over his walking stick that had got between his legs. Hot and flurried he pursued his way for a few yards, then the demons of curiosity and vanity got the better of his good manners, and he turned to see if she were still looking. Yes, there she was; if anything, she was leaning further out of the window, smiling sweetly, he felt sure; and he could catch a glimpse of her white arms through the moving foliage.

On that memorable morning he was seven minutes late at the office! But he met the inquiries and the wondering glances of the other men with a callous indifference, at which no one was more surprised than himself; and though he went conscientiously through the day's work, the dry documents seemed embellished with feathery sprays of golden laburnum, and the silence of the office broken by the sweet notes of the blackbird's song.

He was far too shy to make any inquiries as to who the girl was, and for some days he even lacked the courage to repeat his morning's escapade. He felt as if the passers-by would question his right to be there, as they knew his road lay in a different direction.

At last the longing to see his unknown beauty mastered even his fears, and the bright sunshine tempted him to turn boldly aside, so, with beating heart and flushed cheeks, he made his way to the enchanted spot.

His valour was rewarded, for there she was, and this time he looked long and earnestly. He noted that her hair was dressed high on her small head, and that her sleeves were again carefully turned back as she bent over the flowers growing in the balcony beneath her. It seemed to him as if she blushed under his admiring gaze, and his brain was in a whirl, for no woman had ever blushed under his eyes before. He boldly smiled back and had made up his mind to raise his hat before leaving, but, frightened at his own temerity, he checked his hand half way and put his tie straight instead.

From that day forward the registrar passed the villa regularly every morning, but he arranged his walk so that he arrived punctually at the office as the clock struck the first stroke of eight. The object of his adoration seemed to be of equally methodical habits, for she was always at the window ready to greet him and remained there till he was out of sight. This fact rejoiced his heart, and he also noted with pleasure that she dressed in a quaint, artistic style of her own, regardless of the disfiguring fashions of the day.

In any other case he would have censured such waste of time in a young girl, but one day he noticed that she had a little watering-pot in her hand, and, as he was devoted to flowers himself, he hailed another mutual taste and loved her the better for it. Then again, vanity is apt to upset the judgment of even the wisest of men, and her evident appreciation of himself was sufficient excuse for the apparent loss of the early morning hour.

His acquaintances noticed a great smartening up of the outer man, and even a frivolous tendency to hum, or whistle sentimental songs in these happy summer days, but though some may have guessed his secret, he confided in no one. It was too sacred to be discussed, even if he had had the courage to mention it.

This uninterrupted happiness was soon to have a disquieting element brought into it like all else on earth. Herr Lebrecht was in the habit of playing a game of whist after dinner in the restaurant he frequented, and one of his set, a young lawyer, named Edward Franke, happened to mention one evening that he had friends in the Garten Strasse, and let fall something about a very pretty girl. Lebrecht nearly revoked, and played shockingly for the rest of the evening. His heart was suddenly torn with pangs of jealousy, for there could not be two "very pretty" girls in that street, he felt sure, and as he looked at the good-looking, self-possessed, genial fellow before him, he realised that he would be a formidable rival for any man.

He made a desperate resolve. He must make sure of her while there was yet time, so he decided to declare himself by letter without delay. He made an excuse and asked for a postal directory before he went home that night; but there was no name given for the inhabitants of that particular house. Perhaps they were new-comers, any how she would understand. He must risk it!

For the next three days he spent all his spare time in the composition of that letter. He felt his dry, official style was against him, and yet he feared to give free rein to his passion lest it should jar on her delicate sensibilities. At last it was completed fairly to his satisfaction, and if the subject-matter left anything to be desired, certainly the caligraphy was a masterpiece. He copied it out three times before he was satisfied, and then took it with him the next morning.

After looking carefully round once or twice he drew the letter from his pocket and held it up for his beloved to see, and in so doing, his hand trembled so violently that he dropped it. Then he tried to hide it in the holly hedge that ran alongside the house, and after tearing his hands and dropping the note again, he managed to fix it where she could easily reach it.

All that day his mind was torn with suspense and excitement, and a sleepless night followed. The next morning was wet and stormy, and it was all the poor nervous young man could do to make his way towards the place where he felt his fate might be decided.

Just as he reached the house his umbrella was turned inside out, and a strong gust of wind carried his carefully brushed top hat out into the middle of the muddy street. He caught a fleeting glance at the window, and saw that his faithful love was there, undeterred by wind and weather, and then he started off on a wild and humiliating chase after his whirling head-gear.

The result of this catastrophe was a feverish cold which kept the registrar confined to the house for more than a week, and this unwonted period of inaction was devoted to fond dreams of the fair unknown. He attributed to her all the virtues he most admired in woman, and filled in the bare outline of his knowledge with all the delicate touches of his romantic fancy. The fact of her not having answered his letter by writing to the address he had given her, pointed to a sense of maidenly modesty that quite softened the weary time of waiting.

Digitized by Google

His ambition awoke, and he decided that he would make a career for himself, and he pictured her at his side as he climbed the ladder of official promotion, till they both graced its highest rung.

As soon as he was convalescent he took an afternoon walk, and his steps involuntarily turned towards the Garten Strasse. He had no hope of seeing the object of his affections, but it was something even to pass her house again.

An unpleasant shock awaited him. There was the lawyer, dressed in a brand-new grey summer suit and faultless patent leather shoes, making his way in the direction of the very house. And worse than that,—there was his goddess at the window smiling and blushing at Frank, just as she had done to him for the last month. His rival passed the house, but when he had reached the corner he turned, and, in doing so, ran into the excited registrar.

"Ah, good-afternoon, Herr Lebrecht. Glad to see you out again. We have missed you very much at the whist table."

The registrar could not find words to answer these platitudes, his heart was too full, but he turned and walked silently to the house, struggling with his emotion.

Finding him a dull companion, the lawyer drew out his watch, and, after looking at it, said carelessly:

"Well, we shall meet to-morrow, I daresay. I have an appointment that I must keep, so I'll bid you good day. You don't look like yourself yet, you must be quiet for a bit longer."

With this Lebrecht burst forth into an incoherent torrent of reproaches. At first his companion thought his mind must be wandering, and was seriously alarmed; but by degrees the truth began to dawn upon him from the repeated allusions to the girl at the balcony, and he burst into a hearty laugh.

"Oh, so you think I want to cut you out in that fair lady's affections, do you? My dear fellow, calm yourself. I should never dream of taking the trouble, she's not worth it. She has exactly the same smile for every passer-by. She's a——"

"Stop, Herr Franke! I forbid you to speak one disparaging word of her in my hearing. She has been sufficiently insulted already," said the registrar with dignity.

"Oh, she won't mind. Will you, my dear?" and Herr Franke began impudently kissing his hand at the lady in question.

The registrar expected to see his divinity withdraw from the window in disgust, but to his grief and astonishment she remained there and seemed to like it. He concealed his bitter disappointment under the veil of righteous indignation, and continued to remonstrate.

"Open your eyes, man, and see what a paltry thing you're exciting yourself about!" exclaimed Franke, who was fast losing patience.

"Herr Franke, you shall give me satisfaction for this! You are a ——" and before he well knew what he was saying, an opprobrious epithet had passed his lips.

"Very well, Herr Lebrecht," answered the other quietly, "I've not time to settle the matter now, but you shall hear from me."

With that they parted, and the registrar never knew how he reached his rooms that day. All his beautiful dreams had been ruthlessly obliterated. He had seen enough to convince him that she was not what he had fondly imagined, and now he was going to risk his life for an unworthy object. His short sight would be very much against him in a duel, and he knew that the lawyer was the hero of many such contests. Still, life had now lost for him all that made it beautiful, so he might as well die at once as linger on in sorrowful loneliness.

The next day was Sunday, and a special messenger brought him the following note:

Sir.—I have fought too many duels to be afraid of any accusation of cowardice being brought against me, but I consider it my duty to decline to fight with you. I attribute your exciting conduct to your recent indisposition, and feel sure you will see the wisdom of my decision when you have regained your normal health. For your satisfaction let me add that I know nothing against the character of the lady at the window in the Garten Strasse, and that she is not to be blamed for her seeming levity, inasmuch as she is unable to control either her smiles or her movements. The fault lies with the landlord, who has allowed the work of a crack-brained artist tenant to remain on the blind window.—I am yours faithfully, Edward Franke.

No one ever ever knew what Adolf Lebrecht suffered on the receipt of the above. He shut himself up in his room till dusk, and then crept forth with his opera glass in his pocket to satisfy himself as to the nature of the object upon which he had lavished such a wealth of love and thought. One look through the glass convinced him that Herr Franke had told him the truth, for he could see the bold, masterly strokes drawn on the brickwork after the scene-painting style. The object had evidently been to get rid of the unsightly space where a window had been blocked up, so the artist had been lavish with his colours and had painted the white lace curtains behind the figure of the smiling, rosy maiden, in front of whom were the gay flowers in the balcony which she was represented as in the act of watering.

It was all wonderfully natural; the registrar's mortification knew no bounds. He found his note still among the holly leaves, discoloured by the damp, but otherwise intact, and he crushed it savagely in his hand till he reached the bridge, when he tied it to a stone and hurled it far from him into the rapid stream below.

He felt completely shattered by this rude awakening from "Love's Young Dream," and he passed a hideous night, haunted by the smiling face of the girl rushing after him with a pistol, while the lawyer cheered her on, waving the laboriously constructed love-letter in his hand.

The next morning he bought a pair of spectacles and bade farewell to romance.

Happily for him Herr Franke soon left the city to take a practice elsewhere, so no one was at hand to remind him of his wasted affections. He resumed his mechanical mode of life, and as years went on his heart seemed to shrink and shrivel up like his face, and he strenuously avoided every woman under fifty to the end of his days.

Years after, he met Herr Franke, who had risen to eminence in his profession; but had been singularly unfortunate in his choice of a wife. He held out his hand to the lonely little man saying:

"Well, Herr Lebrecht, are you as enthusiastic as ever?"

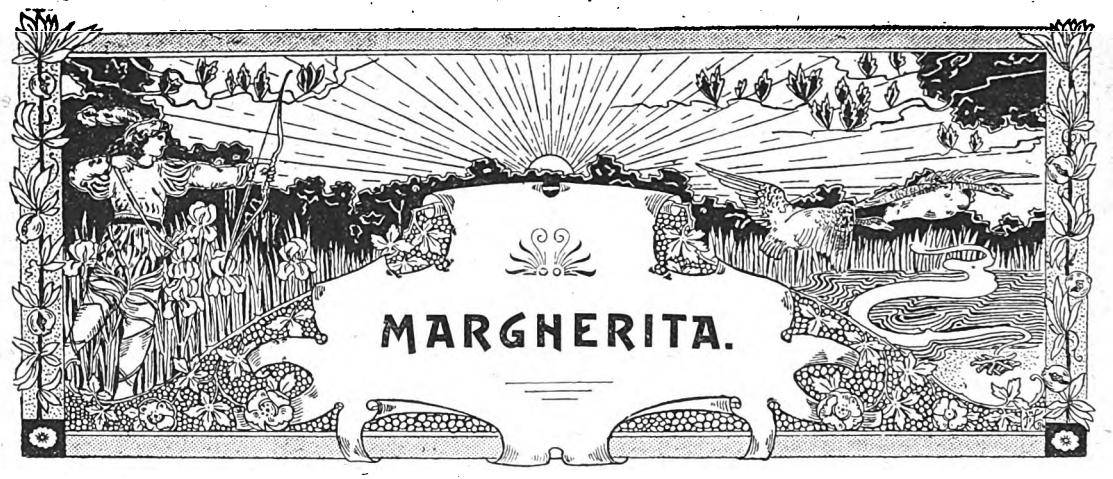
The tide of memory awakened by these words caused a deep flush of pain to overspread the features of his former would-be antagonist which caused the speaker to add in a softened voice:

"Be comforted, my friend, it would have been well for some of us if our youthful dreams had ended as yours did."

And with a hearty shake of the hand Herr Franke walked away with a bitter smile on his handsome features.

Mary Fermor.

Digitized by Google



MARGHERITA.

MARGHERITA'S head was small and shapely, her hair fine and silky, like the hair that is supposed to be nourished only by blue blood.

But there was no blue blood in Margherita's veins. At least it had never been boasted of in her family. The blood that tinged to red the olive of her cheek was warm, rich blood, such blood as the honest Italian peasantry women delight to keep pure.

There was a touch of yellow in her hair that just saved it from being black as night, and gave to it little tints of gold when the sunlight fell on it here and there. This she owed to the Saxon blood of her mother; all the black was the father's.

How shapely her figure! And her hands—her hands were very small, Pedro had often noticed, in spite of much hard work in the gardens.

The gold in the hair Pedro had also long ago noted, and the fine set of the small head on the straight young neck.

There had come a change into Margherita's life, and she was telling him about it.

Had a stranger chanced along the road just then, past the little house with its great gardens that lay just outside the town, he would have cast more than a careless glance at the young couple who stood at the gate.

The girl wore a blue calico dress cut round at the neck, and with sleeves that fell loose to just below the elbow. Resting her elbows on the top piece of the gate and her chin in her palms, the sleeves fell away and left her slim, rounded arms bare almost to the shoulder.

The young man stood outside the closed gate and gazed earnestly down into the girl's laughing face.

"He is handsome as the girl is," the passing stranger would have commented. "Just as dark, and unmistakably a child of the same sunny clime."

Pedro's gardens were but a bit of a way from those of Margherita's father. His lettuce was always the crispest and greenest, and his celery was famed the country round. Margherita often helped him tie it into bunches, and the celery went away to market with a merry girl's bright laughter to season it. Pedro's cart never came back with a burden.

"You will go then?"

And the young man's gaze travelled across the wide slope of Margherita's father's garden until it rested on the turret-like end of a big house that just peeped over the brow of the hill and between the tall trees.

"You will go up there and serve rather than—— But pshaw! What am I saying?"

Margherita looked up eagerly now into his face, as if half expecting, half hoping that she would hear him say the something she felt sure he would say some day. But it was not said. In after years, when Pedro sat alone until far into the night, he wished that it had been.

The girl's expectant look changed quickly to one of wilfulness.

"And why not? Why should I not as well serve there as here?"

"Up there are fine ladies and—and fine men. You are pretty. You will lay by your calico dress and put on fine clothes. You'll forget about the gardens, and how to bunch celery and lettuce, and——"

His dark cheeks were burning now, and he had stretched his arm out over the gate. To a girl not used to the soft and musical accents his words would have meant much, but Margherita had known him always. Why, yes, since she was a tiny child, and he not much larger, when he used to break the orange flowers from the trees and shower them over her head in the garden of their poor but sunny home across the seas.

Some day—yes, maybe, some day, when Pedro had paid off all the debt on his gardens, he would ask her to be his wife. But gold was not as fast coming in England as once, when far away, they had thought. But why must she work in her father's gardens and wait—always wait? The only glimpse she had of the big, gay town was on market days, and now—now as a fine lady's maid she would perhaps see the town every day, and hear the music at the balls, and, oh——

But the thought of it all made her head dizzy.

Pretty? Yes, Pedro had said so. And the fine men!

Here the spirit of the coquetry seized her. But Pedro was to blame. She would never have thought of the fine men had he not said something about them. What was it he had said about the fine men up at the big house and herself? But Margherita could not remember.

* * * * *

There were only occasional glimpses to be had of Margherita now when Pedro drove his cart of fresh green things to the backdoor of the big house each morning. Margherita's young mistress had long been one of Pedro's patrons, and Margherita would take care now to see that no other carts were so liberally patronised as his.

Digitized by Google

The short blue calico frock and the gay handkerchief that she used to wear over her head were gone. Instead, the trim and rounded figure was clad in a dark blue cloth gown, with white lace frills at neck and sleeves. The dark hair was tossed up in a fluffy mass at the back of the little head, and a tiny cap of lace and ribbons topped it all. In place of the stout leather shoes, slim black satin slippers, with saucy bows that called attention to them, were on her feet.

The first day that Pedro saw her like this she had run down the steps all out of breath, and flushed like a child to show herself to him. She had overturned a work basket from the little table from the window where she was sitting putting buttons on a long pair of gloves, when she spied Pedro's cart coming over the hill. The mistress had seen the flight of the little maid, and guessing the meaning of it, stooped smilingly, and picked up the scattered buttons.

Pedro looked at the girl and sighed.

"Why do you look so, you stupid? Don't you want to see me in pretty clothes? Well, maybe there are others who would like to."

And Margherita caught hold of her skirt at each side and spread it, displaying as she did her shapely ankles and small feet, and a white fluff of lace.

Pedro sighed again and mounted his waggon seat. Margherita's eyes filled with tears.

"Pedro! Pedro!" she called after him. "You are mean—I hate you!" But Pedro was driving away.

* * * * *

The summer days were fast passing. The gardens had grown and flourished, and there was another small sum to add to the debt, which now was "almost done," Pedro happily thought.

Margherita could find less time for a chat at the waggon in the morning. There was time enough in the evening, but she said she was busy getting ready to go away, to travel with her mistress abroad. "Back to Italy, Pedro; think of that," she had exclaimed the day that she had told him that her going was certain. Slowly the days were passing for Pedro, but, oh, how fast they went for Margherita! Margherita was light-hearted, but Pedro's heart was aching. There was gossip going afloat, and Margherita's was the one whose name gossip whispered.

"No good will come of it," said busy Gossip. "No good will come of it. It means no good when a girl meets a man to take walks only after the sun is down, and he one who is a fine gentleman. Margherita should know better. And then she goes no more to confession. Poor Pedro! If he knew!"

And Pedro did know, though he said over and over to himself that they were busybodies who said that Margherita was seen walking alone in the moonlight with a handsome stranger. It was one moonlight evening that Pedro, just strolling by the great house to maybe catch a glance of Margherita as she would chance to flit by some window, saw two figures going along a secluded path of the wide lawn. One was Margherita, the other that of a man tall and young. Pedro's heart grew sick. But he had just come up to see Margherita pass a window. He would not do so mean a thing as spy. He knew that Margherita had always loved him. He could trust Margherita. She was so good and honest. But it was Margherita walking there.

* * * * *

One day there came a letter. It was written on delicate paper and bore a crest. Margherita's father walked across the now almost bare gardens to where Pedro lived. He put the letter in Pedro's hands and said not a word as he turned away.

It was from Margherita's mistress, saying Margherita had left her before the steamship sailed from Liverpool, leaving a note behind, saying that she would be happier where she was going and begging that no one would look for her, and that she would be safe. "But please send word to the folks at home," Margherita had asked, "that I will not be back for a long time."

There was a cheque inclosed, Margherita's last wages, which she had not asked or waited for.

How the winter came and wore away, and spring once more with its warm sunshine coaxed the seed in the garden to send up fresh green shoots, Pedro could never remember. But all the warm season had been good, that was certain, for the last of the debt was paid.

Next summer there would be a stall in the market for Pedro to tend, and a man to look after the gardens and the waggon. If Margherita had only waited a little longer! But it was winter now, and a long time until the stall in the market would need attention, and there was plenty of time to think in the long evenings of Margherita, from whom no news had come.

"It will never come," Pedro said to himself, but he cheered the old father with the assurance that Margherita was a good girl, and that in time she would send them some word. That she would never do but what was right, never fear.

* * * * *

Springtime again, and a letter for Pedro. The postman who rode out that way on horseback brought it just as it was time to light the lamp and put more wood on the fire to get supper. The postman was late in his rounds that day, the roads were so muddy. The letter should have been there hours ago but for that.

Pedro almost snatched the letter from the man. Why did he stand there and talk? Didn't he know that perhaps it was a message he had been waiting through long, weary months for, and now delayed it?

It was just a scrap of writing. It only said "Pedro, come," and gave an address.

The roads were muddy, and it was a long way to the station, but what of that? There was a good horse in the stable, and if one travelled fast the train that left in an hour could be caught, and by midnight Pedro would be beside Margherita.

It was just midnight when a quiet-faced little sister met him at the hospital door. Pedro looked at her intently. The good woman, so used to reading anxious looks, said gently: "She still lives."

Then it was as he feared. Maybe Margherita would die! All Pedro's impetuous haste left him, and he followed the little sister softly on tip-toe, as though he were going where there was a sleeping child.

On a little iron bed in the tiny, spotless room, with another sister bending over her, lay the girl—pale and thin. Her dark hair was cut close and clung in little rings above her forehead.

"Yes, you may speak to her. It can do no harm. She may not know you now," the sister whispered.

The strong figure of the man bent over the little cot, and "Margherita" was all he said. The girl opened her eyes.

"Pedro," she answered; "yes, it is Pedro. We were married, Pedro. You did not think we were not, did you? I am sorry, Pedro. So sorry. Poor Pedro!"

The sisters drew him away. There was a sigh, and a little flutter of the slender hands on the white coverlet, and the sister at the foot of the bed made the sign of the cross, and said: "It is all over." But Pedro, bending down, saw that faint breaths stirred the ruffles of her nightgown, and all that night he sat by her side. The sisters came and went, and in the morning the doctor came and said that Margherita was better—that she had slept.

Digitized by Google

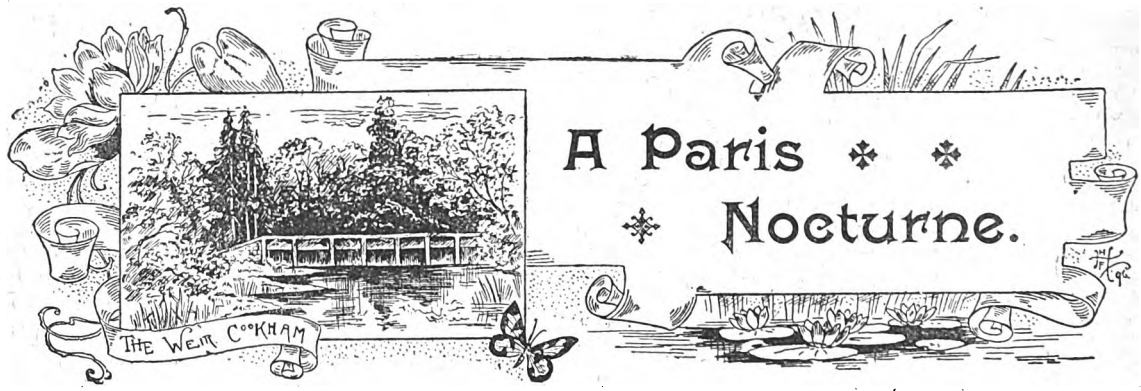
Then Pedro went away. Margherita woke up and told the sisters the dream she had had. Some weeks after that she told it to Pedro, and he said she had not dreamt.

Then Margherita told the story of the years that had not for either of them known happiness—of how she was tired of as a toy, of unkind treatment, of desertion, and the coming of kind death to set her free—free to go back to Pedro's love and ask his forgiveness.

The lettuce and onion were sprouting high above the ground, and there were wide stretches of green on every side when Margherita came back home. She had not forgotten how to bunch lettuce, or celery either, and as she worked the old colour and life came back into her face.

The stranger who might have passed that way when she stood at the gate long ago and told Pedro that she was going up to the great house on the other side of the wood would have noticed little change in her. The blue calico dress and gay handkerchief looked just as bright as ever, and Pedro thought there was no change in the girlish face except it might be a trifle less of laughter in the eyes. In time the new neighbours coming in had many good words of praise for Pedro's thrifty wife. "He was a lucky man, very, to have a wife to turn her hand so well to helping him."

Helen Noanes.



"The price will do."

"Monsieur is most kind."

"And—ah!—let me see. This is the fifth floor, I believe?"

"No, monsieur," simpered the landlady, slightly drooping her eyes.

"But you told me," began the gentleman with the Bohemian air, Greek nose, and shaggy, blond curls, "you told me, madame——"

"Yes, monsieur," Mme. Toudouch half stammered; "I—I had forgotten. On the fifth floor there is a room occupied, and monsieur wished this floor—the fourth—to be quite vacant."

"Yes," was the lingering reply. With a remarkably white hand, though large and muscular, the gentleman stroked a clear-chiseled chin. Suddenly, with this same hand, he made a sweeping gesture: "I will take all the little suite; but, mind you, I expect quiet during the week that I am here. I shall rest and drowse most of the time. I shall have no visitors—absolutely none. Frankly, I shall be in retirement. An absorbing affair—a matter of business, most wearisome business—will soon engross me, and hence I am taking this preparatory term of repose. You are sure I shall not be disturbed, madame—absolutely sure?"

"Oh, yes, monsieur, absolutely."

"My name is—er—Doruc—Albert Doruc."

"Thank you, monsieur."

"Please let my luggage be sent up. You have, no doubt, perceived that it is very small. I shall ask you for a cup of coffee each morning—good, strong coffee—a roll and a bit of butter. Please see that all three are excellent. Stay, madame."

And here M. Duroc glanced about him at the shabby, but clean apartment. "Perhaps you would prefer that I should give you half the agreed sum in advance." He then drew out a purse, and as he did so, the old woman's withered face became one broad smile of pleasure.

After she had gone, Duroc leant from one of his dormer windows, and looked at Paris below the slumbering azure of a perfect autumn afternoon. Yonder was Ile St. Louis, with Notre Dame so near that one could almost make out the grimaces of its ghoulish gargoyles. Ah, dear old Notre Dame, with the adorable sculptures of its main doorway, saints and martyrs all tangled together like roses in a huge wreath! Dear old "other side of the river!" What thrilling memories it evoked! There wound the Seine, with its little toylike steamboats, bound for Charenton, for Suresnes, for numberless ports besides. And the stately fawn-coloured buildings on either bank, skirting so palatially each curvilinear verge. Ah, the delicious days of boyhood, and to be here once again where he had dwelt for so many youthful years! How refreshing after the loud, bustling life of that other Paris, whose boulevards and cafés, and theatres, and salons teemed with a thousand ambitions, rivalries, hates!

"I will dine over here near the Luxembourg," meditated Duroc, "in a little restaurant, which has long ago forgotten my existence. Then I will come back to my placid refuge and enjoy the first serene sleep of seven, all of which I hope will be equally happy. How nice to be hidden away like this! After Monday next my work must begin. Meanwhile rest, rest, rest, before the tremendous task that awaits me."

Digitized by Google

Later Duroc carried out his intention. He took a stroll through obscure, yet familiar streets for nearly an hour after dining, and then returned to his new lodgings. He was a light sleeper, yet a healthful one. Hardly five minutes after blowing out his candle he had fallen into just the pleasant slumber that he craved.

"La—la—la—la—lah—la—la—la—tira, lira, lira—lah—la—tira lirah, lira—r r r!"

Then the tinkle, tinkle, tinkle, and thrum, thrum, thrum of a piano; then the woman's voice and also the piano, both dawning together into awakened consciousness; then a man's basso voice, repeating every tira-lira, every lah of the feminine one.

By this time Duroc was thoroughly awake. He soon lighted a candle and looked at his watch—ten minutes past midnight. The vocal exercises continued. Sleep was now impossible. He anathematised his landlady. Why had she dared to lie like this? Had she not promised him peace? The detestable sounds came too plainly from a room just above him. At a quarter past one o'clock they ceased. Soon afterwards he heard a man's step descend the staircase, passing his door.

The chain of sleep having thus been rudely broken, it was three good hours before he rejoined its disrupted links. He awoke at about nine in the morning, full of indignant protest. Finding the landlady downstairs, he poured upon her a torrent of reproaches. Was it for this that she had accepted his advance payment? Had she not assured him that his lodgings should be quiet? Of course, all the while, she knew of these two owls upstairs, these midnight cats, with their bass and treble miaulings! And the piano, too, a ramshackle thing at best! Was this honest dealing? Was it not shameless deceit?

But the landlady could now afford to be a trifle haughty. Was she not in sweet possession of the deposit?

"Monsieur is unjust! I supposed that he would be fast asleep when they began. The young man never comes till midnight."

Duroc gave a groan and swept past his landlady. He hated all chichancery, and he resolved forthwith to quit the lodgings. Then his wound rankled. Those few extra francs were nothing; but the cool imposition of it all!

He would remain for one day more and a night at least. If the tira-liras again awoke him, as of course they could not fail to do, he would make an emphatic request that these disturbers of his slumbers should keep silent. This would be wreaking a kind of vengeance on his landlady, for neither would she relish having her duplicity publicly disclosed, nor would the fair repute of her dwelling be thereby enhanced.

"Perhaps, after all, though," mused Duroc, "I shall sleep through the clamour of to-night. If not, farewell for ever to Mme. Toudouche."

At ten that evening Duroc ascended his staircase with the intention of retiring. Scarcely had he closed his door when madame's somewhat plaintive voice caused him to reopen it.

"I am so sorry it has happened, monsieur. Of course I realise that monsieur is perfectly right. I have not an idea who she is. Apparently, however, she is very poor. That touched my heart." And Mme. Toudouche made the motion of wiping away a tear. "She says the gentleman is her brother. She pays very little for the room. The piano is her own. She had it brought up herself. And now, M. Duroc, I have come to assure you that you need only command, and I will obey."

"Command? Obey, Mme. Toudouche?"

"Yes, monsieur. It is not right that you should be kept awake like this. I will tell the young girl when she comes to-night that I shall ask no further pay of her, and that she must at once cease from these disturbing practices."

"What a poor little handful of sous that 'pay' must be," thought Duroc, with irrepressible cynicism.

Somehow, after the landlady had departed, and while flinging himself into the only easy chair that his room contained, a twinge of consciousness assailed him. Might he not, after all, be thwarting some effort of self-support on the part of this girl—just referred to as possibly very poor? There might be cogent reasons why she should hold these weird concerts with her brother. "Well, no matter what happens to-night," he meditated, "I will endure it. And to-morrow, if I have been annoyed as I was last night, I can make a change of quarters. Meanwhile the most merciful plan is to see Mme. Toudouche at once and tell her that she must restrain her veto; that it is my earnest wish."

But soon, as it happened, a drowsiness overtook him, and he fell asleep there in the armchair. He was a man in perfect health, but for many days past he had been constitutionally tired by a special pressure of work.

Awakening abruptly after what he felt to have been a long and wholly unforeseen nap, he heard the piano banging upstairs, and the tira-liras blended with its notes.

Rubbing his eyes he laughed aloud. "It's hard to be charitable," he muttered. "How strange I should have fallen asleep like this. I suppose it's my broken rest of last night."

He rose with the immediate intention of undressing. All at once the sounds ceased. Then came another noise—that of voices. He opened his door and went out into the hall.

Upstairs Mme. Toudouche was vehemently talking. "I meant to wait up for you and tell you, mademoiselle, but I was too fatigued, and I lost myself in a long doze. Now I must insist that you stop your singing and playing at this unseemly hour—you and the young man whom you call your brother."

"He is my brother, Mme. Toudouche, just as I have said."

"Yes, madam, she is my sister."

"Well, I can't help that. The gentleman downstairs will not stand it, and he is perfectly right. I——"

Duroc listened no longer. He quickly mounted the steps leading to the upper hall. There he saw in the dim light three figures.

"Ah! M. Duroc," exclaimed the landlady, "it's you? Of course you have been distressed again by this wretched business. And slight wonder."

The light from the near room struck full on a pale, girlish face as "mademoiselle" advanced several steps.

"Oh, M. Duroc, may I beg you to let us go on? This young man is my brother, though madame here has hinted otherwise. I cannot play and sing at home. I had the piano brought here. It's the only possession of the least value that we now have left. My brother plays in the orchestra at one of the small Montmartre theatres. He would have time to teach me in the day, but I have no time then. I am always at the bedside of my poor, sick mother. She takes her sleeping potion at half-past eleven every night, and till half-past one it keeps her quiet. In a week from now my sister, who is a shop-girl at the Bon Marché, will lose her position. They are discharging hands there, now that the dull season has begun. But I have been positively promised a place in the chorus of the new opera at the Comique, provided I can only learn how to use my voice a little better than I use it now. My sister, you see, monsieur, will then become my mother's nurse, and the money that she can no longer earn I shall earn instead. At least, this is my hope, for it seems too hard that the whole burden of our family maintenance should fall upon poor Achille here. Look at him, monsieur; Achille is not strong. See how pale and thin he is, and he is only just nineteen. But he has marked musical talent, and he is helping me a very great deal. Oh, pray do not have us turned away! It has cost so much for us to get our piano up here and pay the rent of the room—so much, I mean, for us in our forlorn poverty!"

Digitized by Google

The girl's lips quivered with entreaty as she paused. Her eyes, large and black, were quite tearless, but they burnt with a keen, dry shine.

"And what is this new opera," asked Duroc gently, "in the chorus of which you hope to obtain a position?"

"Does not monsieur know?" here politely asked Achille, whose slender frame was as dim to Duroc as the latter's taller and burlier one was dim to him. "It is Fiordelisa, by the celebrated composer M. Albert Charantelle. He is the writer of five or six other works, all of which have been great successes here in Paris. It is said that Fiordelisa, will eclipse them all. M. Albert Charantelle is a strange gentleman in certain ways, though greatly beloved, I am told, by a wide circle of friends. For instance, when he has thoroughly completed an opera, and everything is ready for the first rehearsal, he has an odd way of disappearing from the world for a week or more, and nobody can find his whereabouts. They say that he has now disappeared like this. It is to gain rest, complete rest, or so I have been informed, before the great labour shall begin of putting the opera on the stage. But punctually on the morning of rehearsal he will appear at the Opera Comique and take up his baton and drill the singers and the choruses untiringly for days, until everybody is perfect in every part."

"Ah, indeed," said Duroc, rather deep down in his throat.

Without another word he moved past the threshold of the small, bare little room, and seated himself before the little upright old-fashioned piano. For a moment his fingers wandered dreamily over its keys, and then, with almost magic amplitude and finish, a gush of the most beautiful melody burst upon the stillness. As it continued it seemed to blossom even more than to sound. You might have fancied it was some garland woven from flowers of music by the hands of invisible spirits. The poor little ill-tuned piano seemed to its listeners an instrument of diapason divine.

Entranced, intoxicated, the young girl felt her brother's hand clutch her own.

"It is he, Gilberte," gasped Achille. "It is M. Albert Charantelle himself. I once heard him play at a concert, and some one near me said: 'If he had not chosen to be a great composer he would have been the greatest of pianists.'"

"Good Heavens!" faltered the young girl, and Mme. Toudouche, enveloped in an extremely unbecoming wrapper, heard a little cry of consternation.

Here the music slowly ceased in a ripple of tinkling arpeggios. With his hands dropping away from the keys, M. Albert Charantelle turned towards the young girl.

"My dear mademoiselle, you must accept from me a louis to-night for the sake of your poor mother."

"Oh, monsieur!" cried Gilberte, bursting into tears.

"And at ten o'clock precisely, next Monday morning, present yourself with this card at the stage entrance of the Opera Comique. Then you shall see what you shall see. From your tira-liras I feel already quite convinced that you will do excellently well in at least one or two of the choruses of Fiordelisa."

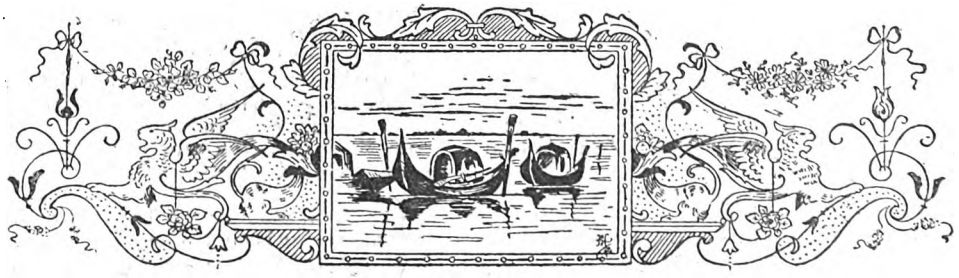
Gilbert passionately kissed the card.

"Oh, Achille, you are quite right! It is he—it is the great M. Charantelle himself! Ah! what a wonderful stroke of good luck!"

"And, now," said the gentleman, running one hand through his short, glossy curls, while he fixed the gaze of his brilliant, tawny brown eyes first on Achille and then on his sister, "I have to beg a favour of you both. Please give me a few quiet nights from now until Monday next. Will you not kindly grant me this favour?"

Achille broke into a laugh at what struck him as the delicate satire of these words: but Gilberte wiped her eyes, from which the grateful tears had not yet ceased to flow.

FRANCOIS COLLETT.



Digitized by Google

THE CLIENTS OF THE FORTUNE TELLER

(Told by Han Chu, on board the flower boat "Heavenly Bliss," Canton River.)

IT was a lovely afternoon in the middle of summer. The day was too hot to sit in the house, and the young ladies had taken their work and gone down to the Pavilion which stood upon an island in the stream that ran through the willow garden.

Their names were Hyacinth and Honeysuckle; and each had been so largely endowed by the Mother of All Things, that it would have taxed the wisdom of Confucius to decide between them.

Happy as the birds which built in the branches, the demon of jealousy had never entered their innocent young breasts.

Cousins by nature, they were companions by choice; and, being near neighbours, some hours of every day were spent together — working in the house, chatting in the garden, or feeding the tame carp in the fish pond. Hyacinth hadn't a thought which she did not share with Honeysuckle; and Honeysuckle confided to Hyacinth every maiden meditation which visited her youthful soul.

The cousins rose and walked out on the balcony.

The young ladies were the only daughters of blue-button mandarins.

Their fathers held official appointments in the province of the Four Streams—the most delightful region in the Imperial dominions—and resided in the suburbs of the important city of Mienchu on the Fu River—a tributary of the mighty Yang-tse—which, as everybody knows, rises in the Valley of Heaven, and flows thence through the Flowery Land.

The abode of Hyacinth was named Felicity House, while the dwelling of Honeysuckle was known as Paradise Place.

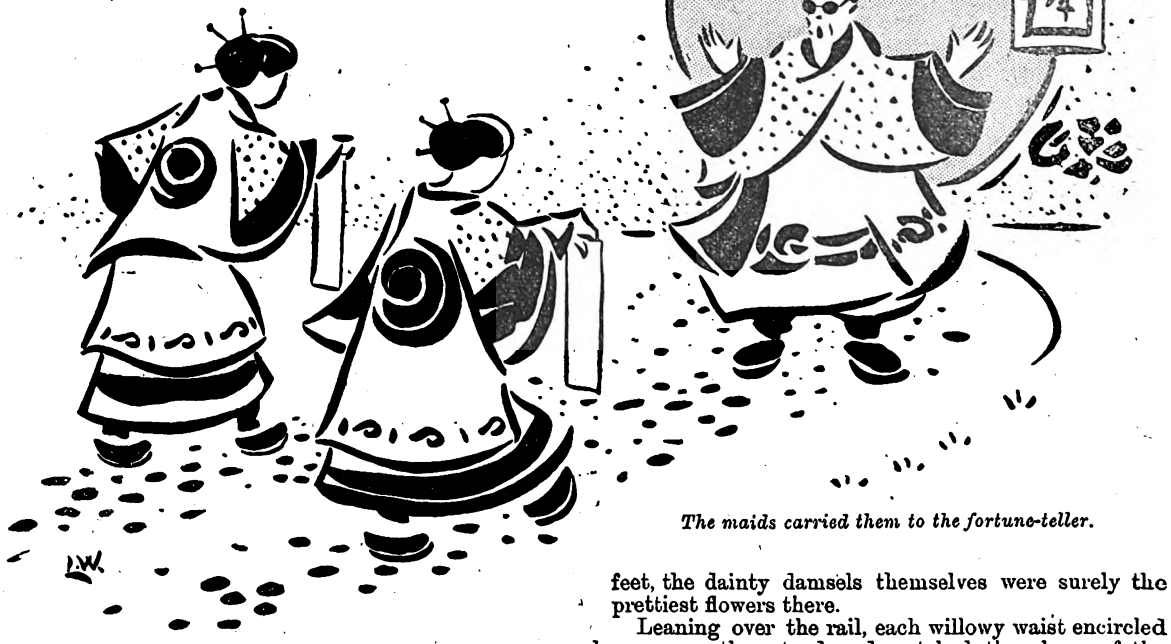
To describe them is a task beyond the power of mere mortal men. Suffice it to say that each was such as the Sons of the Stars might have envied, or the greatest of the Five Hundred Genü have chosen for his earthly tabernacle.

Digitized by Google

The cousins were delightful girls—tall and finely shaped, with complexions of ivory, and willow-like waists. Their eyebrows—arched like the rainbow—shaded eyes which dazzled by their brightness and intoxicated by their beauty.

Their mouths were perfect rosebuds, while their daintily shod feet were certainly the most provoking little things in China—being exactly of the length prescribed for the Court beauties in the palace of the Emperor at Pekin, which, you know, is just three inches long.

But to add to the attractions of these peerless paragons, Hyacinth and Honeysuckle, and, further, to enhance the value of their great physical perfections, the girls possessed all the virtues commended in the Mother of Mencius, and were in the first bloom of heavenly youth. By a singular coincidence, which, however, may account for their twin-like endowments, they were born at the same hour of the same day in the same month of the same year—being the hour of the Dragon on the fourth day of the eighth month in the fifth year of the reign of Heenfung.



The maids carried them to the fortune-teller.

Consequently, on the day when they sat together in the Flower Pavilion, embroidering slippers for the paternal feet, the girls would be fourteen years old.

"Shall we go on to the balcony and watch the gold-fish in the water?" said Hyacinth, throwing down her work. "I'm quite weary of this eternal stitching."

"Really, now, I feel just that way myself, dear," answered Honeysuckle sympathetically, "and the Shantung pattern's very trying to the eyes."

The apartment in which the young ladies were at work opened on to a balcony that was filled with flowers. Azaleas and poinsiettias, lilies and China-asters, roses and honeysuckles, hyacinths and hydrangeas—in tubs, in pots, in vases—there were flowers everywhere, flowers of every shape and every hue.

The cousins rose and walked out on the balcony Dressed in silken robe and pleated petticoat of purple satin, with enamelled hairpins thrust through their shining tresses, bangles on their shapely wrists, and the smallest of embroidered shoes upon their tiny dots of feet, the dainty damsels themselves were surely the prettiest flowers there.

Leaning over the rail, each willowy waist encircled by an arm, they stood and watched the gleam of the glittering scales, as the gold and silver fish darted to and fro under the crooked bridge which connected the island with the other parts of the garden.

"Jasmine tells me there's a famous conjurer and fortune-teller in the town," said Hyacinth presently, throwing a few rose petals into the water.

Jasmine was the maid who waited upon Miss Hyacinth.

"Yes, so Autumn-Leaf was saying, as she brushed out my hair for me last night," replied Honeysuckle, toying with a lily-spray that was caressing her cheek.

"Such a chance might not occur again, dear, in a lifetime," murmured Hyacinth.

"In the Book of Wise Sayings it is written that the man who casteth away his opportunities shall himself be cast away," put in Honeysuckle.

"And in the Book of Fate who shall read but he who is learned in the Wisdom of the Fathers?" observed Hyacinth.

"Even this fortune-teller," suggested Honeysuckle.

"I believe he has been sent expressly for the purpose," asserted Hyacinth. "I am fourteen years old, and I never heard of a fortune-teller being seen in the town before."

Digitized by Google

"Nor I, dear," affirmed Honeysuckle. "It would be a mighty poor compliment to the Giver of Good Things to neglect to profit by the visit of his servant."

"He was at Pekin only a week ago, where, Jasmine understands, he told the fortunes of all the ladies of the Imperial harem."

"And cast the horoscope of the Emperor's favourite daughter."

"And was received in private audience at the Summer Palace. Jasmine, who was shopping in Idol Street yesterday, says the news was all over the city——"

"And was decorated with the order of the——"

"Dragon and the Sun. Yes, I know, dear. Jasmine always brings me the latest."

"Autumn-Leaf, my dear Hyacinth, always gives me the earliest and fullest intelligence of what is going on in the town. The man was transported from Pekin on a flying carpet."

"In three hours. And his name——"

"His common, vulgar name is Li Ming; but his professional appellation is Star of the Morning, and his fee for unmarried girls of good family is ten ounces of pure silver."

"Your information agrees with mine, dear, exactly," said Hyacinth amiably, "and seeing that we have now reached an age when the marriage brokers will soon be busy arranging for our bethrothal, would not this be a fine opportunity to learn the sort of husbands we are likely to get; and how soon we shall ride in the festive chair, and be lifted over the fire which is lit at every 'newly-married' threshold?"

"The very thing, pet, that I was going to ask you," rejoined Honeysuckle, with a ripple of laughter as sweet as the bells in the Temple of Heaven at Pekin. "I'm afraid, dear, it was more about Star of the Morning that I was thinking than about my father's slippers, while I was trying to follow the intricacies of the Shantung pattern."

"Of course, dear, we cannot ask him to come to us; nor, without running a fearful risk, can we venture to visit him. Happily, however, this is not necessary. Jasmine, who has lived in the best families, tells me that ladies of quality never think of a personal consultation with the fortune-teller. The ladies of the Imperial harem, for instance, would only send him the eight characters, together with the colour of their hair and eyes, and the length of the ring finger. In the case of a fortune-teller so world-famous as Star of the Morning, that would be quite sufficient."

"Wonderful!" exclaimed Honeysuckle. "Just what Autumn-Leaf——"

"You won't find his equal out of China, according to Jasmine; and what I propose, my dear, is, for each to write down the eight characters representing the year, month, day and hour of birth, with the etceteras, and get our maids to carry them to the fortune-teller and bring back his reply. There's paper—red paper will be best—red for luck, you know. Besides, sweet, it will convey to Mr. Ming a delicate hint——"

"That we are anxious to have our feet tied with the red silk with which Heaven binds the feet of those whose marriages have been arranged for them in the courts above."

"Exactly. They always expect one to show which way the hare runs. If a girl wants to hear about a husband, it's aggravating to have longevity and everything else put in, while the man she wants to hear about is left out."

"What a dear, good, thoughtful girl you are," said Honeysuckle.

"There's paper then, and pencil; ink-slab and ink in the Pavilion," said Hyacinth, "so let's set about it at once, shall we, dear?"

The cousins filled up the slips and the maids carried them to the fortune-teller; and when the two girls met at the Pavilion in the willow garden next day, each had her answer ready to show to the other.

Rushing out of the Pavilion.

"My husband," said Honeysuckle, seating herself in a low bamboo chair, "is to be tall and rich and handsome. He will have a dark, almond eye, and a true Tartar nose—a man who can count the graves of his ancestors. His father is one of the men most respected in the province; and the son, who has passed all his exams with honours, will probably succeed him in office. 'The name of your beloved, that is to be,' wrote Star of the Morning, 'it would not be proper for you to know until the broker has spoken to your father; but his pigtail makes him the admiration of every woman who beholds him, while his dress of imperial blue and olive green proclaims him a man of taste and station. He will marry before he is twenty. May Heaven give happiness!'"

"Do you know, my dear Honeysuckle," said Hyacinth coldly, "that you have been describing my husband?"

"That is impossible——" began Honeysuckle.

"Nothing of the kind, miss," interrupted Hyacinth. "I tell you it is my husband that——"

"I beg your pardon——"

"You need it."

"I shall not stay here to be insulted," exclaimed Honeysuckle rising.

"Don't let me detain you, pray," returned Hyacinth sarcastically.

"I declare I will never set foot inside your doors again," cried Honeysuckle, rushing out of the Pavilion and over the crooked bridge which spanned the "trout stream."

Digitized by Google

"I'll send for you when I want you," bawled Hyacinth after the flying figure of her cousin.

Honeysuckle waited till she was hidden by the willows on the other side of the stream; then bursting into tears: "It really is too bad of Hyacinth," she sobbed, "and I'll never speak to her again. She is a jealous—horrid little thing; jealous because Star of the Morning has given me the Prefect's son, Li Chang, for my husband, and she'd like him herself. Autumn-Leaf knew who was pointed at directly she heard his description. I thought Hyacinth a better bred girl than to show such a nasty temper."

Meanwhile, Hyacinth, after firing her last shot at Honeysuckle, had thrown herself on a pile of cushions, and wept sorely. "The rude, impertinent minx," she stammered, after the first paroxysm had subsided, "to persist in claiming him for hers after I told her he was mine. Such behaviour is perfectly shameless. She's jealous, the little fool, because I wouldn't give in to her. If she hadn't been so downright ill-mannered as to contradict me to my face, I would have told her his name. Jasmine recognised him at once. 'It's Te Fung, Colonel Wen's son,' says she. Wonderfully clever fellow that fortune-teller. But I never should have supposed that Honeysuckle had such a beastly temper."

* * * * *

Mr. Ming, otherwise Star of the Morning, having filled his pockets at Mienchu, packed up his traps and departed, and in the fulness of time the ladies Hyacinth and Honeysuckle found that the marriage broker had been to their respective fathers, seeking to tie their pretty feet with the red silk of matrimony.

Greatly to their surprise, however, the husbands who presented themselves, were neither Li Chang nor Te Fung; yet by some mystery inexplicable to the brides, they were as proper a pair of phœnixes as the gentlemen whom they expected.

How Star of the Morning had contrived it, was as great a puzzle to them as how the Court Juggler taught the Emperor's mule to speak; but each got a husband just suited to her mind, though neither got the man they had quarrelled about; and, at the feast which followed the ceremony, jealousy was swallowed up in congratulations; while both agreed that the fortune-teller was certainly full as clever as they thought him.

Perhaps Star of the Morning may have guessed that in China there was possibly more than one tall, rich, handsome man who wore a long pigtail.

H. HUNTER.

A Marvellous Magazine.

6D. The January Pearson's. 6D.

ARTISTS AND THEIR WORK. (Illustrated.) In this popular feature, which will be continued month by month in Pearson's Magazine, are reproduced some of the best pictures of the most prominent painters in all parts of the world. They will be accompanied by a series of notes on subjects of special interest in art, and on artistic curiosities.

A VISION OF THE FLOOD. This magnificent poem by Mr. George Griffith is illustrated with a series of splendid oil paintings by Mr. Abbey Altson, R.B.A.

THE EYE OF A GOD. (Illustrated by D. Murray Smith.) By W. A. FRASER. This story tells of the theft of a ruby from the eye of a Burmese God and of the surprises and disappointments in store for the distracted officials in their efforts to recover it.

HOW RAILWAY MEN FIGHT SNOW. (Illustrated with Photographs.) By MERRIDEN HOWARD. Some remarkably interesting particulars are given of the methods employed by the big Railway Companies in removing snow from the permanent way. The article is illustrated with a number of striking photographs, showing engines charging the snowdrifts, a steam rotary plough forcing its way through the snow, and other remarkable sights.

THE ADVENTURES OF CAPTAIN KETTLE. No. VII.—The Pearl Poachers. (Illustrated by Stanley L. Wood.) By CUTCLIFFE HYNE. Kettle is the hero of the day, and his adventures, which Mr. Cutcliffe Hyne relates in this story, are as exciting as anyone could wish.

THE CROWNS OF THE WORLD. (Illustrated with Photographs.) By A. O. TIDBITS. Delightful reproductions are here given of the crowns belonging to the rulers of the chief kingdoms of the world. They are wonderful examples of beauty and magnificence.

POST OFFICE NEW YEAR CARDS. (Illustrated with examples.) By GEO. DAY. The Post Offices throughout the world celebrate the New Year in a most delightful way by the mutual interchange of New Year cards. A number of the most interesting examples are reproduced.

REAL GHOST STORIES. No. I.—The Story of the Spaniards, Hammersmith. (Illustrated by B. E. Minns.) By E. and H. HERON.

LIFE'S LITTLE WORRIES. (Illustrated by A. Popini.) By W. L. ALDEN. Mr. Alden contributes some very amusing comments upon the little troubles which are continually besetting the poor mortal in the ordinary routine of life.

A DEALER IN BRAINS. (Illustrated with Photographs.) By R. C. BURT. Major Pond is the man who has gained for himself this title. He is the great lecture agent in America. Many well known Englishmen have lectured in the States under his auspices, and as may be imagined he has a whole fund of interesting reminiscences which he has placed at the disposal of the author of this article.

DREAR WINTER. (Illustrated by Hana.) By PHILIP HEMERY.

THE COMMANDANT'S WIFE. (Illustrated by A. Kemp Tebby.) By Mrs. ORPEN. A complete story.

LONDON'S COURT OF KING SOLOMON (Illustrated by S. Nation.) By J. MALCOLM FRASER. Few people are aware that in London at the present moment there exists a Court of Justice, conducted upon almost the same lines as was the Court of King Solomon in the olden days.

SONG. By CRANSTOUN METCALFE.

CHINESE STREET CALLS. (Illustrated with Photographs.) By ALFRED EDMONDS. One phase of Chinese life is admirably described in this article. It appears that every vendor of goods in China has a special "instrument of musical torture," upon which he heralds his approach. We have been fortunate to obtain a complete collection of all the instruments thus used, and we are able to publish the first series of photographs of them that have ever appeared in this country.

THE MYSTERY OF THE PORTHAMPTON EXPRESS. (Illustrated by H. Piffard.) By VICTOR L. WHITECHURCH. In this remarkable story the mystery of the disappearance of Balmaceda, the famous President of Chili, is explained in a most striking way.

THE BRAVEST REGIMENT. (Illustrated with Photographs.) By GEORGE A. WADE. The author of this article has set himself to answer the question: "Which regiment of the British Army has most distinguished itself on the field of battle?" He draws some very interesting conclusions from the facts at his disposal.

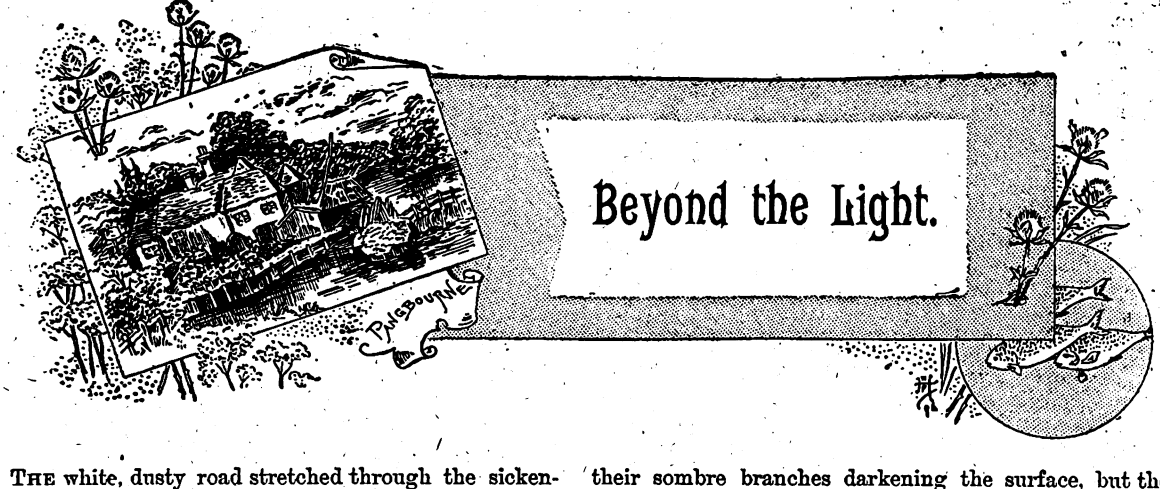
A TUNNEL OF MUSHROOMS. (Illustrated with Photographs.) By FRANK SYDENHAM. In Edinburgh is a disused railway tunnel which is employed for the cultivation of mushrooms. We reproduce interesting photographs not only of the tunnel itself, but also of some curious shaped mushrooms which have been grown there.

FOR THE HONOUR OF FRANCE. (Illustrated by C. Lawson Wood.) By JOHN LE BRETON. A complete story.

PEARSON'S MAGAZINE.

Now on Sale. Price Sixpence.

Digitized by Google



Beyond the Light.

THE white, dusty road stretched through the sickening glare of the sun in and out among the hills.

The coloured, delapidated house stood away from any shade. The sun went in boldly through the broken shutters.

A woman came outside for a moment and gave a tin cup of milk and a piece of bread to two children who sat huddled together on the fallen step.

The boy was the taller; he was ragged, and his skin showed through his soiled shirt. The girl had tears mixed with the dirt on her face.

She was so little, and it was not unnatural she should cry.

"They took her away in a box," said the boy. "I asked the fat man where. He said: 'To Heaven.' What you think 'tis?"

The other began to cry.

"Let's go," she said.

The boy nodded. His face took on a look of deep thought. He put his piece of bread carefully away. Then he held out his hand.

"Come on."

They crept along the path, looking back fearfully lest they should be seen.

The sun scorched their faces and the road felt hot to their bare feet.

Once they met a cart, but they hid behind the bushes until it passed.

"They took her this way," said the boy. "I watched. This must be the road to Heaven, but I don't see anybody going."

"I'm tired," said the little girl suddenly, and sat down in the road.

The other was in despair.

He looked at her. Then he offered her the piece of bread. She began to cry.

"It's so far off," she said.

"I think 'tis pretty far away," said the boy. His courage began to fail.

"But we'll see her when we do get there. P'raps she'll come a little way to meet us."

So they went on, and by and bye the sun was hidden, and the stars came out, one by one, fastening themselves in the night sky.

The boy limped a little, but he did not complain.

They came suddenly upon a broad, shining stretch of water. The trees, clustering close to the edges, showed their sombre branches darkening the surface, but the moonlight falling on it made a clear, unbroken line of gold.

On the bank, in among the tall water weeds and heavy scented lilies, a boat was fastened.

The boy gave a cry of joy.

"Yonder's Heaven! See the light! That's like what they said, all bright. Somebody there's holding out a lantern to us. P'raps it's her. She used to hold one for me when father made me go out in the dark, 'at looked jus' like that. We're nearly there now."

"It's so dark here, I'm afraid," said the other, but the boy answered valiantly:

"I'll take care of you, I'm not afraid. It's right beyond the light, I know. I can nearly see her."

With an effort he drew the little girl into the boat and, leaning over, tugged at the rope. The rotten cord gave way, and the skiff, with a murmur like a happy sigh at its release, went forward.

The boy put his arm round the girl. The tangled mass of her hair swept his face, and her head fell upon his shoulder.

"I'll wake you when we get there," he said.

He looked down suddenly, for he felt his feet were wet. The bottom of the boat was full of water. He could not understand why.

"But it doesn't matter," he said. "We're almost there."

Just then there came, borne over the water from afar, the sound of music.

The boy held his breath to listen.

Upon the hill beyond there was a little church. Those within had prayed: "From sudden death, deliver us, good Lord."

Now they sang of joy, of hope, of eternal day.

The boy did not know. "It is Heaven," he said.

The water came very fast, but he did not notice it. His eyes were fixed upon the line of shimmering, golden light, and reaching beyond it and above the music's strains, it seemed to him he saw her face. He started forward with a little cry.

The water rushed up, carrying the boat under with a swift, gurgling noise.

Where it disappeared there remained only a stream of golden light.

And the sound of the voices was hushed.

S. L. BACON.

Digitized by Google

THE SECRET THAT HE KNEW.

LONG after the speaker's words had died away the listening people waited in hushed expectancy, unwilling to believe that he had finished, and unable to descend all at once from the heights to which they had been raised. But the announcement of the last hymn assured them that the service was almost over, and a little later they began to file slowly out through the high, narrow doors into the damp air.

In almost total silence the crowd separated, with the unconsciousness of surroundings which comes to men when their minds have been stirred deeply.

John Ordway and his wife came from the chapel among the last, and walked arm in arm to where many carts and traps were waiting; both had been strongly moved by the evening's sermon, but in different ways, indicative perhaps of their widely differing temperaments.

Ordway helped his wife into the trap, the horse broke into a trot, and the driver leant forward to draw the rug more closely about his companion, peering up into her face solicitously.

"A damp night!" he murmured. "Do you feel at all cold, little girl?"

She started nervously at his voice, and shook her head.

"I'm quite warm enough," she said mechanically.

They moved swiftly past the scattered houses of the village, and out into a stretch of open country. Three or four times the woman raised her head as if about to speak, but checked herself with an effort.

"I have something to tell you, John," she said at last. "I—I am afraid I ought to have told you long ago."

Her tone was so serious that he turned and looked at her with quick anxiety.

"Are you sure you ought?" he asked gently. "Perhaps there ain't any need."

"There is a need," she answered. "I have known all along that it would be better to speak out, but somehow I never felt that I could until to-night."

She paused as though to gather courage. "It's about myself and Willis," she said. "You remember ——"

Ordway bent forward suddenly with a warning shout to the horse, and the cart jolted heavily in a deep rut.

"That's me all over," he said with a chuckle. "I took special notice of that hole so as to avoid it on the way home, and here I am, drivin' right into it again. That's what comes of listenin' to sermons ye can't quite understand."

"Won't you listen to me, John?" his wife asked pleadingly.

"Of course I will," he answered. "Only my nerves bein' so wrought up I'm sort of afraid to have any big shock come on me sudden, ye know."

"You make it so hard for me," she said, "and I am in earnest. Oh, truly, I am in earnest!"

Her voice trembled with the warning of tears. Ordway put his arms round her and drew her closer to him protectively, as a mother soothes a nervous, sleepy child.

"I wasn't joking," he said. "I'm always glad to listen to ye, only I think ye'd best wait till we get home. We're most there now."

The waggon swung a sharp turn, and then, far upon the hill ahead of them, the clear-cut buildings showed against the horizon.

"Go in by the fire," said John Ordway, when at length they rattled into the farmyard; "I'll follow when I've got the mare in."

But when he came back from the stable he found her waiting, leaning against one of the square posts of the porch, and looking out across the darkness of the valley.

"I wanted to wait until we could go in together," she said.

The long, low kitchen was full of changing shadows, which danced across the polished floor and lost themselves in the corners of the irregular ceiling, when Ordway crossed to the huge fireplace and piled some sticks of soft wood on the glowing ashes.

Then, throwing off his top coat, he dragged from the chimney corner a great, old-fashioned chair, and sank back luxuriously in its capacious depths.

His wife had also removed her wraps, and now took a seat at the other side of the fireplace on a low stool drawn back just within the wavering boundary of shadow.

At length she spoke, slowly and with evident effort at calmness.

"You must try to be patient with me," she said. "You'll be astonished, I know, and I am afraid you'll be angry—and I couldn't blame you—but I want you to wait till—till I've finished."

"Are you quite sure ye'd better begin, or hadn't ye better let it go till to-morrow?"

"No!" she said quickly. "I've wanted to speak—to speak so many times, and haven't dared to. I'll feel a thousand times happier when I've told you, no matter what happens. Let me go on now."

"P'r'aps I know what——" he began, but checked himself suddenly. "I'm listenin'," he added.

She hesitated as if to gain strength, and he marked how the slender figure quivered with the effort of her hurried breathing.

"I had promised to marry Willis before I met you," she said unsteadily. "We quarrelled about some little thing, and each was too proud to speak first. Finally, he went away without seeing me. You know how we heard that he died in Africa. I believed it—we all did—and I cried myself to sleep, night after night, because I hadn't acted differently. As time went on I began to forget little by little, and after a while it all seemed like a sort of dream; then you came into my life, and taught me to trust you and turn to you for help in everything. And, in truth I loved you more than you could ever understand." Her voice trembled pitifully.

"You believe me, John?" she added. "Say that you do believe me!"

Digitized by Google

Ordway drew his hand across his eyes with an involuntary movement.

"I ain't never doubted it," he answered softly.

She gave a quick sigh of relief, and let her head sink again upon her breast as she continued:

"I was happy and contented for two long years. It was like Heaven; and you were happy, too, John!"

"Happy!" he said. "Ah, yes; nobody'll ever know how much."

"And then little Dora was born," she went on, "and somehow all our trouble began there, for it seemed as though her baby hands took hold of our hearts and pushed them apart. I actually thought that you didn't care about her—I knew it was wrong, but I thought it—and I got to feeling against you as I would against someone that was watching for a chance to hurt my little one. Well, things got worse and worse, and when she died I almost believed you were to blame in some way—I didn't know how. Oh, it's awful to think about, how I couldn't help feeling that way. Will you ever forgive me for it?"

"I never laid it up against ye," he answered. "It was natural, and I knew ye wasn't well; so I tried to forget all about that part of our life, and I've done it—almost."

She looked up at him gratefully. "You are trying to help me," she said. "Not many men would do that. The rest of my story is harder to tell, and harder to listen to. You remember that Willis came back and hunted me up. He came at the worst time for all of us. I was set against you, and half wild about baby's death, and reckless to everything. He found that out, and kept pleading with me and urging me to go away with him. Day after day, when you were at work, he used to come to the house and talk to me—always in the same strain. I ought to have sent him away, but—I didn't. His sympathy was so ready that I didn't see the purpose nor the falseness of it. It was as though some evil spirit put the words into his mouth, and I listened; Heaven help me, I listened."

She started to her feet, and stood facing her husband, her arms raised to her head in a wild gesture.

"It was no fault of mine that I did not sin against you in deed as I did in thought," she cried. "If it had not been for some accident—I don't even know what it was—I should not have been here now.

"I went to meet him one night. We were to drive to Oakley and take the train for some place. I waited I don't know how many hours, but he didn't come; at last I crept home, and found you asleep. All night I sat by the fire waiting for some word from him, for I was ready to go—yes, even then I was ready to go.

"In the morning, when you were away, a letter came saying that an unforseen accident had happened, and he would let me know about it soon. I never heard from him again."

She paused, and looked at him fearfully, as though expecting a violent outburst of anger, but he said nothing, and at last she spoke again, unable to bear the silence.

"Won't you speak to me?" she cried tremulously. "Haven't you been listening? Have I done wrong to you? Speak to me, for Heaven's sake; I can't bear it!"

The words were lost in a storm of sobbing, and she threw herself down on her knees beside him, hiding her face with her hands on the arm of the old-fashioned chair. Ordway looked down at her through eyes that were dimming.

"Don't take on so, Eunie," he said gently. "Ye'll be glad all the rest of yer life, I think, on account of jest what ye're cryin' about now. Look up, my gurl, an' p'r'aps I can finish the story for ye."

He put out his hand, and stroked the bowed head with clumsy tenderness.

"Ye say ye never knowed why he didn't come that night," he said. "I could a told ye why."

She raised her head with a startled exclamation.

"You?" she cried.

"Yes," he answered, "me! He stayed away because I told him he'd better; and he knowed I meant what I said."

Her eyes grew full of wondering fear, and she shrank away from him; but he smiled again, and detained her with gentle force.

"Wait," he said. "I ain't crazy. Did ye think I was so blind all them months that I didn't see what was happenin'? I'd a knowed if I'd been miles away, for there aint never any trouble in your heart but what I don't feel it. Lord bless ye, I seen what was goin' on, but I thought 'twas best to say nothin', an' let ye wrestle it out alone. Finally, when I noticed that circumstance an' everything was likely to be too much for ye, why, I stepped in an' talked to Willis. He understood, an' that settled it."

"Then you've known?" she interrupted breathlessly. "You've known all this time?"

He nodded cheerfully.

"All this time," he answered.

"But you never said a word to me—you never acted as though——"

"It's always harder for me to talk than to keep still," he said slowly. "Surely you've found that out long ago. I couldn't a said a word without makin' things worse, most likely; so I thought the best thing to do was to jest wait—an' I been waitin'."

"Waiting?" she responded. "Waiting for what?"

"For what's happened, Eunie," he said softly. "Waitin' to hear jest what I've heard to-night; to have ye kneel down here beside me as ye're kneelin' now, a-wantin' the help I can give ye, an' a-trustin' me enough to ask for it."

He lifted his hand to check her question, and went on in the same tone:

"I ain't never been like any of the men ye used to know. Why, for a year or more after we were married, I used to set an' watch ye, wonderin' all the time whether it was really me, an' whether my luck wasn't too good to be true. I was always afraid that there was a mistake somewheres, for it didn't seem right nor natural that ye should see anything in me to care about, unless—unless it was because I cared so much for you; I tried to think that sometimes."

The woman was clinging to his arm, and weeping convulsively.

"'Tweren't your fault, little girl," he said. "It jest happened that way. There ain't no need to cry about it now; the time for cryin's all gone past, an' I don't think it'll ever come again."

He stopped abruptly, as though half ashamed of his sudden outburst, and let his glance rest lovingly upon the kneeling figure at his feet.

"Ain't ye glad it's happened?" he asked. "Surely ye ain't grievin' over the very thing that is to make us so happy agen?"

She did not answer, and for a moment he watched her in perplexed anxiety. Then he understood, and knelt down by her side.

ETHEL N.

Digitized by Google

BY GEORGE
GRIFFITH.

Author of "Valdar the Oft-Born," "Briton or Boer?" "The Outlaws of the Air," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XXV.

THE SECOND VICTIM.

WHEN they got into the saloon her ladyship turned to Lorrain and looked at him for a few moments in silence, and he, looking back into her eyes, read in them a curious mixture of undisguised fear and equally undisguised admiration, of submission blended with half defiance, and of resignation tempered with an eager expectation. Many a time and oft he had looked into woman's eyes, usually to find what he wanted and expected in them, but never in all his experience in reading that most puzzling of all riddles, a woman's mind, had he seen so many contradictory reflections chasing each other across the surface of the limpid mirror which seems to lie under the surface of a woman's eyes.

She was utterly in his power and at his mercy, and she knew it. She had more than a suspicion that he had made it quite certain that she should never see her husband again—that, indeed, she might already be a widow. Yet, woman as she was, it was utterly impossible that she could have lived in company with these two men through the experiences of the last few days without making comparisons to her husband's disadvantage, and even at the worst—well, that she had already learnt to contemplate with a something more than calmness. Nor was the prospect altogether unpleasant, for, however much further it might have taken her on her downward course, the fact remained undeniable and inevitable, that, whatever she might once have thought of her feelings towards her husband, they were as milk and water to strong wine in comparison with those with which this splendid and masterly scoundrel had inspired her—for splendid he certainly was in her eyes, both physically and mentally, pitiless and utterly without scruple, as she already knew him to be.

And then, behind all, there was a lurking ambition prompting her to think that though she might begin by being this man's slave, she might end by being his queen—and with gold illimitable to share between them, the mistress of such a master of men as Francisco Lorrain would be no mean power in the world.

At last, with an effort that was plainly and satisfactorily visible to him, she took her eyes from his and looked rapidly round the saloon.

"I think you had better see that there is no one here, and that the doors are locked. A third spectator of the—well, the experiment, might be rather inconvenient," she said in a low, rapid tone that was little more than a whisper. His eyebrows lifted in momentary surprise, but he said nothing. He went to the two doors leading to the saloon from the main deck and shut and locked them, and then he looked at the companion stairs and said with a laugh:

"No, I'm afraid that's no use. To make things quite secure we should have to close the companion-hatch, and I'm afraid that would look uncomfortably suspicious. Perhaps your ladyship will honour my own room for the purpose of the experiment. There there would not be the slightest fear of interruption."

"Very well," she said, "perhaps that would be better."

Then she moved towards the door of the splendidly furnished stateroom, half library, half drawing-room, which Lorrain had placed at the disposal of herself and her husband since leaving Barbadoes.

"But, excuse me," he said, "haven't you forgotten——?"

"What?" she said with a smile. "That? Oh no, señor. I don't leave it anywhere where an accident might lead someone to find it. I am going to trust you absolutely, first because I wish to do so; and second, because, under the circumstances, I must. But I don't propose to trust anybody else."

By this time they were both in the stateroom and Lorrain had locked the door. She put her hands up to her head, unpinned the little white yachting cap that she wore, and then pulled what he at first thought was a dagger hair-pin out of the thick coils of her hair.

"There! That is it," she said, holding it up by the point before him. "That is the compass that will point our way to El Dorado. Wait a moment and you shall see for yourself."

She took a reel of thin cotton out of her pocket, broke off a piece about two feet long, threaded it through a tiny hole in the middle of the Magnet, and tied a knot in one end.

"Now," she said, "if you have a little gold in your pocket, put it on the table, or your watch and chain will do quite as well."

While he was taking them off, her ladyship went to the door, and then, holding the suspended Magnet at arm's length, walked towards the table. As she approached it, the needle shivered and wavered. Then the brilliant point swung round for a moment towards the watch and chain, and then, when she had got close to the table, instead of fastening itself on to the gold, as it had done to her own watch and chain on that fatal night in Bedford Square, it swung past them, dipped at a sharp angle, and pointed down over the edge of the table towards the floor.

Digitized by Google

"Sangre de Dios!" cried Lorrain, for the moment startled out of his self-possession. "What is the infernal thing doing?"

"Only reminding you that you have got a very considerable quantity of gold stowed away somewhere under the floor of this cabin," said her ladyship, laughing again, as she pulled the Magnet back. Then, holding it in her two hands behind her, she faced him and said:

"Well, Señor Lorrain, are you satisfied? Has it not already discovered one hidden treasure? Curious, isn't it, that I should have been in this room so often with this thing in my possession, and yet never known that I was walking about over your strong-room."

"It is miraculous, almost devilish!" he said, with something very like a touch of awe in his voice. "Well, yes I confess that I have a few thousand pounds in a box down there. One can't run a yacht for nothing, you know, and it takes gold to find gold. May I look at it?"

He held out his hand, but she drew back a step and said:

"I am going to trust you, as I said, absolutely, but first I want you to promise me on your honour, I won't say as a gentleman, for that is only a conventionalism, but as a man to a woman who is trusting herself body and soul to his keeping—for that I suppose is what this business means now—that you will never attempt to take it out of my possession. You may think it silly of me to ask such a thing, because, of course, I am so completely in your hands that you could take it from me by force if you liked, but you can afford to gratify a woman's whim in a thing like this."

"I hold but few things sacred, as you know," he answered, taking a step towards her, "but if I swear to you by my hatred of the man who has some day to pay for Patricia's life, then you will believe me. Is not that so?"

"Yes," she said, "I think I can believe that, for if there is anything like what they call Fate, and you broke an oath like that, the revenge might pass the other way. There it is!" and she held the Magnet out towards him on her open palm.

He looked at it closely for a few moments without touching it. Then he picked it up, drew the thread out of the eyehole and said quietly:

"Yes, it is very wonderful, and very beautiful, too; and therefore it could have no better possessor than its present one. And now, as a token of my good faith, let me put it back into its place."

She looked up at him for an instant with a smile that would have set a much colder man's blood on fire, and then, with a pretty gesture, she turned the back of her dainty, proudly poised head with its wealth of thickly coiled hair towards him. He slipped the Magnet back into its place with a touch almost as deft as her own, and then, flinging even the pretence of reserve to the winds, he said in just such a voice as he had spoken to her in on the bridge during the fight:

"There now, you have it back, but I have it still for I have you, Jessica mia, and, Madre de Dios, I will keep you both, while I have life and strength to hold you!"

She turned swiftly, as though she would have escaped from his arms, but she was too late, for they were already round her in such an embrace as she had never felt before. She had turned her face upward at the moment. The next his lips were on hers, and the next she had forgotten everything save that she was in the arms of the man she loved.

While this scene was being enacted on board the Minnehaha a very different one was taking place in one of the old dungeons in the foundations of the citadel of Santo Domingo. There, on a stone bench, fastened to the wall by a chain locked on to a rusty iron band round his waist, sat the man who was fated to be the second of the victims

Don Gregorio entered, followed by two disreputable soldiers.

Digitized by Google

whom the deadly glitter of the Gold Magnet was to lure to their doom.

Lorrain had spoken something less than the truth when he had told her ladyship that her husband was perfectly safe and every possible care would be taken of him. He had been taken ashore drugged, and when he had come to his senses he had found himself in as hopeless a plight as any other of the hundreds of luckless wretches who had found that old Spanish cell the ante-room to another world.

How long he had been chained up thus like a wild animal to the wall, he had no notion. There was just a blank of silence and darkness behind him, separating him from the moment at which he had gone to sleep in his berth on board the yacht. It might be only a few hours ago, it might be weeks for all he knew, and his cell door had opened and Don Gregorio entered, followed by two disreputable soldiers of the republic, one of whom carried a smoky old oil-lamp and the other of whom shut the door and put his back against it as soon as they were in.

His head was aching horribly, and an almost intolerable pain shot through his eyes as he blinked at the light. Still he managed to look up at Don Gregorio and say with something like firmness in his voice:

"Well, sir, have you come to explain this abominable outrage on one of Her Majesty's subjects, or have you come to put an end to me in accordance with the orders of that adulterous scoundrel, your friend Lorrain?"

"Gently! gently! muy señor mio," replied the Don, who spoke a curious but quite understandable mixture of idioms which he was pleased to consider excellent English. "Yes. It regrets me much to say that it necessitates for you to leave the world. You see you have the misfortune to be in the camino—I mean the road, the way, of the honourable Don Francisco, who is my friend and my father and benefactor, and who has given my country back to me, and those who are in the road of Don Francisco always go out of it. No, I have never known one that stayed in it. You are in it, so you must go. It is pity, it is misfortune, very much misfortune for you who is an honourable gentleman, so it is. It necessitates, so that is all. We do not hate you. We have not what you call grudge for you, we respect you, and we are very sorry for you, but you must go. You have seen too much and you know too much, and moreover it is your misfortune to possess a most adorable señora who has found favour in the eyes of Don Francisco. Is not this enough? Can you not see that it necessitates?"

As he said this, Don Gregorio spread out his fat, dirty hands with an apologetic gesture and leant forward and stared with something very like commiseration in his big brown eyes at his prisoner.

Langton Harley was not a man who could be called brave if compared with such men as Leigh Tristam or Lorrain, but he was an Englishman, and an Englishman is usually at his best with his back to the wall. And so it was with Don Gregorio's prisoner. He answered his gaoler not only coolly but contemptuously.

"I see," he said. "Your friend Lorrain has stolen my wife and put you back into a position to rob these wretched niggers, and in return for this service you are to make it possible, by murdering me, for him to marry my widow legally if he chooses. I am in the way and it's necessary, as you say, for me to get out of it, at least from your point of view. You'll perhaps excuse me if I don't see it in exactly the same light. Now, look here, Don Gregorio, you are an infernal scoundrel and I'm absolutely in your power. Therefore I know that it wouldn't be the slightest use trying to make a bargain with you. But if I've got to get out of the world I should like to tell you something of very considerable importance to yourself before I go. Give me a drink of something and sit down. I suppose you are not in a hurry for a few minutes?"

Don Gregorio stared at his captive in wondering admiration. The old Pendril blood in Langton Harley's veins had risen to the occasion, and completely transformed the man. Don Gregorio knew that he himself in such a position would by this time have been cowering and cringing on the floor, begging for his life, and whining like a whipped dog, and here was this Englishman sitting chained, and face to face with death, talking about his own murder as quietly as if it had been some ordinary business transaction.

"Ach!" he said. "The señor is reasonable, as all his wonderful people are. José, go and bring a bottle of wine of my own private best immediately, with glasses. This we will set aside for the present."

"What is that?" said Harley, as he took a small wine-bottle half full out of his pocket, and set it down on the stone seat.

"That?" said Don Gregorio with an apologetic smile. "Well, it is the truth that that is the señor's passport to another and, we will hope, a better and more fortunate world. It has no pain, and it is certain. When the time comes he will drink it. He will sleep and dream fair dreams, but he will not wake. That is all. It is better than to die in darkness of thirst and hunger, is it not, señor?"

"Well, yes, I suppose it is," replied Harley, with just a little catch in his voice as he looked round at the bottle which contained his own death. But the next instant his pride came to his rescue again, and he went on as quietly as ever:

"It was really quite kind of you to provide such a happy dispatch for me. I should have thought something lingering and humorous would have been more in your line. However, you mustn't think me ungrateful, and you shan't find me so, for now, Don Gregorio, I, your captive, whom you have got chained to this wall like a dog, and whom you are going to do the greatest of all injuries to, am going to make it possible for you to be one of the richest men, if not indeed the richest man, in the world."

"Eh? What is that, señor, that you say?" said Don Gregorio, coming forward and sitting down beside him, and laying his hand on his shoulder with an almost caressing gesture, from which Harley shrank with a little shudder—the first during the interview. "What is that? The richest man on earth! You will tell me how to be that, and not even ask your life in return?—though, mind you, I could not give it you, no, not for all the money in the world, for Don Francisco is coming here to-night to see, and if he finds you have not gone to meet the blessed saints in Heaven, well, he will kill me with those infernal guns of his, for he has sworn it, and when Don Francisco swears a thing it is done already. But come, here is the wine. Let us drink and be friends while you remain here."

The soldier came back with a magnum of champagne and two tumblers, and when Don Gregorio had opened the bottle and offered him a tumblerful with the politest of gestures, Harley took it thankfully, for physically, if not morally, he needed a stimulant very badly. He half emptied the tumbler at a gulp, and then Don Gregorio said when he had done the same:

"And now, muy amigo mio, what is the story that you would tell me? I am all eagernesss to listen."

"Yes, I dare say you are," said Harley, edging away from him as far as his chain would permit, and turning half round towards him with his shoulder against the wall. "It is just the sort of story that a man like you would like to hear, and yet it is probable that before very long you'll wish to Heaven you'd never heard it. Do you know what your friend Lorrain has come here for?"

"Oh, on some what you call goose's chase, to hunt for buried treasures that we have many stories about in this island, but never seen since the days of the old Spaniards."

"You're wrong there, Don Gregorio, he hasn't come to look for them, he's come to find them. You may not believe me, but you can find out for yourself in a few days that what I am going to tell you is absolute fact. That woman who was my wife has got in her possession a magnet, a sort of compass needle, you understand, which is attracted to gold and other precious metals in the same way that a magnetised needle is attracted to iron. She wears it in her hair, where you may look for it if you get a chance. Lorrain knows she has it and that is one reason why I am here and she is with him on board the yacht. In a day or two they are going, as you know, up the Oyama to locate a chest full of gold and jewels which was buried under the river-bed by one of the old Governors of this place. They will hang this needle on a thread and they will walk along the river-bank, and when they come to the place, the needle will point straight down at the gold, no matter how deep it is buried. Then they will mark the place and go back and dig it up and, if you allow them, take it away in the yacht. Then they will go to one of the Cays of the Bahamas where there is the wreck of one of the old Spanish treasure-ships, no doubt loaded with gold and silver, and the Magnet will find that for them, and in all probability the Minnehaha will go back to England simply loaded with treasure. Do you follow me, Don Gregorio?"

Digitized by Google

"Ach mira, mira! If I follow?" cried the little Don in a voice trembling with excitement. "Sangre de Dios! it is marvellous, wonderful, unbelievable, but is it true, señor? Can such a thing be, and has the señora who was your wife really got it? Why, if one had such a thing one might find all the gold that is hidden in the world and be rich, ah rich, so rich that one need not go to these ever-damnable money-lenders of Europe to borrow a little money to support the work of the State. Ei carramba! what a thing to have!"

Harley smiled as he said this, and he looked at him and saw his eyes alight, his face flushed, and his whole body trembling with the lust of greed. It was evident that Lorrain would not have sent him to his death unavenged.

"Yes," he said, "a wonderful thing as you say, and you have only to have Lorrain and her ladyship discreetly watched when they go up the river, to convince yourself that it is literally and absolutely true that they've got it. Whether they take it out of the island again or not is your look out.

"But, mind you, Don Gregorio, I have not told you this for friendship. I have told you as a sort of revenge in advance for my own murder. You will find that there is a curse upon that thing. My own father, one of the most honoured and honourable men in England, dishonoured himself by stealing it from the man who invented it. That man was his oldest friend, and he died just as he had finished showing it to him. My father died a few days later. The woman who was my wife stole it from him. I married her because she had it, knowing it was stolen, and so I deserve what is going to happen to me. Now, here I am you see, chained to this wall, with half a bottle of poison beside me, which I am going to drink to escape being starved to death.

"Henceforth you are no longer Lorrain's friend. You are the worst enemy he has on earth, and he is yours. He should have poisoned me himself on board the yacht, and not sent me here to tell you this. It is one of those mistakes that the cleverest of men make, and I think he will pay for it. I wonder which of you will die first in the fight for it?

"But, mind you, don't forget that if you kill him and get it, someone else will most assuredly kill you, and I think I can tell you who it will be—and that is a man named Leigh Tristam. Remember the name carefully. He is married to the daughter of the man who made this infernal thing. He knows it has been stolen, and he knows about that treasure-ship I was telling you of. He is fitting out a yacht, in fact I dare say she's on her way now to find it. He must hear of the Minnehaha and Don Christobal's treasure chest. By-the-way, he also knows about that. He will put two and two together and will have little difficulty in guessing that someone on the yacht must have had the Gold Magnet, and and that that somebody must be the woman who was my wife. Then he will come, and Heaven help your friend Lorrain when he does come, or you if you've got the Magnet by then!

"Well, Don Gregorio, that is all, and now, as I don't care about having any more of your company than I can help, I may as well say good-bye."

Don Gregorio sat with staring eyes and open mouth and quick panting breath, and watched him as he uncorked the bottle and quietly poured the fatal draught into the tumbler that he had drunk the champagne from. As he raised it to his lips he looked steadily at him, and said with a savage sort of smile:

"If what you have told me about this is true, you will not leave the world quite as comfortably as I do. I can imagine what your friend Lorrain will do when he finds that you want to steal the Gold Magnet. It will be nothing less than crucifixion or impalement, and he will stand by and watch you die by bits I expect. Here's to you!"

The next moment he had swallowed the poisoned wine at a gulp, just as Don Gregorio, with a cry of rage, was about to spring at him to snatch it away from him. With the last voluntary effort of his life, Langton flung the glass full in his bloated face, and as his eyes grew dim under the almost instantaneous influence of the potent drug, he saw the glass break, as it seemed, in little splashes of blood. Then his head dropped forward on his breast, his body swayed to and fro, and then sank on the stone bench never to move again.

And so died the second of the Gold Magnet's victims, a death better and braver than the life he had lived.

CHAPTER XXVI.

A WELCOME ALLY.

NEARLY three weeks before these events had taken place in Santa Domingo, Leigh Tristram, almost on the eve of his marriage, had heard of a yacht which had been brought home from Monte Carlo by a youthful plunger who had got through some hundred thousand pounds inside two months and, as the advertisement said, "had no further use for her." The vessel was lying at Southampton, and as he thought the description looked likely he ran down to see her. The first inspection proved so far satisfactory that he entered into negotiations with the agents for the hiring of her for six months. But within a few hours these negotiations were broken off in a somewhat unexpected fashion.

It was a lovely evening with a fine, steady breeze blowing straight across the water and therefore just perfect for sailing. Tristram, like most of his adventurous kind, was seldom happier than when he was sitting in the stern sheets of a good boat with the tiller in one hand and the slack of the main sheet in the other, slipping along with a nice leading wind; so as his business was over for the day and the water looked so inviting, he hired a smart-looking, cutter-rigged craft and, taking the owner with him to look after the fore-sheets, he started off for a run down to the Solent.

As they were running across from Hurst Point to Cowes, Tristam's experienced eye singled out from among the crowd of yachts and pleasure-craft a vessel which struck him as being neither yacht nor man-of-war, and yet possessing most of the characteristics of both. She carried guns, or, at any rate, she was fitted for them, and her stem had the outward curve which betokened the possession of a ram, but she had no fighting tops, and her mast and rigging were those of a large yacht rigged as a three-masted schooner. Then again, although the Stars and Stripes were floating from the flagstaff on her taffrail, she carried at her main the pennant of the Columbian Yacht Club, a decoration which no man-of-war of any country could possibly carry. Tristam looked at her, wondering what manner of craft she could be, until his boat had got within a couple of hundred yards of her, and then he said to his boatman:

"Do you happen to know what that craft is? I can't make out whether she's a yacht, a man-of-war, or what. She can't be a United States warship and fly the Columbian Yacht Club pennant, and yachts don't generally carry the armament of a second-class cruiser as she seems to do."

The boatman smiled solemnly, after the manner of his class, and said:

Digitized by Google

"Well, sir, from all they say of her, she's a bit of both. She is called the Pockawantus, or some name of that sort. Yankee, I believe it is; anyhow, her owner's a Yank, a very rich young man I'm told, and very free with his dollars. His name's Cortland I believe."

"What! Cecil Cortland?" said Tristam. "Do you know if that's his other name?"

"Well, sir, I can't say that I do, but it might be, you know," replied the boatman in a non-committal sort of way.

"Anyhow, I'll see if it is," said Tristam. "We'll go round and run alongside on the other tack, and I'll leave a card. If the owner's name is Cecil Cortland, I ought to know him."

As the boat went round and ran up towards the formidable-looking yacht, Tristam's mind went back to the day, some two years before, when he and this same Cecil Cortland had been travelling back together from Cuzco to Sicuani, the terminus of the Southern Railway of Peru, twelve thousand feet up among the valleys of the Andes. They had got into a very tight place, in a little gorge where a tributary torrent of the Urubamba is crossed by a stone bridge, about four miles from Cusipati, the only township boasting an inn in all the hundred and twelve miles from the City of the Sun to the railway.

They had been held up here by a dozen disbanded soldiers, for it was just after the Revolution, and a good many of the Presidential troops, dissatisfied with an honorarium of about six shillings for an eight months' campaign, had taken their rifles and ammunition and gone out on the road to collect arrears of pay from the owners of isolated haciendas, and unsuspecting travellers by the wayside. They had spent a very busy half-hour together, and when it was over they were both wounded, Tristam slightly, and Cortland rather badly, but they had laid out seven of their assailants, pitched one over the bridge into the torrent, and so far impressed the others with the danger of the enterprise that they had thrown away their rifles and taken to their heels.

They had made acquaintances casually in the train coming up from Arequipa, and they had ridden together to Cuzco and Yucay. Just chance travelling acquaintances, so far, and then this little adventure had come and made them friends for life, for there is no more reliable basis for friendship than the getting into deadly peril, and the getting out of it again in virtue of each other's pluck and nerve. Tristam had carried Cortland on his own mule into Cusipati, and had nursed him till his wound had healed and he was strong enough to get back to the coast, and at Mollendo they parted, Cortland to go north to San Francisco, and Tristam south to Valparaiso.

"Is Mr. Cecil Cortland on board?" he said, as the boat ran alongside, and his man got hold of the gangway chain.

"He is, sir," said the gangway man with a smart salute that betokened a certain amount of drill.

"That's so," said a familiar voice from the top of the gangway. "I thought it was you, Tristam. Saw you through the glasses as you came alongside. Come right on board and let's know what good wind has brought you alongside the Pocahontas."

The next minute Tristam was on the deck of the yacht heartily shaking hands with as good a specimen of the American gentleman—than whom there is no better fellow on the face of the earth—as any man could wish to call friend. He was about Tristam's own age and height, rather more slightly built, but well set up, hard and bronzed, with clear, steady grey eyes, curling brown hair and a close-cut, point beard with little streaks of gold in it.

"Come along to my room and have a cocktail, and let's swop lies a bit. No flattery, but this is the nicest surprise I've had this side yet. What do you think of my new yacht?"

"Yacht?" said Tristam, stopping and looking about him. "Your new cruiser, I should say. Why, you've got your guns mounted and everything. What are you going to do with her? Make a patriotic present of her to Uncle Sam, or go and help the Cubans?"

"Neither," he said. "I guess Uncle Sam's navy 'll be able to struggle along without the Pocahontas for the present, and as for Cuba, well, I don't go much on American newspapers, and I'm not going to help those greasers to make another Hayti out of Cuba. Spaniards may be bad enough, but they're gentlemen along side half-bred greasers any day. Walk right in," he went on, as he stopped before the open door of a cosy looking state-room under the navigating bridge. "This is my particular den. Of course, in a ship like this most of the rooms are under the main-deck covered with three inches of steel in case of accident, just to keep the rain out, you know."

"Well, now," said Tristram, when he had thrown himself into a luxurious armchair and lit the cigar which his host had offered him, "I want to know about this ship. How long have you been a millionaire, and what sort of a freak made you buy a man-of-war for a yacht?"

"Well, as to the millionaire first," said Cortland when he had got his own cigar under way, "when I got back to San Francisco after that little scrap with the greasers up in the hills, I found that the old man had struck it very rich in a wheat deal. Meanwhile one of his brothers who owned half the coal in Washington State had died and left me every cent of money and every bit of real estate he had. Then six months after I got back the old man himself went home with influenza and pneumonia, and as I was his only child I got all his, too, and the result is that I've got more dollars than I just know what to do with. I came over here to buy a yacht and couldn't find one I liked. Then I saw in the papers that the King of Assam on some place out east there had had a yacht built for him up at Elswick, which was a good deal more of a fast cruiser than a yacht, and couldn't raise the loan that was to pay for it.

"Well, the notion seemed to strike me, so I went up and had a look at her. I didn't know of any laws that stood in the way of an American citizen having guns on his yacht if he liked, so long as he kept out of the pirate business, and I didn't see why I shouldn't have a cruiser for a yacht if I wanted to, just the same as the Kaiser and the Tsar, and so as I liked the craft when I saw her, and it was just a matter of dollars, well, here she is, guns, ammunition, and all. She is a very comfortable boat, and as His Majesty was dead nuts on speed, we can get over thirty knots an hour out of her at a squeeze.

"I'll tell you she's a daisy to go. The other day one of your big cruisers, the Terrible, went for a full-speed spin in the Channel, so I got up full head of steam and started out after her, and when we came back that evening, her skipper was the maddest man in the British Navy. I shouldn't wonder if I went mighty near causing a war between the two countries, for he must have been just aching to blow the Pocahontas out of the water when he saw us come creeping up and then edge away ahead of him when his big ship was doing all her twenty-two knots. Yes, she's a smart craft, I can tell you, and if she ever got into a fight I reckon she'd give a very good account of herself. And now, it's your turn. What have you been doing since? What brought you down here?"

"I'm on the same errand that took you to Elswick," replied Tristam, "except that I'm not rich enough to buy a yacht. I came down to see if I could hire one for a few months. The fact is, I'm going to get married in a day or two, and we are going to spend the honeymoon on a treasure-hunt in the Bahamas. That's what we want the yacht for."

"Well, I guess that sounds a bit interesting," said Cortland, leaning back in his chair and blowing a perpendicular stream of smoke up towards the roof of the state-room. "A marriage, honeymoon, and a treasure-hunt! That is about one of the spiciest combinations I've heard of for some time. But look here, señor, you've got to just shut down right away on that yacht-hiring business. If you want a yacht, here you are on board of one. The guests I brought over from the States in the one I chartered to come here are scattered all over Europe by this time. I have no engagements, no plans, and, though I'm not in need of the dust exactly, I'd sooner go treasure-hunting just now than anything else."

Digitized by Google

"But my dear fellow——"

"Now look here, Leigh Tristam, you can't stop right there. I know what you're going to say. Trespassing on my kindness, and all that sort of thing, but you'll oblige me by saying something else. If you've forgotten the fact that I owe my life to you, I haven't. You've got a big debt up against me, and one that you'll never collect this side of Kingdom Come, but I've got a chance here to pay off an instalment of it, even if it's only a little one, and I'm not going to let it go; so before you go out of this room you've got to give me the word of the man who stood beside me that night on the Urubamba, that you'll not cross the Atlantic in any other boat than this, and that you're going to give me the pleasure of your own society, and that of the Mrs. Leigh Tristam that is to be, on the trip. See?"

While he had been speaking, Tristam had been thinking, and when he had done, he said, beginning to speak more seriously than Cortland thought the circumstances warranted:

"That's very kind indeed of you, Cortland, very kind, and I am quite sure that the Mrs. Leigh Tristam that is to be, will accept your offer just as heartily as I do, only——"

"We don't wan't any 'onlys' in it," Cortland interrupted, with a wave of the hand in which he held the cigar. "You've said quite enough, and all you've got to do now is to go and get married, and send me word when the trip begins. No, take those cocktails away, George," he went on addressing the steward, who had just come to the door of the state-room. "Take them away and bring me a bottle of the best wine there is on board the ship."

The steward vanished, and presently re-appeared with a bottle of champagne in a bucket of ice. Meanwhile, Tristam, taking up his parable again, said:

"My dear fellow, I should not be doing the right thing if I accepted your invitation without telling you all there is behind it, and as there is a good deal that may interest you, you may as well have it, and if you are still in the same mind when you've heard it, then the matter is settled."

"Which means that it is settled anyway; so now here's the wine, let's take a drink and then we'll have the yarn. I know you don't talk unless it's worth listening to."

"Well, it is just this way," said Tristam—and then he went on and told Cortland the whole story of the Gold Magnet as far as his own knowledge took him, beginning with the death of Arthur Pendril on the banks of the Ozama, and ending with the departure of Sir Langton and Lady Harley Pendril for the West Indies.

"And now," he said, when he had finished the narration to which Cortland had listened with even more interest than he might have expected, "you see it is not only a honeymoon trip. I have come to the conclusion that, by whatever means it got there, the Gold Magnet is in their possession. A thing like that cannot have disappeared utterly without deliberate design on the part of someone, and I've employed what the logicians call the process of exhaustion to the case, and I've come to the conclusion that the only living human being who is likely to have possession of that Thing is the late Sir Langton Harley's son.

"Of course, I haven't even suggested to Muriel that Professor Harley stole it, simply because his daughter Gwynneth is her greatest friend. You'll meet her, because I am going to make it one condition of our accepting your invitation that you shall be my best man at the wedding, and so I had better caution you to begin with. Still no one can have got it out of Earnest Stevens' possession except Professor Harley, and if he had it, it isn't likely that anyone can have got it from him except his son, therefore I think I am justified in concluding that the Gold Magnet has gone to the West Indies and is going to be used in the discovery of Don Christobal's treasure-chest, and I'm going to find them and it. Then the matter is complicated with that Francisco Lorrain——"

"Hold there a moment," exclaimed Cortland, jumping to his feet. "Francisco Lorrain! That's the chap you were telling me about in Peru. Well, I've heard about him since. I had a cable about a fortnight ago from Barbadoes telling me that he'd bought a yacht there, a very fast craft that I wanted myself, called the Minnehaha, a holy terror of a ship. A cousin of mine, Vansuyler, fitted her out to go and help the Cubans. You see I was interested in the estate, and when I heard he'd gone under with fever at Cartagena I wrote instructing the agent to buy the yacht for me, and the answer was that she'd already been sold to Lorrain.

"Well now, that looks like sport. You can't go hunting Lorrain in a common yacht. You might as well try and chase a cruiser in a tug-boat. This is the craft that is wanted for that kind of work, and you are just coming right along in her as soon as you're hitched up, so that's settled. Bet your life they're on the Minnehaha with Lorrain, and that the Gold Magnet is there too, whichever of them's got it. Yes, I'll be your best man with pleasure if you don't have any speeches at the breakfast, and then Westward Ho! By the great Cæsar's ghost, old man, it was a good wind that brought you alongside this evening. I was just wondering what on earth I was going to do with this craft now I got her, and here you come along with a sample of just the very sort of work she is fitted for. She's yours to command, and so am I till you've seen this business out. Shake!"

(To be continued.)

A SUPERB ENGRAVING

Is given away free with this week's SUNDAY READER, and you should not fail to secure a copy, for the presentation plate alone is worth three times the cost of the entire paper. This picture, which is by one of the leading painters of the day, represents Christ as a boy, sitting in the midst of the doctors at Jerusalem. It is a magnificent conception, splendidly executed, and the engraving given away with THE SUNDAY READER is well worth framing.

The New Year's number of THE SUNDAY READER is only one penny. Here are some of the contents: "Playing Instruments Three Thousand Years Old," "Men who Lived Before the Flood," "A Clergyman who is a Gipsy," "Dogs that Wear Medals," "A Barefooted Bridesmaid," "The Most Religious House;" a remarkable building in which six distinct religious works are carried on; "Business Men at Prayer-meetings," "Cockroaches as Preachers," "The Largest Church Organ in the World," "Buying a Bible with a Forged Cheque," and two complete stories, together with a long instalment of a serial.

The children's page is now a feature of THE SUNDAY READER. There are stories, pictures, puzzles, anecdotes, and competitions, all for the little ones, and every mother should purchase a copy of THE SUNDAY READER for her children to read on Sunday afternoons.

Every Thursday. THE SUNDAY READER. One Penny.

Digitized by Google

A YOUNG HERO AT CHILLIANWALLAH.

IN the grounds of Chelsea Hospital, where it is regarded with glistening eyes by the old pensioners, and arouses the patriotic feelings of many of the visitors who stroll about the spacious grounds in summer, stands a monument to the brave officers and men who fell in the deadly battle of Chillianwallah, one of the engagements in the war against the Sikhs in 1849.

The battle was fought under tremendous difficulties, and the cost in lives to the British was very heavy for the advantage gained; but in this, as in so many other cases, the dark side of the picture is relieved by the examples or conspicuous gallantry on the part of our men—and, I may add, our boys.

The battle began about two o'clock in the afternoon of the 13th of January. The ground on which it was fought was covered for miles in every direction with jungle of thick, high brushwood; the Sikh army, under Shere Sing, a noted warrior, was formed in order of battle in the centre of this jungle. The position of the enemy was in the midst of steep, precipitous and deep ravines; in addition they had earthworks mounted with cannon.

At the word of command the men went forward steadily, although exposed to a murderous fire. On the right flank our brigade of cavalry was thrown into confusion by some erroneous order and suffered considerably; while a native regiment was so fiercely attacked by the Sikhs and had to make so many formations to repel the ferocious enemy, that it finally charged with the rear rank in front! But onward went the brigade of infantry, and soon issued from the jungle into an opening where they had the opportunity of a bayonet charge.

"Charge!"

The order rang out clearly, and the men needed no second bidding. In grand order and with irresistible force, our gallant fellows dashed up to the enemy's line; the Sikhs poured in a last volley, broke and fled. It was useless to pursue them in the jungle; our men therefore turned their attention to the wounded, and settled accounts with the wounded Sikhs who were propping themselves up as best they could in order to shoot at our officers.

In another part of the battle, the 24th Regiment attacked a strong point on the enemy's position. They were all young men, but when Colonel Brooks waved his sword in the direction of the Khalsa guns, they responded with a British cheer, and went over the intervening six hundred yards at the double. The men were breathless when they reached the guns, but with the blood rushing through their veins, and their faces grim with determination, they swept away the gunners and spiked the guns.

In the midst of this operation they were fired on by some of the enemy who suddenly appeared; the men of the 24th fell in dozens, and before they could properly recover the Sikh cavalry raced down upon them.

One of the officers of the 24th was prostrated by a shot, but not killed. A Sikh bent over him and was about to finish him with a short sword, when his son, a boy ensign—a mere youth—rushed up to the stalwart foe and struck him down. Standing astride over his father's form, the daring lad fought bravely to defend him.

With flashing eyes and uplifted sword young Pennywick awaited the onslaught. Uttering wild cries the swarthy foemen, their faces distorted by passionate fanaticism and the lust of blood, dashed upon the young hero, who met them with undaunted spirit. There was the ring of steel and cries of rage as three Sikhs went down in rapid succession; but what could one boy do against a multitude? Before help could arrive the youthful ensign was struck down. He made one fierce attempt to deal a death blow to the leader of his assailants, and then the mob swept over him and his father, and two brave men were lost to Britain.

The 24th lost its colours, but after the battle the men found the dead body of one of the ensigns, and wrapped round the lifeless form was the flag that had been borne so proudly by the youth to whom it had been intrusted.

"DEAR SIR," he writes, "I, my wife, my two daughters (charming girls, one is engaged to an officer and the other has had two offers), and my three sons—the young scamps—read your Big Budget regularly every Thursday. We all think it is a splendid paper—or rather three splendid papers—and well worth the nimble penny."—FATHER OF FIVE.

Portrait of a sensible man and a kind father.

Digitized by Google

The Murder of Osmond Bedford, Actor.

I.

STANDING in Armouth Cemetery is a monument commemorating a terrible crime which has to this day foiled the police. The inscription runs:

> May God's great pity touch his heart, and lead
> My poor murderer to confess his dreadful deed,
> And when the secrets of all hearts are known,
> Guilt and repentance may alike be shown.

The victim who lies beneath is Osmond Bedford, a one-time favourite actor. He was a member of a first-class touring company known by name as the "Strand Merry-Makers," under the direction of Mr. Travis King. Bedford was the "Juvenile-leading man," to style his line in professional language, and was a fine, dashing young fellow of five-and-twenty, tall, handsome, and gentlemanly, with fair curly hair, large and expressive blue eyes, clean-shaven face, and he had the knack of dressing well "on and off the stage."

He was jovial and generous to a degree, but the man, or woman even, with the most fascinating of alluring manners, or the best graces imaginable, is liable to be cursed with an enemy of some kind, no matter what the motive of the latter may be. It may be jealousy, or disappointment, or dissatisfaction at the success of a rival, but there it is; the best of us have our enemy, who will show his teeth at every opportunity—at every turn we take on our journey through life. It was so with Osmond Bedford.

Among his compeers on the stage he had a reputation for large-heartedness, open generosity, affableness, and willingness to help on his lesser fortunate brethren of the sock and buskin, but Harry Humphreys, the low comedian of the company, a soured and withered old stork of the great army of unfortunates whose progress to fortune is somehow barred in a hundred different ways, positively hated him. Nobody knew why, except that Bedford had in his less successful days courted the sister of the disappointed Humphreys, but was now paying his attentions to somebody else.

Some people offered that as the reason, whilst others attributed other motives, alleging that Harry's fraternal love for his sister was not of that desperate order to warrant his taking such a strong dislike to the young leading actor.

The "Strand Merry-Makers" were billed to appear at Armouth. It was a small town, and the old Theatre Royal was of that type that allowed of no dressing-room accommodation for the actors, a desperate state of things that used to be, but which is now happily changed. Four of the gentlemen of the company were dressing together under the stage in a corner which had been purposely screened off or "rigged up" for their benefit. Bedford and Humphreys were among the four.

"I'm awfully sorry for you, old man," said one of the four who was employed most earnestly in the art of "making himself up" for the performance, and, half-dressed, was rubbing all over his face the usual flesh-coloured grease paint that they use, "because the fact of that letter being found in her pocket rather tells against you. Don't you think it does?"

"I know it's a deucedly awkward situation, Rankin, but my position is clear in the matter. She didn't end her life through me," replied Osmond Bedford.

"That's the rub, Mr. Bedford. I'm inclined to think the other way, which is the way that every sane person thinks. No girl would willingly place her neck on the railroad track, and invite death in such a horrible manner as suicide by decapitation, through a trivial misunderstanding only," said Humphreys with pointed effect, at the same time proceeding with his dressing for the stage with perfect nonchalance.

"What do you mean, Humphreys?" exclaimed Osmond Bedford, his face flushing with indignation.

"The explanation is on the surface of the whole thing," curtly replied Humphreys, putting down his stick of grease paint and picking up an evening paper that lay on his desk beside a bottle of spirit gum. He read the following extract out loud:

"'THE MYSTERIOUS DEATH OF ALICE SUGDEN.

"'The coroner's inquiry into the circumstances of the mysterious death of this young lady, who was well known at Carleton, her father being an old resident of the town, was held this morning. As has been reported, her mangled remains were found on the railway outside Carleton station, but the evidence now failed to prove whether the girl met her death by foul murder, or accident, or whether she committed suicide. A letter was produced found in the dress pocket of deceased, written by a——.'"

Digitized by Google

"My dear sir, you needn't read any more. I know all that. Wasn't I at the inquest this morning, and the story is too sad to have it dinned into my ear again to-night," pleaded Bedford, putting the finishing touches to his make-up.

"Ah, but just you wait a bit. You had to leave to-day before the inquiry was over, hadn't you? Of course, you didn't know how long it was going to last, and we're over thirty-five miles from Carleton, and the trains are not numerous, and when they do run they are very slow. We know all that. But do you know that the inquiry is over—that is for to-day?" said Humphreys, putting his arms akimbo, and looking Bedford significantly in the face.

"No, I didn't know that. Well, I suppose there can only be one verdict."

"Certainly, the right one, but we don't always get at the right thing at coroners' inquiries. That's been my experience. Listen," said Humphreys, holding up the paper again, and reading out aloud as before:

"'The coroner remarked that the facts strongly pointed to murder, and he adjourned the inquest till next Thursday.'"

"I quite agree with the sagacious coroner, for so far as I am aware she had no reason for destroying herself," said Bedford confidently, "and Miss Sugden's been murdered."

"Come, now, Bedford, you know differently. When a fellow takes the trouble to correspond with a girl whom he hasn't any idea of marrying, he ought to know the reason why she kills herself when he throws her over," said Humphreys, coolly turning towards his dressing place, and adjusting a wig upon his head for the part he was playing.

Bedford almost reeled at the insinuation, and throwing down a hand-mirror he was holding, he advanced towards his companion to strike him, but was stopped by Mr. Rankin.

"You scoundrel!" he cried, leaning over his friend's shoulder and shaking his clenched fist at Humphreys, "I'll pay you out for this when the show is over!"

"Yes—well, we'll both pay off old scores," replied the comedian.

"I say, you fellows, we have had enough of this," interrupted Rankin, a good-natured fellow, a man with a peaceful disposition. "Why can't you let Bedford alone, Humphreys?"

"Smart men must pay for their popularity," was the sneering answer of the other.

Incensed with rage, Bedford broke away from his friend's hold, and rushing at Humphrey, dealt that gentleman a severe, and perhaps not undeserved blow on the mouth that sent him reeling to the floor.

"Take that, you blackguard!" cried Bedford, bending over his fallen man.

Humphreys at once sprang to his feet with the swiftness of a fiend incarnate, and literally leapt upon Bedford, whom he pinned against the wall and tried to throttle. He was eventually dragged away by the others, but not before he had severely mauled Bedford. And he was a thin, spare little man was Humphreys, and about forty-five years of age.

II.

Mr. Travis King's daughter—Elsie—was Bedford's fiancée, and she was a member of the company, playing lead with him.

"I never saw Miss Sugden since I saw her at Norwich," he said to Mr. King during rehearsal the next day, "now six months ago. I have received many letters from her like other people have who are before the footlights, and who are in the habit of regularly receiving letters and presents from the public. I own I went so far as to send her my portrait, a character one of the part I am playing, at her own special request. When we were playing at Carleton I saw her twice, and on each occasion I told her honourably that although I was not a married man, yet I was not a free man, and that I was engaged to be married soon."

"But you never said a word of this to Elsie," said Mr. King reprovingly.

"No. Why? Because I know her to be of a jealous nature, and as there was nothing in what I did, nothing that I was ashamed of—a thing which I did out of pure kindness and sympathy, and which anyone might have done placed in similar circumstances—I thought there was nothing to tell—nothing to justify my making Elsie unhappy."

"Finding your letter in the dead girl's pocket is bad, bad, bad, Osmond," and the old actor shook his head. "You saw her twice at Carleton, and once again at Norwich."

"She followed us from Carleton to Norwich——"

"Followed you, not us," said the manager, interrupting his favourite leading man.

"I didn't ask her to come, Mr. King," said Mr. Bedford with emphasis. "I declare to Heaven, sir," continued he, with panting heart and crimsoned cheek, "that I have been true to Elsie in thought, word, and deed ever since our engagement."

"Look at the public disgrace the affair has got my company in. Your name coming out so prominently in the case at the coroner's inquiry hits every member of the company hard, and a spiteful public will do the rest for us all—they'll keep away from us. We may as well disband, and go home."

"No, don't do that. I'll punish myself for my sin of sympathy by retiring from the company, although I shall leave my friends here with a conscience clear as daylight, and a mind convinced that there is nothing much to be got out of doing an act of kindness for anybody now-a-days," said Osmond Bedford, striding away from the manager, and walking across the stage.

Seeing Elsie King talking to the other lady members of the company in one of the "wings," he turned that way, and, stopping at a few paces from them and raising his hat, he called out "Elsie!"

She advanced towards him. At the sight of him there was instant silence among the ladies.

"Are you going to cut me, Elsie?"

"I can't amend what my father has told you," said she, with dramatic and withering effect.

"But he has told me nothing."

"Oh, I see. Well, in the face of what has occurred, it will be—er—better—if——"

"If we don't meet again? I see, Elsie. This is unexpected, but as I know your proud spirit, perhaps I ought not to be surprised at your decision; but it is an unjust one," continued the handsome but cowered actor.

"Unjust, when letters from you are found on the body of a girl who finds relief in death? And this at a time, too, when you are, or were, engaged to me," said the actress who recited the speech as if she were delivering it on the stage, with force and pointed bitterness.

Digitized by Google

"Your father has the truth of the story. Ask him. At any rate, I am going—I think it better to—and as we are sure to meet again, I am certain that when that day comes round you'll be ready to exchange words of sympathy with me. Good-bye, and remember, I have been true to you in thought, word, and deed. I am not responsible for the death of Miss Sugden any more than you are. I wrote those unfortunate letters to her out of pity for her. I know she has been following me about, and her letters to me prove the intensity of her mistaken love for me. I told her that I was engaged to you. I would have told you all this, but I didn't want to make you unhappy. But the girl is dead; by what means, God knows. I am certain, however, it wasn't through me. If it be murder, I suppose it will out someday."

III.

THE adjourned inquest on Alice Sugden was duly held, and the jury brought in an open verdict. They exonerated Osmond Bedford from all complicity and blame in the matter, and they even went out of their way to compliment him for the straightforward way in which he had tendered his evidence.

He returned to Armouth. It was summer-time, and Armouth at this particular period of which we write was a rising seaside resort. His old company had taken their departure a few days before, but on the Sunday afternoon that they went away he was enabled to show some of his friends an engagement which he had received only that morning from a London manager. He saw that Humphreys was paying particular attention to Elsie King; in fact, it was a renewal of a friendship that had existed before, and which might have brought the two closer together had it not been for the advent of the dashing, spirited, and handsome Bedford, with whom the manager's daughter soon fell in love.

Early one morning the coastguardsmen at Armouth, seeing a boat at the foot of East Cliff, went and secured it. Looking around, they discovered the lifeless body of Osmond Bedford upon the shore, near by being some of his clothes, all the pockets of which were turned inside out. An examination of the body revealed three terrible wounds. There were two wounds in the back, and another just over the heart, a deep and long one, which had terminated the poor fellow's life. It caused a terrible consternation. There was a general hue and cry for the murderer, but the police were baffled. Many arrests were made, but they never caught the murderer, as the inscription on the tombstone testifies.

Let it be said in all fairness to her, that Elsie King was one of the first to kiss the victim of that awful deed. How she upbraided herself for the cruel way she treated him only a few days before! Her heart was rent with grief. She never left the remains of her lover from the hour of her arrival until he was laid in his coffin and buried.

Three months afterwards, the "Strand Merry-Makers" were playing at Manchester. There was a "call" for rehearsal on the Monday, the company having arrived the day before; Mr. Harry Humphreys was absent. They delayed the rehearsal for him. But he never turned up. The manager sent a special messenger to his lodgings to know the reason of the delay. The messenger returned with the thrilling news that Humphreys was dead—he had poisoned himself. On the table by his bedside was a slip of paper, on which were written these three words: "I follow Bedford."

Those who know better than we do, say that Humphreys was Bedford's murderer. But who can prove it now? MULVY OUSELEY.

1898.

"PEARSON'S Edition of the British Almanac for the New Year is now ready!"

At first glance this doesn't seem a very exciting piece of information. But it is. It is, because for one shilling—one solitary, unassuming, milled-edged shilling—you may obtain the mass of information summarised below, a free photograph of yourself, a tablet of "Riviera" soap, and discounts off tradesmen's accounts.

THE FOLLOWING IS A BRIEF STATEMENT OF CONTENTS:

Astronomical Information by MR. EDWARD ROBERTS, F.R.A.S., F.S.S. Eclipses, Star Charts, Notes on Weather, Storms, Clouds, Wind, Metereological Instruments, High Water Tables, etc.

General Information. Calendars — English, Jewish, Mohammedan, Bengalee, Fuslee, and Samvat; also Calendars of the English, Greek, and Russian Churches, and Gardening and Sporting Calendars.

Portraits of past Kings and Queens of England, and of reigning Sovereigns of the World.

Official information respecting Government Officials, Members of Parliament, Postal Regulations and Rates, recent events in the Colonies and foreign Countries, with maps and illustrations.

Provincial Directory of Fairs, Early closing and Market days.

Several beautifully executed Maps by W. and A. K. JOHNSTON.

Seat Plans of principal London and Provincial Theatres.

Ecclesiastical and Educational Section by the Rev. CANON BURNSIDE, Editor of "The Church Year Book." Lists of English and other Church Dignitaries, Church Courts, Colours, Universities, Schools, Board Schools, etc.

Legal Section contains full lists of Law Courts and Officials, and valuable notes on Commercial, Household and Family Law; also advice as to Payment of Rates and Taxes, Qualification of Voters, etc.

Art Section contains lists of the various Art Schools, Galleries and Museums, with regulations and lists of Officials, Heraldic Colouring, Notes on Engravings, etc.

Military and Naval Section. Illustrations of Army Uniforms and principal Ships of recent construction. Lists of Officials, Military and Naval Schools, etc.

Medical Section by Dr. E. P. PHILPOTT., Glossary of Medical Terms, Sick-room Notes, Anatomy, Emergency Notes, etc. besides a lot of Valuable Tables.

Sporting Section by Mr. A. W. BROWNE. Illustrated Notes on latest developments of Billiards, Boating, Cycling, Cricket, Football, Golf, Racing, Tennis, and other sports, also Racing Colours of Leading Owners.

Household Section contains illustrated notes on recent and other dances by Mr. EDWARD SCOTT; Fashions by Mrs. RIVERS TURNBULL; Poultry Keeping and Diseases of Domestic Animals, by Mr. W. B. TEGETMEIER; Pigeons, by Rev. W. F. LUMLEY; Horses and Dogs, by Mr. VERO SHAW; Monthly Dinner Menus, and various useful tables, etc.

Each copy of the Almanac includes:

Coupon entitling to Free Photo of Self.
Coupon entitling to a tablet of Cook's "Riviera" Soap.
Percentage Coupons entitling to discounts off tradesmen's accounts not otherwise obtainable, whereby at least £5 per annum may be saved.

Insurance against Railway Accident for Twelve Months in the sum of £500.

BE SURE TO ASK FOR PEARSON'S EDITION

Digitized by Google

The Lie She Told.

A THOUSAND lights made the great house glow: a thousand roses filled the air with sweetness, and hidden strings sounded tremulous melody.

They sat alone in the conservatory. "Katherine," he said gently, "you know I love you. There is no need of my saying the words for—"

She interrupted him. "Stop! Words like that are an insult. Have you no sense of honour? I had believed you a gentleman: and yet with one of the best and truest of women for your wife, you come to me with this shameful story."

She arose to go, but he prevented her. "Katherine," he said unsteadily, "why should a false sense of honour hold me to my wife when I love you? Since that first day my every thought has been of you. And you love me, too, dearest: I am sure of that. Will you brave the world for me in some foreign land where none need know?"

She twisted a rose in her fingers.

"Yet you loved her once, and she is a sweet, good woman. Then go back to her and your child with what remnant of manliness you can command, and try to repay in some slight measure the wealth of devotion she has given you. It is your business to be true to her, even though you are unworthy to touch even her garment's hem."

He smiled cynically: "You are cruel."

"No, I am only honest. Men like you have no conception of right or duty. You would desert her for me, and you would leave me when the fancy struck you."

A shadow appeared in the doorway. It was Gertrude in search of her husband. Katherine drew her into the conservatory. "You little mouse, how quiet you are! Did you hear what he just said of you? No? Then I'll tell you, but you mustn't repeat it, for it's a secret." She leant over and whispered in Gertrude's ear: "He said you were 'a sweet, good woman.'" Gertrude's pale face brightened, and her eyes filled. She looked at him in a way that was almost a caress, and they went out together, leaving Katherine alone.

"Oh, Heaven!" she breathed: "what a weak, foolish thing a woman is. A man like that, and yet—and yet—we both love him!"

The other woman's face haunted Katherine.

One day they met in the street. "Have you not heard," asked Gertrude, "he is very ill?"

Katherine assured her of her sympathy. "You must be brave, little woman: that will help him more than anything else. I'll come in to see you after a while."

When she entered, the sick man's voice sounded through the house: "Katherine, Katherine! I want you so!"

She put her pitying arms round Gertrude. "Dear, it's hard for you, isn't it?"

Gertrude's face was tearless. "He was that way all night—calling ceaselessly for you."

"He has confused us, probably," answered Katherine; "you know we were together a great deal, just before he was taken ill." Yet a wild chord of happiness thrilled her at the sound of his voice calling her name, which even Gertrude's look of relief could not lessen.

"I have brought some jelly for him to take when he is stronger."

Katherine handed her the small package.

"I'll tell him you brought it," said Gertrude slowly.

Katherine smiled. "My dear, he won't care who brought it, so long as you give it to him. I wouldn't say anything about it, if I were you."

Gertrude broke down completely. "Oh," she cried between her sobs, "how good you are!"

Katherine drew her closer. "Cry, dear, if you can," she said tenderly. "You are nervous and overwrought, and it will do you good."

"Pull yourself together, Katherine," she said to herself, as she turned the corner: "it is the other woman's heart that is at stake—not yours."

* * * * *

Katherine was in a distant city when the news of his death reached her. After the first shock was over she wrote a letter:

"Gertrude, dear, it is not easy to put on paper the things I would rather say with my arms round you, but I do want to assure you of my love and sympathy.

"I know it is hard and bitter, but there is much to comfort you—the little child who is named after him, and who loves you too. There are many women the wide world over, who would gladly give all their earthly possessions for the love which sleeps in your grave today. It is yours beyond the power of change or loss.

"I remember one night, as he helped you with your wraps, the look of love and pride in his eyes, which you did not see, and I thought as you left me, 'there goes a happy woman.'

"Men are proverbially thoughtless, you know, and sometimes they forget the little words which are the very breath of life to a loving woman; but the great feeling lives just the same, and I often think that a woman's finer sight is given her for that very thing—that she may know the unspoken thought of husband or lover.

"Death never changes love, dear; it goes on just the same. Your heart is just as full of him; and who shall say that, somewhere, the same love does not wait for you?

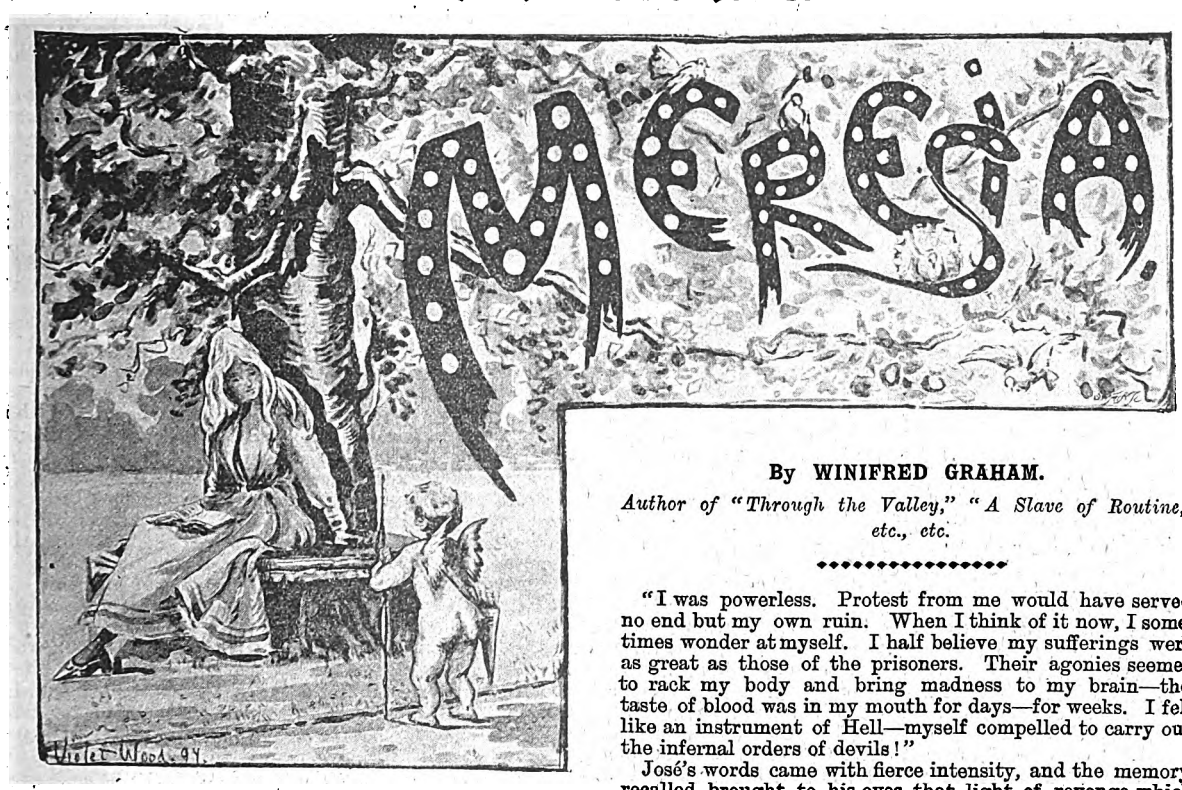
"I can only say 'be brave,' but you are already that, and more, as becomes the 'sweet, good woman' that you are, and, believe me, my heart aches with yours.

"In all love and sympathy. Katherine." She pressed her white face against the window and looked out into the starless night. "God forgive me if I have done wrong, but that comfort is all that there is left for her. Let her believe his love is hers as I know it is mine."

And Katherine smothered a dull, unceasing pain, but the other woman's heart swelled into a sob of thanksgiving.

MYRTLE REED.

Digitized by Google



By WINIFRED GRAHAM.

Author of "Through the Valley," "A Slave of Routine," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE LIFE OF WOMEN IS FULL OF WOE.

"READ this," said Meresia, "read this."

José did not touch the paper, but he bent down over the table and scanned it quickly. She watched his face, but could not see the expression in his downcast eyes.

"Why does this trouble you?" he asked at last.

"Because it refers to my husband, and because no vice or degradation to me is so horrible as the thought of cruelty practised by men of reason and education. I could find an excuse for the wretched savages who sacrifice to idols, for the barbarous deeds of the dark ages. But now, when everything is different, in a country such as Spain, that these things should be is monstrous and unpardonable. I could never have believed it, I should have laughed at the mere idea, but that my husband in no way denies, or even appears ashamed of these scandalous truths!"

"But why do you come to me?" asked José Serano.

"You were a gaoler in the Madrid prison, you must have known of, or seen, these atrocities!"

She fancied he paled at the mention of past horrors, and the lines of his mouth compressed, while Meresia's conviction grew stronger, that his hand, and his alone, exposed such dastardly doings to the British public.

"These secret trials," she continued, "they took place while you were there. The man who could not speak Spanish, and was so unmercifully tortured, did they ever give him a hearing?"

"Yes," said Serano; "finally he was heard, and his statements produced a sense of horror among the audience. I remember that his counsel, while he made his declaration before the judge, remarked with revolting cynicism: 'It seems as though this blackguard needed another lesson in Spanish.'"

"And you," cried Meresia, "stood by and spoke no word—you could endure to do that?"

"I was powerless. Protest from me would have served no end but my own ruin. When I think of it now, I sometimes wonder at myself. I half believe my sufferings were as great as those of the prisoners. Their agonies seemed to rack my body and bring madness to my brain—the taste of blood was in my mouth for days—for weeks. I felt like an instrument of Hell—myself compelled to carry out the infernal orders of devils!"

José's words came with fierce intensity, and the memory recalled brought to his eyes that light of revenge which Meresia discovered for the first time.

"Can you deny," she asked, "that you are the author of these communications?"

Serano was silent. Meresia repeated her question.

"I would rather not say. At least the writer has my sympathy and support," he replied.

"I ought not to have asked you. I understand—I, as the wife of a Spanish judge, and the very one to whom this alludes, should be the last to expect your confidence. I have always guessed that you were my husband's enemy, it puzzled me, but now I am not surprised; I only wonder how you could have endured to be near him, to live under his roof, to break his bread."

As José listened to Meresia, he wondered if anger for him, or scorn for her husband, brought the bitter ring to her wonderful voice.

He saw that the youth and joy in her face had fled, that the tragedy of knowledge changed her, making Meresia none the less beautiful, but marvellously unlike her old self.

Here was a woman to whom he could have given his confidence, unburdened his soul, had not fate made her the wife of Alfonso Aladrós. As such she was tainted in his eyes, she was part of a being loathsome to him, the half of a thing unclean.

"Talking will not better facts," he said. "Go home and forget about it, Mrs. Aladros. All wrongs will be righted some day in this world—or the next."

"In this world," she said slowly. "It is the only world of which we can be quite sure. Do you think it is nothing to me that I have married this man? Am I a child that I can go home and forget? He won me for his wife from the sheer persistency of a prolonged attack. He pursued me with relentless energy, exercising such extraordinary will power that he finally conquered. I gave myself to him in a moment of hysterical passion, caused by a new disease of the nerves called the fascination of hate. He was like a serpent. I could not escape him. I knew it, just as his

Digitized by Google

LOVE STORIES,
The Companion Paper to
SHORT STORIES,
APPEARS EVERY WEDNESDAY
. . And Costs . .
½D.

victims knew they must suffer torture or death when he said the word. That is the solution, Mr. Serano, if you, as my husband's enemy, care to know the true inwardness of my marriage problem. The fascination has gone, but the hate remains, though it slept until to-day. Now it has come to life with the knowledge of his character, his deeds, and the dark passages in that career of which he told me nothing. So at least you and I have something in common. We are both at enmity with the same man."

This unexpected confession on the part of Meresia broke down some of José's guarded reserve. For a moment he let her see him as he was—a man of hot blood, consumed by fiery indignation against the persecutors of the helpless. He spoke words that were rash to be uttered in the presence of the judge's wife, but they were sweet to Meresia, since they re-echoed her own sentiments.

But scarcely had the words passed his lips than his old caution returned, and he cursed himself for a fool.

Meresia drew slowly nearer, her eyes blazing and her breathing quickened by excitement. She leant forward, so that a whisper, hardly audible, could be caught by José.

"You, then, at heart are an Anarchist!"

Her words shot home and startled Serano from his studied politeness. He struck the table with his fist, and the white bone of his knuckles shot through the red.

"You lie," he answered, looking her straight in the face with a candour born of necessity. "Madam, in Heaven's name I swear—you lie!"

Seeing his agitation, Meresia shook her head. His emphatic denial and twitching lips told their own tale.

"Enough," she replied. "Another time, Mr. Serano, be more careful. That is how men betray themselves. But rest assured that I shall not breathe a word of what has passed to-day. I came to question you about this article, and I have found out all I care to know. If at any time I can help you, ask me. As a woman I can do nothing alone, I am so ignorant."

She turned away with bent head, a crushed look on her beautiful face, as if her youth had died a death of shame.

José gathered up the furs she had forgotten, and wrapped them about her.

She fastened her cloak mechanically, forgetful of the cold.

"Good-bye," he said, "and Heaven help you! Without love I can scarcely wish you happiness."

"Wish me insensibility—release. Have you no prescription to cure a throbbing at the brain and heart? There is no bright word of hope, no sweet word of peace for me, only a multitude of waters—without a shore. I am a woman widowed, for how can I call the man 'husband,' whose presence makes me shudder, and whose soul is stained with the grossest offences?"

Her words remained in José's mind long after she had left him. The mysterious notes in Meresia's voice warranted that. Once or twice Serano found himself repeating them. "The grossest offences—yes, the grossest, the vilest—she was right," he said.

As Meresia drove home she began to devise ways of avoiding her husband. Her ideas were not very clear; but she had an indefinable longing to go away, if only for a night, to some quiet retreat where she might rest and think. Not to friends, who would be curious and talkative; they could bring no comfort.

She remembered that her old nurse, Sally Biden, lived at Isleworth, and occasionally let rooms, dignified by the word "Apartments" on a card in the window. Why anyone should wish to go to Isleworth was a mystery to Meresia. The place always seemed a monotonous succession of road and path, without attraction of any kind to the casual observer; but the prosaicness of this unromantic suburb commended itself now to Meresia for the very reasons that would have made her shun it hitherto. Alfonso would never dream that she had sought the shelter of Sally Biden's semi-detached villa, when she left a note excusing her absence, but furnishing no reason for this sudden desertion.

He was out when she reached her home, and, eating a hurried lunch, Meresia left with her bag on a hansom, and a sigh of relief.

"Of course, it was very purposeless," she told herself; "but Aladros must learn that in the future her rôle would be independence. If she preferred the company of Sally Biden, then with Sally Biden she would stay."

This thought of freedom brought lulling dreams, and in the train she closed her eyes, picturing herself a girl again.

Back at the old home, back during summer months, with the soft grass under her body and the burning glare in her face, she lay, taking her favourite sun-bath, with Tina keeping guard and pawing her loosened hair. She could see the shadowy lines of the trees and remember the "long, long thoughts of youth" with joy that was almost pain.

"My heart goes back to wander there," she murmured, still keeping her eyes closed, "and among the dreams of the days that were, I find my lost youth again."

Even as she spoke, crushing reality dispersed the pleasurable fancy, and proclaimed her the wife of Alfónso Aladros, bound by the Word of God and the law of man. She trembled at the recollection of the sudden dislike and horror with which he had filled her that morning.

All her calm self-possession, her moderation, of which Elizabeth sometimes spoke, had taken to itself wings and deserted her in the flood of circumstances. Now she felt convinced it would never return, like the dove, to the Ark. Henceforth must stormy billows be faced—the horrors, the crimes, the sins, the woes! Her heart was like a graveyard—her thoughts and faculties stood still before the ghastly phantoms—the ghosts of transgessors whom Aladros had given over to the tormentors.

She recoiled at the sordid memory of the torment, and her senses, which a few moments ago inhaled the sweetness and fragrance of the old summer home, absorbed afresh the foul air, the tainted atmosphere of London.

In a restless, miserable frame of mind she reached the abode of Sally Biden, and startled the poor old lady so that she trembled with joy and surprise, and fell to weeping because her dear Miss Meresia had never set foot there since the Lord gave her a husband—a brave gentleman from Spain, so she had heard say.

Digitized by Google

Meresia soothed her with many kind words and caresses, and announced her intention of spending the night with her.

"You can get a room ready for me, Sally, dear, can't you? I know you do not like being taken unawares, but I don't care about dinner, or anything, so long as you give me a cup of tea with you, and a fire to go to sleep by. I am very tired and a little sad. Ah! nothing you would understand."

"It's just the way," said Sally Biden, shaking her grey head, "with rich and poor alike! No one can't be always happy, not even them as is beautiful and blessed like you, Miss Meresia. There! I dare say if we knew, the Queen of England 'erself ain't altogether satisfied."

"Some more, some less," quoted Meresia, "but of the whole not one quite happy—no, not one."

"We've got the big bedroom to give you, deary," said the woman, stroking Mrs. Aladros's handsome furs with pride and admiration, "no one ain't used it since my poor lodger, what was an all-the-year-round customer, passed away in late autumn quite sudden like. He was a medical, and that cheery, it did my heart good to hear him whistling about the place. His hat is still a-hangin' on the door, for Mary and I couldn't abide to take it down, for he'd put the peg up himself and spoilt my panel a-doing of it. Mary shall take your bag up and unpack your things, and we'll make you real comfortable."

So the old woman prattled on, and continued to call her "Miss Meresia," which term was singularly acceptable to Mrs. Aladros.

"You shall have a cup of bovril and some poached eggs with your tea, deary; you always liked your eggs poached in the nursery. And didn't I spoil you! Bless your pretty heart!"

Meresia found the eggs on toast less appetising than of yore, or perhaps it was that she had no hunger to relish them.

Sally Biden protested at her scant appetite.

"It's but poor pickings you're taking, Miss Meresia; married life don't make you no healthier, I reckon, or maybe it is the London air what puts you off your feed. Come and sit in the front parlour, deary, in the big chair, and don't fret yourself and eat to be pleasin' me," seeing that Meresia returned to her discarded food.

Mrs. Aladros accepted the invitation of the parlour and the big chair gratefully.

Sally Biden's presence soothed her troubled nerves as none other would have done, for she was associated with childhood's days, which were hallowed to Meresia with tender memories.

CHAPTER XVIII.

TRACKED AND CAPTURED.

"ARE you comfortable, deary?" asked Sally Biden.

"Oh, yes," said Meresia, perching her feet on the fender, and resting her ruddy gold head on the shiny horse-hair back of the big parlour chair. "Isn't it nice to be sitting over the fire, and pretending the old days have come back? I always made pictures in the coals, didn't I, Sally? Even when I was quite tiny, and you used to hold me on your knee and warm my toes by the high guard. But they were such different pictures then; fairies, and knights on horseback, and wonders of many kinds. Now they are all so prosaic, Sally—faces that are not pleasant—and a red-hot burning sea, that only means flame—and nothing more. Perhaps I have lost my imagination, or put it away with childish things."

"Perhaps you're thinking of your good gentleman more than fairies and such like. I was a bit afeared at first, deary, when I heard say as you'd married a furriner. But, praise the Lord, your dear mother has told me what a noble creature he is, and that a happier couple never went away alongside each other from the altar. I've prayed and prayed about you, deary, this many a long day, and always that it might be put into your heart to come and see your old Sally."

"Why were you afraid," asked Meresia, "when you heard he was foreign?"

"Because my step-sister's cousin's aunt, what lived in the North, and was the pick of the bunch, being that comely and buxom, came to service near London at eighteen years of age. She met a furrin person, a man what sold music in a piano shop, with long hair and a mouthful of an Italian name. Well, nothing would do but that she should marry him straight off. There wasn't no rice at the weddin' nor nothing, for he flurried and bustled the poor girl so, she'd hardly time to do her bit of sewing and trim up her Sunday gown. Oh, that man, he were a caution!. Temper—well, there! it was somethink shocking to hear him swear, and her so timid and cowed, poor soul! Last of all, he frightened her that dreadful she packed up her trunks and took herself off. But he wasn't going to be bamboozled. He scoured the country till he found her, and, thinking as it was another man what had got her away, he out with a revolver and let fly full in her face. Then came an inquest, and a hangin', and lots in the papers, written in big letters, and all caused by marrying a furriner, what didn't understand English ways."

"How horrible!" said Meresia. "I wish you had not told me."

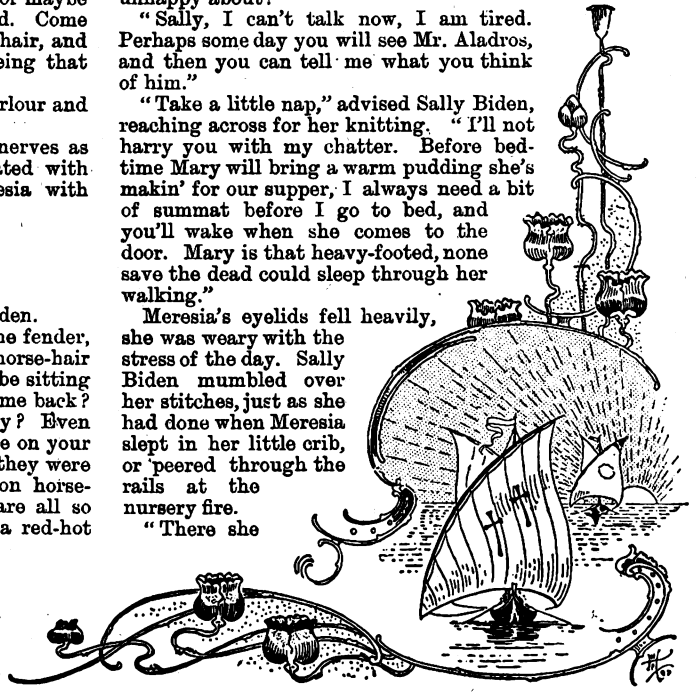
"But of course, deary, that was only one case; it don't happen every time. Jealousy's an awful thing when it do break loose, and frets the bones of a body real badly, take my word for it. But you won't make your gentleman riled, with your sweet, dear ways, and your good, true heart. He ought to be one of the best to be worthy of the likes of you."

Meresia said nothing, but as she gazed into the fiery sea, with its ships of black coal, and its shores of grey cinder, the red of the flame seemed to reach her eyes, and burn them with blood.

"You don't say nothing, deary! It ain't him as you're unhappy about?"

"Sally, I can't talk now, I am tired. Perhaps some day you will see Mr. Aladros, and then you can tell me what you think of him."

"Take a little nap," advised Sally Biden, reaching across for her knitting. "I'll not harry you with my chatter. Before bedtime Mary will bring a warm pudding she's makin' for our supper, I always need a bit of summat before I go to bed, and you'll wake when she comes to the door. Mary is that heavy-footed, none save the dead could sleep through her walking."



Meresia's eyelids fell heavily, she was weary with the stress of the day. Sally Biden mumbled over her stitches, just as she had done when Meresia slept in her little crib, or peered through the rails at the nursery fire.

"There she

Digitized by Google

is, stumping like a trooper, drat her!" said the old woman. "It ain't time for the pudding yet: I tell you it ain't time——"

Her jaw dropped, her eyes dilated, as the door opened and the imposing figure of a man, gigantic in proportions, appeared, apparition like, before her wondering gaze.

Meresia stirred, but did not move her head.

"I don't want anything to eat, thank you; I am not hungry," she said.

The low, sweet tones fell on her husband's ears; he motioned to Mrs. Biden not to speak.

As he moved slowly across the room, a paralysing dread crept over Meresia. She saw Sally's face marked by innumerable lines of interrogation, and was suddenly conscious of Alfonso's presence.

She tried to turn, but her blood was frozen, and her limbs stiff. The days of his courtship returned with uncanny vividness, when upon various occasions Aladros would appear at the most unexpected places, like a superhuman being, knowing without being told.

He came right up to her chair, and laid his huge hand firmly on her shoulder. The clutch filled her with deadly terror, and she thought again of the shuddering wretches that hand had condemned to inhuman torture.

"Not hungry?" he said, with sarcastic emphasis. "Well, it is early yet. We shall be back in town for supper."

Meresia half rose, but her limbs refused to support her, and she sank back speechless.

Sally Biden watched the two faces curiously: Meresia's—pale, motionless; and his—smiling, contemptuous, cruel!

The old woman could have cried aloud in her consternation, for she saw the pain in her "deary's" eyes, and the hard glitter of the man's as they lighted upon his wife.

She thought of the foreigner in the music shop, and trembled for Meresia's safety.

Alfonso turned and spoke in courteous tones:

"I see you have taken good care of Mrs. Aladros; I am much indebted to you. Unfortunately I must rob you of her company to-night; but I am none the less grateful for your hospitality. I have asked your maid to fetch her wraps. The carriage is waiting."

"Sally, this is my husband," said Meresia feebly.

She dared not refuse to return. He had tracked her and caught her; she was caged for the time.

Mrs. Biden courtesyed low. This tall, dark man, in his long fur overcoat, impressed her with a sense of awe.

"It's done my heart good to see your dear lady," faltered Sally Biden; "and there's the big room warm and ready, double-bedded and aired, if so you'd do me the honour to stop."

Aladros appeared so utterly out of proportion with his surroundings that the idea provoked a veiled smile. He pulled his dark moustache and refused in the flowery language that came most easily to his tongue. Mary appeared carrying Meresia's bag and cloak; it was as much as she could do to stagger beneath them.

Aladros relieved her of the cloak, and flung it about his wife. He could have picked her up, wraps and all, like a feather, and borne her away, but though the impulse came to him, for the sake of conventionality he refrained.

Sally Biden, now convinced that the parting was imminent, and seeing Meresia's lips were trembling, brushed aside a tear with the stocking she was knitting, and clasped Mrs. Aladros to her heart.

"Good night, deary, and good rest to you," she whispered. She could say no more, for Meresia's unexpected arrival and abrupt departure sorely puzzled the poor woman. She felt there was trouble in the air—a storm brewing—but of what nature she could not guess.

"You have been so kind to me, Sally," replied Mrs. Aladros, kissing the withered cheeks tenderly. "I wish I could have stayed."

This last sentence was said with such fervour that Alfonso winced and flung the door open impatiently to signify he was tired of waiting.

"Come," he said, "you have kept the horses standing long enough."

Meresia obeyed. It was dark, and he took her arm to guide her. She seated herself in silence by his side, shivering slightly in spite of the huge rug he drew over her knees.

Sally Biden watched the carriage roll away, bearing Meresia back to London, in the keeping of her husband. Long after the sound of the horses' hoofs died in the distance, the old woman stood, forgetful of the cold, straining her eyes in the darkness and mumbling to herself, as she stared down the long road. Mary came out and remonstrated, with a shawl over her head and a duster held to her mouth.

"It be freezin'," she said, "and you'll catch your death of cold. I've stirred up the fire, and I'll get the hot puddin' straight away, if you'll come in ma'am out of the raw air."

Sally Biden suffered herself to be led indoors by the little maid.

"I don't want no puddin' now, Mary," she said sorrowfully. "I haven't the heart to eat it without Miss Meresia. She looked that sad as she said good-bye, with the tears in her pretty eyes. I could have cried outright but for the stern face of 'er furrin gentleman, and him almost knocking a hole in the ceiling with his head! I can't make no good out of it anyway, for he did not mean any kindness coming after Miss Meresia this time of night, when she was sleepy, poor darling, and wanting to be in bed. He might have let her bide in peace along of me until the morning. There seemed no sense in going back as far as I could see. But mark my words, Mary—it ain't all roses for that dear child! The eye of 'im was real terrifying, when she was a kissing of me, and sort of wishing to stay under her breath, and afraid to speak out her own mind. Do you think I couldn't feel her trembling, just as she did in the old days when she dreamt of bogies, and cried out in her sleep? It's made me regular uneasy, I feel as I do before a thunderstorm, weak at the knees, and a bit faint."

Mary listened sympathetically.

"It gave me a fine turn when he came walkin' in at the door, as if the whole place belonged to him—and what with all the talk of burglars about the town—I could have screamed!"

Late into the night the two women talked of Meresia, for she and her husband made an event in their lives, so appallingly monotonous from day to day.

For a time Alfonso sat in silence by his wife—who leant back with closed eyes unwilling to speak. At last he felt a little vibration under the rug, and she broke the trying hush with a low remark.

"Why did you come, and how did you know I was at Isleworth?"

"I came because I wanted you. I told you once before Meresia that I always should know your movements, even if you were the other side of the world, yet you thought you could hide from me within a few miles of London. Now I must question you. Was it because of that article that you tried to avoid me? Did it really annoy you?"

"Yes, I have been haunted by the thought all day."

"Then the sooner you forget these silly fancies the better. It is no business of yours, and your agitation on behalf of the prisoners is a foolish affectation, or the outcome of hysteria. If you had been in your usual health, you would have looked at these matters sensibly."

"But I was in my usual health——"

"No, you can't deceive me, Meresia. You went to Dr. Serano's, and that showed you were not well. There are very few hysterical women who have the sense to consult a medical man when they begin to be a nuisance to themselves and everybody else."

"If I was a nuisance, why couldn't you leave me in peace with Sally Biden? Perhaps that was part of my sense, too—I wished to avoid you."

"An impossibility!" said Aladros.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

CORPULENCY THE THIEF OF TIME.

THAT procrastination is the Thief of Time is a truism so obvious that it has no claim to be regarded as an epigram. To more practical purpose it may be urged that Corpulency is, in very many cases, the parent of procrastination. The putting off till to-morrow what can be done to-day certainly becomes a mental habit, but it is unquestionably very frequently begotten by physical conditions which render exertion irksome. That in the majority of cases procrastination is easily curable is one of the considerations suggested by a perusal of Mr. F. Cecil Russell's "Corpulency, and the Cure," the remarkable popularity of which is evidenced by the recent issue of the 18th edition. The enormous mass of correspondence which this expert has accumulated, and many extracts from which are included in the 256 pages of this little book, forms the most valuable addition which has yet been made to the literature of obesity. It is specially notable that a very large proportion of Mr. Russell's correspondents who have undergone his course of treatment for the reduction of obesity emphasise the renewed vigour which they have experienced after passing through the process—a wonderfully rapid one, according to this method—of banishing their superabundant fat. The universal adoption of Mr. Russell's system by corpulent persons of both sexes would increase, by a stupendous percentage, the working capacity of mankind. The rapidly-growing popularity of the treatment is due, doubtless, to the author having discarded all the obsolete notions about semi-starvation being requisite to insure comely and comfortable slimness. It is certain that the more the marvellous possibilities of Mr. Russell's system become known, the less will be the tolerance for the laziness of people who decline to reduce their overweight by the pleasant and facile means which are described in this little book, which can be had, post free, by forwarding two penny stamps to Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C.—Liverpool Daily Mercury.

REDUCTION OF SUPERFLUOUS FAT.

We have received a copy of "Corpulency, and the Cure," and a very useful and well-written little treatise it is, showing how from 3lb. to 14lb. of fat can be harmlessly removed in a week. We quote rather an amusing extract which was published on the subject by the European Mail. The Editor says: "I noticed the other day that someone had contributed a paragraph containing instructions for persons who wished to reduce their weight. I don't doubt but what, if the advice given was followed, the desired effect would result; but to follow it out properly one would not have much time left during the day. Care was to be taken not to eat this and not to eat that, while to dream of certain drinks was sufficient to increase the weight by about a hundredweight. Now, Mr. F. C. Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C., is my man. His treatment does not consist of any starvation business. Quite the contrary, for the mixture he prescribes is an invigorating tonic, and improves the appetite wonderfully. He treats corpulence as a disease, and so long as his instructions are followed no one need worry about dietary restrictions, but jog along in peace, and continue the usual breakfast of half-a-dozen poached eggs, two or three gammon rashers, and a pound of steak. It is a good job for the success of the 'Pickwick Papers' that the book was written before Mr. Russell came upon the scene, otherwise it is doubtful whether we should have ever heard of those jovial characters, Mr. Pickwick, Mr. Weller, senior, or that truly wonderful being, the Fat Boy. The only case I can speak of personally in connection with this mixture is a friend of mine, who tried it with remarkably good effect. He was enormously fat, and, although he did not believe in Mr. Russell's treatment, when someone told him the mixture made a very pleasant drink in hot weather he tried it for this purpose. This was in June, a few years ago. In September he had to be measured for a new suit of clothes, as those he had were getting very loose, and didn't fit at all. He continued with the mixture, and the tailor had to take fresh measurements at Christmas—well, he didn't quite have to put on a couple of overcoats so as to make a shadow, but the measurements round his waist were just half what they were twelve months before. Like a sensible man, he always recommends Mr. Russell now wherever he can. So do I." His book only costs two penny stamps, but is worth a guinea. Send to Woburn House for it.—Boston Independent.

TO METAMORPHOSE FAT PERSONS.

We were reading in the Penny Illustrated Paper how to reduce obesity, wherein it says in that very excellent publication: "The corpulent will be glad to learn how to lose two stone in about a month, with benefit to health, strength, and muscle, by a comparatively new system. It is a singular fact that the patient, returning quickly to a healthy state, with increased activity of brain, digestive and other organs, naturally requires more food than hitherto; yet, notwithstanding this, he absolutely loses in weight one or two pounds daily, as the weighing machine will prove. The 'recipe' can be had gratis from Mr. F. C. Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C., by sending cost of postage, twopence." We had the curiosity to send to this specialist, and found to our surprise that he had discovered a simple herbal remedy, most pleasant to the taste, which entirely disposed of the necessity of starving oneself if he wished to be rid of all superfluous matter. An interesting point which goes to prove that the almost magical compound is, beyond doubt, harmless, is that in prescribing it in a tentative way to lean persons, or, rather, to those who carry no superfluity of fat beyond that which is required as fuel for Nature's furnace, the medicine is absolutely inoperative, attacking only that unhealthy, disease-creating waste accumulation, which is the burden of the fat creature's existence. In many cases where people take decoctions reputed to be new medical discoveries to cure some specific disease, they may recover by the action of the medicine, or Nature may have effected her own cure. In the case of corpulency, if a simple remedy undertakes to reduce a person, say, seven pounds in a week, all that one has to do is to get weighed, and thus prove it conclusively. So it is with Mr. Russell's compound, but he asks you to prove it in twenty-four hours only.—Rochdale Star.

Digitized by Google

YOU AND I.

THE winner in the picture word competition is Mr. James Matthews, "The Elms," Newbury, Berks.

JACK TAR would like to know how the North American Indians get such funny names.————When a child is born among the Indians, the medicine man in attendance goes to the opening of the wigwam, and looks out. Whatever his eye first rests upon is to be the name of the child.

PAUL.—The Prince of Wales' plume worn on State occasions is worth £10. The feathers are pulled from the tail of the feriwah, one of the rarest and most beautiful birds of India. Great expense and trouble are necessary to capture the bird, which is found only in the wildest jungles.

WHEELER writes: "What is the cause of the humming of the telegraph wires, which can be heard distinctly when passing them by the roadside? Am I right in conjecturing that the noise is caused by the wind?"————No; the wind has nothing to do with the sound. The vibrations are due to the changes of the atmospheric temperature, and especially through the action of cold, as a lowering of temperature induces a shortening of the wires, extending over the whole of the conductor. A considerable amount of friction is produced upon the supporting bell, thus inducing sounds both in the wires and the poles.

MADAME asks: "Is it true that sunshine is injurious to mirrors?"————Most decidedly it is; that is, if the sun shines directly upon the back of a looking-glass. The action of the sun upon the quicksilver has the effect of finally rendering the glass incapable of reflecting an image.

SIBE.—The title of Colonel comes from a word almost the same in several languages, signifying a column. The colonel was so called because he led or commanded a column.

AN OLD FRIEND.—Here are two different ways of making ink which is colourless, but turns yellow on being heated: (1) Saltpetre dissolved in a large quantity of water. (2) Sulphate of copper and sal ammoniac, equal parts dissolved in water.

BIG BEN writes to asks if it is true that projecting brows indicate an unusual amount of brain power? (The reason of his request is that he is himself the possessor of an overhanging brow.)————I am sorry to disappoint BIG BEN, but it is not so. Projecting brows do not contain brain matter at all. They are filled with air, nothing but air, and give a resonance to the voice.

P. L. K.—I am not at all surprised that you letter went astray if you added "Esquire" after the name on the envelope. Foreign post-office people are so ignorant that they frequently take the word "Esquire" for a place, the consequence of which is that scores of letters go astray in the course of a year.

J. O. R.—You're quite wrong. Cats can swim if they only care to exert themselves sufficiently. The ancient Egyptians used to fish with them on the Nile according to the representations on walls and so forth, that have come down to us, and I myself have known a tabby dive into a pond when after a rat.

H. H.—The proportion of blind people in the world is 800 to every 1,000,000.

COLLECTOR.—There are no English coins known bearing the superscription of Richard Cœur de Lion. Those in circulation during his reign were struck in his father's (Henry II.) name.

S. W. asks: "How is it that one's voice has a different sound to other people than to oneself?"————The explanation is that voices are conveyed to the auditory nerve not only through the outside ear, but more directly from the inside, through the Eustachian tube as well as through the muscles and bones of the mouth and head. Thus the singer or speaker not only hears his voice from a different quarter, as we may say, but he hears besides the contraction of his own muscles.

BORONIA.—The custom of a woman assuming her husband's surname is a very ancient one, although it has not always existed. There was "Julia of Pompey," and "Octavia of Cicero." The name being a surname with us is the only difference. In Switzerland the men often adopt their wives' surname after their own.

FERGUS.—No man has the option of "cutting" a lady. If she thought proper to bow to him, and he did not raise his hat, he would forfeit all claim to be a gentleman—at any rate, so far as manners are concerned.

AN "OLD" READER.—The only way to make the hair grey is by bleaching, and it would take years, even of this process, to do it successfully. Occasionally one reads of instances in which a person's hair becomes white in a few hours, owing to a sudden shock. You might get a friend to help you in that way, if you think the game is worth the candle.

H. C. T.—A Prince of Wales is of age from his birth, and a chair is placed for him on the right of the throne in the House of Lords.

N. R.—The first equestrian statue erected in Great Britain was that of Charles I., at Charing Cross, facing Parliament Street.

V. T. P.—Of course, there is no reason why young foals should not be eaten as well as young calves. They are quite a common article of diet in Spain, where they make a good substitute for venison.

TIMID asks: "Is a house lighted by electricity more or less likely to be struck by lightning than one lighted by gas?"————It doesn't make the slightest difference one way or the other.

H. C. E. would like to know where the line is drawn between soft and hard water?————Water is generally reckoned to be soft when it contains less than 1-5000th part of its weight of mineral ingredients, and "hard" when it contains more than 1-4000th.

MENTUS.—It is quite a fallacy to suppose that a liberal consumption of fish strengthens the brain. It is true that fish contains a certain amount of phosphorous, and that is why it is known as "brain food." The constituents of brain matter will be found in any moderately varied diet, and no special food will affect the brain one way or another in any but an infinitesimal degree.

AMICUS.—The Commissionaire Office is at 419 Strand, London, W.C., and applications should be addressed to Major Walter. Only discharged army and navy men with good characters are eligible to become commissionaires. It would be impossible to say exactly what their duties are, for they are many and various, as messengers—some being employed by the railway companies, others at clubs—or even as janitors at museums, in fact, any capacity where strict integrity is required.

DEVOIR.—If you wish to obtain a position as steward on board ship, the best thing for you to do would be to write to the Stewards' Department of one of the big companies, say, for instance, the Cunard Steamship Co., Palmerston Buildings, 93 Bishopsgate Street Within, E.C., or the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co. at 122 Leadenhall Street, E.C. A permanent stewardship is very difficult to get, as the stewards of a vessel are generally people who offer their services in such a capacity in exchange for a free passage and their food.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

DEER RECTORY,
MINTLAW, ABERDEEN,
Nov. 8th, 1897.

From Rev. J. H. BURN.

"My own cure with one dose of KAPUTINE was marvellous after ten weeks' incessant neuralgia.

Thirteen years' suffering effectually and speedily relieved by KAPUTINE is the testimony of Rev. T. TAYLOR, VICAR of ST. BREDWARDS, Cornwall.

There is nothing like this wonderful KAPUTINE. Nothing Similar, Nothing as Good.

Sold by all leading Chemists, Packets of 18 Doses, 1s.

If any Difficulty, send and enclose stamped envelope to "A.M.," KAPUTINE Ltd., Huddersfield, for free samples, or 12 Stamps for a Packet of 18 doses.

KAPUTINE

THE SAFE REMEDY FOR HEADACHE.

EASY COMPETITION FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

As a reward to those who assist in selling KAPUTINE, we will forward to each sender of the first ten letters opened Feb. 1st, 1898, with the missing letters of the Eight following words correctly filled in, descriptive of the qualities of KAPUTINE, £1 each; to the next ten 5s. each; to the next ten 2s. 6d. each.

K*PU*I*E	AEEA*LE	P*RF*CT	U*EQLL*D
T*N*C	I*IM*T*BL*	NO*PO*SONS	EECT*VE

As a guarantee that the competitor has assisted in selling KAPUTINE for Headache, each competitor must enclose four stamped outside wrappers off KAPUTINE packets. These four wrappers may be easily obtained if you persuade your friends or relations to let you buy one packet each for them, and you can then get the wrappers necessary. Show them our advertisement and you will have no difficulty in getting them to buy a packet of this wonderful remedy for Headache and Neuralgia, or you may get several friends to join at one packet. You have three months to win the prize in.

In addition to the above prizes we will give a crisp £10 Bank of England Note to the person sending, on February 1st, 1898, the largest number of outside wrappers bearing part of the medicine stamp. These wrappers you may obtain as suggested above.

Address: "A.M.," Kaputine Ltd., Huddersfield. List of Winners "Yorkshire Post," February 27th, 1898.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

SPECIAL LIST of BOOKS

PUBLISHED FROM THE OFFICE OF SHORT STORIES,

Which have been so successful that they have had to be reprinted, the first large Editions having been sold out.

Second Edition now ready.

MEN WHO HAVE MADE THE EMPIRE.

By GEORGE GRIFFITH. With Sixteen Full-Page Illustrations by Stanley L. Wood. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt top, price 7s. 6d. A Series of Twelve Life-Pictures of the men who have done most to build up the greatest Imperial Fabric that the sun has ever shone upon.

"It is impossible not to be thoroughly interested by his treatment of the empire builders, and impressed with the lofty patriotic spirit which pervades the whole book. It is a volume for everyone to read, but it is essentially one to place within the reach of the youth of the land."—Scotsman.

"The book is decidedly well done. Mr. Griffith has a fresh, forcible style and a real belief in the destiny of our race. Yet, as his excellent account of Nelson shows, he is no Jingo, but has a very gentlemanly respect for the feelings of other nations whom we have at one time worsted in war. He has consulted the best authorities on the various periods of which he treats, yet does not follow any of them slavishly. . . . He has produced a thoroughly readable popular book on a subject of which too many Englishmen know far too little."—Morning Advertiser.

Second Edition now ready.

IN JOYFUL RUSSIA.

By JOHN A. LOGAN, Jun. Crown 8vo, cloth, bevelled boards, gilt top, with 4 Coloured Plates and 46 beautifully executed Full-Page Illustrations from Photographs, 10s. 6d.

"This book is one of the most attractive additions to the literature of travel which recent years have made. . . . Whether they hold with his roseate views or not, all who can interest themselves in Russia will be beholden to him for showing them the reverse of the old shield."—Spectator.

"Russia is so frequently depicted in sombre colours that it is a positive relief to find her here described as a pleasant, hospitable, and jovial country. . . . Some of the most striking pictures are those in which the author tells us of the average peasant."—Sunday Times.

"The book is well and profusely illustrated."—Manchester Courier.

Second Edition now ready, completing 11,000 Copies.

THE SKIPPER'S WOOING.

By W. W. JACOBS. Price 3s. 6d.

"In 'The Skipper's Wooing,' as in 'Many Cargoes,' Mr. W. W. Jacobs proves himself to belong to the tribe of benefactors. The story of how Captain Wilson, master and owner of the schooner Seamew, won the hand of Miss Annis Gething is one which few people, to use an expressive vulgarism, will be able to read 'with a straight face.' . . . Those who have read Mr. Jacob's earlier stories can readily imagine how irresistibly ludicrous are the developments of the plot."—Spectator.

"It contains scenes which we shall not be able to recall without a smile for many weeks to come. . . . It is a good story well told, and full of humour and drollery."—Daily Telegraph.

"Will induce many a hearty laugh. . . . The story is vigorous, as befits its character, but it is devoid of profanity or grossness."—Dundee Advertiser.

Second Edition in the Press.

THE INVISIBLE MAN.

By H. G. WELLS. Crown 8vo, cloth, price 3s. 6d.

"Will greatly enhance the reputation of a very ingenious story teller."—Illustrated London News.

"The story is told with that fertility of imaginative resource which has made Mr. Wells conspicuous in this domain of fiction."—Daily Chronicle.

"This is a wonderful story; grotesque, indeed, as the title-page has it, but deepening as it goes from the farcical to the fearful and tragical. The Invisible Man has been happy in his biographer, if in nothing else."—Scotsman.

"I have not been so fascinated by a new book for many a day."—MR. CLEMENT K. SHORTER in the Bookman.

Fourth Edition, completing 25,000, ready early in the New Year.

DAINTY DISHES FOR SLENDER INCOMES.

Being Vol. 1 of "The Isobel Handbooks," edited by "Isobel," of Home Notes. Cloth, price One Shilling.

Messrs. C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD. will be happy to forward their List of New Season's Novels by Popular Authors, on receipt of Post Card addressed to BOOK DEPARTMENT, Henrietta Street, Strand, W.C.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

THINGS LINKED TOGETHER.

In one of his thoughtful essays on evolution Mr. John Fiske points out that the men of the River Drift and the men of the Caves never took heed of the future. To be able to meet the coarse necessities of to-day was the measure of their ambition. Hence they are known to us only by their geologic record.

The real progress of civilisation is marked by man's growing ability to understand the sequence of events and to provide against calamities. And in no department of our lives is this more important than in the management of our own bodies. Even the medical profession—the essence of conservatism—is slowly learning that the question of health is less and less a question of "curing diseases" and more and more a question of assisting nature to preserve and to renew vital force.

A case which has just been made public will serve to throw light on the point. Among those present at the annual "Feast" at Welford, near Rugby, in September, 1892, was Mr. C. H. Bland, a carpenter, residing at Welford. On the occasion mentioned he took a severe cold. Commonly colds of this sort are gotten rid of in a few days by care, without medication. In this instance, however, matters took the opposite turn, and Mr. Bland was booked for a disagreeable and dangerous experience.

From the very outset his symptoms were of a profound and alarming character. He became cold as death, had great pain in the lower part of the back, and in the left side there was a singular sense of numbness, as though a stroke of paralysis were impending. He also complained of what he called a "dragging" pain, which seemed to begin at the heart and extended to the left hip. His mental prostration was very great; he felt, he said, as if he should die.

Heroic measures were at once resorted to for his relief. Hot applications were employed, but in spite of all that could be done, Mr. Bland remained in great agony the whole of that night—of course without rest or sleep.

The next day he was seized with a violent diarrhœa, and became so weak he could not move. What followed is concisely set forth in his own words. We quote from his letter under date of December 6th, 1893.

He says: "A doctor was sent for, who said I was suffering from English cholera. I had severe griping pains in the bowels, and so violent a headache that I was unable to lie down."

We may say here that although the doctor was mistaken, as events proved, the symptoms then present went far to justify his diagnosis. His error arose from the fact that he had not taken account of the entire case. The truth is that the diarrhœa was, under the circumstances, natural, and, to an extent, helpful.

"In a few days," continues Mr. Bland, "I was taken with palpitation of the heart. All night long I tossed about on the bed, and from time to time shook from head to foot with chills. During the succeeding fortnight I took seven bottles of physic and got no relief. I was now so reduced that I could scarcely crawl. At last my wife persuaded me to try Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup. The first few doses relieved me, and in a week's time I got to work, as strong and hearty as ever, and have not had a day's illness since (Signed) C. H. Bland."

Now let us hark back, and quote the first paragraph of our friend's letter. Here it is: "I was always strong and healthy up to the summer of 1892, when I began to feel heavy, dull, and out out of sorts. My appetite died away, my food did me no good, and I was weak and tired."

That will do. The chain is perfect. The trouble began as indigestion and dyspepsia; the weakness caused by that made the cold a certainty, and the other results followed in regular order. The remedy he ultimately used (Seigel's Syrup) went to the root of the matter, set the food machinery running right, and Mr. Bland was well before he could realise it.

It is, as we said: To know the connections of things is to possess power. That's the way miracles are wrought.

Digitized by Google

½d. "LOVE STORIES." EVERY WEDNESDAY. ½d.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY G. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 472. FOR WEEK ENDING JANUARY 15TH, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

HOUSEKEEPERS!

"FROMMS"

"A COMPLETE FOOD" LANCET

FROMMS EXTRACT OF PURELY VEGETABLE ORIGIN

IMMENSELY IMPROVES THE NUTRITIVE QUALITIES OF SOUPS, SAUCES, SANDWICHES.

HALF THE PRICE OF MEAT EXTRACT.

"The flavour of Soups, Gravies, Jellies, Sauces, Stews, etc., is certainly improved, and the digestibility and nutritive value greatly enhanced by the addition of this appetising and piquant speciality."—Nursing Notes.

SOLD BY CHEMISTS, GROCERS, STORES, Etc.

10/6 THE ALLEN FOSTER HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES 10/6

Acknowledged by Thousands of Delighted Purchasers to be the very Best Half-Guinea Costumes ever offered to the public.

Design No. 545.

Design No. 100.

They stand unrivalled for excellence of style, make and appearance. They are made in the Allen Foster SPECIALITE SERGE. Renowned for its durability and wear. All colours perfectly fast, and do not spot with rain.

COLOURS: Black, Brown, Navy, Myrtle, Ruby, Electric-Blue, Bronze-Green, Fawn, Drab, Cinnamon, Grey, etc.

Design No. 545 is the Fashionable Walking Costume for the Winter Season. It consists of a stylish Reefer Jacket with Skirt. It has a velvet-welted collar, tailor stitching, and fashionably made skirt. A Costume any lady can wear. Price 10/6. Skirt only, 5/6.

Design No. 100 has a bodice shaped to the figure, the lapels are prettily trimmed with braid and large buttons—a marvellous Half-Guinea's worth.

PRICE COMPLETE, 10/6. SKIRT ONLY, 5/6.

Each Costume securely packed and sent carriage paid, 9d. extra. Skirt only, 6d. extra. Regular Stock Sizes are 34, 36, and 38in. round bust under arms. Skirts being 38, 40, and 42in. long. Larger or special sizes to measure, 1/6 extra.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO.'S NEW SKETCH BOOK OF FASHIONS FOR THE WINTER SEASON IS NOW IN CIRCULATION.

This publication contains illustrations of their Mantles, Jackets, and Capes, as well as of their famous Costumes. Ladies are requested to write for same at once. Post free on application.

SKETCHES & PATTERNS POST FREE.

When writing please mention 'Short Stories.'

BANKERS: LONDON & COUNTY, Aldersgate Street, E.C.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO., The London Manufacturers, 17, ROSCOE ST., GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

"Its food value is double that of Bread made from ordinary wheaten flour."—Lancet.

HOVIS BREAD

will not only help to improve your digestion and consequently your health, but will also bring back that energetic and happy feeling of good health. Man does not live a natural life, so a good portion of a natural food, in the shape of HOVIS, at each meal will largely counteract the bad influence that modern life has upon the health and digestive organs. This is not an idle remark, but a proved statement, daily being verified.

HOVIS is baked and sold by all good class Bakers. No loaf genuine unless stamped HOVIS. 6d. and 1/- samples of Bread and Biscuits sent on receipt of stamps by

S. FITTON & SON, Millers, Macclesfield.

Every Economical Housewife

uses

Tower Tea.

Tower Coffee.

Tower Cocoa.

IN PACKETS AND TINS ONLY.

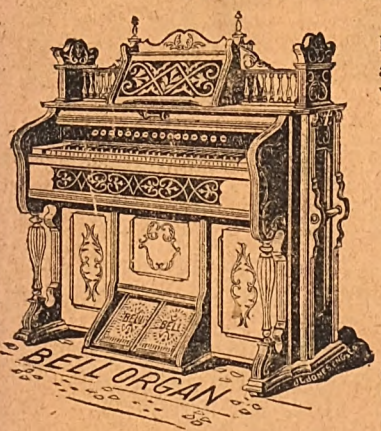
SOLD EVERYWHERE.

WHOLESALE:

TOWER TEA LTD.,

5, JEWRY STREET, LONDON, E.C.

BELL ORGANS & PIANOS.



Unequalled for Purity of Tone and High Class Workmanship.

THE MOST RELIABLE INSTRUMENTS MADE.

Write for Catalogue and Terms, Cash or Easy Payments.

The Bell Organ and Piano Co. Ltd.

49 HOLBORN VIADUCT, LONDON, E.C.

MAKE FRUIT WINES AT HOME.

Ask for MASON'S.

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. THE VERY BEST.

MASON'S GINGER WINE ESSENCE.

A Sixpenny Bottle will, in six minutes, make sixty glasses of Delicious, Non-Alcoholic Wine. Agents Wanted.

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

MASON'S (NOTTINGHAM) COFFEE ESSENCE (THE BEST MADE)

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

MASON'S WINE ESSENCES

are made in all Fruit Flavours, Ginger, Lemon, Orange, Blackberry, etc.

YOU WON'T BE DISAPPOINTED.

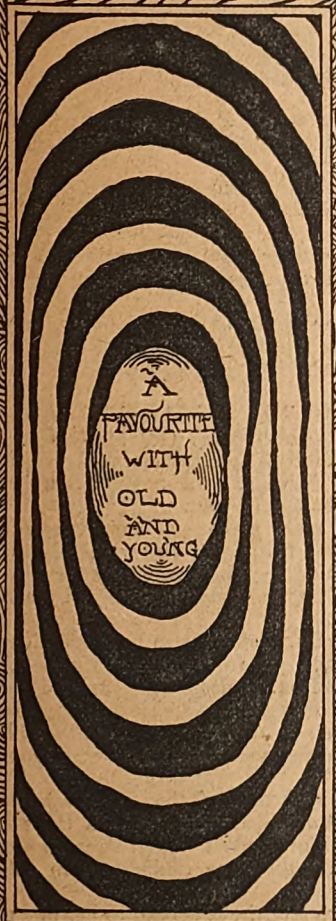
Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON

No. 472.] [One Penny.

For the Week ending January 15th, 1898.



A WAIF OF THE - - PLAINS. - -

You can't change the nature of a human being any more than the leopard can change its spots. Take a savage and make a civilised creature of him; he will probably behave well while amongst civilised people, but should he come into contact with savages again, the old man will show itself; and the reverse holds good. Take a Christian boy (or girl) and bring him up with savages, but, so soon as the strange influence is removed, you will see the old nature asserting itself.

I've seen instances of both. I've knocked about a good deal, and I know it's a fact. Why, I met with an instance of the latter kind whilst I was serving in the United States Army. Ah, yes, I ought to have remembered before I began talking that I should let myself in for an hour's yarn spinning and a dry throat. Well, I'll do you the justice of saying that I believe you when you affirm that my throat shall not be allowed to become parched.

It was the case of a child of Scandinavian descent who had fallen into the hands of the Apachés—goodness knows how—and had been "brought up" by them. Yet she quickly developed as good a specimen of the modern

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

American girl as——. But there, it's a poor way to tell a story by commencing in the middle! So here goes to tell it in proper form.

For days and weeks those of us who had not flown to the safety of the town and the larger camps had watched for the coming of the Apachés, who had been raiding the outlying ranches and the smaller mining camps; and at last they came.

It seemed as though millions of howling, sharpshooting demons had surrounded the camp, and every man who could handle a rifle was needed.

Driven back from the surrounding hills to the confines of the camp proper into our very cabins, where the women and children were—bullet after bullet was sent after an unseen enemy who lay behind the rocks. Then——

There came a bugle call of which we knew not the technical meaning, but we did know that troops from Fort Bayard had come to our rescue, and that we and ours were saved.

Lieutenant Horton was in the thick of the fight, and so busy chopping at the Indians that he never knew what did happen that night, not exactly. He remembered only that when the trouble was all over in this (his first) engagement, he was the possessor of a shattered arm, a broken rib or two, a cut head, and a small, blonde prisoner, whom he had captured at the point of the sword when the troopers found the obscure canyon in which the Indians had concealed their families.

Horton's prisoner came along with surprising willingness. Her complexion was tanned by the sun and winds almost as dark as that of any Apaché, but the same influences had served only to bleach her naturally light hair to an unmistakably tow and molasses colour. She must have retained some recollection of her Scandinavian parents, else she had not come along with Mr. Horton so willingly, for she had a temper, as was presently discovered by several persons. Yet she could not, or would not, speak a word aside from the Apache dialect, and we could learn nothing through the interpreters of her origin or as to the time she had lived among the Indians.

It was embarrassing to all of us to know what we should do with this waif. Those of Apaché parentage we could, and would, return to the reservation. But this one.

The women had talked it over with doubtful shakes of the head, when John Marcus Horton strode modestly into the breach, and offered to send her to his mother in Ohio—an offer gladly accepted.

And, as it was arranged, Olga, as she was called, was sent to his mother in Ohio. A couple of months afterwards he obtained leave of absence, and was away for three weeks. During that time he had been to visit his people, to return with glowing accounts of the manner in which Olga was getting on with her studies and the ways of polite society.

He managed to get away for a day or so at fairly frequent intervals, and after each of these trips it was "Olga this" and "Olga that," until we were tired of hearing of his little "Norwegian Apaché," as one of the boys ungallantly dubbed her one time when Horton was not present. In fact we grew quite tired of it.

But when, after his third visit east, Horton returned to Silver City, bringing with him his mother and the little "Norwegian Apaché," what a change of ideas and a surrender of hearts! Instead of an angular, awkward young person, possessed of points that might make her, when developed, a beauty of the "lily" type, behold a petite young woman, with a wealth of pale golden hair, beautiful eyes and teeth, complexion of roses and cream, and a decidedly vigorous constitution which called for lots of horseback riding and other outdoor exercises. All of us, even the ladies, were charmed with her.

Then they began to think that it would be well if Olga captivated one of the young men and left the wealthy Horton for one of the girls, and upon this basis campaign went on, much to the evident amusement of Olga, who, with womanly intuition and a knowledge of the ways of women far beyond her years, put two and two together and told Horton it was all very funny. "Fancy those army frumps, Jack, being jealous of me—poor me! Jack" (this with mock solemnity), "are you in love with me?"

"Olga, I wish you would not talk in that frivolous manner. It isn't like you, and you should have enough consideration for me to believe those people sincere in their attentions."

And Horton turned away with a pained look; but Olga's arms were round his neck, and her face was close to his. With wet eyes she whispered:

"Jack, dear, have I hurt you?"

Never before had John Horton been so tempted. Should he now tell her what for two years had been in his heart of hearts, unknown to anyone?

It was but a momentary struggle, then Horton was himself again.

"Yes, you have, dear. Please don't speak of my friends again in that way," he said, disengaging her arms.

Olga's mouth drooped, and there was a piteous look in her eyes as she replied:

"I won't, John."

Then, with a sudden kiss, she walked away as though she intended to go to her room for a big, feminine cry.

Horton stood for some seconds, her parting kiss burning upon his cheek, her pathetic face, as he had seen it when she left him still before his mind's eye.

"I'm an old brute!" he told himself. "A man of my age" (he was twenty-eight) "talking to a buoyant, irrepressible child in that manner merely because I am supposed to be her guardian! Jack, you old scoundrel, you ought to be ashamed of yourself!"

If there were a male person in south-western New Mexico who did not fall down and worship that little "Norwegian Apaché," he failed, probably through fear, to disclose himself, but the case of Danby of the Ninth was the most serious.

He all but neglected his duties to be at her side when she and Mrs. Horton were stopping at the post, and, even in his infatuation, almost compromised her by falling in with one of her mad fancies one day when he had obtained leave of absence, and riding with her unchaperoned to Lordsburd and back, returning at dead of night.

For this, Horton took both of them seriously to task as soon as he learnt of the affair, as he did the evening following through his shocked and distressed mother, who rode into town in an army ambulance in order to tell him.

But a week or two later he proposed to her at a picnic given by the ladies of the garrison in honour of Olga's departure from the fort. She refused him, she was kind enough to him, and all that, but Danby took it rather hard, and swore he'd resign his commission, retire to the mountains, and adopt hermitage as a profession. Instead, however, he exchanged to a northern post, fell in love again and married his colonel's wife's sister, who was plain, but who had money enough to disguise the fact somewhat.

Digitized by Google

Fielding comes next. He was a leading light of the local bar at one of the larger Arizona towns, and attended to a good deal of business for Horton, who was interested in copper over there. He came to Silver City to consult with his client, met the "papoose," and a heart theretofore considered impregnable capitulated at first glance, and Fielding was lost. He neglected his other suits to attend to this one to such a degree that it hurt his practice, and in the end he met the same fate at the charmer's hands as had poor Danby—with a difference. Miss Olga told him that if he remained of the same mind until the following year he might propose again, and she "might" then consider the matter. Meanwhile if Mrs. Horton did not object he might write to her at school, but she would not answer his letters.

Poor Fielding was utterly cast down, not even the permission to write affording him any hope, and all that kept him from suicide was an earnest request from Horton neither to make an ass of himself nor to die on the premises, after which that severe guardian lectured his ward quite harshly for her flighty ways, especially when her arts were practised upon his own personal friends.

"But I don't mean to, Jack, really I don't. What makes them act so? I can't help it!" sobbed the culprit.

"Yes, you can," said her mentor severely, adding mentally, "but they can't!"

He looked out of the window a moment, then turned to her.

"Papoose," he said in a strained voice. "I think it best you and mother should curtail your visit and go back to Ohio as soon as you can pack up. I'll speak to mother about it to-night, and, well, I'll see you at Christmas, anyway."

There was a quiet sob from the sofa, which gave Horton suicidal feelings, and in another moment he would have gone to comfort the weeper, but just then he heard his mother's step on the walk, and when she entered Olga had fled to the privacy of her room.

* * * * *

It was rather more than a year later that Horton wrote his ward a letter somewhat to the following effect:

"There has been enough of this sort of thing. I suppose you do your flirting now with the hitherto sedate and dignified professors for want of better material. Now, Olga, this must stop. Here is Jim Fielding, one of the best, brightest, most intelligent fellows in the world, going to the dogs on your account. I want you to be serious and think things over, and when you come down here this time do give Jim a chance."

Olga came at the regulation time, with Mrs. Horton, and it was very shortly after her arrival—not more than two days—that Fielding again declared himself.

But it was a different Olga to whom he spoke this time. It was a girl with the same old ways, the same odd fancies, but yet a girl who could understand and appreciate his feelings and pity him with her whole heart, without making her pity obnoxious. She had known, she said, that this was coming, and had dreaded, yet hoped for this talk, but she did not tell him of her stormy interview with John Horton that afternoon when that ogre had told her she must accord Fielding a hearing, or—or—there would be indefinite trouble.

"Will you shake hands with me, Mr. Fielding?" the girl asked tremulously, when she had finished telling him how she had long thought it over, and found she could not love him. "I suppose it's useless to say I'm sorry, although I hope you know I am. So——"

"I know you are, Miss Horton. I believe in your sympathy and your kindness of heart as thoroughly as I believe in human existence. And I believe in myself enough," he went on more firmly "to think that I might be the successful one, were it not for another—some one. Good-night. God bless you both!"

They shook hands as two ordinary acquaintances might have done, and Olga disappeared through the hall and up the stairs.

That very day, Horton had made himself practically certain that the future of his giddy ward was assured; that, true to his behests and the promptings of a conscience, he had done everything to make worldly Olga engage herself to Jim Fielding. Then, after all his guests had gone to bed and he was left alone in his library, this great, big ex-soldier, thinking it was all over, and that he was forsaken, leant his head on the table and cried like a baby.

He was a baby, too, for presently someone entered the room quietly, and, kneeling beside him, said:

"Tell me, Jacky—tell your mother."

Some women are jealous of their son's loves. Jack's mother was not one of these, no matter what her other faults might be.

"You can't direct a woman's affections, darling, any more than you can direct the tides or the winds. And—it seems to me—you have done a great deal for Mr. Fielding in this case."

* * * * *

There must have been at least twenty guests at Horton's house to celebrate the home coming, and these had progressed through nearly every course, when one of the girls, who sat opposite Olga, remarked suddenly:

"Why, Olga Horton, where's your pretty solitaire? The last time I saw it——"

Olga flushed, then paled, as she rose, trembling, and showed the solitaire (a gift from Mrs. Horton from among the family heirlooms) on the third finger of her left hand.

"It's just changed hands, that's all," she said, trying to speak brightly, "because Jack and I are to be married next summer." Then she smiled on them all and was gone, and presently Jack, utterly bewildered, but entirely happy, found her in the garden crying.

"Sweetheart."

"Go away! I hate you! I——"

"Another lie," commented Jack judicially, but exultantly. "However, you're forgotten, for the sake of the cause in which it was told. But here, Sapphira, how are we to explain things?"

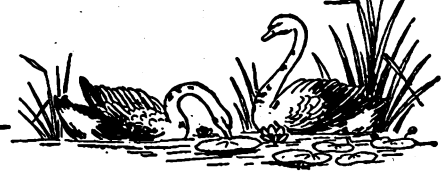
"Why, just go and tell them that you're an old, slow poke, and a duffer, and that I'm a silly school girl, but that what I say 'goes'—and Jack, it's just seven years ago this time that you found me, and it's leap year, too, and, Jack, you're not cross, are you?"

"Of course I am," he replied between kisses. But he did not say it with any measure of solemnity. And that proved what I said at the beginning.

RICHARD LEMON.

Digitized by Google

The Same Old Cure.



Alida Erving sat at the window. It was a beautiful morning, and the view across the river to the towering hills beyond was an inspiring one; but Alida's eyes showed no expression of pleasure as they wandered to and fro over the lovely landscape. The girl had been ill for three weeks, and was now awaiting the doctor's visit.

Mrs. Erving was moving about the room busy with her morning's occupations. From time to time she cast a furtive, anxious look at her daughter.

"I think you are better this morning, Alida," she said for the third time. "Your colour is better, and you look more like yourself."

"Yes; I am stronger, mother. I shall soon be well," the girl replied listlessly.

"Dr. Grantley will soon be here now; he said he would come at nine o'clock this morning," continued Mrs. Erving, glancing at the clock.

Secretly, she was very much enraged at the family physician. She did not think he was doing her daughter a particle of good, and, indeed, this seemed to be the case, for Alida was certainly not improving.

There is one other person against whom Mrs. Erving cherished a feeling of strong indignation, and that was Archibald Hopkins. He was Dr. Grantley's young medical assistant, and one of Alida's most devoted friends. The young man had called twice since the singular malady which so baffled Mrs. Erving, and, she believed, the doctor also, had taken possession of Alida, and then had come no farther than the door. He had simply inquired after Alida's health and had declined Mrs. Erving's invitation to come in. She mentioned her surprise to her daughter, but only once.

"Why should Archie Hopkins come here," Alida had replied with heightened colour, "when I would most certainly decline to see him? I do not wish to see anyone until I am well."

Dr. Grantley now came in. He was a stout, florid man, with silver hair and moustache, and blue eyes which were generally very merry, but which could also look very stern.

"How is our patient this morning?" he cried cheerily. "Ah, greatly improved, I can see at a glance. There will be no more need for me to come here after this week, I fancy."

"I think you might as well have stayed away altogether," said Mrs. Erving to herself.

"Well, now that you are so much stronger, come, take a turn in the garden with me," continued the Doctor in the same cheerful voice. Alida faintly protested her lack of strength. "Nonsense," persisted the Doctor, "I am your physician, and I tell you you are quite strong enough. We shall not go far."

Slowly they walked, the fair young girl leaning on the Doctor's arm, until they reached a rustic bench under an elm tree some fifty paces distant from the verandah.

"Well," he said at length, "you are no better, are you?"

The girl looked up quickly. She thought she saw a challenge in the Doctor's eye.

"Not a bit," she answered, looking him full in the face.

"I don't know what you mean by keeping ill like this," said the Doctor, in a complaining tone. "I have visited you assiduously, have been most careful in watching the various phases of your case, and in compounding prescriptions——"

The girl's eyes were cast down, but the Doctor detected a faint smile hovering about the corners of her mouth.

"You did not take my medicine," he said.

"No—that is—yes; one powder. It was bitter, and I threw the others out of the window."

The Doctor took out his memorandum book, and, turning his back upon Alida, wrote busily for fifteen minutes.

Left to herself the girl leant her head back against the tree and closed her eyes. The Doctor did not stir. Had he brought her to this place by design? There must be memories associated with a rustic bench beneath a tree if two lovers have been in its vicinity. And, indeed, Alida was dreaming.

It was a lovely summer night. Some one was strumming a guitar and singing softly on the verandah, and Alida and Archie Hopkins sat hand in hand beneath this very tree. The music swelled louder, and Archie drew Alida gently towards him. As the song died away her head rested gently upon his shoulder and his lips touched hers. It was the night of their betrothal. Then came that wicked, senseless quarrel—Alida shivered, opened her eyes and sat upright. The Doctor had just time to turn his head away again.

"I think I will go in now," said the girl. "I am tired."

"Wait a moment, Alida," said the Doctor. "I am not angry with you for throwing my medicines away. They were only harmless tonics, but you are right, for, frankly, I did not know what ailed you. I have made an entirely different diagnosis now, and to-morrow will bring a prescription which I am confident will cure you. Promise me that you will try to get well for my sake, Alida, for if you do not get better soon your mother will shut the door upon me."

"Very well, I promise; and I will take what you bring to-morrow," said Alida, smiling, as she gave the Doctor her hand.

Digitized by Google

When Dr. Grantley drove home he found Archie Hopkins apparently deep in a medical volume, but he detected in Archie's eyes the same faraway look he had observed in Alida's.

The Doctor laid his medicine case on the table, sat down and said:

"Hopkins."

The Doctor evidently had something serious to say. Archie closed his book and drew his chair up to the table. He was a tall, long-limbed young fellow, with waving brown hair and a frank, handsome face.

The Doctor seemed to have forgotten that he had spoken. He had lighted a cigar and was puffing away at it, while he stared straight in front of him.

At length he said: "Hopkins, twenty years ago your father came to this town a poor young man. He needed friends, and he found one in me."

"He often spoken to me of your kindness, sir," said Archie, with a slight tremor in his voice.

"So he did to me, and he told me that if ever I wanted his aid in any matter, he would be happy at the opportunity to serve me. I never had to call upon him, but to-day I have to call upon his son."

"There is nothing I would not do for you, Doctor; but I need not tell you that, I know."

Again there was an interval of silence, while the Doctor puffed furiously at his cigar.

"It is simply this, Hopkins. I have a case which baffles me completely. It is a humiliating confession to make; but it is true. The family of the lady, old patients of mine, have found that I don't know anything about the case, and are losing confidence in me. I am greatly distressed about it," and the Doctor looked very miserable indeed.

"What is it you want me to do, Doctor?"

"Only this. You are an alert young man, and of a sympathetic nature. I only want you to look with fresher eyes at the case, which I think is one to be reached rather by intuition than by any great degree of medical skill. I want you to promise me that you will go with me to-morrow and see this patient, that is all."

"But, Doctor, you forget I have had almost no experience; and if, with all your knowledge——"

"Fiddlesticks! The longer I live, the less I find I know," said the Doctor angrily. "Sometimes I think all we old fellows ought to retire and give the younger generation a chance. It at least has confidence in its ignorance, and that is everything. Come, you promise?"

"Yes, sir; I promise."

The next morning Archie sat beside the Doctor when the latter started in his dog-cart on his daily round of visits.

It was almost noon when the Doctor turned his horse into the Egyptian Road. He had then just begun an exhaustive comparison between the old and new schools of medicine, which was not finished when he pulled up at the Erving gate.

"Tie the horse," he said to Archie, who evidently intended to remain in the dog-cart, as he did at the other places. "This is where our patient lives."

"But, Doctor," cried Archie, "why didn't you tell me it was here? I really cannot go into Mrs. Erving's house."

"Indeed, and why not?"

"Well, you see, Miss Erving and I—we are not exactly ——"

"What have I to do with such childish nonsense?" cried the Doctor, in his sternest tones. "This is a serious matter, sir."

"But, Doctor, one moment ——"

"You have promised, sir; do you want to go back on your word?" thundered the Doctor. "Come along."

Dr. Grantley strode up the walk and Archie had no resource but to follow him.

Mrs. Erving was in the porch. The Doctor gave her a look, and she expressed no surprise at seeing Archie. She said "good-morning" pleasantly, shook hands, and in reply to the Doctor's question said that Alida was in the front room.

"Is she alone?" asked the Doctor, in a low voice.

"Yes, alone."

When the two men stood in the hall at the door of the room where Archie's sweetheart was awaiting the coming of her physician, all unconscious of who it was that stood with palpitating heart upon the threshold, the Doctor said:

"Courage, now, and do your best. If you cannot cure her I shall abandon the case. Hand her this when you go in; it will help to break the ice."

"But you are coming in with me, aren't you, Doctor?"

For answer the Doctor knocked on the door. "Come in," said a sweet, faint voice. The Doctor turned the knob, gave Archie a gentle push, and closed the door behind the young man.

* * * * *

It was not until two years afterwards that Dr. Grantley told the whole story, and by that time Mr. and Mrs. Hopkins enjoyed it as much as anyone.

The Doctor would tell with great glee how the young physician did not come out of the sick-room until two hours after he, the Doctor, had driven away, and how he would have had to walk back to town had not Mrs. Erving kept him until after tea and then sent him home herself. And how the improvement in Alida was wonderful from that day on to the following Sunday, by which time she had entirely recovered.

There was one thing, though, which the Doctor never told of his own account. He always waited for the question which was sure to come when he had apparently finished his story.

"What was on that paper which you put into Archie's hand and told him to give to Alida?"

"The paper? Oh, yes," the Doctor would reply, "I kept a copy of it—here it is," and he would fumble in his waistcoat pocket. It read: "This is my prescription. It is pleasant to take, and its efficacy is warranted. Please do not throw it out of the window."

PETER WILSON.

THE following coloured pictures will be found in the January number of the IMPERIAL NAVAL AND MILITARY ALBUM:

NAVAL.	MILITARY.
H.M.S. Northampton.	Cavalry on March.
Boys at Exercise.	Picket 1st Dragoon Guards.
Cutlass Drill.	Filling a War Balloon.
Drill at 12-pounder Hotchkiss.	Reconnoitring from a War Balloon.
Band of Northampton.	Physical Drill With Arms.
Gymnastics.	Dinner in Barrack-room.
Prepare for Cavalry.	Signalling by Heliograph.
H.M.S. Orontes.	A Field Kitchen.

Each Part is ready on the 15th of the month and costs One Shilling.

Digitized by Google

TOM'S WIDOW.

"YE-ES," said Mrs. Craig, as we sat sewing in her cosy sewing-room, "most folks notice that tidy."

The tidy in question was a nightmare vision, a combination of gaudy colours never to be found except in those horrors devised by the economical to use up "odds and ends." It was made of canvas, and bits of zephyr wool left from more ambitious pieces of work were sewn in here and there, without regard to colour, in a manner that was enough to set anybody's teeth on edge.

"Do—do you admire it?" I asked, fearful of giving offence by plain speaking.

The old lady took off her spectacles, wiped them, put them on again, leant her head on one side, and said slowly and gently in a voice mild as new milk:

"My dear, I think it is the most unutterably hideous object I ever beheld in the whole seventy years of my life. Nobody could have made that tidy but Tom's widow."

"Oh," I said, not knowing exactly how to answer, for Mrs. Craig was almost a stranger to me. My husband, a commercial traveller, had gone abroad for two months, and Mrs. Craig, an influential member of the Bilstowe congregation, had invited me to stay with her while he was away. I was very soon made to feel at home in the dear old lady's motherly care, but it is easily understood that I could know nothing of herself or her neighbours and family, except what she chose to tell me.

"You do not know who Tom's widow was, my dear," she said presently, as I stitched in respectful silence; "how should you? Tom was my son—one of my sons, I should say, for I had nine, and four daughters, though you find me alone. Some are dead, some married, but all who are living have their own homes and families. Tom went to Dublin, and started in business; he married there, and when he died it was natural for me to suppose that his widow would remain in her own home, among her own people. Tom was not thirty when he died, and I knew she was much younger. But one day, when I was grieving, as mothers will, my dear, for my son, there walked in a little mite of a figure that I should have taken for a child but for the widow's weeds. She came straight to me, lifted her veil, and, looking out of a pair of baby blue eyes straight into my face, said:

"'I am Daisy, dear mother, Tom's widow. I am all alone in the world; but Tom said he was sure if I came to you, you would be good to me.'

"I took her straight into my heart, the little, winsome darling, and loved her as my own. So, my dear, if I tell you of my trials with her, do not think it is from want of love."

I was sure it was not, for the dear old lady's voice was full of tenderness.

"It was lonely for her for one thing," said Mrs. Craig, "for her mourning, and it was a deep heart-sorrow, kept her secluded; and as there was no need for her to employ herself usefully, she began to plan delightful surprises for me. She was possessed by a very demon of fancy work. While she exercised it upon sofa cushions and footstools with distorted dogs and dislocated cats embroidered in Berlin wool upon them, I endured with patience, although my old-fashioned ideas were certainly amazed at the sums that Daisy spent on materials. Tom had left her well provided for, and as she had no expenses here, her pocket money was a very handsome income.

"As I said, I did not object to the poor little lonely child taking all the pleasure she could find in embroidering hideous designs on canvas and putting the results in the most conspicuous places in the house, but this mild form of her mania soon gave place to the desire to excel in every species of work that came up to waste the money and time of idle women. This old house, which has been in my husband's family for generations, is full of treasures endeared to us by age and association. The first piece of vandalism that I was expected to admire and secretly groaned over was the transformation of a pair of Venetian glass vases that my son Henry brought from the Continent for me. They stood in the spare room, and never was a servant allowed to touch them, the exquisite, fragile beauties.

"Imagine my horror when Daisy exultingly led me to the room and displayed her handiwork. My lovely vases! Outside each one was pasted a coloured landscape cut from a Christmas number of some journal, over which a garland of leaves was varied by bunches of grapes, currants, cherries, flowers, birds, and butterflies. Then the inside was plastered with blue paint. What was on my tongue was never spoken, for the blue eyes danced with delight at my supposed pleasure, and how could I be cross with Tom's widow?"

"Could you never get it off?" I asked pitifully.

"Never. My vases were ruined. The next really dreadful deed, varied by atrocities of minor importance, was Daisy's discovery of my great-grandmother's wedding dress, a white brocaded satin that we cherished far more than any old gold, but which Daisy ruthlessly cut into pin-cushions, embroidering each one and producing them triumphantly for a Christmas surprise. The girls were here—my girls—and my sons and their wives, and there arose such a howl as sent the wee blue-eyed mite to my arms in sheer terror.

"It was at that party that Willie Norman, whose brother is my Kate's husband, first saw Daisy. Long after the others had forgotten the pin-cushions I saw Willie in a corner with Daisy, evidently consoling her. Two babies together, my dear, though Willie is the dearest fellow! He came over very often after that (they live at Fenwood, ten miles from here), and was kind enough to discover in Daisy all sorts of latent talent for decorating everything within reach. What I suffered from their decorative mania never can be described."

"I can imagine it. I had five sisters, and we were all smitten," I said. "What started as a beauty to cover unsightly spots soon became a frenzy! My mother came to the rescue at last and scrubbed away every inch."

"Willie brought her all the designs to be found, and carried the china she decorated (?) to be baked! Oh, my dear! The tea set made in Canton for Mr. Craig's grandmother's wedding present, with gilt monograms and quaint handles to the cups, all different, was decorated, carried off by Willie, the horrible pictures all baked in, and then presented to me for a birthday gift. I could not tell you half, no, not the twentieth part of the dreadful destruction. You can see, dear, that the house is finished inside with oak which not a brush had even touched, but years of rubbing, waxing, and polishing have made like glass. We pride ourselves, I assure you, upon our oak finish."

Digitized by Google

"And well you may," I said. "I have admired it more than I can tell you."

"Then you can imagine my consternation when I came home, after a fortnight's visit to my daughter Marian, to find Daisy was painting the doors of the dining-room in panels. Willie had put on the first coat all over the two doors—white paint, my dear! The panels were in red, blue, green, yellow—each a different colour—and upon each a different design. Such spiky grass! Such stiff leaves, that looked as if they were cut out of tin! Such wooden birds, that looked as if their wings were held apart with a skewer! Such staring roses, flaring with red paint——"

"Such an altogether!" I quoted, as the dear old lady paused.

"Yes, my dear. I looked first at a lily of the valley that resembled snowballs on a green shutter, and then at the culprits. Willie must have read my dismay in my face, for he looked ashamed, but Daisy's lips were parted in what I presume was artistic ecstasy, her pretty cheeks were flushed with pride, her blue eyes radiant with anticipation of praise. She was Tom's widow, the little wife he had trusted to his mother's love. I kissed her tenderly, and only said:

"'You must not tire yourself so much, dear.'

"'Oh, no!' she cried with enthusiasm. 'I am going to do all the doors in the house. Isn't it beautiful?'

"I groaned in spirit, but consoled myself by hoping that some new fancy would spare my grand old oaken doors. And my hopes were verified. Daisy tired of panel painting when the dining-room was finished, and last spring I had the doors planed down. They are a little thinner, but will polish up to the old tone in time.

She came down to tea looking frightened at her own temerity.

"But after that day Willie was more cautious about her undertakings, though more devoted to her. She had been with me then nearly three years, and she had recovered from her first grief. She was very young—not twenty when Tom died—and looking like a little girl. So when she shyly ventured upon a white dress and some blue ribbons, and came down to tea looking frightened at her own temerity, I said lovingly:

"'What a pretty dress, and how pretty my Daisy looks in it!'

"'You don't think it is forgetting Tom, do you?' she asked with quivering lips.

"'I am quite sure you will never forget Tom,' I said kindly, for she was trembling all over, 'but I am sure that Tom loved you too well to wish your young life spent in mourning—even for him. It is natural for you to be joyous, dear, and nothing gives me so much pleasure as to hear you sing or smile.'

"'Ah, Tom was right when he said you would be good to me!' she said gratefully. She was a grateful little thing always.

"She had been wearing her blue ribbons for some months, when the scrap-picture and card-collecting mania set in. I bore my portion of the martyrdom as valiantly as I could. I saw a precious little Chinese jar, that was an heirloom, plastered over with butterflies and grotesque heads, and varnished, and did not faint. I endured patiently when a costly Japanese vase, a present from a dear old friend, shared the same fate; but at last the traditional straw was laid upon the camel's back."

I looked at the dear old face, lighted by a half comical twinkle of the eyes, and wondered where such angelic patience could have given way.

"One of my boys," said the old lady, "my Paul, was a surgeon in the Navy, and from every voyage he brought me treasures that became sacred when he sailed away and never returned. Amongst these doubly precious possessions was a sandal-wood table—a masterpiece of carving—with a top polished like marble. The heavy centre leg branched off into feet of carved leaves, supporting the centre, which was carved into an exquisite garland of flowers twisted round a tree trunk. But the beauty of the wood itself was the only ornament of the flat top. The table stood in a room off the parlour that was seldom used, unless we had company, and I never imagined it in any danger until, coming in rather unexpectedly from a walk, I saw Willie's head and Daisy's bent over it. I hurried into the room. Oh, my dear! The whole beautiful top was covered with hideous advertising cards, nailed on with brass-headed tacks.

"'Oh, mother,' Daisy cried, 'don't come in! It is not finished!'

"'How dare you touch that?' I cried, and then wept like a baby. 'Paul's table!' I sobbed. 'You have ruined it!'

"It was the first time I had ever spoken harshly to her, and she was like a child.

"'Oh, Willie,' she said, 'she is angry, and I thought she would be so pleased!'

"Willie was equal to the emergency. He took her into his arms, and cried in great indignation:

"'It is a shame! Don't cry, Daisy! Oh, Daisy, be my wife, and you may nail scrap-pictures on every table in my house!'

"Did you ever hear of such a proposal? Two babies, my dear. But they have been very happy, and there is not any æsthetic horror wanting in their home. Storks on one leg, reeds, sunflowers, lilies, dadoes and freizes. But there is a third baby now, nearly a year old. I expect to hear of that infant in classic costume, with a lyre in her hands, some day; but I can bear it. My responsibilities came to an end when Daisy ceased to be Tom's widow."

BASIL MANNERS.

Digitized by Google

A BATCH OF CONFESSIONS.

"Well, sir, I understand that you have lost four hundred pounds in hard cash and bank notes; but you will excuse me if I venture to say that you have not put the facts before me quite clearly. Your natural annoyance at the loss of the money has so upset you that you are——"

"Annoyance!" interrupted the head of the firm. "Why it's four months' profit! I'm more than annoyed. What's the good of making a long rigmarole about it? You are a detective and are put on this case. There is only one person who could have done it; do your duty and arrest him!"

Detective-Sergeant Dodds coughed drily.

"We do not go altogether by what is probable," he observed, "It sometimes happens that the most likely man to have committed a crime is just the one who did not do it."

"Well, the facts are these," replied Mr. Robert Jennings, trading as "Jennings and Co.," as it was usually recorded on legal documents. "Yesterday afternoon I received a wire to the effect that a certain transaction—an ordinary one in my business, although not occuring very often—was completed, and I must be prepared to pay cash by ten o'clock this morning. It was just too late to get a cheque cashed. I had only a few pounds here, so after some trouble I managed to get a business friend or two to make up the amount by honouring my cheques. It was placed in my safe, and only two of us knew that the money was in the office—myself and my chief clerk, Henry Garrard, who has the duplicate key of the safe.

"Although I had perfect confidence in Garrard, I had a feeling of impending trouble when I got up this morning, and I left home for the office earlier than usual, arriving here at nine o'clock exactly. Garrard gets here a little after nine, but this morning he was already in the office when I arrived, and I saw at once that something was wrong. I soon learnt that the money had been stolen."

"Were there signs of disturbance?" asked the detective, as the other paused.

"None at all, for the simple reason that the safe had been opened with a key. It's as clear as daylight against him, and I can't see why you want all these details."

"Did you find anything incriminating about the office?"

"After he had absconded—but I suppose you want it all in proper order. I soon taxed him with the robbery, but he denied it. He was terribly upset and looked as guilty as a man could look. I was beside myself with anxiety, and while I was tearing my hair in my little private office and looking blankly at the safe as though it was some horrible dream, he was off. After he was gone, this packet of unpaid bills was found on the floor of the outer room, close to the recess where he hung his coat and hat."

The detective took the packet and glanced at the bills; then he put them into his pocket.

"I know that a man has been sent to his house to arrest Garrard, but he had, of course, not returned. I should like to have a look round the offices," said Dodds in a matter-of-fact way.

He made an apparently superficial examination of the place, but his keen eyes took in everything, even to the appearance of the two clerks and the office boy. He stooped down when near the safe, and picked up a shred of dress-material.

"You employ a woman to clean the offices?" he inquired.

"They are swept and dusted by the boy," replied Mr. Jennings. "A woman comes once a week, but she wasn't here last night."

"And you don't employ a lady clerk?"

"No. What have you found?"

"It looks like a piece of a woman's dress," was the reply of the detective as he placed the shred carefully in his pocket-book. "There seems to be more in this than you suppose, Mr. Jennings. You see, the most probable solution of a problem is not always a correct one."

"On the contrary, this discovery, and the finding of the bills, tend to prove Garrard's guilt, detective," rejoined Mr. Jennings, somewhat testily. "I believe him to be most respectable, but I hear this morning that he has a very extravagant wife. The bills confirm that—they are all from establishments for ladies' things, and the totals are certainly high for a man in his position. That shred, however, suggests some other form of expense."

"But did he stay here after the others had gone?"

Digitized by Google

"Oh, yes, he often stayed late to keep the work up."

"For which he received extra pay, naturally, and so increased his income?" remarked Dodds. He knew that it was not so—Jennings & Co. had a reputation for being anything but liberal, but he said that to have a sly dig at the principal. The latter pretended not to hear it.

"Well, sir, I think I have all the information you can give me and I will work it up. By the way, though, did you have a call for the money this morning?"

"Yes," said Jennings, "and paid it. Had to keep the man till the Bank was opened."

"Ah!" ejaculated Dodds. "Well, I'll get to the bottom of this for you, Mr. Jennings."

"Get me my money back, and I'll give you ten pounds," cried the gentleman.

"You are very liberal, sir," was the quiet answer. "But I am paid by the authorities for doing my work, thank you!"

And he went off.

An hour later, Dodds was in the best room of the apartments occupied by the Garrards. In front of him stood Mrs. Garrard, her pretty face flushed and anxious, and presenting a strange contrast to the quiet, composed features of Detective-Sergeant Dodds. She had her hand upon the handle of the door as though to prevent him from passing into another room.

"It is quite useless for you to attempt to interfere with the course of the law, Mrs. Garrard," said Dodds, in a not unkindly tone. "Besides, I think you will find it in your husband's interest to further my inquiries."

"You have come to arrest him," she answered, her voice trembling with agitation. "You cannot call that 'in his interest.'"

"You say he is ill in bed; still, I must see him. And, as you must know, you can do nothing. However," added the detective as a thought struck him, "perhaps you can answer a few of the questions and so throw light on the mystery and spare Mr. Garrard some trouble. Sit down."

The wife reluctantly released her hold on the door-handle, and sat down on a chair opposite the officer.

"You know from what I have already told you," began Dodds, "that appearances are dead against your husband. There is reason to believe that he has been very extravagant of late, and it is a fact that he has been pressed for money. I have evidence here" (he drew out the packet of bills) "which confirms it."

"Let me see the bills," she cried, holding out her hand for them. "But these bills give no particulars of what they are for," she added, after a glance at them.

"No," replied Dodds. "They are what are called 'statements'; that is, they are reminders that goods have not been paid for. But you see that they are from establishments for ladies' things."

Mrs. Garrard's face, which had lost some of its colour during the conversation, now became red again. Her hand trembled as she gave them back to the detective, but she said nothing.

"There is—hem!—another piece of evidence, which—Can you throw any light on this fact? I found a shred of the material of a lady's dress near the safe in the office." And he held it up before her eyes.

"Yes," she rejoined in a decided manner. "It is mine."

The detective prided himself on being able to hide his feelings under any conditions, but he nearly betrayed his surprise in this instance. He had not expected this development.

"I was in the office last night," continued Mrs. Garrard. "I have been there occasionally when my husband has had to stop late—which is very often. I helped him to put the books away last night."

Dodds looked straight in her eyes as though he would read her soul. Her eyes dropped.

"You are aware that you have the reputation of being an expensive wife for a man in Mr. Garrard's position," he said, his eyes still fixed upon her. "Did you know that the money was in the safe?"

"No, she didn't!" said a voice at the door.

Henry Garrard pushed it open and walked in.

"You may spare yourself any further trouble, officer," he said as he stretched out his hands. "I have heard most of what you have said. I confess to having taken the money in order to pay those bills and meet other expenses. The temptation was too great for me. Put on the handcuffs and take me away."

She had her hand upon the handle of the door.

Both his wife and the officer had risen at his entrance; the former uttered an agonised cry, "Oh, Harry!" while the latter shrugged his shoulders and mechanically drew forth the manacles.

Garrard, standing in the centre of the room, presented the appearance of a man just able to leave his bed after a severe illness. It seemed incredible that a man could alter so in the space of a few hours. He had great difficulty in keeping on his feet, his eyes were sunken in their sockets and bloodshot, his face was without a vestige of colour. Dodds put the handcuffs back again; there would be no trouble with this man.

"Take this chair while I send for a cab," he said. Then he turned to the window and beckoned to an officer on the other side of the street.

Digitized by Google

When Dodds turned round, he found the self-accused man reclining limply in an easy chair and his wife pacing up and down the room wringing her hands. The detective glanced from one to the other with a dubious expression.

"I must take him," he breathed to himself, "but I don't believe that confession! I should be more inclined to believe a confession from her. I'll sift this to the bottom or my name's not Joshua!"

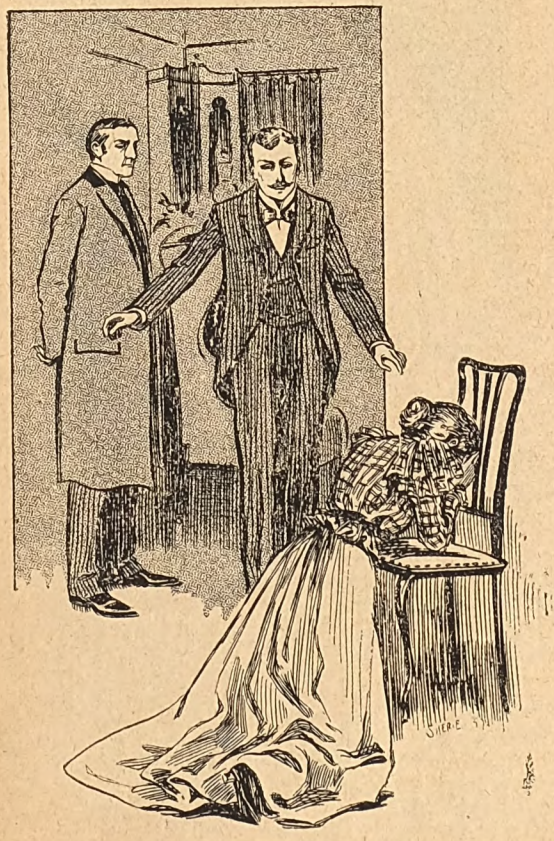
As though she divined his thoughts, Mrs. Garrard stopped short and faced him boldly.

"It is on me that you must put the handcuffs, detective," she said in a voice that was firm, almost defiant. "I took the money; my husband knows nothing about the theft and has told a lie to save me. I have been an extravagant woman; I have been fond of dress and pleasure above my station; and I took advantage of my knowledge and my opportunity to rob the safe while pretending to assist him last night. Heaven help me! I have brought ruin and misery on him and on myself!"

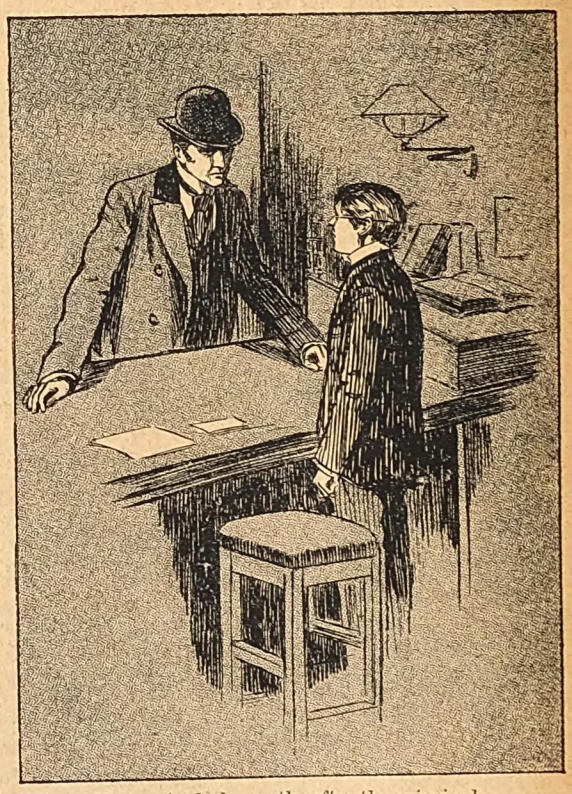
The wretched woman fell on her knees and buried her face in her hands.

One glance at Garrard was sufficient to convince the officer that the man's confession was a lie, that he had uttered it to save his wife. There was no need to put the question to him, but Dodds did it unconsciously.

"Then what you have said is untrue. You were trying to shield your wife?"



The wretched woman fell on her knees.



He inquired pleasantly after the principal.

"Yes," responded Garrard feebly, "I told a lie; I know nothing of the robbery. This is killing me."

At that moment there was a knock at the door, and another plain-clothes officer entered and informed Dodds that the cab was waiting. Dodds instructed his subordinate to do what he could for Garrard, who had fainted at the thought of his wife's being taken away, and then went off with his prisoner.

Detective-Sergeant Dodds was not comfortable about the safe robbery at the offices of Jennings & Co. Mrs. Garrard had been up before the magistrate and remanded after some formal evidence had been given. She had refused to say where the money had been secreted, although Mr. Jennings had promised not to press the case if she would do so.

In the pursuit of his investigations, Dodds had made a disquieting discovery; he had been to the establishments whose names were on the statements found in the office, and in every case he had been informed that there was something wrong, that there was no account in the name of Garrard, paid or unpaid.

"If we have supplied Mr. or Mrs. Garrard with goods, it has been a cash transaction," was the tenour of the replies he had received.

In three cases, for the three largest sums, the statements were declared to be fictitious; the handwriting was unknown; the forms must have been fraudulently obtained and the entries made up.

"There is something deeper in this than I at first supposed," muttered the detective. "But what about the confessions? Is it a got-up affair in which these two are engaged with someone else? I can't see the point of that, though. Any way, there's something deep in it, and you've got to make it clear, J. Dodds."

Digitized by Google

How was it with the four other forms — for small amounts — which made up the packet? Dodds turned into a restaurant where he was known, took a seat at a corner table, and examined the spot on the statements covered by the name "Garrard." An attentive examination with his pocket microscope showed that some other name had been obliterated by means of a chemical substance and the "Garrard," written in imitation of the rest of the handwriting. There was no difficulty about the obliteration; from time to time such chemical substances are hawked about offices for sale to clerks.

"If I go back to these shops and ask them to run through their accounts and find out to whom these bills were made out," mused the officer, "they will do it, but they will think I was silly not to have thought of it before. And it must be admitted, Joshua Dodds Esq., that you have been a little dull in this case! Then, it will take time, and perhaps the name will not reveal anything after all. What's at the bottom of it? I suppose I must go back to these establishments and then to Jennings & Co. Perhaps I had better go to the firm first? Yes. I will."

"That will do," cried Dodds warningly.

When Dodds reached the offices of Jennings & Co. he found that the office boy was in charge. He inquired pleasantly after the principal and was informed that his movements were uncertain; whereupon it occurred to him that he would wait a little. So he walked up and down the office and entered into conversation with the boy, who was quite pleased at the great man's condescension. When Detective-Sergeant Joshua Dodds left the building fifteen or twenty minutes later, he was whistling softly in a way that indicated either pleasure or surprise.

"Some persons say that detectives would never find out anything if chance did not help them," he soliloquised as he stepped out briskly. "It is true that we are assisted a great deal by something that may be so styled, but I say it's Providence. Why did I go there first? Chance? Not a bit of it! It was quite providential. It is Providence that makes such fine smart men as myself join the force; it must be, for there's precious little to induce us to join. It is all arranged so that justice shall be done. And I will see that it is done in this case!"

He visited each of the four establishments and soon placed the book-keepers on the track of the account he wanted. Yes, the account agreed with the statement in his possession in all four instances.

Dodds was busy paying visits for an hour and a half, and when he had completed his round he went straight to the offices of Jennings and Co.

Mr. Jennings was in. He was about to depart for the day, but he took off his hat and coat and bade the officer welcome.

"I suppose you have got no nearer finding my money?" he asked moodily.

"Yes, I have. That's the object of my visit," returned Dodds.

"O-oh! Indeed!" Jennings' voice was somewhat shaky and he looked anxiously at the detective.

"You don't appear very pleased, Mr. Jennings," remarked Dodds quietly.

"Yes, I am," said Jennings, recovering himself. "But I was so surprised."

"So was I."

"Where—I mean, what have you learnt?"

"This," replied the officer, shutting the door and locking it. "Three hundred pounds of the money was paid into the Longton Bank the morning after the robbery, to the account of Richard Jackson, which names begin with the same letters as Robert Jennings. Isn't it funny that when people assume other names, they usually take names with the same initials as their own? Have you ever noticed that, Mr. Jennings? The other hundred pounds was paid into the same bank this morning. You find it handy to keep a special private account at another bank, and in another name, so that nobody shall know anything about it, do you not?"

The head of the firm of Jennings & Co. had sat like one in a daze, while the officer had been speaking. He now jumped up with a terrible curse.

Digitized by Google

"That will do," cried Dodds warningly, his hand going to a pocket in his waistcoat. "It's all up. I've discovered the whole of your little game. You have played and lost, so you must take the consequences."

Jennings sank back in his chair with a groan.

"The only thing which isn't clear to me is, why you were villain enough to try to fix the crime on Garrard; why you didn't arrange it in some other way. But that doesn't matter, now that I can clear those wretched people."

Finding that he was caught without hope of escape, Jennings broke down entirely and made a clean breast of it. He had been speculating and had lost. He had speculated partly with a sum of three hundred and fifty pounds which he held as treasurer for a local fund, and he must show that he held it, three or four days from the date of the robbery. He had that sum of money in his "office" bank (as Dodds styled it), but that was really wanted to pay an overdue account on the morrow, or his credit would be gone. In his despair at the loss, which had been made known to him that very morning, he hastily concocted a scheme, and to carry it out he had sacrificed Garrard. He had placed the statements in the office; he had obtained the three fictitious forms and had altered the name on the others, which were genuine ones made out to himself. He knew Garrard's difficulty with his wife, who had occasionally bought goods without his knowledge. He fastened the crime on Garrard because this plan required it, and that scheme was the best he could evoke.

"It was rather a clumsy plot," said the detective, "but circumstances helped you wonderfully. I never suspected you; you played your part very well in front of me. You see the advantage of being agreeable. If I had not been agreeable to your office boy I should never have drawn from him permission to see the little bottle of stuff for erasing ink marks and mistakes which you kept in your desk. He volunteered the information when I asked casually if any of the clerks ever used such stuff. And if I hadn't peeped into your desk, I shouldn't have seen the other bill which you had forgotten to put with the rest, nor the half of the cheque which you had drawn on the Longton Bank and then torn in halves. Why didn't you destroy those things? Because Providence helps us detectives to discover crime."

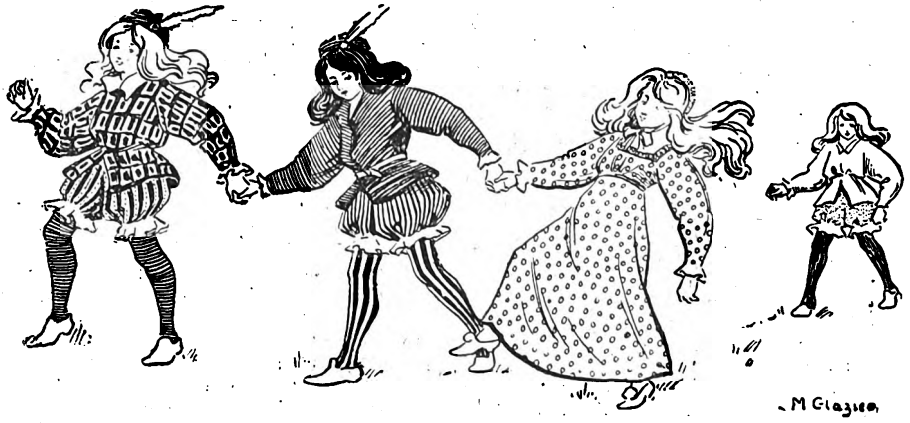
Jennings having made a clean breast of it, Mrs. Garrard was released. Jennings himself evaded justice by suicide.

The confessions were easily explained. Garrard thought his wife had committed the robbery to satisfy her love of dress and gaiety, and had determined to suffer in her stead, and so save her; whereas Mrs. Garrard, believing that he had done it for her sake, and because she had taunted him many times with not having a better position, decided in her remorse to take the crime upon herself.

"Well," said Dodds to them, when it was all over, "I never had a case with so many confessions before, and I shall be very careful of confessions after this! Now, Mrs. Garrard, I hope this trial will be a lesson to you. You've got a good husband; be contented!"

That is three years ago, and there is good evidence that the lesson has been taken to heart.

G. E. LINGEN.



Digitized by Google

THE TECHNIQUE OF PROPOSING.

YOUNG KENDALL walked along the street rather less briskly than usual. His hopes were blighted for ever. He had just asked a girl to marry him and had been rejected. She was a nice girl; he had known her for three years, and for two of them he had been, in his subconsciousness, looking forward to this day—not this day as it had turned out, but as it ought to have turned out.

When he came to Knightsbridge he paused an instant, debating whether to go down to his club, or into the Park. For some reason the club seemed to offer fewer attractions than usual, and he concluded to go into the Park.

It was a perfect January day, clear and crisp. There were more carriages in the Park than usual, and Kendall knew a good many of the occupants. As he recognised the various familiar faces and raised his hat in acknowledgment of the different smiles of greeting directed his way, it occurred to him how self-possessed women always were; how self-possessed she was, while he was all tangled up in his rhetoric and oratory. He seated himself absently on one of the chairs provided for the delectation of weary pilgrims, and, regardless of Park regulations, began to flip off with his cane the ends of some of the prescribed twigs near by; his face reddened again as he recalled her coolness and composure when he had intimated that her refusal struck the sun from his heaven and made his future a blank.

"It's delightful to sit down for a little and cool off, after walking in this sultry weather, don't you think?" said a fresh, cordial young voice at his elbow; and, turning, he became aware of the fact that Hope Brewster had taken the vacant place beside him, and was smiling at him out of her frank, clear eyes, a disarming smile that he could not resent even in his present mood of cynical dejection. Hope was different from the other girls, more original, independent and individual. She had grown up with boys and could do all the things they could. She did things now that a girl of a less secure social position could not have dared to do; the "Miss Brewster" part of her name covered the multitude of little sins against the conventionalities which were committed by "Hope." She was a girl whom the young men all liked, but never made love to. She sat beside Kendall now as naturally and unconcernedly as if she had been a fellow member of one of his clubs. She wore a military coat with a turned-up collar, and a sailor hat that always had a jaunty look on her bright head.

"Isn't it a beautiful day?" she inquired invitingly, gazing with interest at the passers-by.

"Fine," assented Kendall, with the enthusiasm of the menagerie polar bear in July.

"Lots of people out," pursued the young lady cheerfully, tapping her small boots briskly on the path to keep up circulation.

"Lots," agreed Kendall, without manifesting a disproportionate degree of warmth on the subject.

"You don't seem to be very pleased this afternoon. Has anything gone wrong?" was Miss Hope's next venture, as she turned and faced him, giving him the benefit of one of her direct glances.

"You are mistaken," said her companion, with some stiffness. "I was never in better spirits in my life."

Hope smiled at him.

"They seem like good spirits," she observed; "the mirth and hilarity exhibited by the plumes on a hearse. I'll tell you what I believe the trouble with you is, Jack, You have been proposing to Madeline Arnold, and she has refused you!"

If Kendall had not come of a warrior race, he would have been unable to stand this sudden audacious fire without flinching. But blood will tell, when it is really blood and not simply the colourless sap of hypothetic pedigree trees, and the young man did not turn renegade at the first danger signal.

"What makes you think so?" he inquired, with a passable show of indifference.

"Why," explained Hope, nothing daunted, "it's one of those things that come by intuition. I can't tell you any reason. I simply know that nothing short of being a rejected suitor could possibly bring you to the dismal pass I see you in to-day. And when we got that far, the rest is plain sailing; for every one has known for a year and more that your heavenly constellations have risen and set in a certain house not far from here, and that to all other luminaries you are totally blind. She's a lovely girl, Jack. She's my best friend, and I am on your side. Now what made her refuse you?"

"Why, of course," said Kendall, yielding to the superior tactics of the enemy with something like relief; for, after all, there was a melancholy comfort in talking to a sympathetic and comprehending soul like this. "Why, of course, I'm not half good enough for her, and——"

"Well, you knew that before, didn't you?" interrupted Miss Hope sharply; "and yet you went on and asked her just the same. You thought she would give you a different answer. You know you did."

"I hoped—" began Kendall correctingly.

"Precisely. You hoped she was not averse to you, and every one else thought so. I thought so. The course of true love progresses with ideal smoothness up to the point of to-day, and then everything suddenly goes to pieces without warning. There must be some reason for this, and I can think of only one that is tenable; you must have done it the wrong way."

"Done it the wrong way?" repeated Kendall stupidly. "Done what wrong?"

"The asking, of course. You must have gone at it in some senseless way that spoilt everything. I haven't a doubt of it myself," and Hope smiled blandly at some one she knew in a carriage that was passing, and looked as if she were saying something quite different.

"But," protested the young man, roused by various considerations and inferences to indignant combativeness, "granting what you seem so sure of, that I have made a fool of myself, you don't mean to tell me that a moment's stupidity, a casual blunder, would upset a girl's entire opinion of a man? That is a little too much, Miss Hope, even from you!"

"It does seem queer," Hope admitted candidly; "but you know we women aren't always swayed by reason, but often by that indefinable thing which is called by all sorts of names, from intuition to impulse. It is a really serious matter to say the words that mean one is going to marry a man, you know; and the moment before she says them, a girl sees all the cons a great deal more plainly than she ever did before in her life. And if, just at that juncture, a man doesn't act and speak in exactly the way that appeals to that particular girl's nature, why, it's all up with him and with her, too, before they know it. I haven't a doubt that you did it quite as you shouldn't have done it for Madeline. For instance, you probably intimated to her, more than once, that you were utterly unworthy even to open her carriage door for her; didn't you?"

Digitized by Google

"Well, naturally, since it is true——"

"And that she is the only girl on earth you have ever looked at, or ever will look at, or that you can imagine any one else wishing to look at, for all time?"

"Why shouldn't I have said so? She probably knew it, at any rate."

"And that the reason for this is self-evident, because she is so superior, so thoughtful, so deep, so literary, so transcendently different, in short, from all the rest of human kind?"

"She is all that and a great deal more, and I am glad I told her my opinion."

"And doubtless you added that without her your future would be empty and colourless, your life a complete wreck, eternity itself a matter of indifference to you."

"Now, look here," said young Kendall, growing unpleasantly warm even in the sharp air of midwinter. "I don't know how you can guess all this, unless you have had it tried on yourself, and I'm not saying it is what happened at all. But whatever took place is over and past, and all there is now for me is to brace up and get used to it. There is nothing to be gained by talking about it any further. Shall we walk on?"

"Oh, yes, there is use," said his companion sweetly. "It isn't every man that is fortunate enough, when he has made a mistake, to have a girl to help him out of it. I mean to help you, Jack. I want you to go round and do it again."

"Do it again?" he gasped, feeling all his powers of speech reduced to a weak repetition of her words. "Do it again, Hope?"

"Yes, in the right way. Now let me tell you your mistake. You were too subservient. You made her everything and yourself nothing. You deified her until she couldn't help thinking there must be something in it, and wondering if, perhaps, she might not be this creature of fire and soul you depicted. You made her lose her perspective, and then, instead of erecting your own image in corresponding statuesque proportions, you actually made light of yourself. You were not strong enough, for, don't you see, a woman doesn't want a little or humble person to be the one to whom she gives so much. She wants him to love and revere her, it is true, but he must be head and shoulders above her, at the same time. Probably, also, you were nervous and embarrassed and awkward. You ought to have been calm and self-possessed and dignified. Nothing conveys the idea of weakness so much as nervousness; and a woman will forgive anything sooner than weakness. In a word, you should have offered to take her, instead of pleading to be taken by her. Do you see? You were in the wrong part. You were not true to yourself nor to real manhood, and she divined it with that something in her woman's nature which will act as an attracting or repelling force all her life long."

"I believe you are right. Upon my word, I do," said her listener rather heavily. "But what is done is done, and nothing can undo it."

"Nothing can undo your bad quarter of an hour; but pluck and energy may give you a good one. What you must do is to go straight back there and begin over again. Yes," added Hope hastily, seeing the dissent in his face and attitude, "that will introduce such an element of novelty and originality that if she cares for you—mind, I say if she cares—she will be taken off her feet, and you will have it all your own way. If she really doesn't care for you, matters will be no worse than they are now. Will you do it?"

Hope spoke eagerly, and the glow and fervour of her enthusiasm produced a corresponding warmth in her companion. He thought for a moment, then said, in the firm, deliberate accent Columbus might have used when he announced his intention of discovering America:

"Yes, I'll do it."

"Good!" exclaimed Hope. "Now be sure you get into the right frame of mind this time. Take it for granted that she cares for you; remember that you are worth a good deal yourself, and that a great many people think there is no one like you. Finally, if she refuses you absolutely—I don't think she will, but you can never be utterly sure of what a woman will do—let her see that you are a strong, self-reliant man, who is, it is true, deeply disappointed, but who will go out from her presence and continue to build his life, clean and true and upright, a life which is to be, quite independently of her, worth while. Do you feel this way, Jack?"

"Well, I believe I could act the part. Ah, by the way, Miss Hope, supposing I practise up a bit on you?"

"On me?" It was Hope's turn to repeat words.

"Yes, so that you can see if I've the right idea and could carry it out properly, you know. You've got me into this thing, and you might as well see if I'm in correct trim to make a success of it."

"Well," said Hope doubtfully, "of course if it will help you at all. Go ahead; I'll be Madeline. What will you say when she comes into the reception-room?"

"I shall say; 'Excuse me for coming again, Miss Arnold, but I found, on going away, that I had forgotten something.'"

"Oh, did you leave something here?" asked Hope's Miss Arnold, in chilling tones. They seemed to put the breath of life into Kendall's courage, and his voice rang out with manly decision.

"Yes, I left you here and the answer I want. I think the first part of this afternoon was a bad dream, and I've come back to have you awaken me, and tell me so. There's no use, Madeline. I will not have 'no' for an answer."

Kendall had forgotten Hope, and was gazing into space with fire and determination in his face.

"I think we finished all that a little while ago, Mr. Kendall. If you haven't anything else to say to me, perhaps I had better leave you (I've got to be cold for her.)"

"So you will not leave me until you have heard me tell you in full all the reasons why you were wrong in giving me the answer you did before," said Kendall firmly. "In the first place, you are all the world to me. In the second place, I know that you—oh, never mind any more, Miss Hope; I can't do it to you, after all; but I can see exactly how it goes, and I am just in the mood for it. Of course that is the way to meet her, bless her. I was a fool for acting so like a cowardly cad before. Any woman would despise it. I think I'll go there at once, Miss Hope, if you don't mind. Are you walking my way?"

Digitized by Google

"No," said Hope, rising with him and adjusting herself to the sudden quickstep in the march of events. "I'm going up by the Serpentine. Good-bye, Jack, and good luck to you." And she smiled and nodded encouragingly at him as they shook hands at parting.

Kendall walked rapidly away, his head up and his shoulders well back. He had not noticed before how perfect his surroundings were. The exquisite colouring of the wintry sky brought out to full advantage the grace of the tree forms silhouetted against it; everything seemed to smile good cheer at him; even the palatial "mansions" and shops wore a face of kindliness and substantial comfort; they seemed like encouraging friends, beckoning him on.

His feeling of hope and confidence amounted almost to conviction that he was walking straight upon success. Truth to tell, however, it was not until he stood face to face with the familiar doors, and had mechanically touched the unassuming but portentious bell push that the full realisation of his act took possession of him. Then, nothing but his sturdy warrior blood kept him from precipitate flight; it was aided and abetted by the fact that the door was almost instantly opened; and he entered the house like one walking up to a cannon's mouth in a nightmare.

He was conscious of a singular lack of equilibrium, both physical and mental, to which his nervousness of the earlier part of the afternoon was a trifling matter; he was annoyed to find that he had an unusual sensation in the region of the bronchial tubes, and, to rid himself of it, cleared his throat once or twice in a careless, matter-of-fact way; he tried not to let himself get out of that proper frame of mind, which Hope had said was so important, and kept assuring himself encouragingly that if he could only begin all right, he should sail through surprisingly well, as he had done in the Park, to which end he repeated several times the first sentences he had used in his recent rehearsal.

Then he began to wonder why she did not come down, and convinced that he had been waiting an inordinate length of time, a sudden wild gleam of hope shot across his sky—perhaps she was not at home. He was just pulling himself together at this thought, when the heavy curtains at the door were pushed aside, and she entered.

"Excuse me for coming again, Miss Arnold," he repeated with punctilious preciseness, gazing haughtily at the opposite wall, "but I found on getting away that I had forgotten something."

"Oh, did you leave something here?" inquired the young lady, in a voice which, not altogether steady, seemed to accord with a certain unusual expression in her eyes. Kendall, for the first time in all their intercourse, not noticing her, owing to his sudden absorbing interest in a beautiful etching near him, realised that this was the moment to take the citadel by storm, and answered, with all the eloquence he could at the moment command:

"Yes; when I got away, I began to think I—to realise that when I was here—that two hours ago—to feel sure that after all—if you would give me the opportunity and not be too hard on me—in short" (with a desperate spurt) "to determine that I would come back and tell you that I"—his eyes, having left the etching, had fallen upon a small table across the room; Heaven is said to help those who help themselves, and Kendall's mettle had been proved—"that I had left my note-book here!" he finished in triumph, walking to the table and possessing himself of the little leather-bound article of such stragetic importance.

"Oh," said Miss Arnold, in a strange tone, drawing a quick breath. "Did you come back for that? I should have sent it to you when it was discovered; but perhaps you needed it at once?"

"I—yes; I needed it this afternoon," replied Kendall, feeling a great load off his mind, and speaking almost easily. "It contains some figures I wished to use at the club, and of course that reminded me of it."

"I am sorry you have been so inconvenienced," she said, somewhat laboriously. "It is a long distance to the club. Isn't it very cold for walking?"

"Better for walking than for driving, I should say," he responded, pocketing his note-book and moving towards the door; "I actually pitied those girls in the Park. They showed pluck, never a white feather, but they must have been freezing. I have yet to see a physical discomfort that a girl can't face if it is necessary in order for her to do the correct thing."

"The Park?" repeated Madeline. "You surely haven't been to the Park, too, in this short time?"

"Oh—" Kendall hesitated; "well, yes; I went there on the way."

Then, having reached the door, and wishing to avoid opportunity for what he would have called further "breaks," he turned to say adieu. Madeline's response was oddly irrelevant.

"Are you sure," she said in a strained, unnatural manner, and with apparent effort, "sure that you haven't anything else to say?"

"Well, I can't think of anything more," said Kendall amiably, in whose breast a great relief at having passed his ordeal had made every other feeling subordinate; "it was awfully stupid of me to forget my note-book, and I am sorry to have troubled you; that's all. I will promise not to do it again," and he turned once more to go.

"Oh," cried Madeline, in a voice that was a wail, as she sank despairingly upon a couch and buried her head among the cushions, "then you don't care for me after all!"

* * * * *

"And do you know, Jack," she was saying to him a quarter of an hour later, when they were both sitting on the couch, and she had abandoned the cushions, "five minutes after I had been so horrid to you, and you had gone, I was crying my heart out, and willing to give worlds to have you back. Only I knew you would never ask me again. And Hope Brewster dropped in, and I was too miserable to fabricate, so I told her all about it. She said she was sure it would turn out all right, but you see I knew you better, and I assured her you would never give me another chance—never. And the facts have proved I was right, for I had to do the second proposing myself, didn't I? Won't Hope be surprised when she knows it all!"

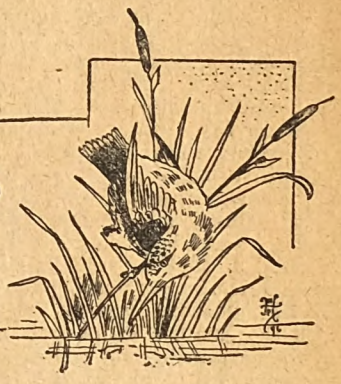
"And wouldn't you be surprised if you knew it all?" reflected Kendall, as he looked down contentedly into the face of the "dearest girl in the world." "Yes, of the trio, I am the only one who knows all the sides, and who is not in for surprises."

But he would have been the most surprised of any of them had he at that moment seen, at a lonelier spot along the Serpentine, a certain lonely little figure standing, a drooping, girlish figure in a military coat with a turned-up collar, and a sailor hat which had lost its usual jauntiness, for the bright head was resting dejectedly on the iron railing, and the girl was weeping as though her heart would break.

ESTHER NOANES.

Digitized by Google

Uncle Benjamin's Parrot.



It was getting late in the evening of the third day before Christmas, when there came a violent pull at our front-door bell, and on the door being opened Uncle Benjamin, covered with snow and out of breath from fighting against the wind, entered. "Oh, what weather! What weather!" he puffed and gasped as he kicked off his wet goloshes, and recklessly scattered the snow from his overcoat on the clothes which were hanging in the hall. "I should so like a cup of coffee. It wouldn't disturb you too much to make me one, would it?"

Of course it didn't disturb us, no more did Uncle Benjamin, who was soon snugly installed in a comfortable seat by the fire.

"Oh, uncle, shut your eyes!" cried my wife suddenly. "Your Christmas present is lying there on the table near you. How could I be so careless! Please don't look that way."

He did as requested—shut his kindly little eyes, and waited patiently until my wife said: "Now, all right."

"How kind of you to think of a present for me," he said. "One good turn deserves another, and I want to give you something, too, but I'll be hanged if I know what."

For a short time he sat with his head in his hands looking fixedly in front of him. Then all at once, bringing his fist down on the table, he said:

"If I only had that parrot I should be all right!"

"Parrot?" I asked astonished. "What parrot are you talking about?"

Uncle Benjamin looked at me jovially.

"Don't you know the story? Really? Well, then, you shall hear it. But first of all give me another cup of coffee. You are a well-read man, nephew, so you ought to know there is nothing like a good cup of coffee and a good luncheon to set a man talking."

When the beverage was ready and Uncle Benjamin had thoroughly tested it by several hearty draughts and had then expressed his satisfaction, he began his story:

"It happened several years ago. After much hoping and waiting, Christmas Day had finally arrived. For several days before a continual stream of presents from relatives and friends had been steadily flowing in, while on Christmas morning quite a number of folks to whom I had scarcely given a thought sent me kindly remembrances, so that I felt proud and happy, and I said to myself: 'Benjamin, my boy, you must be rather a nice sort of fellow, after all, if these people are so fond of you as to send you Christmas presents.' I had already arranged with mother (for she was living then) how we would pile up all the presents under the Christmas tree in the evening—you know, all reasonable people become children at Christmas—when another present was brought in. It was from a man whom I had not seen for years, and whom I had thought of very seldom—my friend, Karl Kierbaum, who was in America. What in the world prompted him to send me anything I could not for the life of me imagine; still less how a man who was in general so reasonable, could send me a parrot, the ugliest bird in creation. The one which I got was the ugliest of its kind, and was, in addition, an ill-tempered, ill-behaved bird. It began by biting my finger, and as soon as it was taken out of the cage, set to work to destroy the carpet.

"I hate all birds, except those which are roasted, of course; then I like them well enough when the gravy is all right. Well, how could I be expected to fall in love with that hateful specimen, which screeched the sharpest words and behaved like a lagan? My wife naturally thought it a dear little thing, and would have been delighted to have it in the bedroom, just like children with their Christmas toys. But I insisted that the parrot should either be taken into the cellar or else chained in the dog kennel. In the latter place it might at least have served to warn its lord and master of approaching danger, like the geese of the Capitol. My wife objected that the parrot would freeze and that it would be brutal to cause the death of the poor, harmless creature. That I finally admitted, but maintained that it should not be housed in the bedroom.

"'Well,' said my wife finally, 'what shall we do?'

"'Can't the bird be roasted?' I asked.

"Upon which my dear better half threatened to lay the case before the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, so I saw that it would be necessary to find some other way out of the difficulty. At noon an inspiration came to me.

"'Mother,' I called, 'I have it! We'll wrap the parrot up carefully in paper, and send it to Director Striegel. I will write a note, telling him how honoured I feel at being able to send him a trifling present, which I hope he will accept, as the bird is of rare species. He will be sure to be flattered by the little attention, and we shall be able to get rid of the bird with credit, for to give, you know, is better than to receive.'

Digitized by Google

"With tearful eyes my wife took leave of the dear, sweet little parrot, which had managed to break a vase before we could capture it. I comforted her by saying that she would be able to see the bird again when she called on the frau director. Then our maid Bertha set out with it, and half-an-hour later came back with a very nice note: 'My dear sir,' it ran, 'the acceptance of your kind present, just received, gives me the greatest pleasure. For a long time it has been my great desire to possess a parrot. I had not bought one because I never found one pretty enough for me. I never saw such a beauty as the one you have so kindly sent me, for which I hereby thank you most heartily.'

"'So you see, mother,' I said, 'what is an owl to one is a nightingale to another.'

"Christmas night arrived. It is always such a peculiar time. The older a man gets the more uncertain he feels whether it is going to bring him happiness or misfortune. Mother and I had exchanged presents and sat hand in hand in front of the sparkling Christmas fire. Neither of us spoke; we were both busy with our thoughts. At such times one wonders if it will be the last time that one will sit so; if not, perhaps a year later one or the other will be resting quietly under the sod.

"Our reveries were interrupted by a sharp ring at the bell, and almost immediately the servant entered the room, carrying a very strange-looking parcel and a note.

"'Mr. Ibsen's compliments. He has sent you a Christmas present.'

"'I must confess I am curious to know what it can be,' I said to my wife, who was busy taking the wrappers off. Then I opened the note and read: 'Dear Benjamin, will you accept the accompanying trifling present? After a great deal of searching I finally unearthed the parrot, which I am sending you. The dealer assures me that it is an exceptionally fine bird. I know that you are very fond of parrots, and hope you will be pleased to have this one.'

"'Confound it all!' I roared in a rage, 'what the dickens do people mean by sending me parrots? What can I do with the bird? I'll tell you what. I'll send it over to the director just as it is in the cage. He'll be glad to have the pair. That's what I'll do.'

"So again I wrote a few words. The dealer from whom I had bought a parrot in the morning, had, by chance, received a second and similar bird, which he had at once offered me. It gave me great pleasure to ask him to accept the parrot which I was sending him.

"Bertha went again, and returned with the message that the director was so overjoyed with the present, that he was absolutely unable to find words in which to express his thanks. He would call on me the following morning to return thanks in person.

"Then we sat down to the table. I was so happy and so merry! The greatest happiness consists in making others happy, and that joy was mine. And as Bertha cleared the table she related again and again, to my great satisfaction, how overcome with joy the director had seemed.

"Another hour passed—it must have been close upon nine—when the door opened, and my friend Ibsen entered, with a cage in his hand.

"'Why, Ibsen, what makes you call so late?' I asked astonished.

"'Well,' said he, after he had greeted my wife, 'the fact is, I am sorry to disturb you, but the dealer from whom I bought the parrot this morning has just sent me a similar second one, and I am so glad to be able to give you a little pleasant surprise that I brought it myself.'

"Deeply moved, I gave him my hand. 'You are really very kind,' I said. 'How have I merited such attention?'

"'Oh, don't mention it,' he said. 'But let us put both parrots in the same cage. I am curious to see how they will behave.'

"'So am I,' I answered, and then, embarrassed, added: 'Do you know, I have had a curious experience with the first parrot you sent me.'

"'Why, how so?' asked Ibsen astonished.

"'Well, I had to make some present to our director, and I thought you wouldn't take it amiss, so I sent him the parrot.'

"Ibsen was astonished. 'What a contemptible thing to do!'

"'How contemptible?'

"'Why,' he replied, in turn embarrassed, 'I myself received the first parrot from the director, and I sent it to you because I thought you would like it.'

"'And the second?' I asked eagerly.

"'Why, I got that from the director, too. But what's amiss with you?'

"I sank down, quite overcome. The poor parrot—twice had I received it as a present, had twice given it away, and now for the third time it was there before me in all its glory. But there was one good thing about the whole affair. In being sent about it had caught cold, and in less than a week it was dead. I am sorry now, because I could have given it to you. I think I have one of its wings left, which would do to put into a hat."

H. GRUDER.

THREE BIG SURPRISES.

THERE are at the present moment three very great attractions which are drawing public attention to Pearson's Weekly.

The first of these is:

An offer of a situation on the staff of the paper at a salary of £200 a year, given to the lucky young man whom the editor considers is the most suitable of those who enter for a very simple examination. Full particulars will be found in the current number of Pearson's Weekly, and the last day for sending in is Monday, January 31st, so that there is little time to lose.

Surprise No. 2 is:

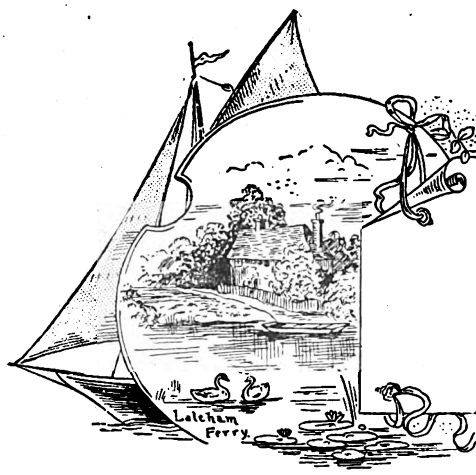
A magnificent new serial story written by Mr. Louis Tracy, and entitled "The Lost Provinces." It deals with a furious war between France and Germany, the Germans being led by the Emperor, William II., and the French by Jerome K. Vansittart, the American millionaire who posed as hero in Mr. Tracy's well-known story "An American Emperor." Each instalment is crammed with incident, and is written in a bright and crisp style.

Surprise No. 3 is:

An offer of £1,000, £100, and £25 every week in connection with a simple football competition. Even if you yourself know nothing about football, you stand a very good chance of winning one of these prizes by getting the advice of one who does know.

These are the three chief attractions at present in P. W. There are many more too numerous to mention, but you will find out all about them by getting a copy of the current issue.

Digitized by Google



The Girl Who Knew too Much.

CURTIS KENT, a young man who had inherited a fortune, and had doubled it in business, was opening his letters one morning when he was surprised to find the following:

Ann Street Bank,
London, October 18th, 189—.

DEAR SIR,—This bank holds, under protest, a bill drawn by Wilbur S. Fletcher, July 17th, 189—, at three months, for £780, payable at the Ann Street Bank, and protested for non-payment October 17th. It was accepted by you and the proceeds placed to credit of Wilbur S. Fletcher by whom the amount has been drawn. Please give this matter your early attention. See inclosed formal notice.—Yours truly,

MORRIS HOLWORTH, Manager.

The inclosure was the usual notice of protest. Mr. Kent gave the matter his "early attention."

He required no special urging, but went at once to the Ann Street Bank, which was not very far from his office. Mr. Holworth did not make Mr. Kent wait. The bank official knew the merchant by reputation, though they had never met before.

"I received a notice from you this morning," said Mr. Kent, "in reference to a bill drawn by a man named Fletcher and purporting to be accepted by me."

The manager's brow was furrowed by lines of anxiety the instant that his ear caught the word "purporting."

"Is there anything wrong with it?" he asked.

"I never heard of Wilbur S. Fletcher," he said. "I never saw the bill before."

"Do you mean that your signature is a forgery?" exclaimed Holworth.

"Certainly. It is not even a good forgery. The resemblance to my signature is so slight that it would not deceive anybody."

"This is extraordinary," said Holworth. "I remember this transaction very distinctly, and I understood that you called here with reference to it."

"I never called here for any purpose before," said Kent promptly.

The manager opened a door which led into another office and called to Mr. Newcombe, the assistant manager of the bank.

"You remember that Fletcher note indorsed by Curtis Kent?" said Holworth. "Didn't you tell me that Mr. Kent called upon you about it?"

"Yes," said the under official, entering the room. "He came to see me, and explained why he was accepting the paper. Is anything the matter with it?"

"This is Mr. Kent, and——"

"What!" cried Newcombe. "This is not the man who called on me!"

Here was a fraud, open and palpable. That the present Mr. Kent was the real one could not be doubted, and if the other had been bogus, the bank had been robbed.

The first thing to do was to get to the accurate history of the case. This, as explained to Mr. Kent, was as follows:

A handsome young man, giving his name as Wilbur S. Fletcher, had called on Mr. Holworth at the bank in July. He said that he was going to buy a share in a business, at that time being conducted by John Spaulding, whose office was in a big building in Marsden Street. Mr. Spaulding was engaged in the manufacture and sale of a patented portable heating apparatus for offices.

Mr. Fletcher admitted that he had neither money nor credit, but he had a good friend who possessed both. That friend was Curtis Kent.

"He had agreed to accept a bill for me," said Fletcher, "in order that I may get the money to buy a share in that business. Indeed, he offered to lend me the money, but I preferred to do it in this way. I have made an arrangement with Mr. Spaulding that he will transfer the account of the business to your bank when I become his partner. This is the only inducement I can offer you to take the bill."

Mr. Holworth said he would consider the matter. In the first place, he had a representative of a commercial agency "look up" Mr. Kent. The report was all that could be desired.

Fletcher called again, and was asked how much of an account Mr. Spaulding would carry. He admitted that it would be small at first—about five hundred pounds to begin with—but he called attention to the fact that the balance of such a business would naturally be small in summer. In the winter it should run up to four or five times that amount.

On the same day the bogus Mr. Kent called, and he had such a satisfactory story to tell that the bank decided to take the bill.

Mr. Fletcher drew it in Holworth's presence, and the manager gave it to the messenger, who took it to Mr. Kent's office, where it was accepted.

When the story had reached this point Mr. Kent was naturally deeply interested. He could not see how the note could have been sent to his office without betraying the whole game.

Digitized by Google

"I'd like to see the messenger that you sent over there," he said.

The messenger was summoned. He was a man over fifty years old, but as erect and active as a youth. There was something of the soldier in his bearing; it clung to him despite the thirty years that had passed since he had served his country in the field.

A more honest face than John O'Neil's would have been hard to find. Upon being questioned, he remembered perfectly the affair of the note. But the surprising thing was that he recognised Mr. Kent.

"I took the bill to the office of Kent and Co., as directed," he said. "This gentleman was at his desk. I could see him from where I stood, outside a little window, where a boy sat to take visitors' names.

"'Are you from the Ann Street Bank?' says he.

"'I am,' says I.

"'Then give me the bill, and I'll take it to Mr. Kent,' says he.

"I wouldn't have done it, if I had not been where I could see the gentleman himself, but as it was, I did. The boy took the note, and gave it to a young woman, who took it to Mr. Kent, and he endorsed it."

"How did you know he was Mr. Kent?" asked Holworth. "Did you depend on what you were told?"

"No, sir; I had seen the gentleman before."

"This seems to be an elaborate conspiracy," said Holworth to Kent. "We have found five people in it already. There are Fletcher and Spaulding, and the man who represented himself to be you. Then the boy and the woman in your office must have been in it; so that makes five."

"Then you saw Spaulding?"

"Certainly. He transferred his account as agreed."

"What does it amount to now?" asked Kent.

The account was looked up, with the result that Mr. Spaulding was found to have a balance of five pounds odd.

"Of course he has skipped before this," said the manager. "His account ran down to a hundred pounds very soon after we took it, and about a week ago he drew it down to where it is now."

"It would be worth while to send a man down to the place where his office was," said the manager. "Come to think of it, I can look in there. It's close to the Central Trust Company's offices, where I must be at twelve o'clock."

"I've got curiosity enough to go with you," said Kent, "if you're going now. It strikes me that this is a very neat game, and I'd like a little more light on it."

It was agreed that the bank should report the case to the police at once. Kent was asked whether the boy and the young woman mentioned by O'Neil were still in his employ. When the messenger had described them, Kent said that both had left him. As nearly as he could remember, they gave up their position about the time of the bill transaction. He had no idea where they could be found. Holworth and Kent went to the address of John Spaulding. They had little expectation of finding any clue to his whereabouts, and they were therefore greatly surprised to find that he occupied a fine suite of rooms, and was surrounded by every evidence of prosperity.

But the biggest surprise came when they were shown into the presence of Mr. Spaulding. He did not resemble the man who had given that name at the Ann Street Bank; he had never had an account there; he had sold no interest in his business; and he had never heard of Wilbur Fletcher.

The swindlers had merely used Spaulding's name, trusting to luck that he would not hear of it in time to interfere with their plans.

"How do we know that your messenger ever went to my office? He may have committed the forgery himself," said Kent suspiciously.

"I'm not given to over-confidence in others," rejoined Holworth, "but I'll require considerable evidence before I believe in O'Neil's guilt. He has been with us for years, and his record is A1."

Kent was thinking about the young woman who had figured so disagreeably in O'Neil's story. He remembered her as a really beautiful girl, in whom he had taken a deep interest. He had been very sorry when she announced that she must leave his employ and added that she was about to be married.

He reflected that she was likely to get into trouble over the affair, and the longer he thought of it the less he liked the idea. The result was that he called upon Harrison Keith, the detective, that evening, and asked him to look up the case.

"I'm sure the girl is honest," he said, "and I want you to see that she escapes annoyance. If the bank people get after her, you block them."

At the outset, there seemed little need for Keith to stand between the regular police and Miss Bertha Warren—the name by which Mr. Kent had known the young woman in question. The police failed to find her. Even Keith was baffled for a time.

The boy mentioned by O'Neil was easily found, his name was Ben Chase. His story agreed with O'Neil's as far as possible.

Chase said that on the morning of July 17th, Miss Warren told him that a man from the Ann Street Bank might call with a note. If so, Chase was to give it to her, and she was to carry it to Mr. Kent. The boy had done just as she had told him to do, and that was all he knew about it.

In tracing Fletcher, Keith made better progress than in pursuing the girl. He soon struck a clue.

Keith did not feel much interest in the affair at first, but as the case developed it began to interest him, and one of its most entertaining features was the clue to the identity of Fletcher which has been already referred to.

The very accurate description furnished by Holworth suggested to Keith's memory a mean scamp—with names enough to fill a directory—who had made his living in the attractive field known as boarding-house sneak thieving.

He was one of those fellows who call to look at rooms and clear off the hat-rack while the servant is calling her mistress. Sometimes such a thief will examine the rooms, and put small objects into his pocket while he is doing so, or he will even engage a room, in order to prey for a day or two upon other lodgers.

From such an occupation to "doing" a bank, is a step so long that scarcely anybody ever takes it. Keith was greatly interested to know what had developed Fletcher's genius so rapidly.

He had previously been distinguished only for his good looks. His picture was in the Rogues' Gallery, and it was a long way the handsomest in the collection.

Keith found that Fletcher was in Liverpool, and soon tracked him to the house where he was living.

He found that the local man who had been watching the house for him had reason to suspect that he was visited in this house by a young woman. He described her as being very handsome, always dressed in black.

Digitized by Google

He soon succeeded in discovering the girl and getting a look at her; and he had no doubt that she was the missing Bertha Warren.

The detective telegraphed the facts to Kent in London, and he replied that he would start for Liverpool at once. Evidently he was deeply interested in his pretty ex-employée.

Pending Kent's arrival, Keith did nothing but keep Fletcher and Miss Warren under surveillance. Both remained very quiet, though once, for a few hours, Miss Warren got away from an expert "shadow," who had been lent to Keith for a time by the Liverpool Chief of Police.

There was considerable doubt whether she had done it intentionally or accidentally. The shadow inclined to the latter view. He reported that the girl seemed to be unconscious of his presence, and that her conduct, as a whole, was not that of a criminal.

When Kent arrived, he insisted upon calling upon the girl at once. She was known in her lodging as Mrs. Quesada.

Keith let Kent do as he wished. It was the best thing to do, so far as the girl's interests were concerned, and it must not be forgotten that Keith had primarily been retained to act in her behalf.

Bertha Warren had never looked more beautiful than on the day when Kent was ushered into the apartment where she awaited him. The man's heart beat tumultuously as he looked at her.

"How does it happen that you are here?" she cried. "Is it possible that you got my letter so soon?"

"I have received no letter from you," he said.

"Then why are you here?"

He told her frankly. She shed many tears as she listened to his words.

"Had you received my letter," she said, at last, "you would now know the secret of this shameful affair. I confessed it all in writing. Certainly I should have no hesitancy in telling you the truth as we stand face to face, though it is a dreadful thing to tell."

"I am a criminal, Mr. Kent, and I ask no mercy—at least, not for myself. For my mother——"

Her voice broke. She sank into a chair and buried her face in her hands.

The sounds of her sobs penetrated to the adjoining room. The door between the two apartments opened, and a stately woman, grey-haired, but still beautiful, entered and bowed to Kent.

"I am her mother," she said, in a voice that would have melted a heart of stone.

She walked to the girl's side and stroked Bertha's pretty brown hair lovingly.

"She has been led into evil, poor child," continued Mrs. Warren. "Now she will make amends so far as she is able by telling the whole truth. Speak, Bertha."

Bertha, after a great struggle, raised her head.

"It was love," she said, "and I was bitterly deceived. But, thank Heaven! I learnt the truth in time to save myself from the disgrace of being his wife."

"Whose wife?" cried Kent. "Fletcher's?"

"That was the name he used in the wicked transaction I was made to assist in bringing to success," said the girl. "I had met him at the house of an acquaintance in London. I loved him the instant that my eyes rested on him. He is so handsome."

Kent winced.

"I did not then read his heart," Bertha continued. "He is deep. His villainy is not upon the surface. He seemed to be equally attracted by me. We met every day. Within a week he had told me of his love, and I replied not unkindly. He asked me to marry him, but at the same time told me that we must wait. He was poor. Thus we came to talk of his affairs. He said that bad luck had pursued him, and had reduced him to the last possibility of desperation. He was then a clerk upon starvation wages—half of what you were good enough to pay so worthless a worker as I am.

"He had been obliged to pawn most of the fine clothes which he had bought in more prosperous times, to meet the necessities of life. But he was full of hope. He said that a great business opportunity had presented itself. If he could find some one who would lend him a few hundred pounds he could buy a share of a splendid business that would make him rich, and enable us to be united very soon.

"There were wealthy friends, he said, to whom he would apply for the loan of the money he needed. In the succeeding days he grew more and more gloomy. All his friends were turning their backs upon him.

"What he desired was to secure the acceptance of a bill by some rich man. He kept repeating to me that it did not involve the loan of a penny from the acceptor. A bank would lend the money, and he could easily pay the bill when it came due by making another bill for another bank, and pledging his stock in the business as security. It would be worth, he said, far more than he should have to pay for it.

"He spoke of you and said that it would be easy enough to discount a bill with your acceptance. It would cost you nothing. Then, as if in gloomy jest, he suggested the plan by which your credit could be used without your knowing it.

"Jest became earnest. I—oh, how wicked I am—I agreed to do the deed. You must know by this time how it is done. I knew—for he told me—that on a certain day the messenger with the bill would be sent from the bank. I told Ben, the boy who sat by the window, to hand the bill to me.

"Then, when it came, I substituted a messenger boy's ticket for it. You signed that, and at the same moment I put your name on the bill, writing on top of your desk tactically before your very eyes. How could I have done such a thing?"

"You were wholly under that man's evil influence, my dear," said the mother gently. "The sin will be forgiven you."

"It will by me," said Kent promptly. "I will never say anything about it."

"But the bank?" said Mrs. Warren. "It has been robbed, and will not forgive. No, my daughter must suffer the penalty, but——"

She could not go on. Her voice failed her. Then, with a sudden revulsion of feeling, she fell upon her knees and begged Kent to save her daughter.

The tears were trickling down Kent's cheeks. He looked at the girl and he looked at her grey-haired mother, and the longer he gazed the smaller became the sum of £780 in comparison with the demands for mercy.

"Don't cry, either of you," he said. "I understand"—he turned to Bertha—"that you escaped unscathed from that villain's clutches?"

The girl looked him full in the face.

"I learnt his guilt before my hand was given to him," she said. "I need say no more to you, who know me."

"It's all right," cried Kent. "Don't you worry a bit. I'll get you out of this scrape all right."

"Impossible!" sobbed Bertha. "I am a forger."

Digitized by Google

"Who says you are?" rejoined Kent. "I'd like to see anybody prove it."

"I have confessed."

"You have confessed to me only. As to the signature, it's genuine. There's no forgery about it. A man can authorise anybody to sign his name for him. Very well, you have my authority to do that, and I am going back to London to pay it!"

When the full significance of this statement was made clear to Mrs. Warren, she swooned for joy. Bertha and Kent had hard work in restoring her to consciousness.

Then she and her daughter joined in protesting that Kent's generosity was too great. But his purpose was not to be shaken.

The girl hid her face in her hands, and called herself unworthy.

"We'll see about that later," said Kent. "The only trouble now will be that my action in accepting the signature will probably clear that rascal Fletcher. I suppose he might be prosecuted for getting money under false pretences, even if the signature was genuine, but that would make trouble and bring your name into the proceedings.

"So perhaps the best way is to let him go. He'll wind up in jail anyway; we needn't be in any great hurry to send him."

So the matter was arranged, Bertha was to take her mother to the home of some relatives in a village near Liverpool. Then the girl was to return to London, and re-enter Kent's employ. The police were to be withdrawn from the case after as much money as possible had been scared out of Fletcher.

Bertha, on learning the truth, had tried to frighten Fletcher into meeting the bill, and had followed him to Liverpool for that purpose, finally writing to Kent.

When Kent had heard all this from her lips, he reluctantly left her, and joined Harrison Keith at the place agreed upon. The detective was directed to remove the watch from Miss Warren, but to keep Fletcher in sight for a few days.

Keith approved of Kent's plan of calling upon the criminal, and offered to arrange the best time for it. On the evening of the day following that on which Bertha had made her confession, Keith notified Kent that the time was ripe for seeing Fletcher. They accordingly went to the criminal's home.

Keith, in disguise, had engaged the room next Fletcher's, and had arranged a means of hearing what was said in the crook's retreat.

"He's been pretty quiet," said Keith, when Kent joined him in the room he had engaged. "He's had few visitors, and he hasn't been out of the house once. There's somebody in there with him now, so you'll have to wait. Meanwhile, you can overhear their conversation."

So saying, Keith opened the door of a closet. Instantly the sound of voices in Fletcher's room became plainly audible.

"You miserable whelp!" a hard-voiced woman was saying, "what would become of you if I didn't look out for you? I picked you up a hall thief, and I've made something worth while out of you. The least you can do in return is to obey my orders. Why did you leave this house after I expressly ordered you not to do it?"

"See here, Bertha," replied Fletcher, in a cringing tone. "you're stepping on me a little too hard, ain't you? What have I got out of this, anyhow? You swiped all the swag we got out of the bill deal. I haven't seen a ha'penny of it except my expenses. And now you put me in this cheap hole and let me half starve."

"Shut up!" cried Bertha Warren, the late tearful penitent. "I give you all that you deserve. If you behave yourself, you'll be in clover when I've married that very easy mark, Kent."

"Married him! Why, you're married to me!"

"Yes, and to a better man than either of you besides. But that doesn't count. Another won't hurt me. He won't be a long job; he's too soft. I'll have his dough in about a year at the outside."

"What am I to do meanwhile?"

"Lie low, and get along on what I can spare," she said, with a laugh. "Now mind what I tell you. I've played this game well, so far. Suppose I'd taken your advice; where would we have been? No, sir; I'm the only thief that ever got the best of Harrison Keith, and did it in the only possible way—by throwing up both hands the instant I learnt that he was on the case. Otherwise, he'd have had us both in the jug. My letter to that fool Kent was a masterpiece. I'm only sorry he missed getting it; but Keith was a little too quick for me. And as for my mother——"

Bertha laughed softly, but with evident great enjoyment.

Kent thrust both hands into his hair, and staggered out of the apartment.

"Oh, Keith, Keith!" he cried; "for the love of Heaven, don't let this get out on me! Oh—h—h!"

It was a combined groan and shudder.

"I might have married her!" he continued. "Yes, I might, by the eternal hills! And she has how many husbands already? Was it a dozen? And that mother of hers! She——"

"Is no relation whatever," said Keith. "She is Celia Delafield, a supposed actress, engaged for the occasion. In reality she is about twenty-nine years old. The grey hair was a wig. I'll admit she played well—better, I'll be bound, than she ever could on the boards.

"Yes, you were neatly fooled, Mr. Kent, but it will come out all right. We'll put both those creatures behind the bars. And there's a third, too—a supposed actor named Gallatin, who, I strongly suspect, personated both you and Spaulding in this little comedy. I think he is also that husband better than either you or Fletcher, to whom the young lady referred."

"Don't! don't!" groaned Kent. "I—I'm going back to London. I suppose you'll act for the regular department in the remainder of the case. Send your bill to date to me, and if it's under five thousand, I'll pay it at once. I'd have married her!"

He shivered as if he had been stabbed with an icicle. Then, with a wave of his hand to Keith, he hurried from the room, from the house, and from the city.

J. H. P.

A BURGLARY CLAIM PAID.

ANOTHER reader of Pearson's Weekly, who was wise enough to comply with the conditions made in the insurance coupon in that paper, has just been paid a sum of money to cover the loss he sustained through his house being entered by thieves.

This is the 105th payment of the kind made by P.W.

Digitized by Google

By GEORGE GRIFFITH.

Author of "Valdar the Oft-Born," "Briton or Boer?" "The Outlaws of the Air," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Madame Sybil.

"Well, General, how is your patient? Any quieter than he was?"

"I thing he is so quiet, Don Francisco, that he will remain so for a very long time. Most of us are a long time dead, eh? Would you like to come and see him? It would be more satisfactory to you, and, you know, in a place like this, the sooner you have the funeral the better. Come, I will show you."

"Very well," said Lorrain. "Perhaps it would be as well. Just wait till I've got a fresh cigar going. I don't suppose the air of those apartments of yours downstairs would strike one as particularly fresh after the breezes of the Carribean Sea. Did he take it quietly?" he went on as the General led the way towards the lower regions of the citadel.

"Quietly? Yes, and like a gentleman until just towards the end," he said, pointing to the sundry strips of plaster with which his face was adorned. "And then just at the last, even after he had drunk the sedative, he so far forgot his manners as to fling his glass in my face, and he cut me grievously, as you see. Carrajo! I could have killed him for it, but then, of course, there was no need."

"N—o, of course, there wouldn't be," laughed Lorrain, "but still, I dare say you got just as much satisfaction out of watching him die, and it would be less trouble, too, wouldn't it? Phew, what a beastly hole! It isn't fit to put a dog into!"

"Unless the dog walked on two legs and was an enemy, señor. That would be another matter, wouldn't it?" replied the General, with a soft, fat sort of laugh, as the sentry whom he had summoned to attend them unlocked the door of the cell and threw it open. "See, there he is. Go and see for yourself. I think you will find him quiet enough."

So far the conversation had, of course, been carried on in Spanish, but as Lorrain went to the side of the stone bench on which lay the lifeless body of the man who a few hours ago had been her ladyship's husband, he forgot his habitual caution for an instant and muttered as he lifted one of the half-closed eyelids:

"Yes, he is dead enough, but I wonder if he said anything before he died."

Don Gregorio's quick ears caught the words, and as Lorrain's back was turned to him, he indulged in a fleeting smile, but there was not a sign of intelligence upon his face when Lorrain looked round a moment after and said in Spanish:

"He seems dead enough for all practical purposes. That must be wonderful stuff of yours. Could you give me some of it?"

"It might be possible!" replied Don Gregorio, with a secondary meaning which Lorrain was a long way from suspecting. "It is, as you say, useful. If you have that, you ask your best enemy in a friendly sort of way to have a cocktail with you. He says 'yes.' You mix the cocktail, and, if you don't make a mistake in the glasses, it is done. Of course, if you do, well, there, no one but a fool would do that. So, Don Francisco, are you satisfied that your requests have been complied with?"

"Yes, General, I think that will do," replied Lorrain, who meanwhile had been carefully seeking for any signs of vitality in the heart or pulse which had ceased their beating for ever. "The funeral can take place as soon as you like, and the quicker and quieter it is the better."

"It shall take place at once, Don Francisco, and then there can be no mistake," said the General, turning to the sentry. "José, put down your keys and take the chain off the Señor Inglese's body. Meanwhile, Don Francisco, if you will help me with your strength, I will show you that those old Spaniards who built this place provided for all emergencies."

As he said this he kicked away some rotten matting which half covered the floor of the cell, and under it Lorrain saw a big, oblong slab of stone with an iron ring-bolt in one end. Don Gregorio took the rifle which the sentry had laid aside, put it through the ring, and asked Lorrain to stand on the other side and take hold of the barrel end.

"Now lift!" he said, taking the butt in his own hand.

Lorrain obeyed, and after a tug or two the stone came up, revolving on a middle axis, which creaked as if the trap had not been used very recently. Underneath there was a black hole, out of which came an unpleasant sound of soughing, sluggish waters.

"Handy, but filthily disagreeable," said Lorrain, "even for the disposal of one's enemies. Still, I suppose it is as good a grave for a dead man as any other."

"Certainly," said Don Gregorio, "since the dead are not fastidious. But in the old times they used to use it for living enemies as well. You see how far we have progressed in civilisation since then, señor! Now, José, bring the Señor Inglese here and let us see the last of him."

Digitized by Google

The sentry, who had meanwhile knocked out the bolt which held the iron band round the waist of Sir Langton's body, took hold of the ankles and dragged it off the stone bench. Lorrain's finer sensibilities received a shock as the lifeless head struck the stone floor with a most disagreeable sound. The negro dragged the body to the edge of the hole, and stooped down to throw it in. As he did so Don Gregorio shifted his right hand from the rifle stock to his hip pocket, pulled out a revolver, and sent a bullet through the sentry's brain. His body lurched forward and disappeared down the hole. Lorrain heard the two quickly succeeding splashes in the water below, and then Don Gregorio, lowering his end of the rifle, said:

"Thank you, señor, that will do. We can put the stone down now. It is as well not to have too many independent witnesses of a little transaction of this sort. You and I are now the only people alive who know what happened to the unfortunate Señor Inglese who had the misfortune to become unnecessary to my best of friends. Now, if you please, we will go to the palace and drink a bottle to the repose of the Señor Inglese's soul. I wish also to give you the pleasure of knowing my wife. I sent her to my hacienda in the country when the trouble began, and she has returned to-day."

"Your what, General?" said Lorrain, with a laugh whose mirthlessness was possibly the result of what he had just seen. "Your wife! Without offence may I ask which? Have I seen her before?"

"No, I think you have not," said Don Gregorio without any sign of resentment at the very obvious insinuation.

He took up the lamp and lighted Lorrain out of the cell, carrying the sentry's rifle in the other hand. The door clanged to behind them. They went along the passage and up the filthy, half-rotten stairs which led to the ground floor, and when they reached it Don Gregorio leant the rifle against the wall and whispered:

"To-morrow I shall send for José, and hear that he has deserted. It is as well that there is no one about. It will make the matter easier, though, of course, he was only a nigger."

"And you're only the sort of unspeakable scoundrel that it takes a drop of black and a few more drops of white blood to make," thought Lorrain, as he followed him out of the citadel and across the plaza to the flat-roofed building of stuccoed mud, which was called the palace. A couple of sentries presented arms as they went in through the gates which led to the central court round which the palace was built. Don Gregorio led the way in a half deferential fashion to a garishly furnished drawing-room on the first floor, and said, motioning Lorrain to a sofa upholstered in flaring crimson velvet:

"Do me the honour to sit, Don Francisco. The señora, of whom I spoke down yonder, is, as I may say, my last wife, and, I may say too, that she is the most beautiful of them all. I have not told you of her on our way here, because I prefer that when you see her your eyes shall speak for me. I will only tell you now that she is an Inglesa, and I hope that when you see her your heart will still remain true to the señora of the late unfortunate, who was unhappy enough to marry her before you saw her. With your permission I will go and bring her."

"Pray do so, my dear General," said Lorrain, thankful for the chance of getting for even a few minutes out of his sight. "Pray do so. I can assure you that, after what you have said, I am all expectation to see la Señora Presidenta, and if you could send up some wine meanwhile I should be glad of it, for I haven't got the taste of that atmosphere down yonder out of my mouth yet."

"Assuredly," said Don Gregorio. "The wine shall come first and then the señora, but I know which you will find brightest and most sparkling."

As he left the room Don Francisco thrust his hands deep down into his trousers pockets and leant back on the sofa, staring up at the gaudily painted ceiling.

"Now," he said to himself in a low, musing half whisper, "I wonder what that greedy little scoundrel knows about this business. It didn't strike me that the little blackguard could speak English when I handed Pendril over to him. But, still, I don't suppose they would have any sort of conversation. Anyhow, even if Pendril had been able to do it the Magnet would be the last thing that he would talk about, surely. If Gregorio had suspected anything he might have tried torture, but he didn't, and I didn't see any marks on Pendril's body, so I suppose that's all right. Still, it was the sort of mistake that I mustn't make again."

He had got so far when a nigger lackey in what had once been a gorgeous livery brought in a big silver salver with glasses. He was followed by another with a couple of bottles of champagne in ice-buckets.

"You can put them down," he said to the first one in Spanish. "His Excellency will be back soon, and then we'll have them opened."

"By-the-way," he went on to himself in English, "I wonder what sort of a person the Señora is? An Englishwoman, too! What a fate! I wonder where he found her."

At this moment the door at the other end of the drawing-room opened.

"Good-evening, Señor Lorrain. Welcome to the palace to which your most opportune arrival has restored us. I had no idea that our old friendship would be re-commenced under such pleasant circumstances."

"Good Heavens, Sybil! You!" Lorrain almost shouted, as he sprang to his feet and stood staring, utterly off his guard for the moment, at the queenly and splendidly-dressed figure that was advancing with hands outstretched down the room towards him.

"Yes, it is I!" she said, looking him straight in the eyes, and speaking in a voice that had just the suspicion of a defiant little laugh rippling through it. "Quite an unexpected meeting, isn't it? And I don't wonder that your surprise is as great as I hope your pleasure is. You see, Gregorio," she went on, turning to her husband, "Señor Lorrain and I are old friends, or rather I should say he was a great friend of my late husband."

"That is very pleasant," said the President, who had apparently considered their first greeting the very reverse, "that the señor should be the friend of your first husband, Querida, and should also be the good friend of me, as he is. So now let us take wine together to our friendship that has been and is to be."

"Her first husband," thought Lorrain to himself. "I wonder what the old scoundrel would think if he knew — and Sangre de Dios! there's that boy on board the yacht. What the dickens are we going to do with him! I'm afraid there'll have to be another accident on board before she gets a chance of seeing him. What in the name of all that is infernal and inconvenient brought the woman here just at this moment! Well, Señor y señora," he went on aloud, taking a glass of champagne from the President, "it is a pleasant meeting that brings old friends together. I drink to your healths, and to the honour and happiness of your union."

Digitized by Google

There was an almost imperceptible stress on the "honour" which brought the blood for the moment to Sybil Pendril's cheeks, but it passed unnoticed by Don Gregorio, and Lorrain's toast was drunk with the most friendly cordiality. In the conversation which followed Lorrain easily perceived a carefully veiled, but nevertheless eager desire on the part of both of them to get a clearer idea of his plans and purposes than he had the slightest intention of giving them, and when, after refusing a most pressing invitation to spend the night at the palace, he rose to take his leave, all they had got from him was the information which he had vouchsafed early in the conversation, that he intended the next day, or the day after, to undertake a sort of half picnic, half exploring trip up to the head waters of the Ozama, a sort of prospecting party in fact, which would make, at any rate, an attempt to locate the treasure-chest of Don Christoval, and when he got back on board the Minnehaha, at about eleven, he found her ladyship walking up and down the poop with short, unequal strides that betokened anything but a peaceful frame of mind.

"Well," she said, stopping short as he came to meet her; "is it—is he—is my husband safe and well?"

"Safe? Yes, Jessica mia," he replied, taking her hands and then, unresisted, slipping one arm round her waist and stooping down and kissing her. "The fact is, Querida," he went on in the soft, caressing tone that had now become so familiar to her, "he is so safe that you may henceforth dismiss him completely from a heart that he was never worthy to occupy. There is no need to go into details. Let it suffice that you are free, free to give your sweet self to one who loves you with a love that he, poor creature, never dreamt of. You can say that your life begins from now. So far you have only existed. Now you shall live. Come, let us go below. I have something surprising and of the greatest importance to tell you."

Her ladyship shivered in his arms, but she said nothing. Whatever had been done was done, and she recognised that however hideous the crime might be, it was not only inevitable, but, moreover, that she, by deliberately anticipating it, had taken to herself a very distinct share of the guilt.

When they reached the state-room he took her by the hands again and said:

"Jessica, who do you think Don Gregorio introduced me to at the palace to-night as—well, his wife he called her?"

"I have no idea. Who was it?"

"None other than Sybil Viney that was," he said. "Sybil Pendril that was later still, and mother of the present Sir Arthur Pendril, who, in the ordinary course of things, would now succeed to the baronetcy and the estates, provided always that no accidents happen to him before his mother or any other officious friend of the family is able to put forward his claims and prove them."

"And when is the accident to happen, Francisco?" she said, looking up at him with the glint of an evil light in her pretty eyes and a hard ring in her voice that was not there the last time she spoke.

"I am glad to see that your ladyship's spirit rises to the occasion," he said. "You will be a fitting life companion for one who has never yet allowed an obstacle to bar the pathway of his life purposes, and I can assure you that the accident will be arranged for with the least possible delay."

CHAPTER XXVIII.

A Trip to Sea.

When her ladyship awoke the next morning she was surprised to find by the vibration that the yacht's propellers were working at very considerable velocity, and that the yacht herself was evidently going very fast through the water. She got up and dressed as quickly as possible and went up on deck to learn the reason of this unexpected departure from their original plans. She looked about her and saw to her astonishment that the Minnehaha was almost out of sight of land, and that the high coast of Hayti only looked like a low brown line on the horizon. The yacht's bow, however, was pointed towards it, and a glance at the water swirling past her sides in long, smooth green swathes and tumbling away behind her in a wide wake of foam, told her that, wherever the Minnehaha had been, and whatever her errand, she was making the best of her speed back to the place she had come from.

Lorrain was on the bridge with Captain Peters, apparently in close conversation with him, but when he looked up and saw her on deck, he came down to meet her, and as they shook hands he said:

"Good-morning, your ladyship. Change of air seems to have tempted you out pretty early."

"Change of air!" she echoed. "Yes, it is indeed a change. Have we been all night at sea, and may I ask the reason for the change? You didn't tell me anything about it last night."

"No," he said with one of those smiles of his which she had got accustomed to find at once so pleasant and unpleasant. "And yet in a way I did. The fact is there were one or two reasons. In the first place, you knew the harbour of Santo Domingo is very unhealthy, and as we have to take a trip into the interior shortly, I thought a change of air wouldn't be at all a bad thing. Secondly, I regret to tell you that late last night, or, rather, early this morning, we had a death on board."

LOVE STORIES. 1D. 1/2

LONG COMPLETE NOVELS. 1D. 1/2

A Bright Paper, full of Good Reading, the Cheapest ever issued.

EVERY WEDNESDAY.

Digitized by Google

"What—not——"

"Y—e—s," he said quite seriously, "I fear your suspicions are correct. The sometime heir of Pendril Abbey died at two o'clock this morning. We will say of malaria and dysentry, which, unfortunately, is not by any means an uncommon combination in these islands, and especially in the old Spanish towns. As it was necessary for sanitary and other reasons to dispose of the remains, as the undertakers say, as speedily as possible, I thought it would be best to run fifty or sixty miles out to sea and get the matter finished before anyone had any time to make inconvenient inquiries. The funeral took place about ten minutes before your ladyship came on deck. By the way, I can call you 'your ladyship' now without the slightest reservation.

"Well, yes, I can quite understand your looking at me in that half reproachful sort of way," he went on as Jessie stopped suddenly in their walk, and looked up at him with something in her eyes, half fear and half horror. "And, I daresay, I deserve it; but then, you see, I thought you would like to be relieved of the unpleasant necessity of thinking and acting in these delicate matters, and of course I couldn't ignore the fact that it would be extremely awkward for you and all of us if Sybil Pendril had come on board the yacht this morning and found her son alive and well.

"She's a bad woman, a very bad woman, in fact; but she is, or rather was, this boy's mother, and very bad women are sometimes very good mothers. Then, again, the unexpected appearance of Mrs. Arthur Pendril, as we may call her, brought a very serious complication into our affairs. You know it can't be very long before Mr. Leigh Tristam and his bride get out here, and if they should by any chance get into communication with Madame Sybil and tell her that the old baronet is dead—well, she would very soon arrive at the very logical conclusion that her son is the only lawful heir to the baronetcy, and that she was his natural guardian till he came of age. That, of course, would mean that she could take the boy to England, and, after proving his identity and her own, take charge of the Abbey and the Pendril estates and revenue for a period of some thirteen or fourteen years. And in that case, you see, from your ladyship's point of view, there would be the very dickens to pay."

"Don't talk like that, Francisco, please," she said in a tone that was almost pleading; "don't. Who knows but what the dickens—I mean the account for all this—may have to be paid some day? I do not—of course, I cannot—blame you for what you have done, because I know you have done it mostly for my sake and with my knowledge, and yet do you know you have made me feel at times even viler and more wicked than Sybil Viney herself, for somehow even I can't bring myself to give her the name that was my mother's.

"I am a murderess by another's hand, as she is; but there are two lives to my charge, and only one to hers, and for the rest," she said, with a pitiful little droop of the head, "I suppose we are about equals. I wish to Heaven I had never seen this horrible thing that I once said I would give my soul for; and, fancy, if it hadn't been for that chance flirtation with my master's son in the library that night I might still have been a servant girl, a lady's-maid with unsatisfied ambitions, but for all that a clear conscience, and here I am only a month or two later——"

"Yes, here you are," he said, breaking in on a soliloquy that it was becoming unpleasant for him to hear. "Here you are, a woman, young, talented, beautiful and ambitious, with the means of procuring that which will gratify every ambition that you can have, and with a man at your side, who, whatever his personal faults, and, conventionally speaking, his sins—his crimes if you like—is yet devoted heart and soul to you, and who is not without those qualities which may be of some service to you in attaining those ambitions. Come now, your ladyship, is the change after all such a bad one? Are not a few marks of the moral searing-iron on what we have been taught to call our conscience, a very small price to pay for the possibilities of a situation such as yours?"

"Well, yes, I suppose they are," she said, catching the tone of his half-bantering speech. "After all I should have thought about the conscience before, and I daresay I did. At any rate, what is done, is done, and there's no going back now, so we may as well go on to the end, bitter or sweet—you and I, brother and sister in crime, as one of those novelettes which I used to read when I was Gwynneth Harley's lady's maid, would have called us."

"Brother and sister," he echoed, pressing the hand that she had put through his arm a little closer to his side. "For the present, yes, if your ladyship insists upon it, but, I give you fair warning, that it will not be long before I find such a relationship quite intolerable."

"Possibly," she said, looking up at him with the light of a swiftly changing mood shining in her eyes and lighting up her face with a very different expression to that which had darkened it a few moments before. "Possibly, but sufficient unto the day is the added wickedness thereof. Meanwhile, has it not struck you that all this while we have only been making a toy of the Gold Magnet, that we have not even begun yet to use it seriously? When are we going to look for Don Christoval's treasure-chest?"

"I hope that all my arrangements will be completed to-day, and that we shall be able to start by day-break to-morrow," he said, not altogether pleased by the sudden turn she had given the conversation. "We shall be back in Santo Domingo in a couple of hours, if the captain of the Magicienne doesn't take it into his head to stop us and make further inquiries into our business here, or if the Haytian government doesn't send round the rest of its fleet to see about the destruction of the Dessalines, which I daresay they've heard of, somehow, by this time. If they do, and the Magicienne doesn't interfere, there'll be a fight, and after that there won't be any Haytian navy to speak of."

"I hope not," she said. "I don't want to see any more fighting like that. By the way, what will happen now when Tristam and his wife get out here and find what has occurred?"

"Well, if they don't take sensible advice and keep out of the Minnehaha's way we may find it necessary to do them some very material damage. What I should prefer myself would be to catch them on an unfrequented part of the high seas, take Tristam and his wife and your late mistress prisoner, sink the yacht, and then retire to some quiet and unfrequented little island, say that Cay in which the Spanish treasure-ship is supposed to be buried, and make them individually and collectively pay the debt that Tristam owes me in such a fashion as circumstances might suggest. That would be much preferable to sending them hurriedly to the bottom, as we had to do with the crew of the Dessalines."

She pulled her arm out of his and stopped and faced him, and said with a smile on her lips and a little quaver in her voice:

Digitized by Google

"Francisco, which are you—a man or a devil, or both?"

"To the world at large, perhaps both," he laughed. "To those I love, a man, perhaps not quite as good as the average. To those I hate or those who may happen to get into my way—whatever your ladyship pleases to call me. Names, after all, don't matter very much."

"No, I daresay a good many highly respectable people at home would gladly be quite as wicked as we are if it wasn't for the policemen, and, talking about wickedness, I suppose we may expect a visit sometime to-day from the President and Madame Sybil. It will be rather awkward if Don Gregorio has happened to tell her about the boy being on board."

"I don't think there is very much chance of that—I mean of his having told her. I don't remember saying anything to him about him, and he only saw him for a minute or two on board if he saw him at all, and in any case I don't think he would know enough to connect him with the lady he now honours with the title of 'wife.' But even if he has done, what then? We have simply to say that the boy fell overboard by accident. Captain Peters yonder will tell her that he saw him do it, and both the officers will be prepared to swear that they lowered the boat, and that he sank before they could reach him. You know people who arrange accidents of this sort mustn't forget to arrange circumstances to fit them."

"I see," she said, looking up at him with a smile. "Still it was just as well that I mentioned it, because now I shall be able to do my share, if necessary, in arranging what the truth has got to be."

Within a few miles of the land the Minnehaha slowed down and ran into the harbour at an ordinary speed so as to avoid exciting the suspicions of the officers of the Magicienne, which was still lying off the river mouth. She had not been long at her old anchorage before a steam launch with a gaily fringed awning over the stern put out from the jetty under the citadel, and came gliding towards the yacht.

"There they come!" said Lorrain to her ladyship, who was standing with him on the deck. "Now I suppose I need hardly remind your ladyship of the fact that the best way to treat an enemy up to the outbreak of actual hostilities is with the most perfect courtesy and consideration. It is all the more necessary to do this when the enemy happens to be a woman."

"Oh, I fully understand that!" she laughed. "My late mistress, you know, used to visit at some very good houses indeed, and if you want to see good society with the paint off you must look at it from the servants' hall. In the drawing-room you only see the polish, but from below stairs you can see under the surface. I don't think you'll have much fault to find with my reception of Madame Sybil."

Lorrain had never admired her as much as he did when he watched her doing the honours of the yacht to the woman who was her worst and her most dangerous enemy. Women, as a rule, find it much easier to be agreeable to people they would like to kill than men do, and the frankness of her ladyship's cordiality was so perfect that it completely deceived even Madame Sybil herself, who, to her ladyship's great relief, didn't seem to have any knowledge of her son's having been on board the yacht. They lunched in the saloon, and after the afternoon siesta Lorrain had a long talk with the General and Captain Peters on the details of the expedition up the Ozama.

The yacht was to be left in charge of the first officer and the chief engineer, who had secret orders from Lorrain to permit no communication whatever with the shore, and to keep steam up ready for any emergencies. The expedition was to be composed of Captain Peters, the second officer, two quartermasters, and ten of the crew and twenty negro labourers and porters provided by Don Gregorio. Lorrain would of course be in supreme command, and her ladyship was to accompany him on mule-back. They dined that night at the palace, and when they had gone back on board the Minnehaha and the President and his lady had retired for the night, she said to him:

"You are sure that the boy was on board when they came here?"

"Yes, Querida, I saw him, and I asked the late Sir Langton who he was, and he told me that he was the son of a friend of his in England, and that they were going to take him home for a long holiday from the college at St. Thomas."

Then she said, with a sort of hiss running through her voice:

"If he was on board to-day they had him hidden away. If they didn't mean foul play why didn't they speak of him? Ah, yes, I see it now. When Lorrain saw me here last night he knew what would happen if I found the boy on board her. That is why he went out to sea this morning. They have murdered him, the poor little fellow—murdered him! I have not been as good to him myself as I might have been, but still he was my son and I would have seen that he had his rights, the rights which that mistress of Lorrain's has stolen from him. Now listen to me, Gregorio," she went on, putting her two white hands on the little man's shoulders, and looking down from her queenly height into his upturned eyes. "Whether this story you were telling me last night about the Gold Magnet is true or not, if you let these people leave this island alive I will leave it when they do, for if I have to follow them to the end of the earth I will do so, and if I have to wait twenty years for my revenge I will wait, but in the end they shall pay for what they have done. What a misfortune it was I didn't take Arthur away before! If I'd done that I might have gone to England now and taken the position that is mine by rights."

"Console yourself, Querida," he replied with a clumsy caress. "Console yourself, and when our treasury is full, as this magical needle shall make it, you shall have a position more brilliant than that. Meanwhile, have no fear about these people. Let them once get into the interior, and it shall be my business to see that they don't come back. I don't think Lorrain would give that thing up except with his life, and you can be quite sure that I don't mean to let him take it out of the island. Only let him get away from that ship and those infernal guns of hers, and you shall see what will happen."

About two hours after sunrise the next morning the expedition started, after Lorrain and her ladyship had drained a farewell glass of champagne with the President and Madame Sybil, and received their best wishes for the success of the enterprise, and shortly before sunset the same evening, a strange, white-painted craft with the hull and armament of a warship and the rigging of a yacht came rushing up from the southward at a tremendous speed, dipped the Stars and Stripes to the Magicienne's white ensign as she passed, and, slowing down as she entered the bay, dropped anchor about three hundred yards outside the berth occupied by the Minnehaha.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

By WINIFRED GRAHAM.

Author of "Through the Valley," "A Slave of Routine," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XIX.

As the Wives of Scripture.

"I must go away," said Meresia, bursting in upon Elizabeth, who had denied herself to visitors. "You got my letter saying I was coming, and that I wanted to see you alone?"

"Yes. What is the trouble now?"

"A feverish unrest, a burning desire to be on the move, a horror of home and the domestic circle, which consists of Alfonso and myself. He has engagements to-day, both afternoon and evening, so I am free. Now, Elizabeth, dear, you must get your maid to toss a tea-jacket into a bag, pack your things for the night, and come down to Brighton with me for a breath of sea air. I've telegraphed for rooms at the Norfolk Hotel, where I stayed last winter, after influenza, you remember. Oh! don't look as if you were going to back out of it; don't say no, unless you would drive me to despair and an early grave!"

"But I have a dinner engagement this evening."

"What is that in comparison with my health, perhaps my reason? Send a special messenger with a letter to say you are called away by a sick friend—sick in soul and mind. The body is always considered, but the mind may suffer torments, agonies, and the only name we give it is—Depression!"

Meresia moved about the room restlessly as she spoke. She was not like her usual self. She talked quickly—a new thing for her—and did not pause to consider Elizabeth's convenience. The latter noticed that Meresia's cheeks were burning, unnaturally flushed, and her eyes, too, had the brightness of danger-signals, while she carried with her a convincing sense of trouble, which Elizabeth could not mistake.

"Why are you so anxious to go away?"

"Why does a woman want to escape her husband?" queried Meresia, raising her eyebrows and pausing in her walk.

"Because she does not love him, I suppose."

"Exactly! Imagine yourself perpetually in contact with a half of yourself that was absolutely distasteful—abhorrent to you. One whose opinions grew daily more impossible to agree with or re-echo—one who allowed you no voice in matters of importance, who laughed at your notions, derided your principles, checked your free will. You are thinking me terribly selfish; I see that in your face. Alfonso has made me so. It is the bad training. So pity, don't condemn. Have you decided to come, like the dear, good, generous creature you are?" Elizabeth laid her hand on Meresia's shoulder and felt her trembling with excitement.

"Yes," she said, "they will have to manage without me to-night. I will send the message."

Meresia sank into a chair with a sigh of relief.

"It has got on my nerves—this existence with Alfonso. Once I had a well-balanced mind, governed by moderation, now I cannot keep my faculties in bounds or order. They seem to run away with me. I sometimes think I am hardly accountable for what I say and do. You are the tonic I most require. These London fogs choke me. To-day we shall breathe the sea. But you must be quick, Elizabeth, for I have looked out a train, and there is no time to spare. My luggage is outside. We will drive straight to the station."

Miss James proved a good friend and a true one to those she really loved, and Meresia was very near her heart. Elizabeth's firm, self-reliant nature pitied the passing moods of the younger woman.

"You are feeling things far too keenly, Meresia," she said, "little things that hardly matter."

"Perhaps they are not so little as you think. But I cannot tell you all."

"It is the old story, dear. I warned you long ago. You are the sort of woman to make her own tragedy. You meet sorrows half way, and taking them by the hand, lead them on, walk with them, talk with them, and, finally, fall under their influences at the moment you most desire to escape. So when the dark hours come—and the difficulties—you cannot tide them over, as I have tided many troubles, either by ignoring them or making them objects of ridicule and sarcasm."

"No," said Meresia, "that is quite incomprehensible to me. I have not grasped such a situation. I never could. My marriage was my great mistake, or rather his. Don't let us talk of it, Elizabeth, or perhaps I shall tell you some of my thoughts, and then you will hate me, and not be good to me any more."

In less than half-an-hour, Elizabeth was ready to start, and together they drove to the station, Meresia childishly delighted at having got her away.

"Now I am almost happy," she said as they settled themselves in the Pullman car. "Oh! I forgot to get a paper," springing out, "wait for me, Elizabeth, I shall not be a minute."

Meresia returned quickly, her face paler than before.

"Look," she whispered, "look at that man passing the window now."

"With the small red moustache and light-coloured eyes?"

"Yes."

"What of him? A most ordinary individual. Why does he interest you?"

Digitized by Google

"I see him wherever I go," said Meresia; "always that man!"

"He is in your circle. It often happens so."

Mrs. Aladros shrugged her shoulders impatiently. Surely Elizabeth was strangely dense to-day.

"Perhaps," said Miss James, seeing Meresia dissatisfied at the explanation, "he follows you purposely. If so, the man is wonderfully presumptuous, for he is certainly not an attractive admirer."

"I know he shadows me, but as to admiration——"

Meresia laughed, and dismissed the subject by pretending to read.

"You are full of fears and imaginations," said Elizabeth. "You don't suppose he is a robber?"

"No."

"Well, then, why should he wish to shadow your steps?"

"There are more reasons than two in the world," replied Meresia. "Think again."

"I give it up. What! you are not going to tell me? I don't believe you have any clear ideas on the subject yourself, for all your wise looks. How about a visit to Dr. Serano when you get back to town? He is a wonderful man for nerves."

"I have been to him already, and he can do nothing for me. His treatment only makes me worse."

The train moved slowly out of the station, and with the motion Meresia's spirits rose. She talked vaguely on many subjects, and appeared quite happy as they emerged from London fog to bright sunshine.

"It only seems like a few minutes," she said, when Brighton was reached, and they drove along the crowded front to the hotel. "We will rest, unpack, have tea, and go out for a blow afterwards, if you are willing, Elizabeth. I feel as if a little walk would do me good."

"Certainly; please yourself in everything, I don't care what I do," replied Elizabeth cheerfully. "I am here as sick nurse to a troubled mind, and the only wage I demand is a complete cure, that my patient may prove a credit."

"Sit in this comfortable chair by the fire, while I take my things out, Elizabeth. This is the dressing-bag Alfonso gave me when I married him. It is like him, very large and superior! I don't suppose you have ever met anything approaching Alfonso's superiority. He looks on himself as a little god—or rather a big god—among men. His judgment is absolutely correct; he, like the king, can do no wrong——"

Meresia spoke bitterly, then, with a curl of her lip, and a defiant raising of her head, she continued:

"At least I have escaped him for a few hours, he does not know that I am here. I merely left word to say I was staying away until to-morrow. The last time I did that he followed me. To-night he is not coming home till quite late——"

"You came away and did not tell him," broke in Elizabeth. "Really, Meresia, that was not quite fair towards me. Your husband will be naturally anxious to know where you are. If I had realised your relations were so strained, I should not have aided and abetted their further severance. It seems a tactless, foolish move of yours—this aimless visit to Brighton."

"He may be annoyed, but if he says that he was anxious, I have a very good reply. Alfonso professes to know all my movements without my telling him. You see, he poses as practically supernatural, and it is rather pleasant sometimes to prove him mistaken. Dear Elizabeth, don't be angry. It does not sit well on you, and I am so happy, with miles of railway lines between me and Alfonso."

Meresia's voice was so low and seductive, Elizabeth could not find it in her heart to continue her lecture.

"You won't think it at all wrong of me after tea," Mrs. Aladros assured her, "but early lunch always makes you unpleasantly virtuous. Put yourself in my place, Elizabeth."

"My dear, I could not do that, for I should never, under your circumstances, have come to be in that place. You married a man because his nature was stronger than yours—the result should not surprise you."

Meresia soon contrived to get back into her friend's good books, and Alfonso's name was no longer mentioned between them.

They went for their stroll by the sea, chanced to meet several acquaintances, and returned refreshed in mind and body.

"I shall slip into a teagown for dinner," said Meresia, going to her room.

The passage was empty, and as she flung open her door she was humming a tune she had heard on a barrel organ outside the hotel. For a moment she did not turn up the electric light, but tossed her muff on the bed, and unwound her boa in the glow of the fire.

Suddenly she was aware of a figure seated in the large arm chair, drawn near the grate with its back to her.

For a moment her heart stood still; she could neither move nor speak. Then, with a little cry, she rushed to the door and turned on the electric light.

"Thanks; it was getting rather dark," said Aladros.

Meresia stared, as if seeing a vision, with parted lips and dilating eyes. He stretched his arms as though he had been asleep, and watched her quietly.

"I—I was not expecting you," she faltered, at a loss for words.

"No; but I don't like you staying about in hotels without me. I have come at great personal inconvenience, so do not let it occur again."

"I am not alone; Elizabeth is here."

"I know; but I do not care to trust you with Miss James. Besides, your erratic ways are growing tiresome; I've had about enough of them. It is a wife's duty to submit to her husband, and obey him. If you don't learn your duty soon, Meresia, I shall take steps to teach you."

"It seems," she answered coldly, her voice vibrating with scorn, "that you have taken them already, or else how did you know I was here? You have not been home, and I cannot imagine your intuition being quite so correct as you would have me believe. The days of fairy tales are over; I want the truth."

"Oh! curiosity, thy name is Meresia!" he said scoffingly.

He still lay back in the big chair, while his wife stood against the door for support.

Now she came slowly forward, so that the heat of the fire scorched her dress as she leant with one elbow on the mantelpiece and her eyes on Aladros.

"You have paid somebody to spy upon me," she said. "Do you think I have not guessed it? Am I so dull, so senseless, as not to see that my steps are dogged. I have done nothing wrong, my only crime is that of avoiding you."

"The greatest of all crimes in my eyes," he answered, and she could not tell from his tone if this were flattery or sarcasm.

"How dare you, Alfonso, how dare you treat me in such a manner? Can you deny, that for the last week you have known my every movement through hiring detectives to shadow me? Is that not the grossest insult you could pay a woman?"

"You deserve this—and more," he answered, "for your folly. If I please, I shall have you watched, but it is neither pleasant for you nor for me. All I want is to teach you submission. When you realise that I am your master—that I cannot be thrown aside like a plaything of which you are tired—then perhaps things may go smoothly again. All this unruliness I date from the day of that publication concerning my dealings with certain prisoners in Spain. Such a childish exhibition of temper as you displayed is not a very elevating memory."

"Those dealings were vile," she said, choking back her rising passion. "They entered into my heart and my blood, and contaminated any softer feelings that I had for you."

"Then you are at enmity with me still?"

Digitized by Google

Meresia paused to think, and the working of her brain was quick and decisive.

To feign submission, to win freedom from suspicion by acting the part of a hypocrite, would not that even be better than beating her wings against a barred cage?

An expression of meekness and surrender stole stealthily over Meresia's face.

"Look at me, Alfonso. Am I so difficult to tame?"

He saw a quivering smile part her lips and tears gather in her eyes; eyes with "just that soft shade of green we sometimes see in evening skies."

She knelt down on the hearthrug at his feet.

"You conquered me in the past. You conquer me again. I will be dutiful as the wives of Scripture. I will bow down before the judge!"

CHAPTER XX.

COALS OF FIRE.

"DON'T hurry, I'm early," said Bertie Haydon.

José Serano went to his desk, sealed a letter, and addressed it. His old school fellow, standing on the hearthrug watching him, marvelled that success had changed the man so little.

In evening dress, and by artificial light, José looked scarcely older than when he had left for Spain.

Bertie recalled their last walk together by the Serpentine, José's blasphemous toss, when the coin rolled into the water, and his mocking words as to his fortunes in the future. He had prophesied that his old pal would meet him as a beggar in the streets, and hear him plead in the stock phrase of the professional alms seeker:

"Por el amor de Dios, senorito," etc, etc.

Instead—though he had returned to England in a humble position—Bertie had not met him until Fortunatus smiled afresh.

"I've been trying to write that letter for the last month," said José, tossing it upon a pile of others. "It goes to Madrid, where all my recollections are bitter and impossible to forget. But I should not say all," he added, after a pause, "I have been answering a long unacknowledged letter from the good old priest who converted me to the Catholic faith. It will be full of disappointments for him, and yet he still prays for me."

José smiled as he spoke, and the light now full on his face revealed lines which told of suffering and thought. For the first time Bertie noticed his hair was streaked with grey, and he was puzzled, because of the boyish manner adopted by José in his presence.

"We are dining at the Berkeley," he said, "a party of eight, and going on to the Gaiety. I find people like an amusement that neither taxes their brains nor upsets their liver. This style of play is singularly harmless, everything is harmless that does not make one think. Do you know I've had six Ibsen patients during the last week—people who have been reading morbid literature, and sitting out unwholesome, indigestible plays. They are difficult subjects to treat, too, especially as I am obliged to christen their complaints."

The two men drove to the Berkeley, and waited in the hall for the arrival of José's guests. He knew the best people in London, and was universally popular.

"Who is that fellow staring at you?" asked Bertie.

José glanced across in the direction indicated, and a flash of recollection broke in upon him. Recognition was mutual, as the stranger advanced with outstretched hand.

"I hope I am not forgotten, Mr. Serano?"

José answered warmly that no English face met in Madrid had escaped his memory.

"How long ago is it exactly?" he said. "Let me see; I cannot recall the date, though I remember our dinner that evening in the café, to the very courses we consumed together. Though I can neither offer you a puchero, a pisto, or sopa de cebollas, will you give me the pleasure of your company to-night? My friends will be here directly, and if you don't mind being odd man out——"

"I hardly like to accept, for I shall make your party uneven."

José's guests arrived as he spoke, all except one, Gregory Merriman.

"He promised to come a week ago," said Serano, "but I have seen or heard nothing of him since. Yesterday I expected him to lunch, but he did not turn up."

"Then, instead of an encumbrance, I may prove a useful stop-gap," said the late invited guest, as Serano introduced him to a charming girl in yellow, who bore the stamp of those who would always wear silken dresses, feed on dainty food, and live in idleness.

"Who has failed you?" asked Bertie as they went in to dinner and settled themselves compactly at a round table by the window.

"Gregory. I can't think what has become of the fellow," replied José.

"Oh! didn't you know he was ill? Awfully ill, I was told. Touch and go, so they said at the club. I forget what was the matter with him. I wonder you were not sent for."

"I don't visit the Merrimans, and they have their family doctor," replied José. "Poor boy! He is quite the pick of the bunch. I hope he may pull through."

A gloom seemed to have fallen on their host, and José was less talkative than usual. After dinner he gave Bertie the tickets for the stalls, and begged his friends to excuse him, as he had a patient to see. So, taking a doctor's license, he escaped fulfilling his social duties, shunting them on to the very capable shoulders of his old schoolfellow.

Gratitude is almost an unknown quantity in the hearts of the human race, but with José it grew instead of diminished with time. It was no small thing to him the memory of Gregory's stammered sympathy and proffered help in the dark days of poverty and loneliness. He would have done much for him or Bertie Haydon, his only true friends at the time of Miss Betts' death.

So burying his animosity for Mrs. Merriman and her husband, he drove straight to their house, and was shown into the empty drawing-room to await an interview.

The alterations were few in spite of the lapse of time.

Miss Betts' photograph had been moved from its prominent position to a back shelf, and placed in a shabby frame. He remembered it was once honoured by the gorgeous setting that now held Mrs. Merriman's latest portrait, taken in full evening dress.

There was the hush of illness in the house, and the drawing-room wore a deserted air. A large pot of chrysanthemums were left faded and brown by the piano, the fire had sunk to mere cinder and ash.

Presently the rustle of a skirt announced Mrs. Merriman's advent. Her eyes were very red, as if from crying, and heavy for want of sleep.

José went quickly forward, and took her hand.

"I'm so thankful you've come," she said, "we did not like to ask you, though Gregory repeatedly mentions your name. You see, since your return to England, you entirely broke the old connection, and we naturally felt there must be a reason, some offence or misunderstanding. It has been a great sorrow both to my husband and myself, for as a boy we were so much attached to you, and then when I think of my dear sister, and all her——"

"I have come to talk of Gregory," interrupted José brusquely, "for the rest we will let it pass. What is the good of raking up old troubles?—they are better forgotten."

"My poor boy—oh! my poor Gregory!" cried Mrs. Merriman, dissolving into tears.

"I only heard he was ill this evening," said José.

"Why, for the last three nights I have hardly slept an hour, and our doctor—an old family doctor—seems at the end of his resources. This morning I lost all patience with him. I am afraid I was very rude. He did not come in the afternoon as we expected. My husband says he overheard me call him a fool to his face, but I have no recollection of saying anything so dreadful. When I am thoroughly upset I lose my head. He has mismanaged Gregory shamefully, and now there are complications! You have a great reputation—your cleverness is well known. Will you save him?"

Digitized by Google

Mrs. Merriman trembled as she spoke. She could not blind herself to the fact that Gregory's life was in danger.

Before José could reply a note was brought in from the doctor. Mrs. Merriman read the contents aloud:

"'DEAR MADAM—

"'Having expressed your opinion of me so frankly this morning, I think it would be advisable if you sent for some one else, in whom you could repose more confidence.'"

"That is fortunate," said José, "now there can be no question of outraging professional etiquette. Take me to Gregory's room."

The very sight of José seemed to calm Mrs. Merriman, and bring comfort to her soul.

"Gregory will get better now," she said confidently.

It looked as if her words were destined to come true, for her son, in spite of his weakness, grew brighter and apparently stronger as José bent over him.

"You won't leave me," he said, "you will stay and see me through this, old fellow."

José nodded.

"Of course," he said, "of course."

Gregory had at the best but a poor constitution, and was suffering from a severe inflammatory attack. Mrs. Merriman was quite right in voting the case shamefully mismanaged.

José's skill needed taxing to its fullest to undo the mischief already wrought. Unfailingly he watched his patient night after night, staying in the house, spending most of the hours at Gregory's bedside, till the crisis was over, and the corner turned. In vain the parents tried to express their gratitude, but he would listen to no word of thanks, and led them to understand his time was given up in personal friendship for Gregory, and not as a matter of business.

"I wish," said Mrs. Merriman to her husband—"I wish that we had done more for José when poor Harriet died."

"I don't know why you say 'more,'" he answered, "for I was not aware that we did anything."

"It was such a strange position," she continued, "and he really left England before we had time to settle anything. Of course I was upset at my sister's death, and I did not think. Now it is too late, and we can never repay him—never!"

A silence fell between them, for each stood convicted by conscience.

Gregory's convalescence meant a change into the country, and for a while he saw nothing of José, who vanished from the Merrimans' family circle as abruptly as he had entered it.

"So you have buried the hatchet, and made it up with Miss Betts' relations?" said Bertie, when next he met Serano.

"Yes," replied José, "I bore them a grudge, but it is a bothering thing to carry about, and Gregory was a brick when they were broken reeds."

"I met Mrs. Aladros last night," said Bertie. "What is the matter with her?"

"How should I know, my dear fellow? I have not been called in."

"She has changed since she married."

"They often do, Bertie; it sort of unsettles them. There is only one thing that tries a woman more than marriage, and that is, to be left high and dry without it! But what particular alteration do you complain of in Mrs. Aladros?"

"Well, you see," said Bertie Haydon, "I was rather a particular pal of Meresia's in old days, and I'm not so sure I shouldn't have married her myself if she'd given me the chance. I never saw anyone so perfectly contented, and with such a happy way of living her own life openly, fearlessly, and letting other people live theirs without remark or comment. Now she seems ill at ease, nervous, jaded—driven I might almost say—and a perfect slave to her husband. By jove! what an exacting brute he is! One can tell that at a glance. Meresia asked me last night if I thought she looked older. She said she could not judge for herself, as she got so used to the woman in the looking-glass. I told her 'yes,' that she had aged in the last month. I consider her young enough to bear these truths. It was the first time I had spoken the truth for a fortnight. The next task I set myself was to discover the reason of the change, but Meresia proved evasive. I led the subject gently to her husband. 'I suppose—you—er—hit it off capitally together—eh?' She looked straight at me with those odd green eyes, and smiled. 'If it comes to hitting,' she said, 'Alfonso is the stronger; I am like a feather in the hands of a giant, or the paws of a lion.'"

"You should have told her the story," replied José, "of the gust of wind that came and blew the feather away; weak and light, it was whirled on—on—by the gale, far out of the lion's reach, even beyond the sound of his roar! Tell her that, Bertie, next time; tell her that!"

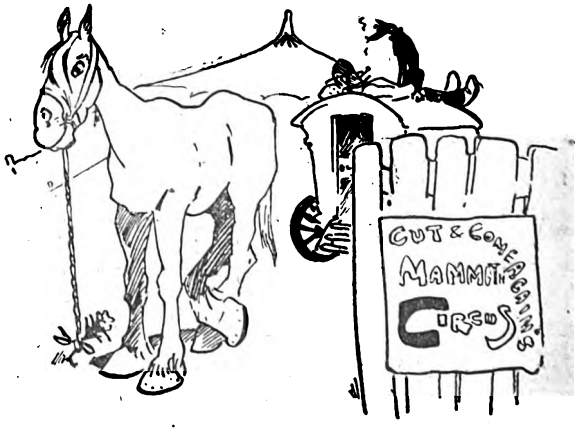
José spoke in quick, excited tones, which carried Bertie back to the days of their boyhood.

"I say," he stammered, "you—you are not—interested in Meresia?"

"You mean am I in love with the wife of Aladros? No! The woman he owns is defiled in my eyes almost beyond respect, but remains still within the limitless range of pity. He has killed the girl he married; can't you see that she is dead, and the thing new born in her place is a caricature, badly executed by our friend Aladros? He has remodelled his clay clumsily, those great fingers lack artistic feeling. Meresia is what he has made her. From an angel she will grow into a devil, so soon as the hour is ripe and the clay sets."

(To be continued.)

Signor McCoy, the great and wonderful circus horse whose pranks have caused readers of the BIG BUDGET such laughter, is now at Barnum and Bailey's Circus, Olympia. Those who live in or near London should not miss seeing this magnificent charger.



Latest portrait of said magnificent charger, SIGNOR McCOY.

Digitized by Google

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

SALE NOW OVER SIX MILLIONS YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

THE John Noble

HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES

Worn throughout the World,

are supplied in the following two good cloths:

I. John Noble Costume Coating, and in II. John Noble Cheviot Serge.

PATTERNS and New Costume Album sent POST FREE.

Model 876.

Smart Double-Breasted Coat with Velvet Collar, Tailor skirt, which drapes well. Price 10/6 complete. Sent carriage paid 10/6 and safely packed for 9d. extra. Skirt only 5/6. Carriage 6d.

JOHN NOBLE KNOCKABOUT FROCKS.

Thoroughly well made, with saddle top, long full sleeves and pocket. Lengths and Prices.

21 24 27 30 in.
1/6 2/- 2/6 3/-
33 36 39 42 in.
3/6 4/- 4/6 5/-

Postage 4d. extra.

'Brewer' Caps (all shades), as sketched, 1/-. Ladies' well-knitted Tam o' Shanters at same price.

COLOURS.—Black, Navy, Electric, Brown, Ruby, Myrtle, Cinnamon, Fawn, Grey, Moss, Sage Green, Reseda, and Purple. SIZES IN STOCK are 34, 36, and 38 in. round bust (under arms). Skirts being 38, 40, and 42 in. long in front. Larger or special sizes made to measure, 1/6 extra. Mourning Orders executed and despatched within twelve hours.

Please mention SHORT STORIES when ordering. Bankers: London & Midland Bank.

JOHN NOBLE LTD., BROOK STREET MILLS, MANCHESTER.

£20

Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.

Tobacconists Commencing. See 1lld. Guide (250 pages) 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000. Tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers.

FREE

Send stamped addressed envelope for Price List and receive free, Our Allies Gold Imitation Diamond Pin, in case, for Lady or Gent. Send four stamps to cover packing, etc.

RENNIE & CO., Dept. 11, Croy Place, Glasgow.

7/6 THE "WAVERLEY" SALOON GUN. WITH 100 BALL CARTRIDGES. 7/6

THE "WAVERLEY."

100 Birds or Rabbits can be killed with this gun at a cost of 1/-. Will penetrate a one-inch deal board at 75 to 100 yards; each gun bears the legal proof-mark. Price Lists free. W. R. JACKSON, Arms Manufacturer, 8, Park Avenue Rd., Tottenham, Middlesex. Mention Short Stories.

WADE'S WONDERFUL OFFER

A WATCH FOR NOTHING.

For particulars send for one of my illustrated catalogues. To induce you to send for this I guarantee to supply one of my half-hoop "Black Star" Diamond 18-carat Gold-cased Ladies' Rings for the nominal sum of 1/6. The ring is equal in appearance to one costing 5 guineas. The watch I give away free of charge and the list price for it is 40/-, being composed of Solid Silver cases, and is a reliable time-keeper. This offer is strictly genuine, and I have thousands of testimonials thanking me for my free gifts. Send at once enclosing Postal Order for 1/6, and string size of finger, and address

W. W. WADE,
Gold Exchange, Hammersmith, London, W.

The Best Hair Dye

in the World for Lashes, Eyebrows, and Hair on the Head, with Moustache and Beard. For Ladies' Hair and for all Colours. Had at 3s. 6d., post 3s. 9d., of ALEX. ROSS, 62 Theobald's Road, High Holborn, London, W.C. Spanish Cantharides for fallen hair, 3s. 6d. 5s. 6d. & 10s. 6d.

SULPHOLINE LOTION.

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

A. A sum of from 10/- to 20/- per week offered for spare time to either sex everywhere. Work can be done evenings. Send adoressed envelope to Box 60, Eclipse Works, 89, Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.

Palatable Substitute for Cod Liver Oil.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.

(REALLY GENUINE.)

In Patent Air-tight Tins, ¼lb., 10d.; ½lb., 1s. 4d.; 1lb., 2s. 4d.; including tin and postage.

MRS. CONYERS, MORCHARD BISHOP, DEVON.

NOSE MACHINE.

This is a contrivance by which the short cartilage of the nose is pressed into shape by wearing the instrument an hour daily for a short time. Price 10/6, sent free for stamps. ALEX ROSS, 62, Theobald's Road, London, opposite Bedford Row. Est. 1850. Parcel free from observation.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 183B, High St., Camden Town, London. N.W. 63 Seven Sisters Road. N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

DR. MACKENZIE'S

Deliciously and expensively perfumed, the most luxurious Soap in the World. Produces a most lovely complexion, eradicates spots, pimples, and all imperfections, makes the skin exquisitely clear, and produces the healthy bloom so much desired. It is absolutely harmless, and each tablet is accompanied by a medical certificate.

ARSENICAL 6D. & 1S. PER TABLET.

This Soap prevents the growth of superfluous hairs, removes wrinkles, feeds the skin. You can get it at all the Stores and first-class Chemists. The Family Doctor says it is the most economical beautifier known to Modern Dermatology. It clears away all pimples, spots, redness, or roughness, and makes the skin smooth and clear as a baby's. Use it in the bath and for all Toilet purposes; it is most delicious. For irritable or sensitive skins it is matchless and delightfully soothing.

MADAME PATTI sends her best thanks for Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap, which she finds most excellent—Craig-y-nos Castle, South Wales.

SOAP.

Use also Dr. MACKENZIE'S "ARSICAL" Face Lotion. Beware of many Imitations. Have Dr. MACKENZIE'S or none.

Digitized by Google

YOUR ESTEEMED INQUIRY DULY TO HAND.

THE guinea offered for the most absurd amalgamation of two well-known proverbs has been won by Mr. Joseph Percival, 166, Oldham Road, Ashton-under-Lyne.

BELOW will be found letters and asterisks indicating certain places in the British Isles. Each asterisk represents a letter. To the person who first correctly names the places a guinea will be sent. All attempts to be sent on post-cards. Place the numbers and your solution against each. Date of closing, Monday, January 17th.

1. A * * * * * * N
2. B * * * * * * N
3. C * * * * * N
4. D * * * * * Y
5. L * * * * * * * R

W. K. E.—There is no secret made of the fact that the Pope's yearly income exceeds £600,000, including the numerous "thank offerings" he receives every year from all parts of the globe.

WHEELER writes to point out the singular fact that nearly all cyclists depend principally upon the right foot to push the machine along. "This," he says, "may be proved by examining the balls on a crank axle, those on one side will be found to be worn much more than those on the other. This is owing to the greater strain that is exerted upon the right side."

AN ADMIRER asks: "Why do the officers of the British Army so often appear in mufti when off duty?" ———The reason officers do not constantly wear uniform is that once in a time of absurd irritation that this country should possess so large a standing army, the Duke of Wellington ordered all officers to wear plain clothes when not on duty, so that no one could point to the well-dressed defenders of our country and tremble at their numbers.

E. R.—No, the Bank of England is not the oldest bank in London. Snow's, Hoare's, and Child's were all established some time before it.

MAJOR.—The average edition of a book is a thousand copies.

DOLLY comes along with a frivolingly curious question, which, however, must have perplexed many other of our lady readers at some time or another. "When my lover kisses me," she asks, "is it correct for me to raise my veil?" ———According to the strictest rules of etiquette, you need not, although probably your lover would prefer that you did, and in a question like this his opinion should have first consideration.

VIC wants to know if animals ever faint.———Yes, they do sometimes, but more rarely than human beings. When they do, it is always caused either by extreme physical pain or great heat, and never by a sudden shock to the nervous system, which is not sufficiently high developed.

LANDRAIL.—The expression should always be spelt "all right," and never "alright," as you suggest.

F. S.—The south-west wind prevails more than any other in this country by fifty-four days in the year. This accounts for the fact that many of our forest trees lean towards the east, which is particularly noticeable in the poplar on account of the great softness and flexibility of its wood.

A. L. W. asks: "How is it that people who have red hair are so often possessed of a fiery temperament to match?" ———Scientists say that red hair is a sign of a superabundance of iron in the blood, and that it is the matter that enters the red hair that imparts the vigour, the elasticity, the great vitality, the overflowing, thoroughly healthy animal life which runs through the veins of the ruddy haired, and this strong, sentient animal life is what renders them more intense in their emotions than their more languid fellow creatures.

W. W.—The value of the British Crown jewels is estimated to be about £3,000,000.

YES, PATRICK, you are quite right in asserting that your countrymen are, on an average, taller than either the Scotch or the English. Most people have an idea that the Scotsmen have the palm for stature, but my authority is a very learned professor, who makes it his business to measure representatives of the different races.

T. P. asks: "How much gas does a ton of coal contain?" ———Almost 10,000ft.

NOVICE is invited to a dinner party, and before going he would like to know whether he should offer the right or left arm to the lady he escorts to the dining-room.———It depends upon circumstances: If you have to go down a flight of stairs to reach the dining-room you should offer the lady the arm which is nearer the wall and further away from the banisters, so that her dress may not rub against them. Should, however, the dining-room be upon the ground floor, it would be more correct to offer the right arm.

N. B. D. wants to know if there is any difference between a life "assurance" and a life "insurance."———It is incorrect to speak of a life "insurance" at all; that expression is only used in a policy against fire. A life policy is always spoken of as an "assurance."

K. G.—£10,000 is the yearly salary of the President of the United States.

R. W.—Londoners keep almost as many medical men busy looking after their ailments as do all the inhabitants of Scotland and Ireland put together. This fact disproves your statement that Scotsmen and Irishmen are not healthier than the inhabitants of our great city.

L. P. T. was married a few weeks ago, and writes to ask if I can furnish him with the name and address of the "idiot" who first introduced the shoe-throwing mania on these occasions. He is still suffering from a protuberance upon his head caused by that part of him coming into contact with an old shoe thrown at it by a well-meaning friend, and he would therefore like to interview the originator upon the subject.——— That would be rather a difficult matter, I am afraid, and L. T. P. will have to bottle his wrath this time, for the custom dates back to the time of the Israelites, when an old foot-cover was always included with any property one man might give another. It signifies that the bride's father has now no more control over her.

PEASANT.—The best kind of cow you can keep is a Kerry. For good, all-round usefulness no other breed can beat them.

FABER.—Only three people know the password of the Tower of London, and they are the Queen, the Lord Mayor, and the Constable. This password is sent to the Lord Mayor quarterly, signed by Her Majesty. It is merely a survival of an old custom.

S. Y. asks: "Is the speed of a lion or tiger much greater than that of a man?" ———For a short distance a lion or a tiger can proceed at the rate of a fast horse, and thus easily outstrip a man; but they lose their wind at the end of about half a mile. They have little endurance, and are remarkably weak in lung power.

Notice to Competitors.

IN all Prize Competitions the Editor's decision is final. No correspondence will be entertained when once a competition is finished and the result published.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

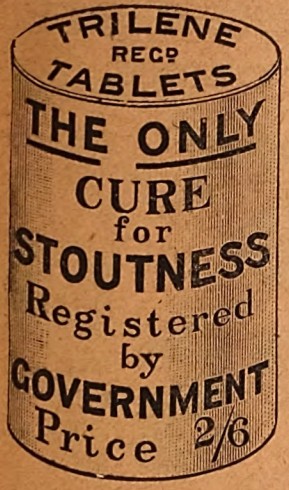
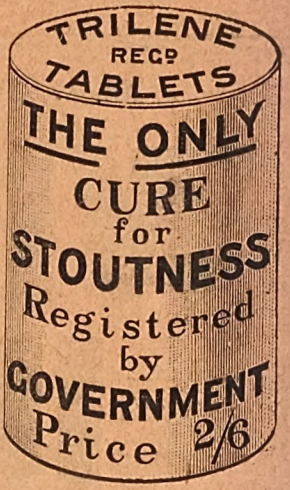
TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY, whether Abdominal or General. They are small, agreeable, harmless, sent privately, and never fail to Improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.



SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87, Alexandra Road, Norwich, Oct. 19th, 1896.

"GENTLEMEN,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them—their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was for many years growing too stout; but although the disease was, I consider, chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely. You have our united thanks; and if I can do anything to promote your interests, I will freely use my utmost endeavours to do so.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

PRINCESS LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me directly your excellent Tablets."

SURGEON-COLONEL E. S. BRANDER, M.D., writes from Ihansi, India: "September 12th, 1897. In my experience your Tablets form an efficient remedy for reducing weight."

LADY CONEAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

MRS. BOSTON, of Clifford Street, South Wigston, Leicester, writes: "I am much thinner and lighter in myself since taking your Tablets."

W. G. LOVE, 4, Kirk Street, Peterhead, N.B., says: "I finished Tablets a fortnight ago, and am reduced a great deal—never felt better in my life."

Convalescent Home, New Brighton, Cheshire.

MISS S. J. PRITCHARD says: "They have done me much good. I am 2lb. lighter already."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk either by means of severe dieting or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a case of the wonderful Trilene Tablets, which are guaranteed absolutely harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, or any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing Cure for Obesity. The Tablets are sold in boxes at 2s. 6d., and are obtainable from the Trilene Company, 66, Finsbury Pavement, London."

25, Windsor Terrace, Penarth, Cardiff.

MISS M. FLAVELL says: "I have lost 2st., and am much better in health."

Windsor Hotel, Merthyr Vale, South Wales.

MR. J. THOMAS writes: "When I started the Tablets I weighed 17½st., and have got down to 14st. 9lb."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

MR. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

MRS. HUTCHINSON, 46, Irwell Street, Widnes, Lancashire, writes: "I have taken three boxes and am reduced 2st."

A. D. BILLINGS, Bell Inn, Aldershot, writes: "Have derived great benefit already. Less in size and weight, breathing greatly improved."

MISS WELLS, Aldeburgh Hall, Saxmundham, writes: "I am pleased to say I receive great benefit from them."

MISS DUGGLEBY, 16, New Road, Driffield, writes: "The girl who took your Tablets is reduced about 2½st."

MISS C. E. SINGLETON, 3, Courtenay Terrace, Teignmouth, says: "They have done me a great deal of good, and I will do my best to make them known. You may use this letter as you please."

MISS MACPHERSON, Balnagowan Lodge, Methuen, Perth, says: "I have taken one box, and am reduced 1st."

MRS. EDMONDS, Pontyguesta, Pontychin, Llantrissant, says: "I have lost more than a stone in a very short time."

MARIAN TAYLOR, Church Farm, St. James, Halesworth, says: "I have lost quite 2st. since taking your Tablets."

MISS GILLESPIE, 50, Chaucer Road, Forest Gate, Essex, says: "I have lost just 3st."

E. NICHOLSON, Crossfield, Staniland, Halifax, says: "I am pleased to say your Tablets are lessening my size very much, and my two sisters are going in for your pleasant treatment."

COUNTESS G. FÜRSTENBERG, of Stammheim, Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

Digitized by Google

GLASGOW; and St. Georg 's House, Eastcheap, LONDON, E.C.

Dr. WILSON'S PURE SOLIDIFIED CACAO

Invaluable for Singers, Speakers, and also for Consumptives. Delicious as a Beverage, and Efficacious as Cod Liver Oil.

SOLD BY LEADING CHEMISTS AND GROCERS.

Wholesale: Hanson's, London.

ENTIRELY NEW PROCESS.

WILLIAMS' INVALID'S TEA

Established 1875.

Invalids, as well as those in health may enjoy drinking this tea without the least fear of the injurious effects which so frequently result from using other teas.

Invaluable to persons of weak digestion.

Price 2s. per lb.; 20lb. 2d. per lb. less.

3lb. and upwards sent Carriage Paid. Terms Cash.

Bankers: London & Midland Bank Limited. (Mention Paper.)

J. WILLIAMS, Tea Merchant, WAIN HOUSE, TONYPANDY.

ZEBRA Grate Polish.

EASY WORK for Servants.

"THE GIRL WITH THE EYELASHES" is the title of the novel in this week's "LOVE STORIES." ½d.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY G. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 473. FOR WEEK ENDING JANUARY 22ND, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

BOVRIL

IS STRENGTH, AND FORTIFIES THE SYSTEM AGAINST COLDS, CHILLS, AND PREVALENT AILMENTS.

MAKES MUSCLE, INCREASES VITALITY, MAINTAINS HEALTH, SUSTAINS INVALIDS, AND IS POWERFUL AND INVIGORATING.

Digitized by Google

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Horsleigh Street, London, W.C.

"Its food value is double that of Bread made from ordinary wheaten flour."—Lancet.

HOVIS BREAD

will not only help to improve your digestion and consequently your health, but will also bring back that energetic and happy feeling of good health. Man does not live a natural life, so a good portion of a natural food, in the shape of HOVIS, at each meal will largely counteract the bad influence that modern life has upon the health and digestive organs. This is not an idle remark, but a proved statement, daily being verified.

HOVIS is baked and sold by all good class Bakers. No loaf genuine unless stamped HOVIS. 6d. and 1/- samples of Bread and Biscuits sent on receipt of stamps by

S. FITTON & SON, Millers, Macclesfield.

MAKE FRUIT WINES AT HOME.

Ask for MASON'S.

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. THE VERY BEST.

MASON'S GINGER WINE ESSENCE.

A Sixpenny Bottle will, in six minutes, make sixty glasses of Delicious, Non-Alcoholic Wine. Agents Wanted.

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

MASON'S (NOTTINGHAM) COFFEE ESSENCE (THE BEST MADE)

MASON'S WINE ESSENCES are made in all Fruit Flavours, Ginger, Lemon, Orange, Blackberry, etc.

YOU WON'T BE DISAPPOINTED.

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

The Best Hair Dye in the World for Lashes, Eyebrows, and Hair on the Head, with Moustache and Beard. For Ladies' Hair and for all Colours. Had at 3s. 6d., post 3s. 9d., of ALEX. ROSS, 62 Theobald's Road, High Holborn, London, W.C. Spanish Cantharides for fallen hair, 3s. 6d. 5s. 6d, & 10s. 6d.

NOSE MACHINE. This is a contrivance by which the short cartilage of the nose is pressed into shape by wearing the instrument an hour daily for a short time. Price 10/6, sent free for stamps. ALEX ROSS, 62, Theobald's Road, London, opposite Bedford Row. Est. 1850. Parcel free from observation.

£20 Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free. Tobacconists Commencing. S... Illd. Guide (250 pages) 3d. E... to open a cigar store, £20 to £2... Tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, Londo... The largest and original house ... years reputation. Mgr., H. Myer...

SULPHOLINE LOTION. For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance. SHILLING BOTTLES.

EPPS'S GRATEFUL—COMFORTING. COCOA

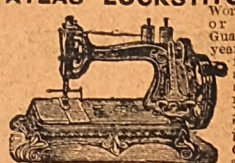
Palatable Substitute for Cod Liver Oil. DEVONSHIRE CREAM (REALLY GENUINE.) In Patent Air-tight Tins, ½lb., 10d.; 1lb., 1s. 4d. 1lb., 2s. 4d.; including tin and postage. MRS. CONYERS MORCHARD BISHOP DEVON.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and finish to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of £... P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for design and Samples of work.



39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 183B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W. 63 Seven Sisters Road, N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn

SEV'EN PRIZE MEDALS.

These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. An assorted sample box for 7 stamps from the works, Birmingham.

DR. MACKENZIE'S ARSENICAL SOAP. 6D. & 1s. PER TABLET.

Deliciously and expensively perfumed, the most luxurious Soap in the World. Produces a most lovely complexion, eradicates spots, pimples, and all imperfections, makes the skin exquisitely clear, and produces the healthy bloom so much desired. It is absolutely harmless, and each tablet is accompanied by a medical certificate.

This Soap prevents the growth of superfluous hairs, removes wrinkles, feeds the skin. You can get it at all the Stores and first-class Chemists. The Family Doctor says it is the most economical beautifier known to Modern Dermatology. It clears away all pimples, spots, redness, or roughness, and makes the skin smooth and clear as a baby's. Use it in the bath and for all Toilet purposes; it is most delicious.

For irritable or sensitive skins it is matchless and delightfully soothing.

MADAME PATTI sends her best thanks for Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap, which she finds most excellent—Craig-y-nos Castle, South Wales.

Use also Dr. MACKENZIE'S "ARSICAL" Face Lotion. Beware of many Imitations. Have Dr. MACKENZIE'S or none.

ALL FAT PEOPLE Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably"

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

MR. CLAUDE CARTER, of Thorn House, Johnstone, N.B., says: "Your Tablets much reduced my weight and I have been waiting to see if it was permanent, and so it has proved."

Mr. CANHAM, 87, Alexandra Road, Norwich, says: "Tablets cured my wife two years ago of extreme stoutness. It has never returned.

MARION TAYLOR, of Church Farm, St. James, Holesworth, says: "Have lost quite two stone."

A. PEEL, of Darley Hydro, Matlock, writes: "They have reduced and benefited me a good deal."

Miss MONEY, Broadway House, Newbury. "I am greatly reduced in weight."

Mr. G. Lewis, 4, Kirk Street, Peterhead. "I think them wonderful not only to reduce fat but as a medicine."

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

No. 473.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week ending January 22nd, 1898.

FITZHUGH:

CLOWN AND JUGGLER.

YOUNG FITZHUGH was a man of his word; and now that he found the amateur circus was an assured thing—in fact, was to come off within the week—he determined to do his best for its success according to his promise.

To be sure, if he chose to back out, it might well be said in his defence that the promise had been extracted from him under pressure; also, that when he had said he would lend a hand in any way the committee might see fit, the duty of impersonating a clown had not been presented to him as a possibility.

The committee had treated him shabbily, he felt. To run about a ring with a white face and a bald white head seemed almost indecent. To turn somersaults, perform tricks, and "in general"—in the language used in describing to him his duties—"to give the affair a dash and swing, and to fill up the necessary pauses in the performance with any tumbling and devilry that his imagination might suggest," this, he feared, was beyond him. However, he would stick to his word.

There was some comfort in the fact that Cushing was to be the other clown. Cushing, by-the-way, was delighted with the prospect; he was something of an acrobat, and at the Athletic Club had been known to turn several hand-springs in succession. To be sure, he would afterwards sit for some minutes on the edge of the mattress, panting for breath, and at the second attempt rarely succeeded in more than two somersaults, the last ending usually on his back—which was amateurish. However, as this was more than any man in the club could do, he had come to regard himself as a sort of phenomenon. He had other accomplishments; he could balance a wand on the end of his nose, could keep a dull knife and two billiard balls in the air at once, and had been known occasionally even to rise from a sitting posture to his feet, without interfering with his jugglery by losing more than one billiard ball, or possibly the knife.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

For these reasons, and with the expectation of adding to his répertoire in the next few days, he was enabled to look forward to the night of performance with a pleasant confidence.

Satisfied beyond doubt of completely extinguishing any attempts of Fitzhugh, indeed, of casting him quite into the shade, as the days went by he even became distressed for his chum, who appeared to be giving the matter absolutely no thought.

"Look here, Fitzhugh, my boy!" he had said, "you aren't a blooming genius. You can't expect inspiration on the moment. Here I've been working night and day, and in spite of a natural gift for the thing, you know, I really doubt very much if, after all, I shall be extremely remarkable. Come," he cried, moved by a spirit of generosity and snatching up a knife, "let me show you how to cut yourself in two; immensely effective, I assure you."

But Fitzhugh had only yawned and said he thought he'd go home to bed; and as he strolled away from the club, he left his friend shaking his head sadly—the knife still in his hand.

It was after midnight when Fitzhugh reached his house in Marlborough Street, and let himself in with his latch-key. The servants were in bed, and he proceeded at once to his rooms on the second floor, looking about him expectantly. Yes, there they were, sent home that evening as he had directed—a number of packages from the costumiers, and in a corner, leaning against the wall, his wonderful new legs, finished just in time, as the performance was to come off the next night.

In fact, Fitzhugh had not been as idle as Cushing had thought. For the past week he had been shut up for hours each day in the workshop of a master carpenter and at great expense had had these legs built.

He felt that they were to be the novelty of the show.

They were undoubtedly curious affairs; a sort of stilt, to be strapped on the feet and legs, and on which, upon touching a spring, he would slowly mount into the air, his trousers keeping pace with his growth until he had reached an enormous elevation. Upon touching another spring these stilts would apparently shrink, double up, as it were, upon themselves, his trousers falling in many folds about his feet, as he gradually resumed his height.

He considered that there would be something striking in this gradual stretching out of his person, and hoped that to do this at various intervals throughout the evening might, perhaps, compensate for his inefficiency in other respects. When he was not growing, he intended to sit quietly on the edge of the ring and watch Cushing make a fool of himself.

It was a warm night; Fitzhugh opened his windows and determined to have a dress rehearsal. He whitened his face, making his eyes and mouth look rather more ghastly than necessary, by the use of red paint; he then stretched over his hair a piece of white kid, which he plastered tightly across his forehead, and fastened at the back of his neck and above his ears. A pair of bushy white eyebrows, which he next put on were extremely effective.

His clothes were all white, and consisted of a loose upper garment and a pair of baggy breeches, which, when he thrust his hands into the hip pockets and distended them laterally, attained an additional breadth that was amazing. He strapped the patent legs on first, and then put the baggy breeches over them.

These legs had broad wooden feet and were embellished with white kid slippers and pink rosettes. A tall, white felt hat completed his equipment. Then, standing before a mirror, he touched the spring and watched.

His eyes naturally were fixed upon his limbs; these grew beautifully and were giving him exquisite satisfaction, when, happening to look up, he was horrified to observe that his head was nowhere to be seen, having passed the level of the glass. In a second he felt the ceiling pressing his cap tightly over his eyes. There was not a moment to lose. With a quick movement he threw himself into a chair, and placing his legs on the window-sill, was gratified to observe the white kid slippers slowly disappear into the night.

Apparently at a distance of eight or ten feet they came to a stop. It was a close shave; his extremities shuddered for a moment, nervously, and one of the slippers was shaken off and fell into the yard below. This annoyed him.

He waited patiently for several minutes, but, observing no further change, he with some difficulty found the proper spring, and touching this, saw his feet gradually withdraw into the room until he was restored to a Christian length.

For some time he rested in his chair, puffing quietly at his pipe. Then he decided to go and hunt up the slipper. He groped his way clumsily downstairs and out into the yard, where the moon was shining brightly and the air was crisp and pleasant. It was a great relief from the hot room above, and he leant easily against the house, chuckling as he thought of his startling reflection in the mirror, and of the prodigious effect he would create the next night. He smoked his pipe and meditated with satisfaction over Cushing's somersaults and jugglery.

Circuses, after all, weren't half bad.

Suddenly he heard a heavy footfall and the noise of a key thrust into a lock; the next moment the gate of the yard swung slowly open, and a man entered.

Fitzhugh was a man who thought quickly; he knew it must be the night watchman, an arrant old coward, and on the instant he decided upon his course of action.

Retreat was impossible; to explain his identity under such a disguise was not to be thought of. Besides, here was a dress rehearsal with a vengeance, an opportunity of putting his costume and legs to a most critical test. He determined to do them full justice.

The watchman slowly entered the yard, humming a tune and jingling his keys, after the habit of his race, as a warning to thieves to take themselves off and avoid a mutually unpleasant encounter. Fitzhugh crouched close against the wall and waited until the man was well within the yard; then, with a low, hollow sound, such as he fancied would be appropriate, he stepped into view and touching the spring, began slowly to mount towards the sky.

It must have been a wonderful sight, this bald, white creature, with bushy white eyebrows, and ghastly mouth (not to mention the huge white slippers and the pink rosettes), lit up by the moon's light, and slowly towering higher and higher into the air. When half way he unexpectedly extended his breeches, upon which the watchman sank in a heap on the pavement.

Digitized by Google

So far all had gone well; his costume was a pronounced success, and Fitzhugh should have been content to withdraw quietly indoors. It was very certain he would not be pursued. But unluckily his appetite was merely whetted, and shaking himself to make sure that the mechanism was intact, he proceeded to bear down upon the unfortunate man, working his mouth into the most dreadful contortions, and spreading his breeches until they looked like spinnakers on either side of an attenuated mast.

The outcome was disastrous. Flesh and blood could not stand such a sight. With a howl so blood-curdling and sustained, that the whole neighbourhood at once sat up in their beds, the watchman, now little better than a madman, discharged his revolver into the air, and rushed, howling, from the alley.

Fitzhugh got back to his room with what speed he could, and rang for his man, who bandaged his arm, and unstrapped and washed him, and helped him to a sofa. The next morning he was ordered to bed by his doctor, and placed on hot water bottles, and a diet of milk.

* * * * *

It was nearly eight o'clock in the evening, and Fitzhugh lay stretched out in his bed, gazing critically at apparently the very same object that had had such a disastrous effect upon the watchman the night before, except that this object had attained his growth, and appeared to be pretty much of the height of Fitzhugh in a normal state.

"Yes, you'll do," said Fitzhugh slowly, and then continued with more animation: "Now, mind your directions; the slighest slip, the mere opening of your mouth, might make a hash of the whole business. The show begins at eight o'clock. You are to drive to the hall in my brougham, which will await your return, and, as it is now just five minutes before the hour, you are sure to find the thing in full blast and the way clear by the time you arrive. You must leave in the same way, a little before the end, for the danger of a chance encounter with one of the performers, and especially with the other clown, is what is most to be dreaded. So much for that. As to what you do in the ring, I don't care much. Turn a few somersaults—by the way, do you juggle, play with billiard balls and knives and such things in the air?"

"Yes," said the man quietly.

"Ah! that's capital. Cushing will be charmed with you. I will leave the particulars to you, then. But remember, make your exit early, and drive back here, so that I may hear the news and pay you the money." The man made an odd, foreign bow, and left the room, and in a moment Fitzhugh heard the brougham drive rapidly away.

He leant back on the pillows with a sigh of relief. His arm pained a good deal, for the watchman's bullet had made a nasty wound, over which at another time he would have growled savagely. As it was, however, he had given it little thought through the day, for he had been entirely absorbed in his plans for the evening. It was useless to notify the committee; to say that he was laid up, that, much to his disappointment, it would be impossible for him to take part in the show; and then upon inquiry refuse to give any particulars as to the cause of his indisposition, would have been at once to pronounce himself a sham. His preparations for the affair had been so desultory that, as he well knew, his eagerness to participate could never stand such a test. Of course, to describe the episode with the watchman was impossible. No, there must be a substitute of his own getting, who must be palmed off as himself.

But whom to get! Savage knew everything. He called his man, told him what he wanted, and sent him off with directions to agree to any terms so long as he found a decent, respectable fellow who would not disgrace him. And the fellow was obtained, as we have seen, and his name—though this Fitzhugh did not as yet know—appeared on the posters as "Mons. Callistrau," a gentleman who was at that time drawing an enormous salary at the Palace of Pleasure in Tremont Street, and was generally considered to be the most wonderful juggler and master of legerdemain that the world had ever seen. He had at first refused Savage's offers, but eventually agreed to a sufficiently enticing figure, and one that later made Fitzhugh feel as if he had been hiring an assassin, at the least. However, the man was conscientious, and went to the circus and excelled himself.

He reached the ring a little late. He was under the impression that the other clown at the time was standing calmly and unflinchingly on his head—an addition to his répertoire; however, he soon forgot everything in the heat of his performance.

On his entrance, he attracted to himself the attention of the house by turning a series of easy, graceful somersaults from one end of the ring to the other, ending at the very edge, with a low bow and a sweep of the hand. It was merely what one can see any time at the professional circus, yet such agility in Fitzhugh aroused much astonishment. There was loud applause and shouts of "Bravo! bravo! old man!" from his men friends in the audience. Cushing, as he saw Fitzhugh turning lightly over the sawdust like an animated cart wheel, had at once come to his feet and stood gaping with astonishment.

But Fitzhugh was evidently bent on work, and behaved like a man well accustomed to applause, treating it at times with scant notice, but occasionally acknowledging the appreciation of his audience by sweeping bows made to all corners of the hall.

It would be tedious, and indeed impossible, to describe his performances in detail. They were naturally of a marvellous skill, and in the course of half-an-hour he held the entire audience and all the performers spellbound. Cushing had long forgotten all about his cunning little tricks, and was seated on a heap of sawdust at one side of the ring, lost in astonishment and admiration.

Not for a moment did the performer appear to notice the effect he was producing; he was calm, unhesitating, and trick succeeded trick with scarcely a pause or intermission. Men and women shuddered as they watched him toss long, skewer-like knives into the air and keep them spinning round and round with the rapidity and symmetry of a revolving wheel. Men who had travelled and seen the exhibitions of the practised jugglers of the East told each other that never had they seen anything to equal this daring and demoniac skill.

It was nearly nine; the man was again playing with the knives, and was in the performance of a marvellously intricate feat, when a bunch of violets, thrown by some enthusiastic and excited woman, struck him full in the face; for the moment he was blinded and helpless, his hands groping at random in the air, and the knives falling about him in a shower; one scratched his hand, and another struck him fairly on the arm, burying its long, sharp blade deep into the flesh. He uttered a cry, and drawing forth the knife threw it aside, and for a moment stood irresolute, the blood flowing freely from the wound. Then, snatching up the flowers, he bowed bravely, and turning, literally ran from the ring. The others followed, but he ran only the faster on through a long corridor, past the officer at the door and out into the street, where he was seen to jump into Fitzhugh's carriage and drive away.

Digitized by Google

Fitzhugh learnt little of the affair that night; the man, when he reached him, was weary and anxious to get away to his home; he described his wound as a scratch and stated briefly how it happened, and Fitzhugh paid him his money and let him go, making sure, first, that his identity had been in no way disclosed. He then slept happily through the night.

On the next morning, however, his trials began. By the first mail he was deluged with letters: letters from girls and from men, expressive of sympathy for his accident, and of unbounded praise; several boxes of flowers arrived through the day. The newspapers, too, were full of him, and one in particular fairly threw him into a fever, one in which for some reason he was portrayed in tights, with curly hair and firm countenance, knives flying about him, and one quivering in his arm. But it was not until several days later, when, with his arm in the sling, he went into his club for breakfast, that he realised the extent of his fame and the terrible nature of his punishment.

The men crowded round him as he entered the room, and stood about in a semi-circle as he sat down to his eggs and coffee, praising, questioning, blaming him for his years of non-activity, anticipating other performances in the near future, until Cushing, who alone in a corner was earnestly endeavouring to perfect himself in a certain feat involving a carafe of water and several dinner plates, unwittingly created a diversion much longed for by his friend, by dropping everything upon the floor.

It was in vain Fitzhugh pooh-poohed the matter, and said that any of them could do as well with a little practice. They only called him modest, and this put him in a rage. As he walked home sadly, many heads were thrust out of carriage windows, nodding to him brightly; sometimes a neatly gloved hand was waved, or two, perhaps, were placed palm to palm in token of applause. He was very unhappy; and when he reached his rooms and thought of the weeks that were before him, he made up his mind, in his usual impulsive way, to turn and run, to go abroad, and stay there until the affair was quite forgotten. Even this was a gloomy enough outlook, for he must go alone, of course.

Any companion he might find among his friends would be sure to hang upon the old tale, in fact would, in all probability, some stormy night, introduce him in the saloon to the entire ship's company as a very possible source of entertainment, and with an elaborate description of his former success.

So, by the first ship he sailed for Naples, without a good-bye or a word to anyone. That same evening at the club a lot of men were seated about a table smoking, when Cushing broke into the silence with a sudden inspiration.

"I have it!" he cried; "you fellows are wondering why Fitzhugh has gone abroad. It's the simplest thing in the world. Don't you see, the man is just brimful of ambition, and I'll bet a fortune he has gone off to India to study some new tricks from those skinny beggars—dervishes, you know. That's the trouble with this sleight-of-hand business," he went on, fingering nervously his cigar, a box of matches, and a small china ash receiver; "it grows on a man, becomes a sort of craving. If I had half of his natural ability, if I was not such a clumsy brute"—here the little ash receiver fell to the floor with a crash—"why, hang me if I would not have gone along with him myself!"

W. MACPHERSON WILTBANK.

BIBLIOTHECA BODLEIANA

Digitized by Google

SIXTY or more years ago there flourished in France a class of bullies, the most detestable one could conceive, men who had perfected themselves in the use of arms, who gleefully boasted of the number of people they had done to death, and took rank accordingly, as a Red Indian brave takes rank by the number of scalps in his girdle.

One of these bravos, who styled himself Jules de la Magny, took up his residence in Lyons. Magny was a man of about forty, tall, rather slim, and of a military bearing. His very features, it was said, were intimidatory, his pale face, without a speck of colour, being crowned by coal black hair. His eyes were blacker still, and gave him a sinister aspect, which was increased when he assumed his cold smile. This scoundrel, who dressed elegantly, who dined on the best—he preyed on a rich widow, who adored him—and affected the most elegant and aristocratic manners, boasted that he meant to kill eight men before the year closed.

"I have a method," he said, "the method of progression. Last year it was seven, this year eight. Behold, it is September, and I have only accounted for five, so this city must supply me with three."

Incredible as it may seem, the picture is not overdrawn; these fiendish butchers, with their sensitive "honour," were regardless of life as an Eastern despot.

Monsieur de Magny opened his campaign at Lyons with a duel that pleased the citizens. There was already a minor bully in the town, who called himself Captain Ferreuse, and who had terrorised the law-abiding for some time.

It was only a week after De Magny's advent in the town that he insulted Captain Ferreuse in the Palais Café—the swell café of the city—one evening. He sat down at the same table as the captain, called for a glass of wine, and, when it was brought to him, swept the captain's glass off the table with his cane, saying to the waiter:

"Request this fellow to find another table, garçon, I like not the society of canaille (the scum)."

The captain replied by taking up De Magny's glass and throwing its contents in his face. Monsieur only smiled his cold smile, and wiped his face delicately with his perfumed handkerchief. The meeting took place an hour or two later, and, after a few passes, the captain fell with a gaping wound in his throat.

Decent people congratulated themselves, but soon they found that they only exchanged King Log for King Stork, and no man was safe.

Of course De Magny had his friends—there were always to be found a dozen or two who looked to him as their leader and chief and took pride from being recognised as a friend of so redoubtable a man.

Ernest Soleau was a young doctor in the city—a most able young man, who was steadily making a name for himself. He was respected by his equals and almost loved by the poor, from whom he would take no fee. Shortly after De Magny's advent to the City he was married, after a year's engagement, to a beautiful and charming girl, the daughter of a deceased colonel.

They were passionately devoted to each other, and it was a pure love match. They spent their honeymoon in Italy, where they stayed six weeks, it being the first holiday the doctor had given himself in three years.

On a Sunday afternoon, a week after their return, they were enjoying the sunshine in the public park. They were seated talking and laughing merrily, when by evil fortune Monsieur de Magny came by. Now it happened that on the day of his return Dr. Soleau had been called in to attend the seventh victim of De Magny, a barrister, who had been wantonly insulted and then killed.

The Doctor, as the bravo passed, could not help showing his loathing. The cold smile that meant death came on the face of the bully. He walked on a few yards, then turned back, and, ignoring the husband, he stopped before Madame Soleau, and with well-simulated politeness, said:

Digitized by Google

"Good afternoon, madame; with your permission I will seat myself beside you, and we will chat together. I love to talk to the beautiful," with another bow.

Estelle, who had never heard of the bravo, turned her inquiring eyes on her husband, thinking the man was either drunk or a madman. Soleau's face became frightfully pale, and he controlled himself with the greatest difficulty, understanding well that De Magny was seeking to insult him.

"Monsieur," he said, "you are speaking to my wife, and you are offensive. Pray leave us."

De Magny affected neither to notice nor hear him. "Will madame give me permission to sit beside her or will she take my arm for a stroll? I find madame charming, and I adore charming women," and he made her another sweeping bow.

"Go away! go away!" said Estelle, now thoroughly alarmed.

"Monsieur, you are grossly offensive, I tell you," said Soleau, trembling with restrained passion. "Your behaviour is that of a cad."

"Ah," said De Magny, still affecting to ignore the husband, "madame is fatigued, and does not care to talk, I will leave madame, and will call upon her this evening. But permit me to anticipate this evening," and before husband and wife could guess what was coming, he had kissed her.

With a spring like a tiger's, Soleau was on him, beating him wildly about the face with his fists. Estelle screamed in terror, and several people who had witnessed the altercation at a little distance came up. De Magny, with a confused face, but with his demon's smile, had disengaged himself, and was asking for satisfaction.

"Satisfaction! Yes," cried the young doctor, "satisfaction and your deserts!"

The meeting took place early the next morning. There could only be one result—considering between disparity and skill, it was a duel between wolf and lamb. With the glee of a fiend, De Magny played with his victim, giving him a wound for every blow, as he said, finishing with a thrust in the left side. Ten minutes later Estelle was a widow.

It was not until her husband was brought home to her dead that she learnt that he had gone out to inevitable death, that De Magny had purposely insulted her, and it was, in fact, most deliberate murder, sanctioned by the false code of so-called "honour," under which the vilest and most bloodthirsty wretches could commit the most inhuman murders with impunity.

It was the most heartrending tragedy those present, when the body was taken home, had ever witnessed. In her eyes there was none like her husband, so clever, so handsome, so sure of becoming one of France's great sons. And now he lay dead by the hand of a vile monster.

She knelt beside the corpse, calling on him, now in yearning accents, now in the softest and gentlest tones of entreaty, now with a smile, to speak to her, to say one word. Mercifully she fell beside him. For a week she lay unconscious on the verge of death, and only by most devoted and skilful attention of a professional friend of her husband—Dr. Leres—was her life saved.

"You have been cruelly kind," she said to him when she was recovering. "It would have been truer kindness to let me die. But now I have been restored to life, I will devote it to ridding the earth of that monster. He shall die—by a just Heaven, I swear it!"

"Dear madame," said the doctor, "dismiss all such thoughts. I see what you mean. You would assassinate him, and the law would have no pity on you. You would be a victim."

"Doctor," she said firmly, "he shall die!"

Madame Soleau gained strength slowly. She would go away for a change, she said, and one day she set out for Paris. Dr. Leres was glad, feeling certain that she had forgotten her vow.

One evening, seven months later, just after another scandalous "affair" of De Magny's, a handsome and unknown young gentleman entered the Palais Café at Lyons. The newcomer, who, to judge by his tone, was a mere boy, walked with much swagger, talked loudly and authoritatively, and altogether conducted himself with aristocratic insolence.

A little later De Magny entered with three of his particular friends. The stranger favoured them with a rude stare that did not pass unnoticed. In a few minutes he got up to go. He went a little out of his way to pass near where the four were sitting, and when close to De Magny he stumbled, or pretended to stumble—none of the onlookers doubted for a moment that it was intentional—and lurched against him as he was raising a glass of wine to his lips. The consequence was that the liquid was spilt on the duellist's immaculate shirt and silken waistcoat. He turned round as if he had been stung.

Throwing its contents in his face.

"Monsieur!" he cried to the young fellow, who stood with an innocently proud smile on his features.

"Monsieur!" said the Unknown.

"Monsieur!" said De Magny more furious than his friends had ever seen him. "You will apologise for your rudeness or clumsiness, which ever it be."

"Monsieur! I never apologise for accidents!"

There was the stillness of death in the café. It was evident that the reckless stranger knew not the fearsome reputation of De Magny.

"Monsieur, you will apologise, or——"

"Monsieur, I never apologise——"

"Nor do I apologise for that!" cried De Magny, in a tempest of rage, as he picked up a friend's glass and flung its contents in his opponent's face.

The youngster calmly wiped his face. "Monsieur has wantonly insulted me," he said. "I shall demand satisfaction."

Digitized by Google

"Willingly," said De Magny with his terrible, icy smile. "I shall kill you, puppy."

"Perhaps, pig," retorted the other calmly, and then, turning to the spectators, he asked in a clear voice: "Are there any gentlemen here who will act for a stranger of good birth who has no friends at hand?"

There was a little hesitation, then two gentlemen, one a notary, the other a silk merchant, signified that they would.

"Thank you, gentlemen. Shall we confer outside?" said the young fellow, who led the way.

"My dear sir," said the notary with agitation, "I warn you, you will be killed," and in trembling accents he told of De Magny's reputation and many villainies.

The Unknown heard him with a smile. "Thank you," he said. "I have heard of him, and that is why I came here. Before this time to-morrow you will be well rid of him. For I shall kill him, gentlemen; the good God shall aid me. I am the insulted party, and select pistols. Arrange it as you will; I can trust you without reserve. You will find me at the café opposite. And allow me to express the deepest gratitude for your kindness."

Again they tried to explain, but the Unknown would not listen, and with heavy hearts they went to confer with De Magny's seconds. In half-an-hour they were back. It was to be a duel with pistols at ten paces in the garden behind the Palais; the time, midnight. The seconds were to toss for the first shot.

"Thank you, gentlemen, you have done me great service. And now, if you please, we will have supper."

* * * * *

Just before midnight they walked across to the Palais, and were admitted through a private entrance into the garden, where presently De Magny, his seconds, and Dr. Leres were awaiting them. Dr. Leres had been obtained by the notary on the suggestion of the Unknown.

The preliminaries were soon arranged, and the respective seconds threw the dice for the right of first fire. De Magny's second threw a three, the stranger's five.

"You have the right to fire first, M. Inconnu," said the notary.

A smile of satisfaction overspread his features. "Ah, I knew it!" he cried, in a tone of absolute conviction. "It is the finger of God."

The five spectators looked at De Magny. For the first time, it is said, a look of anxiety, even of fear, was observed on his features. He was tinged with superstition, and the Unknown's confidence had shaken his nerve, and in vain did he try to appear unconcerned.

They had been placed opposite to each other, when the Unknown said to the notary: "Monsieur, fire off my pistol, if you please, and load afresh. There must be no mishaps."

A protest was raised by De Magny's seconds that it was irregular, but the Unknown insisted, and after some argument and appeals to the law and etiquette of duelling, both pistols were fired off. Strange to say, when the trigger was pulled the pistol of M. Inconnu missed fire, and a fresh cap had to be placed on it before it was discharged.

"You see," said he, "there would have been a mishap, and God's purposes would have been frustrated."

Once more the pistols were loaded, and again the duellists took their places. The incident had further affected the bravo, and his face was ghastly.

"Inconnu, fire!"

The Unknown slowly raised his pistol until it was pointed at De Magny's heart. He held it there for a quarter of a minute, his arm as rigid as a bar of steel, then he lowered it again.

"Monsieur," he said slowly and coldly to his antagonist, "God has made me His minister to end your crimes. But I fire especially to avenge Dr. Soleau, whom you wantonly assassinated."

And again he raised the pistol, this time pointing it at De Magny's forehead. The latter was almost in a state of collapse, and as the Unknown pulled the trigger, contrary to the regulations that had been made, he lifted his pistol and fired. It was almost a simultaneous report. De Magny's ball passed through the left arm of the Unknown, breaking the bone, but at the same instant he gave a leap in the air, and fell dead! The bullet had passed exactly between the eyes.

"Infamous! Infamous!" cried the notary to De Magny's seconds. "A scoundrel act!"

"What matters it?" said the Unknown solemnly, "he has been executed." And then his face turned ghastly, as if he were about to faint. In an instant Dr. Leres was at his side, ripped open the sleeve with his penknife, and began to examine the wound.

"The infernal scoundrel!" he cried.

"He has died as he has lived, Dr. Leres," said the Unknown. "Do you not know me?"

The doctor peered keenly into his face, then started back. "It—it cannot be!" he cried.

"But it is," said the Unknown. "I am Estelle Soleau, the unhappy widow of that scoundrel's victim. I have kept my oath. But it will not bring Ernest back," and she fainted.

* * * * *

There was much incredible news for the city next morning that many would not believe until the seconds had been interviewed, and then the rejoicing was great. Mme. Soleau's act touched the popular imagination, and the bulletins as to her condition were scanned as eagerly as if they concerned the health of a crowned head.

It was a dangerous wound, and it was only after weeks of anxiety that all danger was pronounced at an end.

A fortnight later she took the veil, not to live in seclusion, but to devote herself to the poor and needy in the slums of Paris.

J. HARTLAND.

IF YOU WANT A SITUATION WITH £200 A YEAR SALARY,
ENTER FOR THE COMPETITION ANNOUNCED IN PEARSON'S WEEKLY.

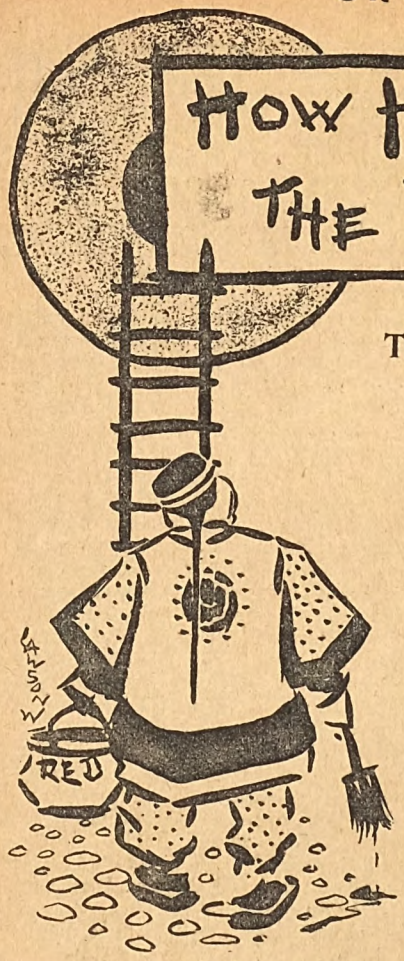
Digitized by Google



How Hwang Tak taught the Emperor's Mule to Speak.

Told by Che Fu, at the Club of the Green Tea Merchants, Shanghai.

Nothing was certain but confusion. The Palace was in commotion. The Cook was in disgrace; the Court Juggler was in prison. Consternation had seized upon the Harem.

A most untoward event had befallen.

Light of the Eyes, the favourite son of the great Emperor, Qwong See—the only child of his beloved Narcissus, the Golden Lily of China—would not eat his breakfast. The Imperial kitchen had been ransacked in cupboard and corner. Its choicest delicacies had been set before him in vain. With an imperious gesture of his arm he had motioned them away.

Jellied bird's nest and sharks' fins à la Hong Kew he refused even to look at. Candied sucking pig, a dish prepared by the chef's own hands for the Emperor's own table, the young gentleman had only toyed with, finally sending away the bonne bouche untasted.

The kitchen was in despair. The cook saw nothing for it but to resign while he had the opportunity.

The Harem was in tears. The ladies had used every art, had employed every artifice, and were at the end of their resources. Light of the Eyes had repulsed their best efforts with a vigour that was really alarming. Daffodil and Violet had besought him on their knees, Tea Rose and Crimson Clove had dipped their dainty hands in the dish, and would have fed him with their own delicate fingers. Cherry Blossom had sung to him, and Peach Bloom had played.

Alas and alack! it was labour that profited not.

Light of the Eyes fretted and fumed, pouted and pished, hid his pretty face behind his fan, wound his small pigtail round his forehead, shook his shoulders and kicked the slippers off his feet. He wished the ladies to understand that their attentions were not agreeable to him.

The situation was rapidly becoming acute. Evidently a crisis was impending. That a son of the Heavens should refuse to eat his breakfast was a thing the like of which had never before been heard of by the oldest inmate of the Harem.

For six years Light of the Eyes had eaten his breakfast without a murmur—"with relish and regularity," to quote from the official report submitted each day to his Imperial father. Why, then, should he refuse it now?

"Clearly," said Green Jade, "there must be a demon at the bottom of it. The spirits of the Evil One have arrayed themselves against the House of the Emperor. Send for the Venerable—send for Honan, the High Priest of Buddha."

Now, Green Jade was, by virtue of her age, the mother of the maids; and her advice was listened to with eager attention.

"Honan," declared Green Jade, "is the only person likely to be of any use where demons are concerned."

So Honan came, together with Li Chun, his assistant, a good-looking young priest who, under sunnier circumstances, would probably have created a warm interest in some one or two of the half-dozen susceptible feminine breasts which now beat with an overpowering anxiety on behalf of the youthful heir to the "Celestial" Kingdom.

Squatting down upon the floor, Honan lit his joss sticks and began to recite the "office" for the exorcising of demons, while Li Chun beat the tom-tom to call Buddha's attention to the fact that his servant Honan was in petition for the son of the great Emperor Qwong See.

Honan finished his prayers, invoked the five blessings in which are summed up all the elements of human felicity—health, riches, longevity, love of virtue, and a natural death; and, to insure a perfect and lasting cure, proceeded to drive out any obstinate demon that might be hanging behind, by firing the crackers which Li Chun had arranged upon the temporary altar.

But Light of the Eyes, who had watched the performance intently from the beginning, began to manifest his displeasure so persistently and emphatically, as the exploding crackers showed the smiling Buddha in a blaze of light, that Honan, gathering his skirts about him, declared that it was a case not provided for in the Books, and advised that the Court physicians be sent for.

Digitized by Google

Instantly messengers were dispatched to summon the best medical skill which the chief city in the Empire could afford—for time was pressing.

Every day it was the habit of the Emperor Qwong See to pay a visit to the Harem to hear his favourite son repeat the Seven Wise Maxims or read a passage from the Book of Rites.

The approach of the hour for the daily visit filled the ladies with alarm. If the Emperor should happen to discover that Light of the Eyes had refused to eat his breakfast, the consequences would be past all imagining.

Haste, post haste, therefore, was urged upon the doctors.

Presently the men of drugs began to arrive. They came in ones and twos and threes—men whose appearance answered for their wisdom; books under their arms, glasses astride their noses. Ushered with becoming gravity into the young prince's apartment, they were evidently much impressed by the serious aspect of the case, and the more especially since the Emperor might now be expected at any moment.

The men of drugs began to arrive.

Light of the Eyes regarded them at first with a stony stare, and then with a disapprobation which left no room for doubt. When they sought to approach him he made to clear the table, threw his fan at the wall, hid his face in his blouse; and, finally, turning his back, declared in unmistakable fashion his profound contempt for the entire faculty.

Distressed at these ominous symptoms, the good men nodded their heads sagely, and, consulting together, agreed that the Books of Medicine contained no prescription to meet a case such as this. But, just at that identical moment, trumpets sounded without, there was a commotion in the corridor; and, whilst the doctors were yet debating, the doors were thrown open, and, attended by all the great officers of State, the Emperor strode into the room.

The news which had got all over the Palace that Light of the Eyes would not eat his breakfast, had brought the Emperor to the Harem ten minutes earlier than usual.

Everybody waited breathless, anxiety and expectation in each countenance, till the Emperor should speak. What would he say? What would he do?

Green Jade had handed him a full report of the case up to the moment of sending for the Court physicians. The doctors, who scanned the Imperial features with careful scrutiny, the while Qwong See the Great perused the fateful document, stood in a small knot at a respectful distance waiting till their master should signify his good pleasure. Presently, sending his glance in their direction:

"Speak," he commanded in a voice that might have froze the marrow in the bones of an ostrich. "Speak, and under pain of instant death — no, by the pigtail of Confucius it shall be death by slow slicing. See to it then, physicians all, that ye attempt not to deceive me; for, by the eyebrows of Buddha, that moment will find you booked for a visit to the Yellow Springs* at the expense of the Public Treasury.

"Say on now, and tell if aught in your books can teach how to cast out the demon which torments my son; and in doing so, avert the calamity which threatens our dominions, when a son of Heaven refuses to eat his breakfast."

The doctors, laying their hands upon their breasts, salaamed profoundly.

"Prince Light of the Eyes," continued the Emperor, "has refused to eat his breakfast."

Then the doctors, bowing more humbly than before, made answer and said:

"May it please your High Mightiness, our miserable bodies are at your Majesty's disposal, our worthless heads are laid at your Majesty's feet. The case of Prince Light of the Eyes has received our most serious consideration; and, in our unworthy opinion, there is but one man in your Imperial Dominions who is equal to undertake it. He alone may hope successfully to

* The Nether Regions.

Digitized by Google

expel the evil spirit which has dared to lay its wretched hand upon a son of the Heavens—he alone, most Mighty One, can restore cheerfulness to the Prince, peace to the palace, happiness to your Majesty, and prosperity to all who have the felicity to dwell under the shadow of your protecting arm."

"His name?" demanded the Emperor in a tone of thunder.

"Hwang Tak," cried the doctors in chorus, but their voices were thin and feeble, and made scarcely more sound than the scratching of a mouse.

The Emperor's eyes blazed as if a furnace burnt behind them.

"Hwang Tak," piped the doctors a little louder;

Whispered many words in the ear of Hwang Tak.

"Hwang Tak, the court juggler," and, growing bolder on finding their heads still upon their shoulders, they continued: "Light of the Eyes must be diverted in divers and strange manners till the devil which has entered into his Highness be driven out of him. Tak is the man, your Majesty."

"Let Hwang Tak be brought hither immediately," said the Emperor, turning to the Captain of the Gate. "Return without him, and ——" If the Captain had possessed the wings of the flamingo he could not have sped quicker.

"Hwang Tak," said the Emperor, addressing the juggler, "a calamity is impending over the Palace. A blow is being struck at the foundations of the Empire. My son, Prince Light of the Eyes, has refused to eat his breakfast; and till the Evil Spirit passes, the business of the State waits. The learned Faculty of Medicine inform me that the Chinese Pharmacopœia does not provide for the expelling of foreign devils, which can only be driven out effectually by a professed follower of the Black Art. I look to you, therefore, to remove this affliction from the Prince, my son, and receive the hearty thanks of a grateful Empire. Proceed."

"But——"

"But me no buts. Proceed!"

"Lord of the Heavens and the Earth——"

"Proceed, proceed!"

"Your Mightiness will at least allow——"

"Nothing—nothing! Time pauses in his onward flight till Light of the Eyes shall have eaten his breakfast."

The juggler touched his forehead in token of humility, and bowing himself down to the ground, answered:

"My mean, contemptible head is placed in your August Majesty's all-powerful hands."

"Away with him," cried the Emperor in anger. "Away with the impostor! If in three days he has not promised obedience to our wishes, his name shall be marked with the vermilion pencil."*

So they took Hwang Tak and cast him into prison. But the juggler was a wily fellow, and forthwith fell to weaving spells and practising incantations to such good purpose that next morning the evil spirit had departed from Prince Light of the Eyes, who ate his breakfast as usual.

Then the Emperor, commanding Hwang Tak to be brought before him, rated him severely for his folly in persisting to defy the Imperial will, concluding with these words:

"While acknowledging the result of the efforts made by you after committal, I cannot allow such an act of gross disrespect to our Imperial dignity to go unpunished; but, that none may say of Qwong See that he did not know how to temper mercy with justice, I now offer you a free pardon and full restoration to former honours, on one condition."

"My lord, your humble servant bows his worthless head."

"The only condition I make is, that you teach my mule to speak."

Hwang Tak lifted his eyes. "Your servant accepts, my lord," he murmured, "but prays you will remember that of all beasts the mule is the most obstinate; and, therefore, would crave of thee a boon. Grant him, O Gracious One, twelve moons in which to bend the stubborn creature to his will, and the thing which thou desirest shall be done."

"'Tis not unreasonable," said the Emperor. "The boon is granted."

Then Hwang Tak got upon his feet and went away.

Now Hwang Tak's mother, who lived only a day's journey from Pekin, was a wise woman; and no sooner was Hwang Tak outside the Palace than he set off to consult with her on the business in hand.

"You did well, my son," said she, "to gain time. With time and faith one can do all things. Time was at work, with patient fingers unloosening the knot while you lay in prison; and behold, in the morning the black fit had passed; but the credit of it went to you. So now, my son, in twelve moons many things may happen—the Emperor may be gathered to his fathers,

* Marked for execution.

Digitized by Google

the mule may die; you, my son, may be taken hence, or—the mule may be taught to speak."

Then the old woman leant over, and whispered many words in the ear of Hwang Tak, who rubbed his hands, cracked his fingers, and laughed softly to himself. Every month regularly until the year had run round, Hwang Tak paid a visit to the wise woman, his mother, and every month the juggler grew more jocund in spirit and joyous in manner. His nights were spent in the Emperor's stables teaching the Emperor's mule to speak.

At length, the last day of the moon in the twelfth month having arrived, the Emperor and his Court was assembled, all anxious to hear what the mule would say. At his father's feet, smiling and happy, sat Prince Light of the Eyes, who delighted in the miracles which were wrought by Hwang Tak for his instruction and amusement.

Suddenly the great gong at the water pagoda sounded, the mule was led forth, the attendants were bidden to stand aside, and Hwang Tak was left in sole charge of his pupil. Then the Emperor, making a sign with the golden wand which he carried, the juggler stretched forth his hand, and with a loud voice cried:

"Now, oh, Stubborn-of-heart, is the time come that ye know of. Speak, therefore, and tell his High Mightiness, Qwong See, Lord of Heaven and Earth, all that you have seen and heard in the Imperial stables whilst the little white rabbit in the moon has been pounding rice for the year."

And lo, before those present had recovered from their surprise at hearing a mule speak, the sagacious animal was relating how the Master of the Horse sold the foals and put the money in his pocket; how the forage contractor supplied bad feed which the storekeeper passed in—for a consideration; how the stablemen stole the corn out of the bins and neglected to groom the animals in the stalls; how the litter was seldom changed, though it was always charged for; how the harness-maker cheated the clerk, and the clerk imposed on the steward, and the steward deceived the controller, and the whole gang were in league to defraud the Emperor.

What further the mule would have said was cut short by Qwong See rising in his place and commanding him to stop. "Stop!" he cried, "before faith be utterly destroyed, and we are left without remedy! Stop, while the power to believe in word or oath remains still within possibility! Stop, lest a worse thing be spoken; for, though he search diligently, a faithful man, who can find?"

Then turning upon his household, "Out of the mouth of a beast of the stall," said he, "an Emperor and his Court have been put to shame—the master for his servants, the servants for each other. Dumb dogs are ye all," he continued, withering them with scorn, "in the presence of this mule. Dumb dogs, and craven. But I shall know how to deal with you."

How the delinquents were dealt with may be inferred from the fact that there were a large number of vacancies in the Palace on the day after the Great Function, which henceforward was known in all Pekin as the Day of the Mule.

Hwang Tak, loaded with favours, was re-named the Wonder Worker, and might have aspired to a seat on the Council; but, by advice of his mother, he remained simply Court Juggler to the Emperor. Qwong See the Great, like a wise and prudent man, never tried to peep behind the veil, or to look farther than he could see; and so, to this day, no man in the Eighteen Provinces knoweth how Hwang Tak taught the Emperor's mule to speak.

H. HUNTER.

Digitized by Google

AT THE END OF THE LARIAT.

WHEN James Sorten came to the Cimmarron ranche and introduced himself as the younger son of a wealthy Englishman who came out for sport, he was believed. His admirable form, and his charming manners, won the hearts of the men—and women—of the settlements, and made him the friend of the ranche boys wherever he met them.

Rivalries that are now turned towards the manipulating of the prices of stock were then in that section devoted to the handling of herds, and the ranche that had the largest and most energetic force of cowboys, was the one that had the better fortune in that line.

Sorten, who soon gained the title of "Yellowback," because of his customary clothes of bright saffron, became the leader of the rustlers. He could scent a maverick farther than anyone along the trail, and woe to the herder that allowed a drove to remain out on the prairie over night—it was likely to be missing for good.

Sorten went to the trail every night, and often returned with two or three that had strayed from some passing herd. One night he did not return as soon as usual, and when he came in, it was with a white face and agitation written all over him.

"Seen a ghost?" asked the chief herder.

"No, but I tell you, boys," were his words, "I've seen the fastest rider that ever was in this valley."

"Tell us about it."

"There ain't nothin' to tell," said Sorten, who had lapsed into the rough talk of the boys. "I was over in the upper ravine looking fer any a-wanderin' steers that might be needin' care an' had found two, when along come a stranger on horseback and ordered me to git. I don't take any man's sass, and I told him so. What did that critter do but give a whoop an' scare them steers so that they went bellowin' down the ravine. I follered of course, an' when I saw that there wasn't any chance to get them home, turned round to look at the other one. He sat on his hoss as quiet as you please, an' when I looked at him, smiled, then, with another whoop, started after the steers himself, an' what do you think? In a minute he had 'em on his line an' was drivin' 'em home—which I take it is over the other side of the trail."

It appeared afterwards that he had tried to overtake the stranger, but failed—hence his perturbation.

About a week afterwards a day off was given to the cowboys, and we all went up to the town for a time. When we came within a mile of the settlement, Jim caught sight of a sorrel horse ahead of us, and he gave a little cry of joy and sank the spurs into the flanks of his pony. He had recognised the horse as that ridden by the mysterious herder. We followed, and were by his side when the sorrel was overtaken. Then we noticed something that we had not been aware of before—the rider of the sorrel was a woman.

Jim's face was a study. He was so sure of his game, and when it came as it did he wilted. But he braced up a little and began a conversation. It was the daughter of the chief herder across the river, and she was about as pretty a picture as often came to the eyes of the herders in the territory. She laughed and joked with Jim, and he deserted us to be by her side. We rode on and left them together.

That was the beginning, and for about a month Jim and his girl were the talk of the country round. They were smitten with each other if any two ever were, and rode up and down the ranges like wandering twin spirits.

Jim was scared on the range again, and this time he swore that the visitor had made him give up ten head of the finest calves that he had ever laid eyes on. But none of us saw the stranger, and the opinion of the ranche was that Jim had had too much that night.

One day the order came to go to the south-west after a herd and drive it north. It meant two months of hard riding, and how Jim did hate it!

He rode over to see his girl, and they had an affecting parting.

That was the year of the cattle suffering on the plains because of the rain and sleet. In the territory there was not so much suffering, but the cold wind made it hard for the cowboys, and they had the toughest time they had ever seen to keep warm while on the range.

One night, as the storm was at its worst, there came along the trail a little herd that had evidently been herded through the summer on their way north.

In the camp waggon that was with them was a woman. She came to the ranche house to get some food, and we kept her there all night, the cook's wife sharing a bed with her. The girl—for she was not more than a child—asked if we knew a James Morris. Of course we did not, but when the next morning she took from her neck a locket, and opening it, showed us the face of "Yellowback," we all looked blank enough, I tell you.

She went back to the waggon, but they did not get any farther. The man fell ill somehow, and the woman went to the other ranche, where she met Jeanne Arsey, the girl that had the love of Jim—or thought she had.

Well, the expected happened. She told her troubles to Jeanne, and the girl knew that she had been making love to a married man. Mad? There is no word to express it. She vowed that she would kill him, and then was willing to forgive for the wife's sake. But Jim did not come then.

Digitized by Google

The wife stayed and grew ill faster than her father. At last she died and Jeanne was free. But those who knew were glad they had not the task that was before Jim when he came home.

At last the herd was within a day's drive. The boys all knew the situation between Jim and Jeanne and wanted to see what would happen.

Jim was tired when he came into camp, and did not want to talk. When he had eaten his dinner he proposed going to the town, and half-a-dozen of us went with him. On the way he asked if we had seen Jeanne. We told him nothing about the visitor.

Jim drank harder than I had ever seen him do that afternoon, and at four o'clock was in a lively mood, ready for any sort of an escapade. As we rode down the little street we saw coming in from the ranches a woman on horseback. All the herders fell back. They did not want to see what happened at too short range.

"How are ye?" called Jim so that we could all hear.

There was no answer.

"What's the matter?" he demanded. "Don't you want to marry me?"

For an answer she gave her horse a blow with the riding whip and came up to his side. In her hand was the raw-hide. She lifted it high, and before he could see what she was going to do it came down across his face again and again. He fairly howled with pain, but she rode back to her side of the street and kept up the highway.

"I'll kill her," shouted Jim, and away went his horse to the saloon where he had left his revolver.

As he stood before the bar trying to get the barkeeper to give it up she rode in front of the house.

"Jim Morris," she called, "come out here." How white Jim turned. But he went.

"You cowardly sneak," she began. "I thought I loved you once, but now I know you. Do you remember those nights that I used to scare you away from the mavericks?"

Jim looked at her in astonishment. Had he been outwitted by a woman?

"And last month I held in my arms a woman who had this picture. Do you know it?"

She held out the miniature that was in the possession of the woman with the herd. Jim shuddered.

"Where—where did you get it?" he asked.

"From your dead wife's hands. She believed in you, and I did not tell her better. She died blessing you, and do you know where you ought to be?"

The woman's eyes fairly blazed as she sat there on her horse, and faced the little company of herders and saloon frequenters.

Jim never said a word. He quailed before the angry woman, but he was too angry himself to give up.

"You said a little while ago that you would kill me," she began once more. "Get on that horse, and let's see about it."

A pony was standing near—Jim's. On it's back the men placed him, wondering what would be the next move, but all hoping that the vengeance would fit the crime.

"I'll count three," said Jeanne; "then look out."

"One——"

Jim was unarmed—what else could he do? He jabbed the spurs into the pony, and was off like a shot. Up the long street he went, and had 300 feet the start when came "Three!"

Then we knew why the sorrel had rounded up the mavericks. It ran like the wind. At the sound of its mistress' voice it was off, and the distance between the two lessened. Out on the prairie they sped. Then came the end.

When within a short distance of the fleeing man, the woman drew a coiled lariat from her saddle and whirled it around her head.

Once, twice it circled, and then—away in beautiful curves until it settled over the head of the coward and deceiver, Jim.

Her sorrel planted its feet in the sod; there was a jerk, a fall, and then away over the plain towards the ravine, where was the little cemetery, she went, a dark object dragging at the end of the rope. They disappeared behind the hills, and she did not come back.

Indeed, she never came to the settlement again, for she moved from the trail country a few weeks after.

G. PANTHEON.

Another Great Scheme.

HOW TO GET ANY BOOK YOU WANT.

WE are constantly receiving complaints from readers that we do not devise competitions in which everybody can enter.

It is difficult to do this—to give everybody an equal chance of success.

However, we think we have hit upon something this time.

Every week we shall give away half-a-dozen books.

All a competitor has to do is to send us one Book Coupon cut from The Sunday Reader, one from the Athletic Record, and one from Short Stories.

Send these to us in one envelope together with a request for any single book in the whole world of literature.

From the applications we receive we shall each week pick out six and send the books asked for.

If you are not successful one week, keep on trying, you are bound to be successful some week.

All applications to be addressed to "BOOKS," Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please let me have: S. S.

Book.....

Price.....

Name.....

Address.....

.....

Digitized by Google

THE MAN WITH THE BOX.

On a certain quiet corner, one Cahill keeps a cosy snuggery to which I am partial—especially when returning from an up-country outing. One sultry evening in July, I arrived at his place at the hour of ten p.m. somewhat tired out, for I had passed a busy day on my wheel, over a country road since dawn, making kodak notes of certain views I needed for future reference. Entering my favourite restaurant, I gave a generous order, and devoted myself to the matter of refreshment. Supper over, I ordered another bottle of the beer I had been drinking with my lunch, and lighting a cigar, sat at a luxurious ease, too tired even to glance over the evening paper that lay on my table.

As I sat drowsily smoking, my attention was attracted by the noise of a moving chair in my rear. I turned somewhat suddenly, to find, sitting at the table behind me, a peculiar-looking person. He was possessed of a long, narrow face, that was half buried in a heavy, iron-grey beard of extraordinary length. His eyebrows, of the same colour as his beard, were bushy and bristling, and meeting in the centre of the line of his nose, gave to his face an air of concentrated purpose, borne out by a pair of keen, glittering eyes, that peered sharply from beneath them.

"Kodakist?" queried he, with a brusque, familiar air of one who eschewed conventionalities, as he caught my eye.

"I am an artist!" I replied stiffly. His undue familiarity annoyed me.

"Ah, indeed? A distinction without much difference, in my mind; they're essentially quite the same——"

"Not at all the same!" I rejoined, ruffling.

"Pardon me—no doubt you think so; but after all, it's a mere matter of one's point of view. Did it ever strike you, when thinking of these matters, how few are the primal principles on which are based the innumerable inventions of modern times?"

"Can't say I've thought much about it?" I tartly replied, sipping my beer and wondering how to rid myself of this preposterous bore.

"For instance, as an artist, you are very likely aware of the recent successful experiments in photographing colour?"

I nodded in cold affirmation.

"Then you are probably aware it is generally admitted that the differentiation of one colour from another to the eye is occasioned simply by the fact that each colour imparts a different number of vibrations to the second of the ray of light it reflects to the optic nerve?"

I admitted a knowledge of this theory.

"Very well; you are possibly also aware that the difference between one tone and another in musical sounds lies merely in the different number of air vibrations to the second produced by each respective sound?"

I intimated that I was also aware of this fact.

"Very well; here we have two quite diverse channels through which the principle of the sensibility of the nervous system to vibratory impressions operates."

"Well, what of it?" I asked impatiently, as he paused and sat regarding me with his bright, glittering eyes.

"Simply this: Why should not the sense of taste be referred to in this same principle?"

He arose as he spoke, and drew from under his table a small box. Bringing it over, he placed it carefully on my table, after which, without apology, he removed my kodak from where it lay near my elbow, to the floor beneath, and seated himself, unasked, opposite me. The box was of cubical shape, made of some fine, richly grained wood, and polished till it shone like the cherry-topped table at which we were sitting. Pivoted on the top of it was an arrow-headed index hand, made of brass and about four inches in length. The side of the box facing me was studded with a row of brass push-buttons.

"Kodakist?" queried I, ironically, returning his first question.

"No, my dear sir, I am not; neither am I a confidence man; nor am I, as your manner might seem to imply, a 'crank.' But," said he, suddenly leaning forward and tapping himself briskly on the forehead, "I do confess to a degree of enthusiasm over a certain discovery of mine—an enthusiasm you will presently share if you will give me a few moments of your leisure."

My distaste for the fellow was not lessening; but his speech was civil in its way, and his brusque, eccentric ways amused me. I wrote occasionally for the press. Here was a character, and I resolved to study him a bit. I rapped for the waiter.

"Excuse me, sir," said my peculiar companion, as the knight of the apron appeared; "it is my privilege first, I believe, under the circumstances. Waiter!" he added, tossing a silver dollar down on the table, "two glasses of water, please."

That functionary stared.

"Sir?" quoth he, with mouth open.

"Two glasses of water, please, and there's something for your trouble."

The sight of the money seemed to restore the waiter's equilibrium, for, picking it up, he felt it, put it in his pocket, and retired with chin elevated! In a moment he reappeared with two glasses of water, deposited them on the table, winked at me, and again retired with chin still elevated.

Digitized by Google

"Rather mild potation you've ordered," I observed, with a quizzical glance at my eccentric companion.

"The water?" said he somewhat absently, as he blew the dust from the throat of a small key; "oh, that's all right; you shall drink your favourite beverage presently."

Carefully fitting the key into some aperture in the side of the box facing him he turned it a little, as if to try the wards; then, pushing the box aside, he suddenly leant forward, fixed on me his peculiar eye, and abruptly asked:

"Are you not possessed of a somewhat vivid imagination?"

I acknowledged to being endowed with a fair share of that faculty.

"Do you not write for the press occasionally?"

I admitted that I was something of a scribe.

"So I thought, so I thought," said he, tapping the box thoughtfully; "an artist—a man of letters—a person of imagination. Just the person I seek. But talking is dry work, particularly to a listener. Let us first drink," continued he, pushing one of the glasses of water towards me.

"Oh, really, you must excuse me," I demurred, with a furtive eye on the box, which I began to distrust, "water after beer—I couldn't you know—and——"

"Oh, bother the water," he impatiently interrupted, suddenly turning the box round and pushing it over to me.

In the side of the box that had been facing him, was a large glass-covered dial, round the margin of which was printed in small characters a number of words, radiating in the alignment of their letters from the centre. In this central point of the dial was pivoted an index hand, the finger of which at present rested on a blank space which broke the circle of printed words. I bent closer to examine these characters. To my surprise, I found they constituted a remarkably complete list of the most popular of the beverages known to the bibulous world. The more noted brands of ale, beer, brandy, whisky, rum, and gin appeared, together with many of the most celebrated vintages of wines. There was also listed a number of fancy drinks so dear to the British heart. The milder beverages found place, too—both hot and cold—even water being included. Beneath the dial was inserted, in a small hole, the key the man had just been manipulating.

I looked up inquiringly. "Name your beverage," said he.

"If you mean that I am to name a favourite beverage from that list, why, I should say Bass's ale," I replied, somewhat puzzled.

"Very well," said he; "kindly turn that key till you see that the indicator above points to the words 'Bass's ale.'"

I complied.

"Take up your glass!"

I obeyed.

Swiftly drawing the box to him, he turned the brass arrow on its top till it pointed at me, and then pressed one of the push-buttons.

"Look at your glass!"

I turned my gaze from the box to the glass that I held in my hand. To my amazement, instead of water, there shimmered in it, with an oily bead, an amber-hued beverage, most uncommonly like in appearance the ale I had just been drinking.

"Taste it," said my strange acquaintance.

I tasted it—though somewhat gingerly.

"Bass's ale!" I exclaimed, astounded.

"Yes," he observed, with an air of satisfaction, "and, as you'll find, a particularly fine brew."

Curious to investigate this novel trick, I took a few moderate sips of the stuff. The fellow was right. I am somewhat of a connoisseur of fine ales, and I found this one excellent.

"A capital trick! I perceive you to be a master of the art," I observed smilingly.

"A paltry dabbler in legerdemain?" he exclaimed with irritation. "I had attributed to you a finer perception than this. I am aware that in person and manner I may seem eccentric, but, believe me these appearances are not the fruit of an ill-balanced head or an evil heart. They are the ugly crusts, so to speak, begotten of bitter experiences and deferred hopes."

He sat silently regarding me for a moment, and then continued:

"Sir, I have a brief story to tell, and a proposition to make to you. Whether or not you accept the latter, you are confessedly a knight of the pen, and may find some use to make of the former; will you listen?"

The fellow really was getting interesting. I nodded my willingness to hear him.

"I am," he continued, "by profession a model maker. I was brought up to the business, and, having a natural aptitude for the work, came to be counted among the best in my line. Having an original turn of mind, together with a natural facility of execution, I made a specialty of developing the crude ideas of inventors who lacked the technical knowledge and practical experience necessary successfully to complete their various conceptions. Thrown thus in contact with minds groping along original lines with more or less cleverness, my own ingenuity was stimulated, and I was led, at last, into a line of original investigation and experiment that resulted in a most wonderful discovery.

"Even to outline clearly to you the nature and methods of these researches and experiments would take too much time. Suffice it to say that the flower of my discovery stands before you in that box. In that polished cube of wood is incrusted a marvellous device, equal in importance to a telephone, typewriter, phonograph, or any other of the mighty group of great modern invention.

"You look incredulous; but I assure you my words are well advised, as I shall presently demonstrate to your entire satisfaction.

"This wonderful little apparatus that stands before you, I call a Universal Beverage Differentiator. By a proper manipulation of its mechanism, in conjunction with a certain exertion of psychological power on the part of the operator, any beverage held or recently touched by a person within a radius of sixty feet of the box, and at whom this projector on top may at the time be pointed, will, to that person's sight and taste, be converted to any beverage indicated at the moment by the pointer of this dial that you see set in the side. Moreover, the impression will hold good until neutralised by the action of certain parts of the apparatus, that, when brought into play by the operator, serve to dispel the hallucination."

As the stranger paused, as if waiting for me to remark upon his strange disclosure, I took a long breath, tossed away my cigar sat upright, and, like a sensible cosmopolitan, laughingly observed, "Rats!"

The stranger frowned.

Digitized by Google

"You choose to be facetious," he drily remarked; "I might, however, rejoin that, in this case, it seems to me that 'Snakes' answers all purposes equally as well," added he, pointing to a name on the dial.

I bent closer and examined it. Amidst the list of beverages was printed, in smaller characters than the others—as if to render it inconspicuous—the word "Snakes."

For an instant, I looked at it in stolid wonder. Then suddenly I surmised its ostensible function. Sitting back in my chair, I regarded my strange companion for a moment in silence; then, putting back my head, I exploded in a fit of laughter.

"Well," said I, as I recovered my breath, "my friend, all I've got to say is, that if you conjure up snakes as cleverly as you seem to change beverages, you hold the key to considerable sport in your hands."

"To a better purpose than that of mere sport, I should hope," he somewhat gravely replied. "But if you are as incredulous as your words would imply, it seems to me it would be but justice, at least, to give me a chance to demonstrate beyond dispute that what I have related of this box is literally true."

I intimated that I was willing, "provided," I added, with a laugh, "you don't turn on the snakes."

"You may rest assured as to that, sir. Although," he added with some gravity, "should I do so, you would find it no laughing matter.

"And now, pray mention some wine of which you are particularly fond," said he.

I named a certain sherry I had observed on the dial, and of which I am very fond. Hardly had he swept the indicator to the place, when the pale amber of the ale before me deepened to the ruddy brown of the wine I had called for.

Taking up the glass, I smelt the stuff, then tasted it. Unquestionably, so far as my physical senses evidenced, it was the brand of sherry I had named.

I set down my glass and regarded my companion with a puzzled look.

"My friend," I drily observed, "these transformations, on the face on them, appear quite marvellous; but any clever master of legerdemain will do things apparently as wonderful. I shall be glad to be convinced of the truth of your extraordinary statements; but for anything you've shown me as yet, these curious phenomena may be but an adroit piece of chemical jugglery."

The stranger listened with an impatient frown. Then his countenance cleared.

"Sir," said he, "under the circumstances, your doubts are natural. Though it is not my intention that you shall go from here to-night unconvinced, any test involving immediate publicity of my discovery would be fatal to certain cherished purposes of mine. For the present, it is imperative that the strictest secrecy be observed in this matter; and though you may wonder somewhat at my sudden confidence in a perfect stranger I am not so unsophisticated as may appear, and know, in a way that would surprise you, that my trust is not misplaced.

"Now, I would propose as a test both simple and crucial, that you operate the box yourself on the next person who may drink at one of these tables. With ordinary discretion, no suspicion need be aroused as to the source of the hallucinations, and on the success of the experiment I am willing to stake my chances of convincing you."

I bit my lips and smiled.

"Your words are more flattering than convincing," I replied, "but I've no objections to such an experiment."

"Very well," said the stranger, "and now listen," he continued, with one finger held up by way of emphasis. "I must briefly explain the method of operating the box. In the first place, it is essential that the operator should be possessed of sufficient imagination to recall at will the taste, odour, and appearance of the beverage he may desire to project into the imagination of the drinker. It is not necessary that this mental picture be powerful on the part of the operator. The faintest suggestion in his mind of the desired effects will suffice, as certain plates in the apparatus—brought respectively into play by the dial indicator—are so constructed as powerfully to develop this mental effort of the operator while what, for the sake of convenience, I will call the projection current, convey these effects through this brass arrow on top into the nervous economy of any person at whom it may be pointed, and who may be drinking any liquid within a radius of sixty feet of the box—providing, of course, the indicator in the side dial be set at the name of the imagined beverage. Now this row of push-buttons which you observe set in the side of the box regulates the strength of the hallucinations. The first one on the list gives a very powerful impression; the one next is a milder one, and so on down to the sixth and last, which gives a very faint effect.

"By the way, it is not necessary that the projector be held on the subject, once it lines up with him. It suffices simply to sweep it past him. The impression he will thus receive will remain until dispelled by the action of the neutralising mechanism, which is operated by these two large buttons set in the end of the box. When the operator desires to neutralise the effects of the apparatus on a subject, he simply lines him up again with the projector and presses the white button, or, if several persons are under influence, he may break the spell with all of them simultaneously by pressing the red button, which does not necessitate the use of the projector in conjunction with it. Thus, you see, the operation of the box is extremely simple; and I should be very glad if you would put it to any test these instructions may have suggested."

I had followed him through these details with a grave countenance. Inwardly I was convulsed with a curious mixture of wonder and mirth. If only a clever fakir, what possible lay could the fellow be on? Perhaps a matter of a desired loan on the alleged apparatus. Still, for a confidence game, the plant seemed unnecessarily elaborate. Juggling so clever as this would be a goose which would lay more golden eggs in legitimate paths than in crooked ones.

"My friend," I observed, scanning him sharply, "as I've said, your proposition of a test seems made in good faith. If sincere, you, of course, will not object to my trying these experiments without your presence, I suppose?"

To my surprise, he rose at once.

"Not at all, sir; in fact, I was about to propose such an arrangement myself," he frankly replied. "I will absent myself for an hour from these premises," added he, glancing at his watch. "That will give you time to experiment to your satisfaction. But before going, I would say that while I want you thoroughly to satisfy yourself in this mattter, you will see, I am sure, the necessity of keeping within judicious bounds. A hint to a person of your discretion should be enough."

"Oh, and one thing more; try any plate named in the list, but as you value your life, don't tamper with the 'snake' plate; remember, have nothing to do with it!"

Digitized by Google

During the latter part of this conversation, a lull in the evening trade of the place had left us alone. At this juncture, however, a gentleman entered, bowed smilingly to me and, passing on to another table, ordered some sandwiches and a glass of milk. I knew him as a promising young physician who was strongly opposed to the use of stimulating beverages.

My companion leant over to me with twinkling eyes. "There's a subject for you," he whispered; "try him! Here comes his drink," he added, rising, "and as you seem to have understood correctly my instructions, I will now leave you to experiment to your satisfaction by yourself;" then, nodding me "good-evening," he withdrew.

I was nonplussed.

I had so far doubted the fellow's sincerity in desiring a genuine investigation of his alleged discovery; but there of course could be no possible collusion in this case.

How would he get out of it? His audacity amused me. I would humour his game till I saw its point, at least. Under cover of the evening paper, I set the indicator of the box at "milk punch." Then, waiting till my medical acquaintance reached for his glass of milk, I pushed the No. 1 button, called up the proper mental picture, and slowly lined him up with the brass projector.

It was not without an anticipatory thrill that I did this, and then I smiled at my absurd perturbation. The stranger would very likely return presently, and, alleging an improper manipulation on my part in excuse of the failure of the experiment, defer his straw test until the arrival of some confederate who would enable him to effect a "fake" demonstration for my benefit.

As these thoughts were passing through my mind, the doctor suddenly pulled out his watch.

"I declare," he called to me, "I had nearly forgotten an engagement I have for this very hour!"

Rising hurriedly, he caught up his glass and took a hasty gulp. Hardly had the beverage passed his lips ere he slammed the glass down on the table, caught himself by the throat, and snorted, coughed, and choked as if he had swallowed vitriol.

I sprang to my feet and stepped over to him.

"What's the matter, doctor?" I asked in dismay, catching him by the arm.

"Matter?" he wheezed between his snorts and expectorations; "I ordered a glass of milk, and they've sent me in milk punch! Just taste of that, sir!" said he furiously, picking up the glass and handing it to me.

I smelled it, tasted it. It was milk—and nothing but milk! Not the faintest trace of any other taste or odour.

For a moment I stood confused. Then I pulled my wits together.

"Doctor," said I, dumping the contents of the glass into a cuspidore, "I am at fault myself. I just now ordered a milk punch for the person you saw sitting at my table as you entered. He has stepped out for a moment, and the waiter has made a natural error. I must beg a thousand pardons."

The doctor—by nature a pleasant fellow—had by this time somewhat recovered. His countenance cleared, he laughed good-humouredly, and expressed regret at having shown temper over a trifle. Nodding me a pleasant good-evening, he hastily departed to his engagement.

I resumed my seat, and sat regarding the mysterious box before me with an odd mixture of feelings. My manipulation of this apparently potent apparatus had been conducted, so far, in a spirit of sceptical levity, but my last experiment had put another face on the matter. I began to feel a little nervous about making further experiments on my own responsibility.

Throwing the evening paper over the box, I sat doubtfully considering the matter, when a couple of rough-looking characters swaggered in. Taking seats at a table, they ordered some beer and sandwiches, over which they proceeded to discuss the contents of a scrap of paper which one of these had produced.

Others now began to drop in, and, shaking off my nervous doubts, I gave my attention to a judicious manipulation of the box under cover of my paper.

Up to this time, I still had been obstinately possessed of a suspicion that the effects apparently produced by this alleged apparatus—even in the doctor's case—had been but a clever piece of legerdemain. The marvellous hallucinations that invariably seemed to follow every trial I made with this mystic battery were too much for my scepticism. I found my doubts resolving into a critical enthusiasm, and I entered upon further experiments with a wondering and growing delight in the occult powers of this cube of potent mechanism. In short, without exception, they confirmed all that had been claimed for this apparatus by its inventor, and created a degree of confusion in the mind of Cahill's phlegmatic head waiter that, I think, had never been visited on that organ before.

Before long I saw that I was going too far with this sort of thing. Relighting my cigar, I leant back in my chair and awaited the stranger's return with impatience. Convinced, from what I had seen, of the veracity of his statements, I was now burning with curiosity to know the nature of the proposition he had to make me.

I had, so far, refrained from tampering with the "snake" plate. As I sat waiting, I found my thoughts persistently reverting to this forbidden fruit. The unpleasant sensation which I at first experienced upon thought of it gradually grew duller with each recurrence of the matter, and, in place of aversion, there presently arose an itching curiosity to try this plate. However, the stranger's warning was yet in my ears, and I had seen enough by this time to convince me that he was sincere and knew whereof he spoke.

And yet, was not there the mild button? I had tried the brandy plate on myself with this button set, and found it reduced the hallucination to a mere shadow of effects. I would try the forbidden plate with it! On myself, of course, possible consequences forbade other experiment.

Disencumbering the box of the paper I had so far kept over it, I pushed the mild button, set the indicator at the forbidden point, and with one finger held prudently over the neutral button, slowly turned the projector till it bore full on me. Reaching out my left hand to my glass, which I had previously refilled from a fresh bottle of Bass's ale, I somewhat hesitatingly touched it. At the same time I mentally conjured up a mild type of garter snake.

As my fingers touched the glass, I was suddenly seized with a qualm of nervous apprehension; but bracing myself for a possible shock, I firmly grasped it and pulled it to me.

For a moment I observed nothing. With an odd feeling of relief I was about to re-examine the dial, thinking I had made some error, when I was startled to find my gaze irrisistibly drawn back to my glass by an overpowering fascination. The colour of its contenst was changing. From a pleasant amber it was rapidly passing to an ugly, venomous green; and as I looked, two bubbles of the liquid's head detached themselves from opposite sides of the glass and circled slowly to its centre, where instead of uniting, as bubbles in proximity usually do, they remained a little apart without further tendency to rotate.

Digitized by Google

Suddenly it came to me, with a sickening sensation, that they were not bubbles, but a pair of small, glittering eyes that now seemed regarding me from the depths of the beverage. For they sank as I looked; and then—horrors!—they enlarged to two great, frightful orbs that seemed to fasten my gaze with bands of fire. Slowly they began to circle about the bottom of the glass, then faster and faster they spun, until my brain reeled and my head felt like a humming top. At last so rapidly they whirled, they seemed one bright wheel of baleful, glittering light, which, presently paling to a dull, sickly-hued ring, swung slower and slower, finally fading away in the green-hued contents of the glass.

A simple matter to describe—but I had had quite enough. My ears were ringing; an iron band seemed drawn tightly about my head; a reddish mist impigned on my eyesight, and I felt the cold perspiration running from every pore.

I was about to press the neutral button, when I started back with a suppressed cry. In place of the arrow-headed pointer on the top of the box, there twisted and squirmed a hideous green and grey adder! The shock to my nervous system was something frightful; but even in the distraction of the moment, I realised it was not so much this one apparition of an adder that unnerved me, as it was the horrible dread of what might appear next.

With a powerful effort of my will, I reached a trembling hand to the cut off button, and pressed it just in time to shut off a row of small wriggling vipers which the row of buttons on the side seemed simultaneously projecting.

"And that's the effect of that plate with but the mild button set!" I mentally ejaculated, wiping the cold perspiration from my face with my handkerchief, and glancing furtively about the room. As I did so, I caught the eyes of one of the seedy pair of roughs fixed on me with a queer, insolent look. My nerves were yet tingling from my recent experience. I felt irritable and ugly and I returned his stare with interest.

"Look at that dude over there, piping us off with his kodak," said he to his chum.

"I say," said that pers nage, turning about in his chair and holding up to me the sole of one of his big feet, "just put the machine work on that, and git the picter framed to mind me by—see?"

I knew a word to the waiter would suffice to rid me of the pair. But it suddenly occurred to me that here was an opportunity to utilise the powers of the apparatus to some purpose. I would give these fellows a lesson they'd never forget to their dying day. The indicator of the dial was still set at "snakes." I had but to press the No. 1 button and call up the proper mental picture to turn the full power of that terrible plate through the projector, which, as the box now stood, pointed at the wall on my left.

I had just attended to these preliminaries when Cahill entered and walked down to them, evidently to order them out. But I was resolved not to let them off so easily. Hastily turning the projector, I lined them up just before he reached them.

The effect was instantaneous. With a yell, they both sprang to their feet. The next instant, one fell writhing to the floor, while the other came rushing towards the swing door, his face distorted and the foam flying from his mouth. As he neared me, he suddenly threw up his hands and fell across my table, striking the box, as he fell, with such force as to send it flying under the swing door out into the bar beyond.

The next moment pandemonium reigned!

As the box went rolling along, a chorus of agonised shrieks sounded through the room.

In falling it had swept the occupants of the place with its terrible current!

Indeed, it was only by a miracle of chance that I had not been caught in its radius as the box rolled.

In an instant the room was a struggling mass of delirious humanity. Some rolled on the floor in frightful convulsions, others, in their frenzy, grappled together and tore at each other's throats like wild beasts!

I sat for a moment paralysed with horror. Then I realised that in my attempt at a joke I had brought upon at least a dozen respectable citizens delirium tremens in their most horrible forms! This brought me to my senses. The box must be recovered at all hazards and its fearful effects neutralised! I sprang to my feet and leapt through the swing door.

The box was nowhere in sight!

A waiter, white with fright, was clinging to the door-post of the street entrance, shouting for the police.

"The box! where's the box?" I cried.

"He's—he's got it, sir!" said he in a frightened stutter.

"Got it! who's got it?"

"Why, just as it rolled against the bar, in came the crank that brought it here. Grabbing it, he pressed one of the buttons, and then 'Great heavens!' he yelled. 'the fool has broken the neutraliser. I can shut off the current but not the effects!' and with that he clapped it under his coat and rushed out."

My predicament was a desperate one.

The stranger undoubtedly would seek, by flight, to evade all responsibility for the frightful consequences of my folly.

He must be found at all costs.

Appalled at the frightful position in which I had placed myself, I rushed into the street in wild pursuit. But my efforts were vain. And since then, though I have exhausted every expedient in my despairing search, not the slightest trace has been found of the mysterious inventor—"the man with the box."

GEORGE TRIPP.

LOVE STORIES.

The Companion paper to Short Stories.

Costs one Halfpenny.

Each number consists of a complete illustrated novel, besides information on Love, Courtship, and Marriage by the Countess M.

Digitized by Google

BY GEORGE GRIFFITH.

Author of "Valdar the Oft-Born," "Briton or Boer?" "The Outlaws of the Air," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XXIX.

THE voyage of the Pocahontas from Southampton out to Barbadoes, and thence, in consequence of news of the revolution in Santo Domingo coming just in the nick of time, to her berth alongside the Minnehaha had been both swift and pleasant.

The Atlantic Ocean and the Carribean Sea had been on their best behaviour, and the whole run had been accomplished in under a fortnight, and the Pocahontas had proved herself well up to thirty-two knots, if it were really necessary, as her owner put it, to get a special sort of wriggle on her.

The party in the saloon could hardly have been more happily brought together. Muriel Tristam, though she had worn the dignity of wifehood for less than a week, was able to satisfy the conventionalities without in any way embarrassing a most promising flirtation which, thanks to the constant intimacy of steamboat life, was showing symptoms of further and favourable development between Courtland and Miss Gwynneth, even by the time the yacht got to Barbadoes.

The two most delightful conditions of human life were thus both represented under their most fascinating aspects, and a pleasant spice of uncertainty, mingled with the promise of adventure, made things generally about as enjoyable for the time being as the jealous Fates are accustomed to permit.

At Barbadoes both Courtland and Tristram gave such information as they possessed with regard to the true character of the Minnehaha, and the objects of her owner and his guest, to the proper authorities, and the consequence of this was that Her Majesty's cruiser Hermoine and the United States cruiser New York, which happened to be lying in the roadstead at the time, received instructions to put to sea and keep an international eye open on Señor Francisco and his formidable pleasure craft.

The English and American captains lunched on board the Pocahontas while the war-ships were getting ready for sea, and made an interested inspection of the cruiser-yacht and her armament. It was not strictly in accordance with the law of nations that a private yacht uncommissioned in any regular service should carry six-inch quick-firers and batteries of smaller cannon and machine guns, together with a corresponding supply of ammunition, and the two captains looked a little grave about it at first, but Courtland disposed of the scruples by saying:

"Yes, gentlemen, that is a difficulty that I have seen myself, and the way I propose to deal with it is this. You see, to begin with, I think I may say without talking too tall that this is the only craft afloat that can do anything like show speed with the Minnehaha. I know something about that craft, and I can tell you without the slightest desire to say anything against either of your ships, that if she wanted to run away from you you'd never see anything more than the smoke of her funnels and that not for long, and if she wanted to fight she could steam round you and knock spots off you with those dynamite guns of hers while you were trying to get near her.

"Now the Pocahontas is equal to her in speed and carries heavier metal. If we got one six-inch shell into her there'd be mighty little fight or run left in her, for after all she is only yacht-built, and her engines and boilers are entirely unprotected. At the same time I don't want to do anything illegal. What I propose to do is this. The Pocahontas flies the American flag because I'm an American, but she is British built and British registered, so I think the difficulty would be squared if you gentlemen each sent a lieutenant and a party of gunners on board, and I'll divide the guns equally among them, and if it comes to a fight I promise you that the officers shall take charge of the ship. That will make her a sort of international cruiser and we can hoist the two flags. You see it is something like the sort of naval alliance that we ought to have, and I wouldn't be sorry to see the Pocahontas set the example. What do you think of that, gentlemen?"

The two captains received the novel proposal in silence, looking at each other as though neither cared to speak first. At length the British captain, who was senior in service, turned to Courtland and said:

"Well, Mr. Courtland, your proposal is distinctly a novel one, and quite outside all naval precedent. At the same time I quite admit the force of what you say with regard to speed. Our very best is from nineteen to twenty knots, so we obviously have no chance against a ship that can run thirty-two, hence if Captain Rockwell agrees with me that there is no actual illegality in the plan, I think the circumstances will warrant us in putting it into execution. What do you think, Captain?"

"Just about as you do, Captain," replied the American Commander. "It seems to me a pretty clear way out of a decided difficulty, and if there is anything not quite legal about it I am quite prepared to answer to the Department for my share in it. You see there isn't a cruiser either in your navy or ours that could keep track of this Minnehaha for an hour, and if she got clear away there is no telling what harm she might do before she got run down at last, especially if those dynamite guns are what Mr. Courtland says they are. Why, you couldn't think of a better sort of up-to-date pirate than she'd make, and I guess it's just our duty as peace-keepers of the sea to stretch a point or two to catch her when we can."

Digitized by Google

This settled the matter, and the two captains arranged the details there and then, and the result was that when the Pocahontas put to sea she had received a complement of a lieutenant, a gunner, and twenty men from each warship, and exhibited the distinctly novel spectacle of the Stars and Stripes flying at the fore, and the White Ensign at the main. For the present, the British and American seamen joined the port and starboard watches respectively, as regards messing, but did no work unless they chose to; while the officers were berthed in the saloon as Courtland's guests, as it was understood the yacht was to remain entirely under his control until there was a definite prospect of fighting, when the naval officers would take charge.

The first thing that was done on the arrival of the Pocahontas in the Ozama river was the sending of a boat containing Lieutenant Dallas of the Hermione to the Magicienne, to report what had been done and learn what news he could, and immediately afterwards Tristam paid a visit to the Minnehaha to leave his card on the owner, not forgetting one of his wife's for her ladyship, as it was entirely contrary to his plan of action to do anything that might cause hostilities to break out between the two of them.

The chief officer met him very politely at the gangway and told him that only that morning the party on board the yacht had started on an expedition into the interior, that he didn't expect them back under about ten days, and that his own orders were to take a trip across to Kingston for some stores which couldn't be got in Santo Domingo and then come back for them, from which it will be gathered that the astute Yankee had already smelt danger in the arrival of the Pocahontas and the continued presence of the Magicienne off the mouth of the harbour. That night, too, as soon as it was well dark he slipped a couple of his most trusty men ashore, well provided with money and armed with a brace of six-shooters each. Their instructions were to follow up the party with all speed and at every hazard, acquaint Lorrain with the state of affairs, get his orders and bring them back before it was necessary for the Minnehaha to start on her ostensible voyage to Kingston.

As he had found the owner of the Minnehaha not at home, Tristam thought that the next important thing to do would be to go on shore and interview Don Gregorio, whom as yet he knew only by reputation. The President, who had been expecting a visitor from the Pocahontas, received him with the cordiality which a brief inspection of the craft and her armament through the telescope had already inspired him with, and Tristam, reckoning up the man he had to deal with, with the prompt judgment of the man who had met many different kinds of men in many different climes, saw at once that bluff was the game to play—and he played it.

"Don Francisco is a very good friend of mine, señor, as I have told you," said the President in reply to a very direct question from Tristam as to the exact relationship between them. "He came to my help with that splendid ship and those wonderful guns of his when I had been driven from my lawful position, and forced to take flight by that scoundrel Manuelo and his followers. He hoisted my flag and helped me to overcome my enemies, and in return he asked only that he should go up the Ozama and look for some fabled buried treasure that he thinks is there. That was generous, was it not?"

"Well," replied Tristam, taking his cigar out of his mouth and looking very straight at Don Gregorio, "to tell you the truth, Señor President, I think I know enough about Francisco Lorrain to say that he wouldn't be quite so generous as that without good reason. No, I don't mean to say anything rude about your friendship, which I have no doubt is as honourable and sincere as circumstances permit, only it strikes me that either he is perfectly sure that there is such a treasure as you speak of, and he knows where to find it, or he knows that it is somewhere, and he possesses the means of finding out where. How do you take my meaning?"

The question was put so very directly and carried such a peculiar emphasis, that for the moment Don Gregorio was taken fairly off his guard. He moved quickly and uneasily in his chair, his ruddy brown complexion changed visibly, and there was an uneasy look in his eyes as he replied:

"It is not quite plain. Does the señor mean that Don Francisco possesses some historical record of the treasure, whatever it may be, and that he has a plan that will guide him to it? I can only say that he did not tell me of any such thing."

"No, I don't suppose he would have done," said Tristam. "He is not that sort of man, any more than he is the sort to go on a wild goose chase into a disturbed country like this after a treasure that he'd only heard someone talk about. By-the-way, Don Gregorio," he went on, as though changing the subject, "Señor Lorrain had some friends with him on board the yacht, Sir Harley Pendril and his wife and, I believe, a boy, a sort of connection of the Pendril family whom they picked up at St. Thomas's. I was told on board the Minnehaha just now that the whole party had gone up country. It's rather a curious thing that they should have taken a little boy of six or seven on an expedition like that into a country which has just gone through a revolution, isn't it? I can understand Lady Pendril going with her husband, for she is just the sort of woman to do so; but the boy—surely, I should have thought they would have left him on the yacht. You tell me you saw them off; are you sure he started with them?"

While he had been speaking, Don Gregorio had been thinking, and he had come to the conclusion that Tristam not only knew a good deal more than his conversation indicated, but that all things considered, it would not do to tell him more lies than were absolutely necessary, and he therefore decided to tell him the one which seemed most likely to square with the facts. By the time Tristam had done speaking he had assumed a very creditable expression of sorrow, and he replied with appropriate tone and gesture:

"Ah, señor, it is to my greatest regret that I must say that neither the youth nor his Lordship of Pendril accompanied the expedition. Alas, it is to my sorrow that I must say that they are dead."

"Dead!" exclaimed Tristam, sitting bolt upright in his seat. "Surely you can't mean that, Don Gregorio. Why, Sir Harley Pendril was in the very best of health when he left England! What did he die of?"

"He died," said the President, with an excellent imitation of sorrow in his voice, "like the poor little boy, by being struck with the splinters of a shell, when Don Francisco's ship was fighting the Dessalines, the gunboat which the rebels had hired from the Haytians. They would not go below. His lordship would see the fun, he said, and so a shell came from the Dessalines and struck one of the yacht's boats and burst and wounded them both so sorely that they died. It was very sad, but his lordship should not have remained on deck and kept the boy with him. We buried them at sea with all honour and much sorrow, so you see they could not go on the expedition because they were dead."

Tristam more than half doubted the exact truth of this story, but it left him in no doubt whatever as to the fact of Langton and the boy having been got out of the way by some means or other. At the same time, he saw that no good end could be served by showing any doubts, so he replied:

"That is news that I am very sorry indeed to hear, for not only did I know Sir Harley Pendril personally, but I very much regret to say his sister has come out with us, and it will be a dreadful shock to her. I am afraid, too, that some very serious trouble may possibly come out of all this. You see, this yacht of Lorrain's was bought in a British port. She left Barbadoes with British papers as an ordinary yacht—a gentleman's pleasure craft, in fact. From what you have told me, she turns up on the high seas in a totally different character—as a sort of war-ship, in short, possessed of extraordinary speed and armed with very formidable guns.

Digitized by Google

"In this capacity she joins in a quarrel with which the British Government has nothing to do, and sinks a gunboat belonging to a friendly state. Meanwhile, too, a British subject and a gentleman of very considerable social position in England is killed in a quarrel in which he cannot have had any interest. I don't know what allowance might be made for the fact that you were on board and that the yacht was flying Dominican colours at the time, but to my mind it looks precious like filibustering, which a court-martial might perhaps call piracy. At any rate, I think it is only my duty to tell you that the captain of the Magicienne is acquainted with most of the facts, and that a British and American cruiser have followed us from Covered them with a brace of revolvers.

Barbadoes to watch the coast. At the very least there will have to be a strict inquiry into the matter, and I don't think the Minnehaha will be allowed to leave until it has been cleared up, unless she goes away to Kingston in custody of the squadron.

"I may as well say, too, at once, that Mr. Courtland's yacht, as you'll have seen, is really an armed cruiser. She can steam every inch as fast as the Minnehaha, and Mr. Courtland has placed her under the orders of the British and American commanders to make such use of as they think fit. Now what is your opinion of the situation, Don Gregorio?"

The President had been thinking again harder than ever, and by the time Tristam had finished he had come to the conclusion that his friend Lorrain was not likely to be much more use to him. He rose from his seat and said with as much dignity as he could assume:

"Señor Tristam, I am the lawfully constituted President of this Republic. Our ways here are not, unfortunately, as your ways in Europe are, and I saw no harm in accepting the help of Don Francisco to punish those who had rebelled against my authority and driven me from the place which was mine by right. But such explanations as your Government may ask for I will give you. Moreover, from now I am content to leave the settlement of the matter in the hands of the honourable captains of the English and American ships, and I will do everything I can to help lawful authority."

"Well," said Tristam, "we can't expect anything more than that, Don Gregorio, and I have no doubt that the commanders will be happy to meet you in every way they can. But there is just another matter, a personal one which I can hardly explain just now in full, but I may just say that I, too, have come after this treasure that Señor Lorrain has gone to look for. I have every reason to believe that it exists, and at the proper time I shall be able to satisfy you that I have a better right to be the discoverer of it than he has. Therefore I am going to ask you for permission to organise another expedition to go and look for it. If I find it I shall, of course, be prepared to pay a fair proportion into the treasury of the Government, and I am prepared to pay you £500 in gold now for what we may call the Concession of Search. What do you say to that?"

"I say only, señor," said the President with one of his blandest smiles, "that if you believe there is treasure in this country you are as much at liberty to go and search for it as Don Francisco is, and so I will accept your terms. The £500 down, and—shall we say a fifth of the treasure if it is found?"

"Yes, I don't think there is much the matter with that," replied Tristam. "We can draw up the agreement to-morrow morning, and you shall have the money the moment after it is signed. Now it is getting late, and I must be off on board."

"There has been some infernal foul play about this business," he said to himself as he walked down to the jetty wondering how he should break the news to Gwynneth. "That shell was altogether too convenient to be believed in. It seems to me about a thousand to one that poor Langton and the boy were murdered, but I don't see how to bring it home either to Lorrain or her ladyship, who, I dare say, had a hand in it, especially as regards the boy. Ah, if she only knew the truth! Anyhow, I am convinced now that they have got the Gold Magnet, and I'll hunt Lorrain down till I've got it."

"That is a very happy arrangement," Don Gregorio was saying to himself about the same time, as he was reviewing the situation with the help of a brandy-and-soda and an excellent Cubaña, "a most happy arrangement. They will go up the river. They will meet, and they will fight. It may be they will almost destroy each other, for Don Francisco is not the man to give up so precious a thing for nothing. Then it shall be my care to see that these lawless revolutionists fall on those that are left and slay them all, except the señora, for whom I will find a place of safe retirement, and then she shall tell me where I am to find this wonderful thing, this gold-finder, if I have not found it before. Yes, it is very good and very fortunately arranged. And now I will go and tell la Señora Sybil all about it."

CHAPTER XXX.

THE MAGNET AT WORK.

THE two men whom the chief officer of the Minnehaha had despatched to warn Señor Francisco of the dangers which had so suddenly and unexpectedly accumulated in the Bay of Santo Domingo, had been given very clearly to understand that the success or failure of an undertaking of great importance to their employer depended on the rapidity with which they moved, had decided that nothing in the ordinary course of human affairs was going to stop them.

As has been said, they were both well armed, and carried plenty of money to pay their way if they couldn't make it in any other fashion. They also knew enough of their new employer to feel pretty certain that every hour would be worth something to them in the way of reward.

They were landed near the Bastion San Gil without being observed, struck straight inland across the cemetery and then northward round the landward fortifications of the city, up to the old Well of Columbus. Near this they were fortunate enough to find a light skiff that was just floating on the incoming tide. Without a moment's hesitation one of them waded out to her, and finding that she had two oars on board, waved a white handkerchief to the other, and he promptly cast the moorings loose and joined his companion in the boat. Then they took off their stockings, muffled the oars with them, and pulled silently out into midstream.

Digitized by Google

The tide was coming up pretty strongly, and within the next hour or so they had covered a good six or seven miles of their journey in perfect silence and secrecy. Then the tide failed them, and the river got too shallow for further navigation, so they pulled the boat ashore and dragged it up into the thick scrub which crowded both banks of the river. Then, following the directions that had been given them, they struck eastward through this, and after struggling for nearly an hour with the thick undergrowth, they came out on the track, well above the mouth of the Isabella.

Then they turned their faces north-westward and set out at a rapid, swinging pace, which, with one or two brief spells, they kept up till daylight. Soon after sunrise fortune again favoured them, for they were overtaken by a couple of well-mounted gentlemen of colour, who were also making a journey into the interior. A very few words sufficed to bring about a complete understanding. Just as the travellers overtook them they separated, and from each side of the track covered them with a brace of revolvers. The coloured gentlemen understood what was meant in a moment, and promptly climbed down, and began to grovel for mercy. This facilitated matters considerably, and while one of the Minnehaha's men kept them in a paralysis of fear with his revolvers, the other tied them up neatly hand and foot with their own picketing ropes. They were then carried into the bush out of sight of the road, and deposited as comfortably as might be in the midst of a forsaken plantain patch, after which the two Americans got across their horses and went away up the track at a nice easy canter.

They made such good time that towards the middle of the afternoon they came in sight of the expedition, which had, of course, only been able to go at a foot pace, and another hour's hard riding brought them up with Señor Francisco and her ladyship, who were riding side by side half a mile or so ahead of the main body.

Lorrain heard the ominous tidings that they had brought in silence. Then he turned to her ladyship and said:

"This is distinctly awkward. I thought we should have had another week at least. I think I had better take Captain Peters' opinion on the subject."

"I think so, too," she replied, pulling her mule round. "It looks as if the yacht would have to run the blockade. Would it be better to give up the expedition for the present, and for all of us to get on board as soon as we can?"

"No," he said, shaking his head, "I think I must disagree with you there. That would look too suspicious, and besides, we should be almost certain to meet Tristam's party, and then there would probably be a fight, and with our base cut off we don't want anything of that sort just now. I don't mind a little gamble with Destiny, but I like the odds just a bit in my favour. Besides," he continued in a lower tone, "I don't see the fun of getting as near as we are to what we are looking for and turning back without at any rate finding just where it is. No, I think I see a good deal better way out of the difficulty than that already."

"I hope you do," she said, "for a meeting like that would be distinctly awkward just now, especially if Mrs. Tristam and my late mistress come up with the party."

"Very awkward, indeed," he said quickening his horse's pace a little, "and from more points of view than one, for if Tristam has any suspicion that we've got that thing with us he is just the sort of man to shoot on sight, and personally I should prefer to get there first."

"I most sincerely hope you will," she said with a little shudder.

"Waal, seenyor, what's the trouble? Serious news from the coast, eh? I hailed those two galoots as they passed me, but they wouldn't bring to, so I concluded that there was something serious and rode ahead a bit. Darn you for an iron-jawed grandson of Balaam's jackass, come round, and be—— I beg your ladyship's pardon, but this long-eared son of Belial won't answer the helm without a certain amount of language."

Captain Hiram Peters, who felt, as he himself put it, a good deal less at home on the hurricane-deck of a mule than he did on the navigating bridge of a steamer, had kicked his spurs into his animal's ribs as the two messengers from the yacht had passed him, and the mule had responded by breaking into a fast lope which made his seat in the saddle both undignified and precarious. Consequently he was in anything but a good temper when he hauled the hard-mouthed brute's head round alongside Lorrain's horse.

"Never mind about the language, Captain Peters," he said rather shortly. "The news is serious, and we've got to decide immediately what's to be done."

Then he told him what the news was, and Captain Peters heard it with becoming gravity, sparing one hand from the bridle to twist his beard awhile.

"Well, what do you think of it?" asked Lorrain, after a little pause.

"I think it is just about the meanest news I've heard since the late boss died," he said, looking down straight between his mule's ears. "It's real mean, but there is no doubt about what's got to be done first. The Minnehaha's got to be taken out of that bay on the shortest possible notice, if she's got to run the gauntlet of the united British and American fleets to do it."

"I quite agree with you," said Lorrain. "If we lose the yacht, we shall be in a fix that some of us won't get out of alive, and got out she must be, even if she has to fight her way out."

"That's so, seenyor," replied the skipper, his wicked little eyes lighting up at the very mention of a fight, "and although the First's a good man I don't like putting too much responsibility on him. He might wilt when the strain came, and I shan't, so I reckon if she's going out the man to take her out is sitting right here on this—darn you, hold still, you son of a coyote! I mean me, seenyor. You see, I've got a sort of interest in her, and though I wouldn't run her into any unnecessary dangers, I'd put her through something mighty like the ground floor of the other world before I'd let anyone else have her. Yes, sir, I would. The only trouble is what are you going to do."

"I've got it!" said Lorrain after a little pause. "Look here, Captain Peters, you are quite right about the yacht. In fact, I shouldn't feel at all easy unless I knew that you had charge of her if there is anything like blockade-running to be done. There is no disguising the fact that we are in a tight place, and we shan't get out of it without a squeeze. You take one of these men's horses and get back as fast as you can. Keep your weather eye open for Tristam's party, and avoid them whatever else you do, but get back on board the Minnehaha at all hazards. Then take her out to sea. Those are my orders. Get out quietly if you can. If not, fight your way out, but trust chiefly to your own speed and a dark night. If you find yourself chased when you get outside go full speed ahead to the southward, of course without lights, and as soon as you're clear double to the eastward, run round outside Saona through the Mona passage, and get round into Samana Bay, but don't get far enough in to give any chance of a blockade.

"I shall pay these niggers off at once, and send them back. We've no use for them now, and I believe every one of them is more Don Gregorio's man than mine. Then I shall get ahead as fast as possible with the others, locate what we've come to look for, and then get down to the north coast at Savana la Mar across the Sillon de la Viuda. It's a bad road, but it's a good deal shorter to the sea that way than back to San Domingo from where we're going. When you get into the bay send the boat ashore to Savana, and let it wait for us, with directions where to find you. Now that's the best plan that I can think of. Of course, if you don't get there——"

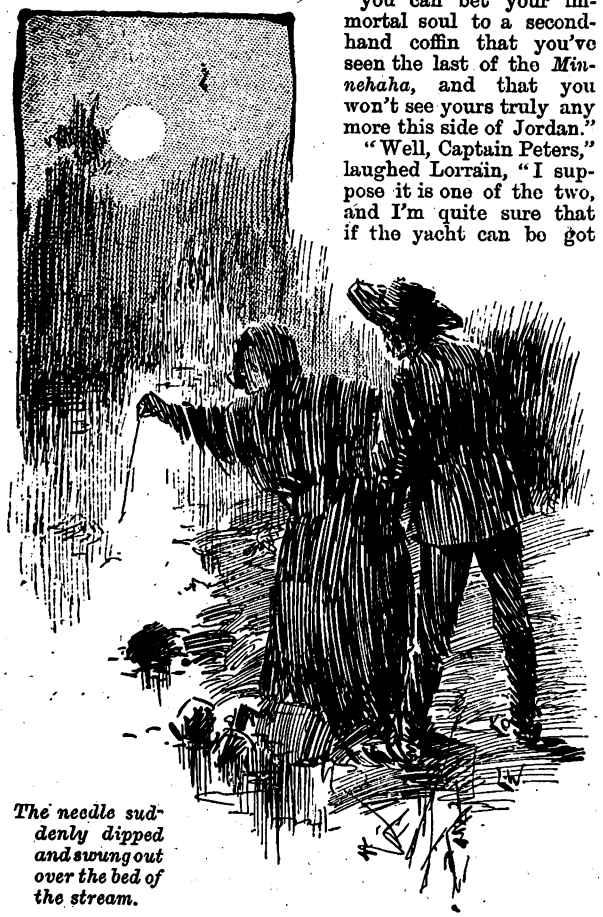
"If I don't get there, seenyor," said the skipper, climbing with more haste than dignity down from the saddle, "you can bet your immortal soul to a second-hand coffin that you've seen the last of the Minnehaha, and that you won't see yours truly any more this side of Jordan."



The needle suddenly dipped and swung out over the bed of the stream.

"Well, Captain Peters," laughed Lorrain, "I suppose it is one of the two, and I'm quite sure that if the yacht can be got round you'll get her there. If not, well it's all in the game, and I don't suppose we shall get off much better. I feel pretty certain that that little skunk Gregorio will have turned traitor by this time, and, what's more, if Mr. Leigh Tristam and myself meet on this island only one, if either of us, will get off it alive. And after all, that may not be myself, so practically the only chance we have of bringing this little bit of business through is to meet you on board the Minnehaha of Samana Bay. And now I think that is about all there is to say."

He put out his hand to Captain Peters, and as the little skipper took it, he said quietly:

"Waal, so-long, seenyor. You are tough-laid, but I believe you're real grit and straight business right through. That's me, too, I hope, and I'll keep my appointment in Samana Bay, or drive the Minnehaha bang into Kingdom Come. So-long, seenyor, and, your ladyship, my respectful au revoirs!"

As Captain Peters pronounced these last words with scrupulous adherence to the spelling, he let go Lorrain's hand, and waved his own with elaborate respect towards her ladyship.

"Good-bye for the present, Captain Peters!" she said with a prettily gracious little bow. "Good-bye for the present, and I sincerely hope that it will be only for the present."

"It 'll be that or all continuous eternity, your ladyship, and most likely that," said the little man with another elaborate salute.

And then he walked off to get his new mount.

He only waited long enough for the man who was to go back with him to get a few mouthfuls of food and drink, and then the two immediately set off on their return journey. Meanwhile Lorrain had called the other messenger aside, and was engaged in earnest conversation with him. When he had finished this he rode back to where the ten men from the Minnehaha were lounging and sitting by the side of the track enjoying a smoke and a spell. They stood up as he approached them, and he said in a low, grave voice:

"I am sorry to say, men, that I have just received very serious news from the coast. That little scoundrel of a President, it appears, has not only got a scheme on foot to jump the yacht and murder everyone on board her while we are away, but I find that these niggers that he has sent with us as porters are really what they call soldiers in this country, and have arms concealed about them and in their packs. The game, of course, is to let us find the treasure that we have come to look for, follow us up with a body of men from San Domingo, join with these blackguards here, and shoot the lot of us down with the exception I suppose of her ladyship yonder, who will probably be kept for something worse. Now this is not only a matter of life and death to us, but of a very considerable amount of treasure, and I don't think you're the men to walk into a trap like that with your eyes open."

"I guess, boss, we had better start in at the shooting right away," drawled one of the men, a tall, tough-looking down-easter. "It don't do to give vermin of this sort any show when there's shooting or knifing on the board."

"What do you think about it, Mr. Sampson," said Lorrain, turning to the second officer.

"I think Davy's advice about the best that could be given under the circumstances," was the reply. "Any one of those niggers would knife the lot of us if he could for a dollar a head. If it's to be us or them I'm for immediate execution."

"So am I," said Lorrain. "It's a pretty sharp measure, but it's life or death, and I think we're justified."

Murmurs of "That's so, seenyor," "Bully for you, boss!" "Niggers don't count anyhow," came from the rest of the men, and when Lorrain saw that they were quite ready for the bloody work that he had decided upon he went on:

"Very well. I am glad to see that you are prepared to stand by me, and you'll see that I shan't forget it, whether we find the treasure or not."

He then told them of their change in their plans and destinations, which had been rendered necessary by the news from the coast, and ended by saying:

"Now as regards these niggers. About a mile further on the track dips down beside the stream into a bit of a cañon. I and her ladyship will ride on ahead as before, and you, Mr. Sampson, will see that the niggers go in first. Then when they're in and we're out of sight, each of you pick your man and let go. A couple of volleys with your repeaters ought to do it, but if they don't I'll see that none of them get past me the other end. Now we'll get on the march again."

The cold-blooded scheme was carried out to the letter. The twenty negro porters went as unsuspectingly as sheep into the narrow defile, and as soon as they were fairly in it, the whites, at a sign from the second officer, scattered along the little ridge and poured a close, deadly volley into the midst of them. The sudden scream of terror from those who survived it was answered by another rattle of the repeaters, which was echoed by three or four rapid revolver shots from the other end of the canon. It was all over in two or three minutes, and the murderers set to work to strip the packs off their victims and drag their bodies away out of sight among the brushwood. They took what was most essential out of the packs and threw the rest away where they had thrown the bodies. Then they started forward again at a rapid marching pace, few of them thinking any more of what they had just done than if they had shot down so many sheep.

"After all, a Haytian nigger's best when he's dead. He's no good in this world, and if he does happen to be wanted in the next, there's no harm in sending him there," was Lorrain's only comment on the affair in reply to a sort of half reproach from her ladyship.

That evening they encamped in a pretty little glade a couple of hundred yards or so from the stream, and, as it happened, about half a mile below Arthur Pendril's grave.

"I think, from what I've heard Tristam say when he was showing Miss Stevens and my late mistress the plan that he had got from Arthur Pendril, that we can't be very far from the place now. It looks as though there was going to be a lovely starlight night. What do you say to a stroll up the river, and a little preliminary experiment with the Magnet?"

It was her ladyship who spoke. They were just finishing their evening meal, which she and Lorrain were talking together some distance apart from the others. The moon was about four days' old, and the star-clusters of the tropical sky were beginning to shine out brilliantly.

"Yes," said Lorrain, looking up. "I think it would be a very pleasant way of spending an hour or two before we turn in. It's not a very nice night for blockade-running, and I hope to-morrow night we shall have some clouds. But for a stroll in such pleasant company, and for such an interesting purpose, it is perfect, and as soon as I have posted the sentries and taken a few other necessary precautions, in case Mr. Tristam is coming up to pay us a visit, I shall be entirely at your ladyship's service."

About an hour later they were walking up the stream which here narrowed to little more than a brook. Lorrain was on one bank and her ladyship was on the other. He carried a light axe with the back of the blade drawn out to a point so as to serve as a pick, and a bull's eye lantern. She was walking with her right arm stretched out, holding between her finger and thumb a slender thread, at the other end of which hung the Gold Magnet, glittering with its strange lustre in the soft, half light, and swaying aimlessly to and fro. They had traversed over half a mile of the stream in silence, broken only by the sound of their own footsteps and the rippling of the water over the stones. Each of them felt an unwonted restraint and anxiety, a suppressed excitement natural to two people who were trying to do what had never been done in the world before, and who had every reason to believe that this first real trial of the talisman they had both sinned so greatly to get and keep would that night unlock the treasure-house of illimitable wealth for them, since if it showed them where Don Christoval's treasure-chest lay hidden it would also show them where every other golden hoard in the world was to be found.

"Stop!" whispered her ladyship suddenly, and looking across at Lorrain; "I believe we are getting near it. Look at the needle. Do you see, it has stopped swinging and the end is pointing straight up the stream!"

"So it is!" he said, coming across and turning the light of his lantern on the needle. "Come along, Jessica mia, and show the way to fortune!"

He slipped his arm through hers and led her along up the stream with somewhat quickened footsteps. About a dozen yards farther on the needle began to swing out ahead, and its forward swings were longer and quicker than the backward ones.

"We are getting hot!" whispered Lorrain, but her ladyship didn't answer. Her eyes were fixed on the uncanny thing that hung from her hand, and her whole soul was filled with dreams of gold. They went on a yard or two more, and then the needle suddenly dipped and swung out over the bed of the stream pointing almost perpendicularly down at the stones under the water. They stopped, and she went close to the brink and bent over with outstretched arm, Lorrain holding her by the other. She swung the needle about over the rippling shallow water, but the moment she held it still the needle stopped swinging and pointed down to the same spot.

"It's there!" she whispered again, looking round at him with bright eyes and white scared face. "There's no doubt about it, it's there. Now what shall we do?"

"Find a few land-marks that will help us to recognise the spot but won't help anyone else to find it," he said, drawing her away from the water and sweeping his bull's-eye about over the bank. "Hullo! What's that?" he said, as the light fell on a long, low mound about twenty paces from the stream.

They went towards it, and saw that there was a rude cross of white pebbles lying on one end of it. She crept closer to his side, and slipped her hand through his arm as she leant over and looked at it.

"That must be where Tristam buried Arthur Pendril," she said in a rather unsteady whisper. "Poor fellow, he little knew that he was going to be buried so near to what he was looking for."

"No," said Lorrain, with one of his gentle, unpleasant laughs, "and it's a very good thing for us that Tristam didn't know it when he was digging this grave. Perhaps, after all, he had some notion. What an infernal misfortune it is that something didn't keep them on the other side of the Atlantic for another week or so!"

(To be continued.)

A WONDER
IN MODERN JOURNALISM.

Do not fail to order Home Notes to be sent you on Saturday, February 19th.

On that date, and every week for the future, a shilling novel will be absolutely given away as a supplement with each copy issued.

These novels will be known under the general title of the Home Notes Library. They will be printed on good paper, in clear type, and will contain between 20,000 and 25,000 words each—the length of the present day shilling story.

Remember, these are Absolutely Free to Readers of HOME NOTES.

The stories will not be mere reprints. They will be specially written for us, and will not be obtainable separately from Home Notes, which will remain, as hitherto,

ONE PENNY EVERY SATURDAY.

Further particulars next week; but ORDER NOW, as there can be no reprint, owing to the amount of weekly labour this scheme will entail.

THE PASSIONATE SNAKE.

IF any man supposes that snakes do not understand the speech of human tongues, I—being a snake—will, in this short story, convince him of some other truths also.

We are the accursed of the earth. We have only to be seen to be straightway killed. Every man's hand is against us, not because of his own hate, for men are not cowards, but because of the hate of his women.

We have learnt, therefore, through ages of cruel treachery, to make our blows swift and sure; yet I say to men, with scorn, that we are more honourable and more merciful than they: we give warning before we strike. We give each man one chance, at least, for his life. More, we strike only when our lives are threatened, or our privacy invaded.

I, being a female thing, have known love. Ay, most beautiful and graceful have I been from birth. My form is slender and supple: my movements are sinuous and alluring. The grasses sway in languid undulations, caressing me as I slide slowly through them. My markings are of rich and unusual beauty and brilliancy. It is said that my eyes take on the colour of my moods and passions. When I lie basking in the sunlight, they have the pale blue content of the skies. When I lift myself erect, suspecting danger or treachery, they are like glittering, green emeralds. When I am jealous—what female thing has not been?—they are a pale amber-yellow. Once it was said to me that they were—but that must wait.

But I am beautiful, so beautiful that other female snakes hate me. And I heard a man exclaim: "What a handsome thing!" one day even as he lifted his heel to crush me. My beauty saved me, for, looking, he struck so reluctantly that I slid away and escaped.

I was born in a pile of stones on a hill in the lovely Grande Ronde Valley, in Oregon. From my father, a rattlesnake, I inherited my strong will and fierce passions; from my mother, a blue-racer, who had been lured away from her kin down in the green valley, my beauty and grace.

Before I was three months old I had tasted fame. All the male snakes on the hill came to watch me as I coiled and uncoiled my magnificent length over the stones of my home. And, oh, I used to wish that the mated ones would not come, for their mates said such evil things of me! But they would come.

One day in spring, when I was a year old, the king of all the rattlesnakes himself came to see my beauty, and he desired me greatly, although I was so young and he so old. My father was proud and flattered. But I—well, there was a young and bold blue-racer who used to climb the hill from the valley; and on soft, moonless evenings, when my father slept and my mother pretended that she did not hear, I slid down and met him among the deep grasses that grew half way up the hill.

Ah, those hours of first love! Poor human things, who pass your nights within the four walls of a room, I pity you!

We were only snakes. But we had the night and all its sweets woven for ever through our love. Soft winds, scented with the pines on the crest of the Blue Mountains, rippled the grasses above us, as we tasted the bliss of loving companionship. The nighthawk sank to blow his bugle-note beside us; the stars glowed redly through the breathing dusk; from the cañons far up in the hills came the mornful cry of a coyote. Down under the velvet grasses it was dark and sweet, and we were alone, and we loved.

When at length I stole home and coiled myself on the smooth stones, I could not sleep. I lay motionless until the pale greens and yellows came marching up the east, and the trees on the mountain's crest turned, one by one, to gold, and the meadow larks sang, oh, so sweetly, in the valley where I knew he lay as motionless as I, dreaming of joys that had been, and longing for those that were to be.

There was a full month of such bliss. But a day came when my father knew; and that night the king of the rattlesnake went down the hill in my stead, and lay in wait for his rival.

* * * * *

When I was convinced that they had killed him, I stole away in the night, and made my way to the other side of the valley, and dwelt alone on another hill, and mourned. There were no snakes, and there were no human things. And, oh, the days were long, and, oh, the nights were lonely.

Deep and passionate was my grief through all the spring, and summer, and autumn. When winter drew on, how glad was I to curl myself in a dark, warm place for my long sleep. I recall that my last thoughts were of how dreary and heart-breaking my awakening would be in the spring. Yet when the awakening came—well, I am a female thing, and that must be sufficient explanation.

Digitized by Google

* * * * *

It was a warm and lovely day in April that I languidly uncoiled and slid out to lie upon the stones. Never shall I forget how the beauty of that day thrilled me! I was glad, I exulted, only to live once more. My memories of love and sorrow seemed vague. Had I ever wished to die? Well, now I longed to live.

The valley stretched before my eyes, green and shining like a great emerald. There were splashes of yellow where the buttercups grew, and there were shooting stars, and all the sweet winds of spring.

I remember my first glimpse of myself in a still pool that spring. You may have observed a woman, reft of her love, in your own life, you human things. You may have seen her tears, her anguish, her garb of woe. Then, when a few months have gone by, you must have one day had your eyes dazzled by her sudden blossoming out into a new and wonderful beauty. You must have marvelled at the colour in her cheeks, the brilliancy of her eyes, the warmth of her mouth, the subtle grace of her movements. So it was with me. Life throbbed once more through all my being.

The loneliness grew unbearable.

One day as I lay curled, half asleep, I heard a step. A moment later a man came close to my heap of stones. I sprang erect, hissing and swelling, for I had not time to escape. He paused and looked at me.

"Beautiful thing!" he said, in a tone of sadness. "Strike, if you will. I shall not harm you."

He threw himself on the ground near me. He was unarmed. Ashamed, but incredulous, I dropped back into a coil, and lay watching him, motionless, save for the slow sliding of my head from side to side. He looked at me steadily.

"That a snake could be so beautiful!" he said, in the same sad tones. He reached out his hand with a caressing motion. "Come," he said, "we are alone. Let us be friends."

His eyes drew me with an irresistible fascination. A new, strange feeling stirred me. I uncoiled, and slid to him with graceful undulations. He laid his hand upon me, and both of us were without fear.

Days passed. I learnt gradually that he had come there to forget a woman. He pitched a tent near the stones and dwelt there. I followed him everywhere, I never permitted him to go out of my sight. I slept at his feet, and with the first dawn-ray I found his hand and curled upon it, waiting patiently for his caress.

One night, when the moon hung large and yellow on the violet breast of the sky, he threw himself upon his blankets, and held out his hand to me.

"I am sorrowful to-night, Lilith," he said—he called me that. "Come close, closer, my beautiful. Make me forget—other nights."

In that hour, as I slid into the warmth of his breast, I knew that sometime, somewhere, I had been a woman. Oh, the wild, sweet, passionate love that shook me. Oh, to utter but one word of it! Oh, to have hands to caress him, soft arms to enfold him, red lips to find his kisses. What had been my sin, then, when I was a woman, that I should have been re-created in this form? Beautiful, oh, beautiful! Yes; but unfitted for any save the lower loves, and this love was of the highest; the love of woman for man.

* * * * *

In the gorgeous pomp of an August dawn the man woke, with the snake twined about him. The woman he had been trying to forget stood beside him. He flung the snake from him and stretched out his trembling arms to the woman.

"Dearest!" she cried. "Did you think I could bear it? I know better. I have followed you, and I shall follow you again!" She sank to him, sobbing, and laid her mouth upon his.

He put his arms round her and held her there silently.

Suddenly she screamed and sprang erect.

"A snake! Kill it! Kill it!"

It was coiled, hissing, to spring at her. Already his hand was on his revolver. There was a flash. The woman screamed again. The snake was dead. In a moment the man had flung it outside the tent, and caught her, sobbing and trembling, to his breast.

"Oh, my dearest," he cried, "if the reptile had struck you, I should have turned the revolver on myself. Oh, my beloved, this accursed time without you! Give me your arms, your lips. Let us make up for this awful time apart!"

ELLA HIGGINSON.

YOU ARE WRONG. These are not thieves running off with other people's money. They are lucky winners who have solved the Popular Picture Riddles (the latest fashion in the puzzle world) in

THE BIG BUDGET 1D.

THE BRIGHT THURSDAY PAPER

Digitized by Google

MERESIA

By WINIFRED GRAHAM.

Author of "Through the Valley," "A Slave of Routine," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XXI.

"CLEANSE THE EARTH."

"DON'T you know what it is to have a sentence echoing in your head night and day, urging you on—always—always—till your brain reels?" said Meresia. "I can hear the words now: 'Cleanse the earth from all that harms it!' that is the continual cry which rises in my heart. Sometimes it inspires me with a feeling of awe and horror—sometimes I am glad—almost glad—a hideous thought isn't it, that I should be glad?"

José Serano looked at the woman long and silently. In her he saw an instrument—a means to accomplish an end. Her face was pale from deadly conflict with her soul. He wondered if he dared trust her with the thing she desired.

"You are mad," he said at last, "to undertake the work of Heaven, when after all you are only a woman. It is God's privilege to kill—God's alone. He places the hurtful crawling things on the earth that they may sting and bite."

"But we, meeting these, put them to death, when we have the strength, or the means. You could give me this advantage!"

Meresia's voice was scarcely raised above a whisper. She had in her eyes the dazed look of a sleep-walker, who dreams of ghastly deeds without grasping their full horror—one who has spoken words without understanding.

The man, on the other hand, realised in full the plan—the proposal she had just made him, and his hot Spanish blood tingled at the thought. For her womanhood, or for her soul, he had no care. He remembered only the cause for which he was a secret worker, and the villainy of the man now about to return to his judge's post in Madrid.

"So your husband is going back to Spain?" said Serano.

"Yes, yes," she answered, wringing her hands, "and I am to go with him. If he is unjust and cruel, as you tell me, how can I endure?"

"Hush! Don't talk so loud."

Meresia had raised her voice, and José went quickly to the door.

"I thought I heard someone outside," he said. "Be careful, Mrs. Aladros. You are unaccustomed to the discussion of crime."

There was something of sarcasm in the doctor's tone, but the woman did not appear to feel this.

"I don't care what happens to me," she said apathetically, and in direct contrast to her previous mood. "I am not afraid of death for myself, even if I break the Sixth Commandment. You see, I have lived with Aladros, and he has imbued me with the lawfulness of murder for the benefit of a community, or even for mere personal convenience. If I compass his death, it won't be from a selfish motive."

"Are you sure you have any motive at all?" asked José quickly. "Are you sure that in your saner moments you will not turn and upbraid me for leaving you loose on the world in your present mood? You need saving from yourself, Mrs. Aladros, and you come to the man who most hates your husband, and who knows enough of him to condone—even to applaud—your scheme."

Meresia went slowly to his side, and looked into his face.

"I have considered everything—success or exposure. I am neither mad nor motiveless."

Serano's breath came slowly through his teeth; it made a low hissing sound, like the travesty of a sigh.

"My husband sent me to you now—he is ill. Here is his letter asking you to return with me. A slight attack of influenza, he called it. Influenza sometimes goes to the brain, and kills people in two or three days. Alfonso is rarely ill—he has never really suffered—perhaps that is why he has the reputation of being the most cruel man in Spain. I don't want him to suffer, but I don't want him to live. If this is sin, then he, Alfonso, is the false prophet, for I am his disciple, and he has made me what I am!"

"Yes, I will come to him; but first I must think—I must consider!"

José walked slowly up and down the room in silence. Meresia crossed to the window, and watched the falling rain. At last he spoke—spoke all his thoughts—and as she listened, the fabric of the room seemed to fade and dissolve, while superhuman forces closed around her. She was out of breath with chasing shadows—she half-opened her mouth and panted. Here was the opportunity—the help—for which she craved—the great gust of wind that could raise the feather, and give it strength. Her faculties, instead of diminishing, by some mysterious but indestructible property enlarged; not weighed hitherto in her balances, nor comprehended in her horizon—they outstripped all the past limits of Meresia's imagination.

She listened to José's vehement and impressive utterances, hardly realising they were the words of a man. He, too, appeared transformed. The laws of conventionality, the sacredness of human life—all were as nothing to him with the lust of revenge in his soul, for the tormented ones whose blood cried loudly from the ground. He was back again—watching the old scenes of torture, hearing the groans from the upper room, the swish of the cruel whip, the clank of the burning irons. Through it all rose the voice of Aladros, sneering, self-satisfied, and then the uproar in the court—the cry: "Assassins, assassins!" And now came a human device, rising through it all on the lips of a woman, willing herself to cleanse the world from such a man. Her crime changed to a moral act of philanthropy, viewed by these side lights.

She was offering to sweep Aladros from off the face of the earth, this monster of iniquity, at the risk of enduring reproach, shame, imprisonment, and death!

Digitized by Google

What could be more terrible to Nature than such a thought?

With fearless eyes she stood—waiting; no longer the girl Meresia—but the wife, and the slayer! An outsider could not possibly have accounted for conduct so totally incompatible with her nature before Aladros claimed his bride, before she knew him as he was.

Now she felt the impelling power strong upon her—goading to sin—deadening her regard of principle, blinding her to the fact that this contemplated treachery was detestable.

She had thrown in her lot with the children of wrath, instantly depreciating both earthly and Heavenly things. The fiery serpents of sin crept to her heart and crawled about there. Legions of malignant spirits compassed the woman's soul on every side, taking the forms of angels, and bidding her "cleanse the earth." Tears of passion stood in her eyes as she drank in José's fierce revilings against Aladros—revilings that echoed the crying of her own spirit. The tears that rose entailed a bitter baptism not to be tasted yet!

Many and urgent were the motives at work, above and beyond her personal horror and contempt for the man.

Lost in the action of stronger emotions, she passed through successive stages of hardness and guilty thought, ever pushing on to reach the climax, to solve the mystery of her own destiny.

Germs of rebellious action had been growing for months secretly, poisoning her blood, fanned to life by her husband's words, who unconsciously preached his own doom.

It was his way to assert authority—to treat her as sold into bondage—to exact implicit obedience. Now the day was fixed for his return to Spain, and Meresia, throwing her confidence upon Serano, awaited the issue of things without fear or trembling, and with a certain fanatical fervour, born of long thinking and energy postponed.

José went to a cabinet, took something out, and gave it to Meresia. Her hand closed over the bottle, which she hid in the recesses of a huge muff.

"I will come with you now," he said, "and see Aladros."

She walked unsteadily to the door. He stood back to let her pass—his eyes fixed upon the fur muff. Then shrugging his shoulders, Serano followed, with the face of a man who had seen the blackest side of life, with the horror and the pain, and trained himself to smile at it all!

In silence they drove through the wet streets, Meresia keeping her eyes fixed on the window, mechanically counting the rain drops that coursed like tears down the mud bespattered pane.

José watched the curve of her neck, and the coils of her hair, for sheer lack of something better to look at. Meresia's beauty appealed to him merely as a picture, and he felt an unpleasant mixture of admiration and contempt for the nature she had revealed to him that day. She was conscious of his scrutiny, and moved uneasily, with a quick indrawing of her breath—a nervous twitching of muscles, as the carriage turned a corner sharply, and brought them in sight of the house. There was straw on the road for a sick man opposite, and the sudden noiselessness came like a funeral hush after the bustle of crowded streets.

Meresia let down the window, and, leaning forward, caught the indriving rain full on her face. Still she said no word, though José opened the door, and waited for her to get out.

"Shall I carry your muff?" he asked.

Meresia held it away from him, and shook her head.

"No," she replied.

They entered the house together. Meresia paused by the fire in the hall, and took up some unopened letters, with a pretence at interest.

"Will you go now to Alfonso's room?" she said. "If so, William will show you the way."

She put up her hand to the mantelpiece, to steady herself.

"Yes," he answered; "but won't you come too?"

"I think you had better see him alone, and tell me afterwards what you prescribe. Alfonso will enjoy a talk, he is not really ill—a little cold. William, take Dr. Serano upstairs."

When Meresia joined them she found her husband sitting up smoking a cigar. He complained of having lost his taste, and declared the cigar was like hay, but beyond that, and a general feeling of depression, there seemed to be little wrong with him.

"I have persuaded Serano to stay here and dine," he said. "I am to keep my room, and after dinner he has promised to play a game of chess." Meresia smiled.

"That is very good of you, Dr. Serano," she murmured. "Now tell me, what is the matter with Alfonso?"

"Influenza. I have sent for some medicine. Be sure you give it him every hour till midnight. I think it will check the illness, and bring it to an abrupt conclusion"

Meresia stayed with her husband till it was time to dress for dinner. Then she changed into a white tea-gown, which Aladros had, on more than one occasion, deigned to admire. Her gown was scarcely whiter than her face, and her voice trembled slightly as she joined in conversation.

Presently the gong sounded, and Meresia went with José Serano to the dining-room below. The room was shaded in red, and cast a glow over their features. A profusion of flowers scented the air heavily, and to the woman racked by suspense, their perfume became intolerable.

"Take that large bowl of lilies out of the room," said Mrs. Aladros, "and leave the door open, William. What a fire!" she continued, turning to José, "I hope it won't overpower you."

"No, I like a burning fiery furnace this time of year."

Meresia tried to eat, but it was a misera'le failure.

"I am rather anxious about Alfonso," she explained. "He seemed worse this evening."

"It will not aid your anxiety if you starve yourself," replied José; "life is, you know, merely a struggle with forces conspiring to put an end to it. Every meal is a sop to ward off physical decay."

Meresia turned to the man behind her chair.

"Go upstairs, and see if your master has everything he wants."

She glanced at the clock as she spoke, then moistened her lips with wine, and waited. Presently came the sound of feet running quickly down the stairs; simultaneously they rose, Meresia holding her breath, and looking across at Serano with something of triumph in her green eyes.

"What is the matter?" he asked, as the servant rushed into the room.

"Oh! the master!" he gasped, "the master!"

CHAPTER XXII.

The Sorrow of it.

"Can I see Mrs. Aladros?" said Elizabeth, standing on the steps of the darkened house. "I have only just heard the dreadful news."

The servant led her to a small boudoir at the back of the drawing-room, where Meresia was sitting tearless and alone.

She flung herself into Elizabeth's arms with a little cry, and clung to her fearfully as to a strong rock in the hour of distress.

"I knew you would come," she said. "I wanted you so badly. It seems years to me since last night."

"My poor Meresia!"

"I cannot realise yet that it is only Alfonso's body upstairs and not Alfonso himself. I had a sort of feeling that he couldn't die, and it was very sudden, very strange He had been ill all day, but only, as I thought, with a cold

Digitized by Google

Dr. Serano came and stayed to dinner. I think he knew, and his staying made me anxious. In the middle of dinner we were called to his room, and found that he was sinking rapidly. I believe it is often the way with those very big men. All his strength had left him, his pulse had almost ceased to beat, he was in a state of utter collapse, and a few minutes later became unconscious. Dr. Serano feared the worst immediately; he tried restoratives, but the failure of the heart's action came as quickly as the sudden sinking. In less than ten minutes he was dead!"

"How terrible!" gasped Elizabeth; "but what was the cause?"

"Dr. Serano will explain it to you. He told me, but I hardly listened, I was so upset. Mercifully he was in the house—I don't know what I should have done without him. It appears Alfonso always had a weak heart, and Dr. Serano knew it, though he never told me."

A silence fell between them. At last Meresia continued in low, unemotional tones:

"Have you ever watched the passing away of an earth-bound spirit, Elizabeth—and thought of the pity and the sorrow of it? I fancy a life that disappoints God must disappoint the soul that leads it. Perhaps you wonder that I am not crying, or sitting beside him, perhaps you are a little shocked at me——"

"No," said Elizabeth.

"I should be sorry if you thought me utterly heartless, but I cannot be a hypocrite, and Alfonso never had my heart; you knew that from the first—you were in my confidence. I wish I could tell you everything, but I can't; it would not be fair to make you share my burdens. I have missed the mark—I have played havoc with my life—I have sinned grossly! That is the Greek meaning of sin, 'missing the mark.'"

"Dear Meresia, you have done your best—you tried to be a good wife——"

"Oh! did I? Don't be ironical! I crawled to my husband because he was the stronger; I have only once got the better of him—only once!"

A queer light came into Meresia's eyes; a light that mystified Elizabeth.

"But this talk does not suit my widowhood, and in a few hours my parents will be here."

To Elizabeth, Meresia seemed more passionate and spontaneous during that first day of bereavement than ever before. Once while they talked, she even laughed; but there are women as well as men whose laugh "is as untrue as anything about them."

The seclusion of the house was unbearable, she confessed; her soul was full of wild energy. She could not rest or keep still, but wandered from room to room. She longed to unfold the bitter secret to her friend, to own that at last she had indeed made her tragedy—worked out her life task. The heat of youth burnt in her veins, but she could give no expression to the deep cry of her heart, she could tell no one of the dangers that encompassed her.

A voice from the great deep of Nature alternately convicted and condoned. Now she was prostrate at the judgment seat; now she was saved—pardoned, living in new and ever nobler embodiment, the endless life of an immortal. From a bewildered rhapsody she sank to a torment of struggles, of conscience-stricken shames, of long, severe sorrow, and penitence.

"Talk to me, Elizabeth," she said. "Distract my mind, occupy my thoughts, or give me something to read—some great author—Dante for choice. He is at least human; he got at the root of things. I think he would have understood me to-day. He has been described as 'deep, fierce as the central fire of the world.' Oh, Elizabeth! you don't know what I feel—what I suffer and endure. If I could only let you inside just for a moment, into my heart, that you might see the inward mechanism! What would you say? How would you endure the clear insight? You would hate me; you would be angry; you would condemn! This is not orthodox mourning—this fever of unrest. It is unusual, bad taste, but I cannot help myself. I remember last night, every moment as I talk, that dread hour 'big with destiny,' that slow sinking death, after the senses had fled. I counted the minutes by the clock till he should die. I could not bear to look, for I knew death was in the room; it came all round me—it was something cold and horrible. I wanted to scream, but my throat was parched. I was voiceless—dumb! Everything flashed before me—from the very first day I saw Alfonso; it passed in scenes—the mirror of my brain was never clearer at reflecting. I recalled much of what he had told me about life and things—coloured by his dreadful scepticism! They appeared in the presence of death to be the mournfullest, meanest ideas, without a grain of truth. His scepticism was not only intellectual, but also moral—a chronic disease of the soul. There was nothing submissive or reverent in him; it was all argument and obstruction with Alfonso. He pitied no one—not even the poor wretches that were placed in his power. He burnt them, like the chaff, and bragged of his Godforgetting unbelief. This was the influence I came under daily—hourly! Elizabeth, can you wonder I am embittered? Are you surprised that the Devil found his way to me, and tempted and, tormented?"

"You mean," said Elizabeth, "that your faith is shaken?"

"Not quite that, but from toleration I grew to hate my husband, my fear of him changed to defiance and indignation, though he never guessed or knew. Now he is dead, and in all common decency, I ought to sorrow and weep."

"Meresia, I do not blame you—I understand."

"If you only could, but that is impossible. Listen, someone is coming up the stairs, I can't see any one, my nerves are on the rack. Oh! Elizabeth, keep them away, save me from the condolences of my family."

The door opened, and José Serano came in. A sigh of relief escaped Meresia.

"Your father and mother are here," he said. "They are waiting to see you."

"Elizabeth," she whispered, "will you go down and bring them up?"

"Certainly, dear."

"And, Dr. Serano, stay with me till they come."

As Elizabeth went, Meresia crossed to the door, and stood with her back against it, questioning Serano with her eyes.

"You have nothing to fear," he said, "I've made the causes of death quite clear to every one, there is no suspicion."

She could hardly catch his words; he spoke in cautious undertones.

"According to Alfonso's teaching, it was not a crime," she said. "Thousands of generations have died, and what is one—one life hurried out of this inane existence a few years before its time that it might do less harm, and have a shorter account to answer for?"

"Hush! We had better not talk of it now. Only, for Heaven's sake, keep calm. The very walls have ears and eyes for guilty men and woman. Remember you are a—— "

He checked the word "murderess," but Meresia felt its sting, and shuddered. She looked irresistably pathetic.

"You have done well," he said, "don't grieve. It is something to have dared Heaven's work—and at your age!"

A new nature seemed to have come to Meresia in these first hours of self-sought widowhood. It was as if she had taken hands with a superhuman power, and lost her touch on transient things.

This deep-hearted daughter of crime, with the mysterious green eyes, had new and confusing thoughts, which at least were earnest. For the first time in her life, she was alone with the reality of things.

"Elizabeth is long," she said; "they are talking it over downstairs all in ignorance! How vile they would think me if they knew! Such a thing has, probably, never been committed before by any of our stock. Even now it is like a dream, and I am afraid that the door will open and Alfonso appear in the flesh."

Digitized by Google

She moved nearer the fire, and listlessly opened a book. To José she was still an enigma—a mixture of vices and virtues brought from her home and gathered from Aladros. In measured but melodious tones, she read the words that met her eye:

"'What am I? What is this unfathomable thing I live in, which men name Universe? What is life; what is death? What am I to believe? What am I to do?'"

The sorrowing parents crept softly to the little room where their widowed daughter mourned, and paused wonderingly as they pushed the door back unperceived.

On one side of the hearthrug stood Serano, with folded arms and impassive face, listening while Meresia read aloud chance passages from the book she held.

They exchanged bewildered glances, and it was Elizabeth's voice that broke the spell.

"Meresia," she said.

Mrs. Aladros sprang to her feet, and let the book fall. It clattered against the fender.

She saw the surprise on her parents' faces, and felt acutely her tea less position.

She held out one hand to each, and kissed first her mother and then her father. They had been prepared for hysterical grief, for lonely mourning, or overpowering despair, but not for this unexpected silence—this unnatural calm.

She drew them to the fire and shivered slightly.

"My dear child," cried Mrs. Milford, wiping her swollen eyes, "what can I do to comfort you?"

"Nothing," she answered, "I am only rather cold. Alfonso is cold, too. There is death everywhere—it follows me even here. I want to get away from it, I——"

She broke off, and bending down, stirred the blaze.

"I suppose I am cold-blooded," she continued, "like the fish. I can't tell you what I feel—fish have no language you know, like birds and beasts—their utmost power of sound is a feeble cry of pain."

Her words were so unexpected that the conventional soul of the mother stood aghast.

It was altogether a new phase to Mrs. Milford, who through joy and grief had ever followed the orthodox lines, and in her inmost heart she blamed Meresia, though she would not have said so—even to her husband—who was by no means loth to discuss his daughter's behaviour.

"To tell you the truth," he said, when they were alone, "I don't believe she ever cared for Alfonso."

"My dear," replied his wife, "Meresia simply adored him. Can't you see she is stunned by the blow?"

"I think it looks a deal more like frank indifference," retorted Mr. Milford. "But that is not a bad excuse if it should be noticed. 'Stunned by the blow!' I will remember those words."

Mrs. Milford dropped the subject by collapsing into silence.

Her daughter's attitude annoyed, and, at the same time, gave rise to thankfulness. She was not herself a very soulful person, but at the same time considered a philosophical acceptation of grief to be unbecoming in a young widow. A few emotional scenes at such a period were to be expected.

To herself even Mrs. Milford tried to paint her daughter in softer lights. Meresia had exceptional powers of control, fortitude consisting of self-repression under adverse circumstances and overwhelming calamity. It was her desire to save others pain, this hiding of her woe—a feeling, perhaps, that her sorrow was too deep for them to understand.

"We must bear with her gently," the mother said, "and when the tears come and she sobs out all her misery in my arms, then the worst will be over. Nature must have her way, but I think she is proving exceptionally cruel to my poor Meresia!"

(To be continued.)

A Magnificent Offer.

WE have made arrangements whereby we are going to do a wonderful thing. We are going to offer exquisitely coloured miniatures (hand-painted) of any family photos our readers like to send us.

Everybody knows what a miniature is; but until now the price of them has been so excessive that only the rich could afford to indulge in this luxury.

Fickle fashion has decreed that hand-painted miniatures are to be the rage once more, thanks largely to the interest taken by such renowned miniature painters as Lord Ronald Gower, Alfred Praga, Kate Pragnell, and others.

With the enterprise born of repeated success, Short Stories has taken time by the forelock and makes an extraordinary offer to the whole of its readers for a limited time only. We will paint a beautiful little miniature (about 2¼-inches by 1⅞-inches) in exquisite colouring, and completely framed in a dainty gold-plated oval frame.

Our special process enables us to give our readers a faithful likeness, which is more than can be said of many of the old-fashioned miniature painters, who charged a hundred guineas for the work.

Shall We Make a Miniature for You?

You will get an unheard-of bargain by availing yourself of this grand offer. All you have to do is to send your photograph, or that of a friend, together with a description of the colour of eyes, hair, complexion, and dress, and the coupon found below, with seven shillings and sixpence. The miniatures may be also had in chased gold ornamental frames, the total cost being 10s. 6d.

Of course, the better the photograph you send, the better will be the reproduction. Be careful to fill in the coupon correctly.

Name .....

Address .....

.....

Colour of eyes .....

„ „ hair .....

Complexion .....

Description of dress .....

.....

Amount of Postal Orders inclosed... £ s. d.

£ s. d.

Please send ..... @ 7s. 6d.

„ „ ..... @ 10s. 6d.

Digitized by Google

An Extraordinary Offer.

The Finest Embrocation in the World

GIVEN FREE.

The following very generous offer is made you (and is open up to and including January 31st, 1898) in the hope that you will see that it is greatly to your advantage to avail yourself of the opportunity now presented. If you are a smart man or woman you will write to us AT ONCE, and receive in return TWO FULL SIZED 1s. 1½d. Bottles of the FINEST EMBROCATION IN THE WORLD. All you have to do is to send SIX PENNY STAMPS to cover cost of postage and packing. You cannot but be pleased with our preparation, which only needs a trial to prove its worth. EVERYBODY HAS A GOOD WORD IN ITS FAVOUR. READ THE PRESS OPINIONS, THEN TRY FOR YOURSELF.

HERBULINE.

ONCE USED, NEVER WITHOUT.

HERBULINE

Not "One of the Best," but THE VERY BEST.

A Certain Cure for Toothache, Neuralgia, Rheumatism, Bronchitis, Asthma, Sciatica, Inflammation, Pleurisy, Fever, Ague, Cramp, Croup, Lumbago, Sprains, and Bruises.

THE CYCLIST'S FRIEND. HERBULINE THE ATHLETE'S COMPANION.

A BOON AND A BLESSING TO ALL.

Read What Authorities Say:

ENGLAND.

The Editor of PEARSON'S ATHLETIC RECORD: "Have any of our readers tried Herbuline? Everybody knows its name, but probably only a small proportion have had practical proof of its usefulness. Herbuline is a liquid herb compound, entirely free from acids or any other ingredient which would tend to make it injurious to the skin—a point of considerable importance, as it is used externally only. We are, of course, mainly concerned with its effect on athletes. For sprains, rheumatism, the prevention of chills, and a hundred complaints, it is invaluable. A little rubbed on the chest, back, and legs after a long run or a hard game will obviate all chances of a chill being contracted, and will prevent that stiffness which most of us have come to look upon as an inevitable sequel to opening games. The football season is now here, and we confidently recommend an application of Herbuline. We know the result will be satisfactory."

SCOTLAND.

The Editor of SCOTTISH SPORT: "Herbuline, which of late has come prominently into notice among athletic and other communities, has been tested by us, and we readily assent to the praise bestowed upon it in other quarters. It is a herbal compound in a liquid state, and does not injure the skin, though its use is external, which is one recommendation. Non-chronic rheumatism among a host of other complaints, is speedily disposed of; while for sore throats, cold, toothache, and like ailments, it is well spoken of as an immediate cause of relief as we can ourselves testify. The season being now in swing, we are certain, a more suitable commodity in case of accident could scarcely be kept at hand, and we recommend clubs to procure it for use in the field or clubhouse when required."

Sold by Chemists, Stores, and Patent Medicine Vendors everywhere. If not in stock may be ordered through leading wholesale houses in London or Provinces. This unrivalled preparation can always be had if asked for. See that you have HERBULINE, as none other is so good. Price 1s. 1½d. per bottle, Post Free, 3d. extra.

THE HERBULINE CO., 54 Bow Lane, London, E.C., and at Glasgow.

Digitized by Google

PLAIN SPEAKING.

P. R. E. A.—Probably you mean the river Tinto in Spain. The stream petrifies the sand in its bed, and stones that by chance touch one another are rapidly united into one piece. It is impossible for fish to live in this water.

S. D. T.—All birds when perched on trees or bushes serve as weathercocks, as they invariably arrange themselves with their heads to the wind.

AMATEUR.—The dexterity and suppleness of an acrobat is due entirely to constant practice. They are generally taught at a very early age, beginning with some simple motions like bending backwards until the head touches the floor, and rising again without the aid of the hands. Afterwards more difficult feats are learnt, until the muscles and joints become so supple that the whole frame can be twisted to almost any angle with apparent ease.

A. S. C. wants to know how it is that when a shower of rain begins with very big drops it is usually a very short one.————For two reasons. In the first place because wind which absorbs vapour in the clouds and causes them to disappear by blowing two or more raindrops into one, naturally increases the size; and, secondly, because the greater the distance of the rain-cloud from the earth, the larger will be the drops, and when a cloud is away up in the air, showers seldom last long.

D. G.—It is a strange fact that birds fish, and reptiles, are better able to distinguish colours than quadrupeds. Birds are very quick at distinguishing the colours of fruits, and are particularly fond of brightly-coloured objects, as the owners of red currant bushes and cherry trees can testify; even bees have been found to distinguish colour, showing a decided preference for blue.

COBB.—The average age of a dog is about fifteen years, although they sometimes live to be nearly thirty.

D. L. C.—Crows were not always regarded as pests. The ancients used to employ them as letter bearers in the same way that we now use carrier pigeons.

A CORRESPONDENT when travelling in the East came across a curious form of courtship, and thinking it might interest the readers of Short Stories, writes: "One day in Burmah I noticed a man sitting by the roadside glaring fiercely straight ahead of him at something he certainly could not see from his position. Passing again the next day I again saw him, still in the same attitude, and my curiosity being aroused I inquired of an English resident as to what it meant. 'Oh, he is in love,' was the answer, and then it was explained to me that when a Burmese falls in love he has to seat himself at some distance from his adored one, and wait for her to do the rest. If she condescends to look in his direction once or twice on the first or second day, he is wildly encouraged, but if on the third day she nods at him and smiles, it is time for him to consult papa."

THE volume of Pearson's Magazine offered to the reader who re-wrote a given paragraph in the smallest space has been won by Mr. S. C. Hurford, care of O. Hurford, Station-master, Walnut Tree Bridge, near Cardiff, S. Wales.

R. N. B.—Most of the hair used in wig-making is obtained from the heads of German peasant girls, many of whom will exchange a fine head of hair for a shawl and a few commonplace trinkets offered by agents.

T. S. S. asks: "What is the cause of the feeling of impending misfortune which comes over one when lying awake at night?"————This question has puzzled psychologists since the beginning of history, and it has been answered in many different ways, some possible and others improbable. The view now most generally held is that when lying awake at night, the controlling power of the mind is not so great as when the body is active, and ideas rise in rapid succession, suggesting to the judgment all possible developments of the thoughts which last occupied the mind of the distressed person.

J. J.—It is not the custom at present to put either cream or sugar into the tea or coffee for one's guests. The tea should be sent round and the other ingredients separately, in order that they may help themselves.

AN OLD MAID.—A hundred years ago, unmarried, as well as married women, were styled "Mrs." Girls were called "Miss" until they left school, when they took rank as "Mrs.," while married women were very generally addressed as "Madam."

AN INQUIRING MIND would like to know how it is that an eagle can look at the sun without blinking.————By means of a thin, transparent veil, which the bird can draw instantaneously over its eyes without affecting its vision in any way.

SUPER.—The oldest existing playhouse in London is the Sadler's Wells Theatre. It is now an inferior place of entertainment, and exceedingly moderate in its charges for accommodation, a stall ticket being obtainable for threepence. Contrary to general belief, the audience is exceedingly well-behaved.

P. W. M. is curious to know the origin of the expression "To propose a toast."————A toast is, of course, a name given or a sentiment suggested, to which guests are invited to drink in compliment. In olden days our ancestors approved of using toasted bread with their drinks, and toast still floats in the loving cup, and also the cups called copus, bishop, and cardinal at the universities. Hence, the lady named, or the sentiment proposed, was the toast or savour of the wine which gave the draught piquancy and merit.

R. M. B.—The reason that lightning is zigzag is because, as it condenses the air in the immediate advance of its path, it flies from side to side in order to pass where there is the least resistance to its progress.

M. T.—Silkworms produce twelve times as much silk as do spiders.

CORDER is anxious to know if the belief that the wearing of earrings is a cure for weak eyes is anything more than vulgar superstition.————I am bound to say that there is some slight ground for believing in the remedy. The truth of the matter is that by piercing the ears a counter irritation is set up, which may affect more or less of a cure. When once the skin has grown over the wound, the rings in the ears are as useless as they would be in the toes; the object of the gold rings is to keep the wound open as long as possible, and hence the magical power with which they have been credited, especially by sailors.

CADET.—Napoleon Bonaparte was of neither French nor even Corsican origin, but German. His ancestors emigrated from Germany to Genoa in the eleventh century.

Notice to Competitors.

IN all Prize Competitions the Editor's decision is final. No correspondence will be entertained when once a competition is finished and the result published.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

DEER RECTORY,
MINTLAW, ABERDEEN,
Nov. 8th, 1897.

From Rev. J. H. BURN.

"My own cure with one dose of KAPUTINE was marvellous after ten weeks' incessant neuralgia.

Thirteen years' suffering effectually and speedily relieved by KAPUTINE is the testimony of Rev. T. TAYLOR, VICAR of ST. BREDWARDS, Cornwall.

There is nothing like this wonderful KAPUTINE. Nothing Similar, Nothing as Good.

Sold by all leading Chemists, Packets of 18 Doses, 1s.

If any Difficulty, send and enclose stamped envelope to "A.M.," KAPUTINE Ltd., Huddersfield, for free samples, or 12 Stamps for a Packet of 18 doses.

KAPUTINE

THE SAFE REMEDY FOR HEADACHE.

EASY COMPETITION FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

As a reward to those who assist in selling KAPUTINE, we will forward to each sender of the first ten letters opened Feb. 1st, 1898, with the missing letters of the Eight following words correctly filled in, descriptive of the qualities of KAPUTINE, £1 each; to the next ten 5s. each; to the next ten 2s. 6d. each.

K*PU*I*E	AEEA*LE	P*RF*CT	U*EQLL*D
T*N*C	I*IM*T*BL*	NO*PO*SONS	EECT*VE

As a guarantee that the competitor has assisted in selling KAPUTINE for Headache, each competitor must enclose four stamped outside wrappers off KAPUTINE packets. These four wrappers may be easily obtained if you persuade your friends or relations to let you buy one packet each for them, and you can then get the wrappers necessary. Show them our advertisement and you will have no difficulty in getting them to buy a packet of this wonderful remedy for Headache and Neuralgia, or you may get several friends to join at one packet. You have three months to win the prize in.

In addition to the above prizes we will give a crisp £10 Bank of England Note to the person sending, on February 1st, 1898, the largest number of outside wrappers bearing part of the medicine stamp. These wrappers you may obtain as suggested above.

Address: "A.M.," Kaputine Ltd., Huddersfield. List of Winners "Yorkshire Post," February 27th, 1898.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

A sum of from 10/- to 20/- per week offered for spare time to either sex everywhere. Work can be done evenings. Send addressed envelope to Box 60, Eclipse Works, 89, Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.

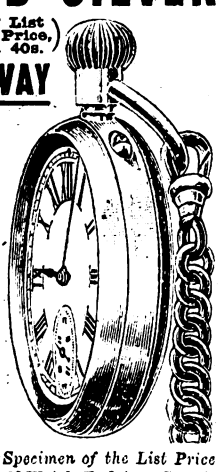
A SOLID SILVER WATCH (List Price, 40s.) GIVEN AWAY



to every person who carries out the conditions mentioned in our Catalogue of further wonderful bargains, for which you must send. In sending for it enclose 1/6 (nominal price) for one of our handsome Black Star Diamond 18-ct. Gold-cased Half Hoop Rings equal in appearance to one costing £5 5s. At same time state whether you require Lady's or Gents' Watch. This is NO SWINDLE, and I am not an AMATEUR Watchmaker, but an experienced Watch Manufacturer and Diamond Merchant. Send at once. You will be delighted. If not, money will be returned. The Watch is warranted for 5 years, and is sent post free on your complying with our conditions.

Specimen of the List Price £2 Watch (Lady's or Gents') I am giving away.

Send at once, enclosing P.O.O. 1/6 for ring and offer of watch. Send string size of finger. Address:

W. W. WADE,
Dept. 6, Gold Exchange, Hammersmith, LONDON W.

SUCCESSFUL NOVELS AT 3/6 EACH

SECOND EDITION IN THE PRESS.

THE INVISIBLE MAN.

By H. G. WELLS. Crown 8vo, cloth, price 3s. 6d.

"Will greatly enhance the reputation of a very ingenious story-teller. Mr. Wells has a remarkable faculty of invention, and a still more remarkable gift of persuasion."—Illustrated London News.

"I have not been so fascinated by a new book for many a day."—Mr. CLEMENT K. SHORTER, in the "Bookman."

"Without exception one of the most weird and creepy books we ever remember to have read."—Weekly Sun.

"The story is told with that fertility of imaginative resource which has made Mr. Wells conspicuous in this domain of fiction."—Daily Chronicle.

A SECOND EDITION, COMPLETING 11,000 COPIES, NOW READY.

THE SKIPPER'S WOOING.

By W. W. JACOBS. Crown 8vo, cloth, price 3s. 6d.

"In the 'Skipper's Wooing,' as in 'Many Cargoes,' Mr. W. W. Jacobs proves himself to belong to the tribe of benefactors. The story of how Captain Wilson, master and owner of the schooner 'Seamew,' won the hand of Miss Annis Gething, is one which few people, to use an expressive vulgarism, will be able to read 'with a straight face.' . . . Those who have read Mr. Jacobs's earlier stories can readily imagine how irresistibly ludicrous are the developments of the plot."—Spectator.

A STIRRING ROMANCE OF THE TIMES OF FRANCIS I.

JOHN OF STRATHBOURNE.

By R. D. CHETWODE. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

Times.—"We can only say that had it appeared anonymously it might have passed for the handiwork of Mr. Stanley Weyman, and it would be difficult to give higher praise."

THE TYPEWRITER GIRL.

By OLIVE PRATT RAYNER.

The Times says: "Amusing and clever. . . . We like her when driven to dire extremities, she pawns her typewriter and keeps her bicycle."

A COMPLETE CATALOGUE WILL BE SENT ON RECEIPT OF POST-CARD.

C. ARTHUR PEARSON Limited, Henrietta Street, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ENTIRELY NEW PROCESS.

WILLIAMS' INVALID'S TEA

Established 1875.

Invalids, as well as those in health may enjoy drinking this tea without the least fear of the injurious effects which so frequently result from using other teas.

Invaluable to persons of weak digestion.

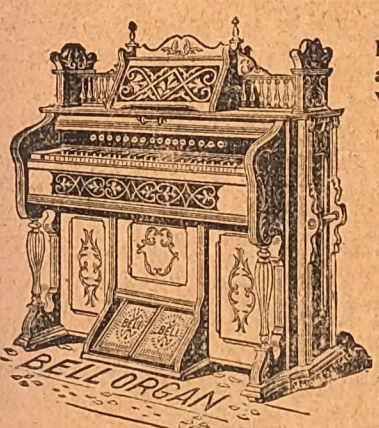
Price 2s. per lb.; 20lb. 2d. per lb. less.

3lb. and upwards sent Carriage Paid. Terms Cash.

Bankers: London & Midland Bank Limited. (Mention Paper.)

J. WILLIAMS, TEA MERCHANT, WAIN HOUSE, TONYPANDY.

BELL ORGANS & PIANOS.



Unequalled for Purity of Tone and High Class Workmanship.

THE MOST RELIABLE INSTRUMENTS MADE.

Write for Catalogue and Terms, Cash or Easy Payments.

The Bell Organ and Piano Co. Ltd.,

49 HOLBORN VIADUCT, LONDON, E.C.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

SALE NOW OVER SIX MILLIONS YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

A FEAST OF FICTION.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY
C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

NO. 474. FOR WEEK ENDING JANUARY 29TH, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.

"Kola is not a food. . . . Kola is not harmless."
—MEDICAL WORLD.

CADBURY'S Cocoa is entirely free from all admixtures, such as Kola, Malt, Hops, Alkali, etc., and the Public should insist on having the Pure, Genuine article.

CADBURY'S Cocoa is "A Perfect Food."

EXTRACT FROM AN OPINION BY DR. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E.

(Combe and Gilchrist Lecturer, etc.), expressed by him in a Lecture on Foods:

"I am distinctly of opinion that the modern tendency to add to Cocoa other substances, mostly of a stimulating nature, is a dietetic mistake, a practice to be thoroughly discouraged. If you have a pure Cocoa you want nothing else in the way of constituting it a food, for it contains in itself all the principles which go to make up a perfect article of diet. When people begin to add to Cocoa, Hops and Kola and other things, they are interfering with and altering its dietetic value. Cocoa thus treated is not Cocoa but something else, and I have declined for my part, in all my long advocacy of Cocoa as a food to recognise that anything but pure unadulterated Cocoa can correspond with this definition of a perfect and desirable diet. I hope the time is not far distant when the public will awaken to a knowledge of the fact that 'doctored' cocoa is not a thing to be recommended or advised as a food."

CADBURY'S COCOA

IS ABSOLUTELY PURE, AND A PERFECT FOOD.

Digitized by Google

"Its food value is double that of Bread made from ordinary wheaten flour."—Lancet.

HOVIS BREAD

will not only help to improve your digestion and consequently your health, but will also bring back that energetic and happy feeling of good health. Man does not live a natural life, so a good portion of a natural food, in the shape of HOVIS, at each meal will largely counteract the bad influence that modern life has upon the health and digestive organs. This is not an idle remark, but a proved statement, daily being verified.

HOVIS is baked and sold by all good class Bakers. No loaf genuine unless stamped HOVIS. 6d. and 1/- samples of Bread and Biscuits sent on receipt of stamps by

S. FITTON & SON, Millers, Macclesfield.

Every Economical Housewife
uses

Tower Tea.
Tower Coffee.
Tower Cocoa.

IN PACKETS AND TINS ONLY.
SOLD EVERYWHERE.

WHOLESALE:
TOWER TEA LTD.,
5, JEWRY STREET, LONDON, E.C.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL
BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS
SUCH AS
Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.
SALE NOW OVER SIX MILLIONS YEARLY.
In Boxes, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.
Prepared only by the Proprietor,
THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.
Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

MAKE FRUIT WINES AT HOME.
Ask for MASON'S.

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. THE VERY BEST.

MASON'S GINGER WINE ESSENCE.
A Sixpenny Bottle will, in six minutes, make sixty glasses of Delicious, Non-Alcoholic Wine.
Agents Wanted.
NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.
MASON'S (NOTTINGHAM) COFFEE ESSENCE (THE BEST MADE)

MASON'S WINE ESSENCES
are made in all Fruit Flavours, Ginger, Lemon, Orange, Blackberry, etc.
YOU WON'T BE DISAPPOINTED.

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

SHORT STORIES

No. 474.] [One Penny.

For the Week ending January 29th, 1898.

The Mysterious Figures.

One day last January I received the following cablegram from Messrs. Radix and Pollen, of Rotterdam, Holland:

Will you go to Guiana for us? Come if "yes."

Messrs. Radix and Pollen import roots, barks, herbs, and dyewoods from South America; in fact their house is the leading one in that line in Europe. I had been on botanical excursions to South America for this firm several times before. I therefore took it for granted that the telegram referred to a similar commission.

As they had cabled their inquiry I knew that they desired no delay, so an hour later my answer, was on the wires. Two days later I sailed for Rotterdam.

Coming on Hollandia.

Arrived there, I immediately called at the office of Radix and Pollen. After the usual introductory phrases about the trip over, the weather, and our respective good healths, we proceeded to business.

"You were no doubt surprised," said Pollen, "at our cablegram? Our business is so important, however, that we want it taken in hand without delay.

"With the last vessel from our factory on the Surinam we received a letter from our superintendent there; in it he stated that an Indian, one of the Galibis from the lower Maroni river, had called at the factory for a few days, always more or less drunk. In the course of a talk the superintendent had with him the Indian said that he knew of a tract of rosewood trees several miles in extent.

"From his talk our people there could not determine whether the tract was on Dutch ground or over the river in French Guiana. As a great sum of money was eventually involved, the superintendent concluded to keep the Indian at the factory (to prevent him from talking to other parties) until he heard from us.

"We think the matter worth investigation, and concluded to send you over to do so.

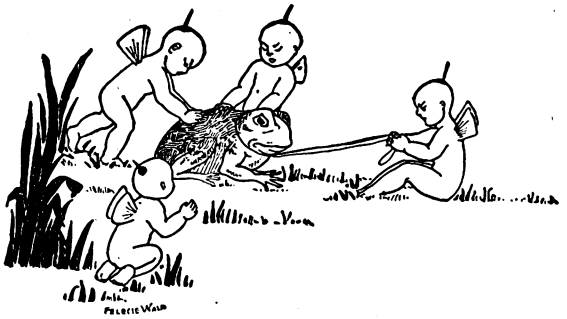
"Our steamer, the Cortex, will be ready to sail in about a week. Get your things ready and go out in her. The business may be settled in a few months, it may take longer, and it may be that the Indian lied altogether. Go and see what you can do. We have obtained a blank grant from the Dutch government, so that if the tract exists we can pre-empt immediately."

My preparation for the trip was soon made. Everything necessary for the work in the forest I could obtain at the factory. I only needed a supply of necessaries for the long ocean voyage.

These "factories," as the trading stations are called, are simply storage houses established by the European traders

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google



at convenient points along the coast. Here the natives bring their gold, ivory, skins, roots, dyewoods, etc., and exchange them for rum, cast-iron knives, more rum, calico, brass wire, more rum, obsolete fire-arms and other European commodities. Messrs Radix and Pollen had three such factories on the Guiana coast.

In due time the Cortex sailed and arrived at Paramaribo after a long and somewhat tedious trip. At Paramaribo we discharged freight for that port and then continued along the coast to the mouth of the Maroni river. Here the factory was situated to which I was des ined.

At the factory my arrangements were soon made. Indian carriers were selected, supplies to last us for three months were packed, guns and revolvers were examined, cartridge belts filled, and the thousand and one other things attended to that were necessary to insure the safety of an expedition into a South American forest.

After a week's hard work we were ready, and started upon our tramp into the forest.

Week after week we toiled on, chopping our way through the inextricable mass of tangled vines, creepers, roots, and undergrowth of the primeval forests, harassed by ants whose bite raised a blister the size of an hazel-nut, dreading to set foot on the ground for fear of treading on a snake, and yet fearing to keep the eyes fixed upon the ground for dread of walking into a snake hanging from a branch, like a whipthong discarded by a driver, or like a piece of huge cable, able to crush the largest beast in its folds.

If we came to a clear, cool stream flowing temptingly in the shades of the forest, we hardly dared bathe in it for fear of the gymnotus—the electric eel—whose shock, while not always fatal, is always very unpleasant.

And then, after passing the day with every nerve strained to its highest tension, when night came it was necessary to wrap one's self up very carefully lest some unprotected part of the body attract a vampire. These hideous bats settled themselves noiselessly upon the exposed neck, hand, arm or other part of the body, and insert their lancet-like sucker under the skin of the unfortunate.

After filling themselves with blood they flit silently away into the forest, leaving the wound open. Then, when the traveller awakes, he is generally so weak from loss of blood that very often he can no longer bear up successfully against the equatorial fevers.

At last, however, we came to the end of our journey. After battling for five weeks with the tropical vegetable and animal world we came, as the Indian had said, to a veritable forest of rosewood trees. As we saw later, the edge of the forest was but a few miles from the river.

After having satisfied myself as to the extent of the grove, exact location, distance from the river and best route to the river, I set the Indian carriers to work making a canoe, as I intended to return to the factory by way of the river.

While enjoying a brief rest and a pipe on the river bank, I carelessly examined the rocks rising in a dense mass from the river, and was startled to see the figure of an arrow carved deeply into the rocks a few feet above my head. Naturally, I asked myself why the arrow was there. Cleaning the face of the rock from vines and moss I followed up the direction indicated by the arrow. Foot by foot I scanned the surface until I saw a place where an opening about a foot square in the rock had been closed with a stone, roughly chipped to fit the opening. This stone cover was wedged into place tightly with several large iron spikes.

Returning to camp, I got a small axe and then proceeded to remove the stone lid. After working for half-an-hour I succeeded in removing one of the spikes; with it I displaced the others, and finally probed out the covering stone, disclosing an opening about a foot deep, in which lay a large copper powder flask.

On shaking the flask it seemed to be empty, and I was about to throw it into the river when I thought I might as well open it. As it was impossible to remove the screw cap, I chopped off the head of the flask and saw that the flask only contained a tightly rolled paper.

Upon unrolling the paper I saw that it was covered with writing; this, after studying it for half-an-hour, I was enabled to read.

It was a letter, signed Yan Kerkenberg, giving instructions to some one coming after him.

The letter described how the writer had left his vessel at anchor at the mouth of the river, and how he had made the trip up the river in a rowing-boat. From the landing place at the rock, where I had found the flask, the diamond mines, according to the Indian guide, were distant in the direction given, inland, a journey of about two weeks.

In case the party following should not meet Kerkenberg on the road coming or going, he would cruise along the coast the stated time and then return to Dykendorp.

So much for the letter. From the coating of patina on the flask and the faded appearance of the writing, I judged that many years had passed since the flask had been placed in the rock by some hardy adventurer in search of wealth.

As soon as our canoe was finished I took two of the carriers and started down the river to the factory; the rest of the men I left at the camp in charge of one of the whites from the factory who had accompanied us.

Arrived at the factory, we soon had all arrangements made to send a force of men up the river to the camp; then, for myself, there remained nothing else to do but wait in patience until the Cortex returned.

One evening I mentioned my find in the rock to the superintendent of the factory, and was astonished to hear that he had heard of Kerkenberg.

"Yan Kerkenberg," said he, "was one of two brothers who carried on a promiscuous kind of a sea trade, chiefly between Holland and our coast here. This was long before my time, however. I heard one version of the story shortly after I came here, some twenty years ago, from the older among the Indians. Later I heard more of the story from the authorities at Cayenne, so I think I have it about right.

"Well, each of the two Kerkenbergs commanded a small vessel; they bought, or stole, and sold slaves and anything or everything they could convert into money. It seems that they also did a little bit of piracy now and then. At any rate the authorities at Cayenne, some forty years ago, accused the two brothers of a long list of crimes, hung the one brother Diederick, on general principals, and confiscated his ship and cargo. The other brother Yan, was known to be off the coast hereabouts at the same time, but after the hanging of his brother he disappeared. They said at that time that he had left here for fear his vessel would be confiscated also, but it seems, from the letter that you have found, that he went up the river.

Digitized by Google

"Perhaps he returned. I doubt it, however. From what you have just gone through in the last weeks you know it is a huge undertaking to penetrate into the woods, provided with all help possible. For a seaman to go in, accompanied by only a lot of sailors, is simply to hand himself over to the snakes, Indians, or starvation.

"I think Yan's bones are lying in the woods somewhere, and that his ship waited a certain time at the river mouth for him. As he failed to appear again, the ship no doubt put to sea without him. At any rate his ship never returned to this part of the coast.

"His name, by-the-way, was Churchill. He was an Englishman, and had merely changed his name into a kind of Dutch and called himself Kerkenberg. He no doubt had reasons for so doing. I suppose in his wanderings up and down the coast, Kerkenberg heard of diamond mines in the interior and started out to find them. If he did not die on the road from other causes he was most assuredly killed and robbed by the Indians."

On the home trip, when the Cortex stopped at Cayenne, I looked over the records there and saw that Diederick Kerkenberg had really been hanged there for piracy, and that search had been instituted at the same time for Yan, without results, however.

Upon the arrival of the Cortex at Rotterdam I reported at the offices of Messrs. Radix and Pollen, settled our business relations, and then started on a short tramp afoot through part of Holland before returning to New York. On my tramp I had Kerkenberg again called to mind by stumbling into a village called Dykendorp.

Prompted by idle curiosity, I asked my landlord if he had heard anything of a mariner called Kerkenberg many years before.

"Kerkenberg!" said he, folding his hands over his breast and gazing reverently at the ceiling, "do I know anything of him? I do, God keep him in grace for ever and let the kingdom of Holland prosper! Why, man, they eat his annual dinner right here in this house every 4th of August. We will always think of Kerkenberg, at least so long as the kingdom of Holland exists."

Later in the evening, over a pipe and a glass, the landlord told me the following story:

"Yan and Diederick Kerkenberg were merchant sailors who sailed from here for many years. They traded between here and South America. They generally came into port here about the same time and always sailed away together.

"Once, so my father, who knew them both, told me, Diederick left port suddenly before Yan was ready. A few weeks after Diederick had sailed Yan called to the town council together and told them that he wished the town to remember his name for ever. As he and his brother stood alone in the world he had arranged matters so that the town itself would see to it that his name should not be forgotten. For this purpose he had purchased a plot of ground in the village churchyard. In this plot he had placed a slab of granite with the name of Kerkenberg cut upon it; the plot he had had inclosed with an iron railing.

"Then he deeded 1,000 florins to the town upon the following conditions:

"The money was to be placed out at interest three-quarters of the interest obtained was to be used in providing an annual banquet of the town officials, the minister, the school teacher and whatever guests the town officials might see fit to invite.

"This banquet is to take place every year on the 4th of August. My house has been honoured by having the last ten held in it.

"This bauquet is to be held, provided that the sexton hands to the burgomaster, one week before its date, a written statement that he has looked after the Kerkenberg plot during the year, and has kept it in order, the fence painted, and the slab clean. For this labour and expense the sexton was to receive the remaining quarter of the annual interest."

The next morning I called upon the burgomaster, and heard the same story from him, and was shown the original deed of gift to the village.

This deed is in the form of a letter, and is addressed to his brother, Diederick, also called Richard Churchill. It is written on heavy paper, in Dutch, and is witnessed by the burgomaster and village attorney of that time for Dykendorp and by Yan Kerkenberg, also called John Churchill, and one of his mates for Kerkenberg.

On turning the deed in my hands, while listening to the burgomaster, I noticed a row of figures on the back of it. On calling the burgomaster's attention to the figures, he told me that they had always been there. He supposed that Kerkenberg had written his deed on a sheet of paper without examining it first, and that the figures had been on the sheet before the deed was written.

At any rate the figures were there, and as they did not interfere with the annual dinner, it was really not worth while giving them a second thought.

As the deed was such a peculiar one I asked permission to copy it, this was readily granted. While copying it I thought of the figures on the back and copied them also.

In due course of time I finished my tramp and returned to Rotterdam. There I took passage in one of the steamers for New York.

By chance there were only a few cabin passengers on board on that trip; as they were either too old or too young for company for me, I was thrown upon my own resources to kill time.

One day, while hunting for a novel in my trunk, I saw my copy of the deed and took it on deck to read it over again. Then the figures on the back again arrested my attention. I was positive that the figures had been placed there intentionally and that they had some ulterior meaning.

Digitized by Google

But why were they placed there and what did they mean? But, first of all, here are the figures: 1139, 4185, 4142, 1582, 0514, 1520, 1914, 8151, 0.

Settling myself in a quiet corner, I lit my pipe and proceeded to cross-question myself about it as follows:

"Why are the figures on the deed?"

"Because somebody put them there."

"Good," thought I, "now we are progressing."

"Who put them there?"

Here the progress came to a dead stop.

From the care with which official documents are treated in Europe and the veneration the people there have for such a paper, with its red seals, I decided, most emphatically, that the figures had not been upon the document after it became one.

At the time the deed was written a nice big sheet of clean paper was not thrown about in a Dutch village dwelling and scribbled upon carelessly, simply because such a sheet was rarer and more expensive then than now. Consequently, I took it for granted that the figures had been put upon the paper before it was converted into a deed, intentionally.

If this was the case then Yan Kerkenberg was the one who put the figures there.

Let us take for granted and continue questioning.

Why did he put them on the deed?

Well, surely not out of mere fun of scribbling! Men of his class do not waste time in that way.

Perhaps it was a message?

To whom?

Well, as the deed of gift is in the form of a letter to his brother, why should not these figures represent some message or codicil intended for that same brother?

If Diederick returned to Dykendorp before Yan he would of course hear of the deed immediately; as it was addressed to him he would of course read it! Then he would naturally see the figures! if they were intended for him, he would of course know how to decipher them.

If it was a message of some kind from Yan to Diederick, it was of such a nature that it was intended only for him, it was of importance and value.

As the brothers were English, and as the message was left in Dutch hands, it was most likely that it was couched in English. Now I took it for granted, from the two samples of Yan's handwriting that I had seen, that his education had been carried just far enough to enable him to write a few lines when necessity absolutely required it; consequently, if Yan had made use of a cypher he had used the simplest kind he could invent. Now one of the simplest cyphers consists in replacing the letters of the alphabet by figures, taking one for A, two for B, three for C, and so on.

Following out this theory, I obtained the following: 1139, 4185, 4142, 1582, 0514, 1520, 1914, 8151, 0, DAHE, DADB, AEHB, EAD.

Here I was compelled to stop. The nought upset my theory. Then I started over again, commencing with 0, 1, 2, etc.

On this basis I worked for two days without results, or rather with negative results.

At last I started with my first arrangement, and said that the nought in the fifth block of figures belonged to the 2 in the proceeding block, making 20; this would then represent the letter T.

From that point I worked forward and backward, and then had my letters and figures, grouped as follows:

11, 3, 9, 4, 18, 5, 4, 14, 21, 5, 8, 20, 5, 14, 15, 20, 19, 14, 8, 15, 10: K, C, I, D, E, D, N, U, E, H, T, E, N, O, E, S, N, H, O, J.

Returning to the original grouping I got:

KCID, REDNU, EHT, ENOTS, NHOJ.

One step farther showed me that the first four letters, reversed in position, gave the word:

"DICK"

Then I shouted "Hurrah!" and went down below, and interviewed—well, I went below and came on deck again feeling somewhat better. (The Dutch mail steamers carry a brand of Chateau Margeau that is really exquisite.)

Having my entering wedge, I easily pried the letters into the right position; transposed they gave:

DICK UNDER THE STONE JOHN.

Hurrah, and hurrah again! John had hidden something under the stone for Dick. There was only one stone that could be meant, and that was the granite slab in Yan's plot in the churchyard.

The "something" that was there must be of value, as Yan had paid one thousand florins to the town in order to have it guarded for him; no doubt booty acquired by the brothers in their voyages.

For the present I could do nothing but think and make plans as each revolution of the screw was driving the steamer, and me with it, farther away from Holland.

By the time I arrived in New York I had made up my mind to return to Holland.

Leaving the Dutch steamer immediately upon its arrival at New York, I boarded one of the fast liners and steamed off the next day for England. From there I crossed the Channel to Holland, and, after making a few purchases in Rotterdam, took the first train for Dykendorp.

There I rented a small cottage, telling the landlord that I expected two cousins, who would stay with me for a few weeks. I told the people that I would stay a couple of months in the place to study Dutch.

For a week or so I walked about, showing myself everywhere in the place, talked broken Dutch to old and young, and told them where I came from, what I was doing in the village, how long I intended to remain, how old I was, and in fact, satisfied their curiosity in every way.

After two weeks the villagers ceased to bother me with questions. They counted me as one of them and paid no particular attention to me; this was just what I had laboured to attain.

Digitized by Google

Not knowing how deep I would be compelled to dig under the stone, and knowing that I would have only one night to dig in, I practised digging in the cellar of my cottage until I could handle my short coal miner's pick and spade like a veteran.

As good luck would have it, I had been enabled to rent a cottage on the outskirts of the village. The garden belonging to the cottage was bounded by the churchyard wall. This enabled me to pass from my cottage into the churchyard with very little risk of being seen.

It was now only necessary for me to wait for a suitable night. This came sooner than I had hoped. A heavy wind started in the afternoon, and by supper time it was blowing great guns in from sea. An hour after the streets of the village were dead and deserted.

Now was my time. Taking my tools, I hurried through the garden, jumped over the low churchyard wall, and a minute later I was in Yan Kerkenberg's grounds.

There I sat down and listened. The clock in the church tower started to strike the hours. Although but a few hundred feet away, I could barely hear the deep booming of the bell through the howling of the wind and the roar of the surf on the beach.

Then I went to work. I dug down about two feet deep along one side of the stone and then I started to dig under it; the rain beat upon me and soon had me wet to the skin; the wind swayed the trees to and fro and whistled in shrill tones among them. I neither felt the rain nor heard the wind. I dug, dug, dug, till I thought my back would break and my arms fall off.

At last my spade gave back a hollow sound as I forced it into the earth. Then I forgot back, arms, wind, rain —everything but my digging. Soon I had laid bare one side and the ends of a small chest. A few sharp blows with a short, heavy steel bar broke in the side of the chest enough to enable me to thrust my hand into it. This I did, and felt that the chest contained, seemingly, bricks, covered with heavy canvas! A few wrenches with the bar broke out the entire side of the box, and I proceeded to take out the contents.

One after another my trembling hands pulled out the "bricks"—one, two, three, four, five and so on until the chest was empty, then I had twenty-one heavy little bricks lying beside me on the ground. Loading myself with as many as I could carry, I hastened to the dividing wall, and threw them over into my garden. Four times I made the trip, and then I proceeded to fill up the hole I had made.

After that I returned to the garden and carried my bricks into the house. There I saw that my bricks were gold ignots, each weighing about twelve pounds.

With the first glimpse of dawn I returned to the churchyard and obliterated the traces of my digging. As the plot outside of the granite slab, had been covered with shells and gravel, I succeeded beyond my expectations. The rain that still came down soon washed the adhering earth from the shells and gravel and made it difficult to detect traces of my work.

I had now over two hundred and fifty pounds of gold to carry away from the village. The next question was to get it away immediately and without suspicion. To do this I adopted the following plan. From a dealer in the village I purchased several hundred small glazed tiles, telling him I might want to use them some day to fit up my bathroom. I ordered him to purchase a heavy chest for me to ship them in and to send the chest and tiles to my house.

This he did. Then I packed the ingots securely in the chest, the tiles I buried in the cellar.

The next morning I shipped my chest to Rotterdam; as the tile dealer's men took the chest to the railway station, the weight did not cause any remarks, as they took it for granted that the chest contained the tiles I had purchased from their master.

In Rotterdam I sold the ingots, receiving eleven thousand pounds for the same.

Although Yan Kerkenberg had stated himself that he and his brother stood alone in the world, I had extensive inquiries made through a firm of lawyers in Rotterdam for eventual heirs.

They found that the two Churchills had come from Bourneham in England, but could discover no direct or indirect heirs.

Through the same legal firm I then had one thousand pounds deeded to the village of Dykendorp, the interest of this sum to be given annually, on Yan Kerkenberg's day, to those fishers of the village who had suffered loss at sea during the year, or who, in consequence of poor fishing, had need of aid.

* * * * *

I have now given up travelling in equatorial regions, but I often think that the stone that Kerkenberg really meant was the one on the river bank in Guiana.

Should I go there again? Did the arrow mean more than to point to the hiding place of the flask? Who can tell?

H. C. STIEFEL.

Digitized by Google

Look out for our GRAND NEW SERIAL Next Week.

Mr. Krell's Million.

It was about nine o'clock on Christmas Eve. The lights were burning unusually late in Mr. Krell's office, for Dakins, the book-keeper, was getting off the balance-sheet. He had just summed up the final column and was meditating over the row of figures before him, when Mr. Krell entered from his private room.

"Well, Dakins," said he, "have you finished?"

"Yes, sir, it's all ready for you," answered the other, "and I think you will be very much pleased with the result. I congratulate you, sir, on your fortune at last reaching seven figures."

"Ah," said Mr. Krell simply. He was not a demonstrative man, but for a moment his features relaxed their customary rigidity, and he seemed about to give away to a feeling of joy. He quickly recovered himself, however, and, as if ashamed of his weakness, he scrutinised the balance-sheet with a face as expressionless as a sphinx. Presently he folded the paper up and placed it in his breast pocket. Then, going into the inner office, he brought out a gold chronometer—one which had formerly belonged to one of his ships, and which watchmakers had pronounced irreparable—and requested the book-keeper's acceptance of it as a gift. He furthermore gave Mr. Dakins two distinct shakes of the hand, and, for the first time since the latter had been in his employ, now twenty-six years, he actually wished him a merry Christmas! It was too much for Dakins. The gift was unexpected and unprecedented. He strove in vain to articulate his gratitude, and had to content himself with sundry bows as he retreated from the room.

The substance of Mr. Krell's reflections after he was left alone might be summed up in a very few words. A millionaire at last! A millionaire at last! The delightful thought absorbed him for several minutes, then he arose, locked up the office, and went home.

Mr. Krell was a widower and had no children. He lived in a small house in the suburbs. His housekeeper, Mrs. Mathers, was waiting up for him. She stirred the fire and busied herself getting him something to eat. When the modest meal was prepared, Mr. Krell very quickly disposed of it, for his experiences had made him hungry. Then he rang the bell, and Mrs. Mathers reappearing, he asked her to remove the dishes, and to her astonishment, requested her to bring materials for a tumbler of hot toddy. The order being obeyed and the toddy mixed, the millionaire drew his chair up before the fire, the toddy at hand, seated himself and relapsed into thought.

"A million! A million at last! Well, long and steadily have I striven for it." Here he began to dangle the heavy bunch of old-fashioned keys he was holding, and, after a few moments thus employed, he mentally came to the conclusion that he had reason to be entirely satisfied with himself. Not that he was at all contented. On the contrary, he already began to plan larger schemes than ever; but up to the present he thought that he had done well, and he expressed his satisfaction and sealed his self-approval with a long sip of toddy.

As he was setting down his glass, the door opened, and a man of about the millionaire's own age entered, uninvited and unannounced. The stranger laid his hat and gloves on the sideboard, deliberately took a chair, placed it opposite Mr. Krell, and calmly seated himself, the millionaire looking on in speechless astonishment. Making himself perfectly at home, the newcomer took the poker and proceeded to stir the fire, after which he sat composedly back in his chair and turned to Mr. Krell with a slight nod of recognition. The latter continued to gaze with astonishment, but seemed unable to speak. Presently the stranger arose, went over to the millionaire and patted him on the shoulder.

"What's the matter, Krell?" he said. "Why don't you welcome me? I'm glad to see you, old fellow. Wish you a merry Christmas, and congratulate you on your good fortune."

Digitized by Google

Without waiting for any reply the stranger laughed. Krell was still more astonished at the laugh, for he fancied it resembled his own; but as it was nearly thirty years since he was last guilty of laughing, he was not quite positive as to the resemblance.

The stranger's hands on Krell's shoulders gave him an unpleasant feeling; they had an unearthly chilliness about them. Yet he was unaccountably unable to resent the familiarity, although he struggled hard to do so.

"So you have made a million at last, Krell?" the stranger went on. "Allow me to again congratulate you;" and then he proffered his hand and Krell actually, but timidly, shook it.

"You must be a happy man this evening, Krell," he continued. "Don't you feel rich?" and as the stranger chuckled Krell's indignation increased. He always kept his business profits as secret as possible. Only two hours had elapsed since he was certain of being a millionaire, and he knew Dakins was no more likely to have let it out than he was to fly.

"How the dickens did you know I am worth a million; and who are you?" said Krell angrily.

"Oh, I am familiar with all your affairs, Krell, and yourself also, in the most natural way imaginable; but the nature of that way, and who I am, you must excuse me from telling you just at present. By-and-by you will know all about it." And the stranger laughed quite loudly.

Mr. Krell's usually haughty manner again tried to assert itself, but failed. As he was in the act of rising for the purpose of ejecting the stranger, the latter gently pressed him back in his chair.

"It's no use, Krell," said he, "to order me away. Your conduct at this festive season is quite inhospitable. You must be quiet and let us pass this Christmas Eve together in a social manner." The millionaire, impelled by some strange power, leant back and resigned himself to what might follow.

"So you have really made a million, Krell! What a successful man you are! How pleased you must be with yourself!—aren't you?"

"I suppose," replied Krell with a modest air, "I have no great reason to be dissatisfied with myself."

"Dissatisfied!" ejaculated the stranger, with a tone of surprise, "I should say not. You ought to congratulate yourself. Just think of it! Thirty years in business, commenced on nothing, now worth more than a million, acquired by your unaided exertions! Do you remember the day you first entered old Connell's office, on a salary of thirty pounds for the first year? You were a lad then. And how rich you felt when the first week was paid you! How many golden castles your imagination built out of that! And then your salary was increased yearly, and when it reached four hundred, in a moment of weakness you fell in love!" Here the stranger grinned and nudged Krell in the ribs; but the latter did not appear to see the joke, and looked very uncomfortable.

"What was her name, Krell? Janet Key, wasn't it?"

"Yes," he answered meekly.

"Yes, as I have already said," continued the stranger, "you showed then a phase of weakness, but nobly you overcame it.

"I had never any doubt of your success after the termination of that short struggle; for it was during this love episode you resolved to become rich, and this girl was poor. I admit, as some excuse, that she had what is called beauty and amiability and all that sort of thing. But none of these qualities have any appreciable value in 'prices current,' or on the Stock Exchange. Had you married her, you would have had to support her, and perhaps a family in addition, and these considerations induced you, with Spartan fortitude, to terminate the engagement, and to bear the taunts of her friends that you had broken her heart. Faugh! Broken hearts are frauds! Never saw one. Don't believe in them. Do you, Krell?"

"I assure you I do not," said the millionaire quickly.

"Of course not, Krell, of course not. You acted with perfect consistency; and consistency is not inaptly compared by one of those half-crazy poets, called Shakespeare, to a jewel, on account of its rarety."

"Indeed," said Krell, "I think I have heard of that name before."

"Well, Krell, having surmounted this weakness, you henceforward resolutely set to work for wealth, and you wisely determined that no other object should again impede its attainment. By degrees you became rigidly economical. As you got richer, the world said you became meaner; but I say you got wiser. Contributions to art, science, literature, and all such nonsense were gradually discontinued, and you sagely held that the daily perusal of the money article, the prices current, and the shipping list, was sufficient for any man. In your office you worked early and late; you were keenly sensitive as to how and where money was to be made, and you thus became invaluable to your employer, so that he felt himself obliged to take you into partnership. After that you worked still harder. You made money still faster. You were congratulated on the Exchange and in the street for your business sagacity. Men began to take off their hats to you; for, my friend Krell, piety may quote Scripture on the worthlessness of wealth, and the pulpit may preach that money is the root of all evil, yet they all worship the golden calf.

"Of course, Krell, there are exceptions, even as there are business men weak enough to treat money as of secondary importance, instead of being, as it is you know, the primary object of life. For instance, there is McLennan, a quondam schoolmate of yours—you both commenced business about the same time. But he belongs to this exceptional class. He actually married for love, early in life, and before he was worth two thousand. Neither he nor his wife ever refused themselves any so-called comfort; and as he increased his earnings so he increased his expenditure. Now there are few of these societies dubbed charitable, to which they do not fancy they are bound to contribute, and because a Lazarus now and then blarneys them with a blessing, and a Magdalene figuratively bathes their feet with her tears, I do believe they feel themselves compensated for the money they have thrown away on such worthless objects. It is perfectly shocking, isn't it, Krell?"

"Perfectly shocking!" echoed Krell.

"And what is the consequence of such thriftlessness?" continued the stranger. "Why, this man, with all his opportunities, isn't worth a million, as you are! Think of that, Krell, and take a warning by the example—not that I think, to your credit, you need any such warning.

"Even you married at last, Krell—but you married wisely. You got, you know, old Connell's only daughter. She was said to have been neither too amiable nor good-looking, and as the French say, of a certain age; but what sensible man regards ugliness if it be gilded with gold dust, or a bad temper offset by bonds and bank stock? She inherited all her mother's wealth, and you reckoned upon getting her father's also. This was your second grand coup, your judicious affaire du cœur.

Digitized by Google

"You perceive," said the stranger, grinning again, "I have some little knowledge of French, Mr. Krell."

"Yes," faintly answered Krell, who now assumed an appearance of entire resignation.

"We now," continued the stranger, "reach the period of old Connell's death. From that time you have become the sole manager of the business. Having now attained to large possessions by your own efforts, you naturally saw, more than ever, the folly of giving any of your money away, and accordingly you withdrew your subscriptions from the few charities which you had hitherto deemed politic to aid annually with a guinea. Your life and experience now led you to believe that none had any right to live who could not support themselves, and that misfortune was simply retributive justice and deserved neither help nor pity. Wise Malthusian views! Noble sentiments! Worthy of an old Roman, are these of yours, Krell!

"The next step in your successful career was the death of Mrs. Krell. I know your neighbours said you had no love for her, and that you were rather pleased than otherwise at her departure, as it gave you absolute possession of her property; but they should give you credit for your sincerity, for you certainly did not simulate any great sorrow, if you did not feel it—and I hate hypocrisy! Having neither wife nor children, you now wisely sold your dwelling and purchased a smaller and cheaper one. You curtailed your domestic expenses, reduced the number of your servants to one, resigned the church pew and rented a single sitting. Pious Mr. Krell!" (here the stranger actually winked). "In a word, you acted with your usual wisdom, and were on the road to becoming richer faster than ever.

"But I must now approach the second, and to your credit, the last weak spot in your untarnished career. I mean that affair connected with your sister's husband. Your only sister, or near relative, I believe? By-the-bye, is she living yet?"

"I really am ashamed—er—er—I mean to say," stammered Mr. Krell, "that I believe my clerk, Mr. Dakins, knows. I feel rather cold; shall I put on a little more coal?" he inquired, in a very meek tone.

"Quite unnecessary. Don't be extravagant; we shall be warm enough shortly," said the stranger, as he laughed immoderately.

"To return to that brother-in-law. You actually endorsed an accommodation note for him! You know you did, and don't attempt to deny it. And you lost fifteen thousand by it, and what excuse have you to offer?"

"The fact is—er—er—I made much more than that through him, and I endorsed in the belief that if I could thus keep him from bankruptcy for a few weeks, I should be able to secure some sugar cargoes which I knew were coming to him. But I never endorsed again for anybody, I assure you."

"I know that, Krell. Still, it is a pity you made this mistake. But I must do you the justice to say you gave the fellow no mercy when the collapse took place, and before you secured the sugar. I rather pitied you on that occasion; for you had not only to bear the loss of your money, but also the abuse of his friends because you tried to realise all you could from the estate, and for administering him a little deserved punishment in a debtor's prison. And when you released him, they had the ingratitude to say you did it upon a doctor's certificate that his mind and body were rapidly failing through his incarceration. Your conduct was characterised by consistency and entire impartiality; you nobly refused to allow his relationship to interfere with your uniform treatment of all your defaulting debtors. Therefore, I forgive your endorsation," and the stranger gave Mr. Krell another chill by patting him on the shoulder.

"You quickly recovered the amount of that loss. That was indeed a smart stroke—the foreclosure of Aikens' farm; the 'Homestead' as his family called it. The goose! He—old Aikens I mean—imagined when he gave that mortgage he would have no difficulty in paying the loan, and therefore he complied with your conditions. You knew better, Krell. Ha! ha! And what a jolly row his wife made when you ejected them! How she bawled and appealed to you for a little mercy, as she called it, for her poor, helpless children! Unreasonable woman! but all women are alike in that respect. You must have realised a handsome profit on that transaction."

"Yes," said Krell, "I did pretty well on that affair."

"And not only in that case," said the stranger, "henceforward everything you touched, Midas-like, turned into gold. And although some uncharitable people called you by hard names, and even children would be rude enough to run away, in seeming fear, at your approach, you were sustained by the becoming humility of your debtors who were slow in their payments; by the entreaties to you of joint stock promoters to subscribe and become a director, and by the rapid rise of the Squeeze-'em Bank stock as soon as you were elected the manager."

Suddenly Mr. Krell arose, and in agitation exclaimed: "Are not those bells tolling a death?"

"Ha, ha, ha!" laughed the stranger, "those are Christmas chimes! merry, merry Christmas chimes! Why, Krell, I fear you must be feeling unwell. You appear to be excited. Courage, Krell, be yourself and show no weakness. Allow me to wish you a merry Christmas and a happy New Year!" And here the stranger again shook Krell by the hand, the latter wincing slightly under the operation.

"I have not," said Krell, "been in the habit of regarding these seasons with any particular favour, as their observance entails a sad waste of time."

"I know that," said the other; "the custom is a superstitious relic of the dark ages. Day is given man to work only; we work to make money; ergo, to make money every day in the year should be the sole end of man! This truth aught to be incorporated into every church catechism."

"Very true indeed," said Krell. "I have always striven to act according to that excellent precept."

"I know you have," said the stranger, "and on that account I am having this genial chat with you; and you will be appropriately rewarded, Krell—you take my word for it. But we are digressing. Let us resume the thread of our discourse.

"A recent book-writer, I am told—for, like yourself, I never waste time in reading any book except an account book—has asserted genius to be synonymous with industry, and that an undeviating, life-long effort in the attainment of an object is the sign of true genius. This peculiarity, he says, creates Alexanders and Napoleons. If this be true, Krell, then you are a hero! You have this element of genius, and although some win their trophies in the battle-field—the broken lives (excuse the phrase, Krell) made by you in your counting-house are equally deserving fame. In fine, your course, on the whole, is a wiser one. And yet they say you are unhappy and heartless. Let me disprove the assertion; Krell, I will take out your heart and show it to you."

Digitized by Google

"Pray don't!" cried Krell, with a terrified countenance.

"Don't be afraid. The operation will be perfectly painless."

The stranger then placed his hand on Mr. Krell's left side, and, without any difficulty, and apparently without any sense of feeling on Krell's part, he removed a substance in shape and size resembling a heart, but apparently petrified. Touching the top with a finger, a lid suddenly opened, and from within he extracted bonds, mortgages, deeds of sale, promissory notes, bills of exchange, certificates of stock, in large numbers; and in bulk far beyond the seeming capacity of the article.

"Who says now," cried the stranger to Krell, "you have no heart? Here is a jolly one, though it is a little hard and dry; and full of riches, though it be lacking that sentimental and unprofitable stuff, figuratively called 'the milk of human kindness.'"

"Spare me! Do stop, for Heaven's sake!" cried Krell. "I feel so cold and sick. Leave me, and I will seek my sister and her family—I will befriend them—I will make restitution to all whom I have oppressed—I will aid the poor—I will resign all I have. Oh! heavens, who are these? There's Aikens again! I thought you were dead! Here, I'll give you back that farm—and there is Swandon! Don't say again I ruined you and broke your wife's heart. I'll give you back all I took. And there—is—is—Heaven have mercy on me!—have——"

"Too late, Mr. Krell," interposed the stranger, "too late, too late!"

* * * * *

The papers on Christmas morning contained the following paragraph: "We have to record the sudden death of Mr. Krell, a wealthy and successful merchant, a director of several joint stock companies, and the worthy manager of the Squeeze-'em Bank. About midnight, his housekeeper was awakened by the sound of a heavy fall in the dining-room, which was immediately succeeded by the howling of the house dog. On reaching the room she saw her employer's body stretched on the hearthrug, apparently lifeless. A physician was quickly called, and he pronounced Mr. Krell to be dead. An inquest will be held to-morrow. It is surmised that his death was occasioned by disease of the heart!"

JOHN POPHAM.

FORTUNES MADE OUT OF BOOKS.

EVERY year some book is published which takes the public by storm, and brings to its author, not only fame, but fortune almost beyond the dreams of avarice.

To mention only two books of this kind, "Trilby," and "The Christian" realised vast sums for their creators, and, for a time at least, a kind of mania seemed to have seized the reading public, who could talk of nothing else but these stories.

In the United States, during the past six months, a similar craze has been witnessed in connection with two wonderful books of a religious character. These volumes, "Quo Vadis," and "Titus," are stories of the time of Christ and the Apostles. The former is by a Polish writer, "Henryk Sienkieviecz," and has been translated into English, whilst the latter is by a lady, Mrs. Florence Kingsley.

Both authors were practically unheard of before, but in a moment, as it were, they have become famous by their latest works.

There is always a certain fascination in a story of the early Christians and the terrible sufferings they endured at the hands of the Cæsars. "Quo Vadis" and "Titus," for some inexplicable reason, are almost unknown in this country, but a powerful story of the Domitian Persecution, which will bring in as a prominent character the last of the apostles, St. John, is about to be published as a serial in The Sunday Reader.

The story is entitled "In Cæsar's Name," and has been specially written by a very clever and popular author. It will, without doubt, take a foremost place amongst works of its kind, and every reader of this journal should be sure and read "In Cæsar's Name."

The first chapters will be published in The Sunday Reader of January 29th. The story is splendidly and powerfully illustrated by an artist who makes a speciality of ancient scenes, and who has for a long time been reading up the history, manners, and dresses of the period. It is, without doubt, the most powerful story of the period of the Cæsars ever written.

A GREAT SCHEME.

HOW TO GET ANY BOOK YOU WANT.

WE are constantly receiving complaints from readers that we do not devise competitions in which everybody can enter.

It is difficult to do this—to give everybody an equal chance of success.

However, we think we have hit upon something this time.

Every week we shall give away half-a-dozen books.

All a competitor has to do is to send us one Book Coupon cut from The Sunday Reader, one from the Athletic Record, and one from Short Stories.

Send these to us in one envelope together with a request for any single book in the whole world of literature.

From the applications we receive we shall each week pick out six and send the books asked for.

If you are not successful one week, keep on trying, you are bound to be successful some week.

All applications to be addressed to "BOOKS," Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please let me have: S. S.

Book.....

Price.....

Name.....

Address.....

.....

Digitized by Google

THIS morning I received a letter from Ruth Clayton announcing her engagement to Charlie Everett. Dear me, I begin to feel like—I was going to say an old maid—but I will lessen the blow by using the term bachelor-girl; that certainly sounds more self-respecting and less resigned, for even at twenty-five there is room for hope, and then it is true that I don't look my age. Sometimes I feel that I am scarcely honest when I allow people to think that I am still in my teens, but if they will be so stupid why should I enlighten them?

When that dear boy, Tom, left, I told him his case was hopeless, that I could never be more than a friend to him. I did not even use the time-honoured sister ruse. I might have told him that I was his senior by three or four years and thus have put an end to his infatuation, but I couldn't bear to shatter his hopes in that particular way, and he has gone back to town cherishing in his heart a seventeen or eighteen year old ideal of me. I drove over to the station with him that last evening. These country places are very propitious for flirtations; he held my hand a moment in farewell and called me "little one." I really felt like a fraud, but what a blow it would have been to him to have announced, in cold blood, that I was twenty-five. His letters are tenderly regretful, and ring with hope notwithstanding my firmness. I have written once, but think I shall not do so again. If we meet in town this season, some of my friends—the Cooks or Blanchard girls—will doubtless tell him my exact age, or perhaps in the fulness of their hearts, add a year or two; so I will let him down easy now, and he will have less to blame me for when he does find out how he has been deceived.

Well, to return to Ruth and Charlie, they will doubtless be happy together; she is a sweet girl, one of those prettily dependent creatures, calculated to make a man proud of his own self reliance, and conscious of the importance of himself in particular and mankind in general. I always thought they would make a match of it some day. He is not brilliant, but true and manly, and, I presume, very much in love. I remember as long ago as last summer he preferred Ruth to me. We were all on the Clayton's yacht together, and he was by far the best-looking man aboard, so I thought him fair game, and tried all my wiles, but he was proof against them, and returned after each of my attacks to Ruth's side. At the time I was a little huffy, for I was obliged to turn my attention to one whom I thought a rather elderly man, of not very promising appearance.

I did not know William then as I do now. William Holbrooke then seemed old, his grave, quiet manner and iron-grey hair gave him an appearance of age which deceived me; he is really only ten years older than I am.

My face burns now when I recall the manner in which I received his kindly warning the day we anchored in Bleak Harbour. It was perilously rough, but I insisted upon going into port in our little boat. I came out of the cabin attired in my freshest and most becoming yachting costume, and as I stepped on deck, I saw a look of surprise come over the faces of the party who sat lazily watching the waves and speculating as to the results of the storm.

"Miss Knowlton, you surely will not venture out on this rough sea in that tiny boat. The clouds are growing more threatening every moment; it seems risky even for the sailors to go ashore. The wind is rising rapidly, and if we have a storm, we need your gay presence aboard ship to keep up our spirits," said Mr. Holbrooke.

"Poor grandpa," I replied, "if you are afraid, I am not; perhaps when I am your age I shall be nervous. But now I am off. Who will go with me to brave the stormy deep?"

Mr. Holbrooke's bronze face whitened for an instant, and I saw that my rudeness had hurt him, but prompted by my evil genius (I'm sure I have one), I answered his next entreaty to stay aboard in the same discourteous way.

"Katherine, listen to me," he said earnestly; "you are fool-hardy. Whatever motive prompts you to risk your life on this rough water is not worthy of you; if you care not for yourself, you should think of others; why cause them such unnecessary anxiety?"

Digitized by Google

"By what right do you presume to undertake a surveillance of me?" I asked, drawing myself up haughtily, and flashing a look of defiance into his grave eyes. "If Mr. Clayton, our host, does not object, why should you?"

I knew so well Mr. Clayton's indifference!

"I beg your pardon, Miss Knowlton, for the interference I've been guilty of. You are right; of course, I have no right, but since you are determined to go, I shall accompany you, with your permission."

By this time the party on the deck were all agog at our heated discussion; and suddenly becoming conscious of the food for gossip we were furnishing, I repressed the cold declination that came to my lips, and bowed my acceptance of his offer.

I had friends staying at the White Shore Hotel, so there was no occasion for a chaperone, even if any of the married ladies could have been induced to risk their lives in the frail boat in which we were to breast the waves. Two of the sailors, brave fellows that they were, let down the boat, and, with a hasty kiss to Ruth and her mother, we were off.

As soon as we were well under way I said: "Mr. Holbrooke, why did you insist upon coming; I should not have minded the trip with our good sailors."

"I am very sorry if my presence is disagreeable; please forgive me, Miss Knowlton, but I could not let you without protection, and I seemed to be the most available."

I looked at William Holbrooke proudly, about to scorn his protection, but something in his firm, kind gaze, saved me from perpetrating any more ungracious remarks. An instant afterwards the boat gave a fearful lurch, I shut my eyes, but knew instinctively that we were capsizing, and in another moment I found myself submerged in the cold, terrible water. It is all too horrible to relate; it's like a nightmare to me now. The only thing I remember distinctly is the sense of security that came over me when I felt William's strong arm round me—what strength he had! Holding me with one arm, and clinging tenaciously to the overturned boat with the other, I heard him say: "Hold on to me tight, Katherine," but I seemed to be in a dream, the waves rolled over my face, and I made no effort, but sank into unconsciousness.

That evening I awoke in the White Shore Hotel. Dear Mrs. Graham was bending over my pillow, and there was a lovely bunch of my favourite Katherine Mermet roses on the table by my side. I put my hand to my head and reassured myself. What a blessing is naturally curly hair! I always feel myself at such an advantage, for, whether wet or wind-blown, I know my chestnut locks are falling into soft, becoming ringlets, and the peace of mind that knowledge gives me imparts a bright, care-free expression that is unknown to the slaves of the curling iron.

"How do you feel, dear girl?" asked Mrs. Graham.

"I think I am all right, except that I am painfully tired and sore; but tell me how I came here? Is it a miracle? The last thing I recall was making up my mind that I had done with all the pomps and vanities of this wicked world; and isn't it strange, I don't remember regretting them at all?"

"The doctor said you were to be kept quiet, dear, but of course you won't rest until you know that all were saved. The lifeboat picked you all up and brought you into the hotel. We saw them capsize from the porch. I wonder that my hair is not white, and if I had known it was you, madcap, I am sure it would have been; as it was, I suffered terribly." So on, ad finitum, she continued, chiding me and caressing me over and over again, regardless of the doctor's injunctions, while I lay calm and happy in the assurance that William Holbrooke was saved. I had not dared to ask for him, so fearful was I that my mad foolishness had brought him to a watery grave

During the three long, dreary days that I lay in the little white room in the hotel, unable to continue my voyage on the yacht, I had ample time for reflection, and I devoted most of it, much against my will, to William Holbrooke. I could not keep him out of my mind, though he had not come near me or sent any word, and I was too proud to ask about him. I remembered all his gentle kindnesses to me, and recalled with a smile his grave, quaint humour. The strength and sweetness of his character burst upon me with new light, and I looked back upon my rude behaviour with painful regret. His silence showed me very plainly what he thought of me, and I found myself in a state of abjection, hitherto unknown.

I heard when I rejoined the yachting party (how good they all were to me, notwithstanding my late escapade) that Mr. Holbrooke found telegrams awaiting him at the hotel at Bleak Harbour, which called him back to London, immediately, and he subsequently sailed for the Cape. I thought it was unforgiving of him not to have left me a good-bye. However we took aboard a party of college boys at Margate, and I was very much occupied during the rest of the time.

This morning's post brought me news of Ruth's engagement, and in company with her letter was one from William Holbrooke. He has returned from abroad, and writes me he is coming down here to-night. He says that he has tried to forget me, as he felt the hopelessness of his love, for did I not take every means of showing him my indifference!

Ah, me! if I had only discovered the note to which he refers, in the Mermet roses! I might have known that only he would have remembered which flowers I loved best. But I never found the missive that he sent by those sweet messengers. I presume the chambermaid edified the servants' hall with the words that should have been sacred to me. No wonder he thought me cold and heartless, but he says he is determined to ask me face to face. When I answer Ruth's letter I shall, D.V., have an engagement of my own to announce.

A SITUATION WITH £200 A YEAR IS OFFERED
AS A PRIZE TO YOUNG MEN UNDER 35.
FOR PARTICULARS SEE THE CURRENT NUMBER OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY.

Digitized by Google

MISS MERRYVIEW'S SLUMMING.

It was not a pleasant sight that met Miss Merryview's eyes as she climbed three flights of uncertain stairs, avoiding dirty, squalling children who were tumbling up and down, and trying to stifle the undeniable odour of beer and cabbage which floated out to her on every landing. Her rich furs and aristocratic person seemed sadly out of place, but with the determination born of ignorance she pressed on until she gained the fourth floor of the disreputable-looking tenement to which her mistaken motives but thoroughly good intentions had led her. The room before which she paused was little better than the rest. There were the same broken chairs and cracked window-panes, but the bed was made up smoothly, the floor was not littered with trash, and no decided odour met her delicate nostrils. She hesitated at the half-open door, knocked, but received no reply. A second knock brought no response, so she advanced timidly, looking about rather fearfully, but still preserving her determined air.

"This looks like a good place," she observed. "That is, a good bad place. I wonder if anybody is in? Oh, I don't like slumming a bit. I never would have come here if the girls didn't want me to come. Well, I won't come again, for I don't think it's a bit funny. The old woman downstairs was horribly rude when I offered to make her some tea—and I'm sure I've done it very beautifully every Thursday afternoon this winter. She wouldn't even take a flower. Oh, I wish somebody would come!"

Growing impatient, she rises and walks about the room, loosening the furs at her throat and displaying a rich diamond brooch. The touch of it startles her.

"Oh, I wonder if that's safe? Would anybody—I've heard awful tales——" She is hastily closing her cloak and almost preparing to go, when a sound makes her turn to face a girl who stands in the open door, looking at her questioningly. The fair intruder is not at ease, for the newcomer holds herself with a certain uncouth dignity, and her heavy features are full of strength. The two women are almost of an age, but the difference in their appearance is almost pitiful. One fair, exquisitely dressed, and with the happy, complacent face of those daughters of fortune who have never known what it is to want for anything; the other old before her time, with gaunt features which tell their tale of poverty, perhaps hunger; eyes which hint at tragedy, and rough garments which have done service for several seasons.

Miss Merryview advances with some embarrassment. "I—ah—good-morning. The door was open, and I knocked several times. Nobody answered—so I came in." This last rather lamely, but with that engaging smile which never fails to win a friend.

"Will you sit down?" the other girl asks gravely.

"Thank you;" and Miss Merryview seats herself in the doubtful looking chair nearest her.

"Did you want to see me?" inquires the girl. Then, noticing her visitor's hesitation, she continues: "Dad is not home, of course. Grandmother's drunk again, and the children are at the shop. So would I be, but I was discharged last week because I wouldn't kiss the foreman." All this was said in a dull, spiritless tone, utterly devoid of any emotion.

"What?" gasps Miss Merryview in horror.

"That's what I said," replies the girl doggedly. "They all call me a fool for it; but I won't have Tim O'Neill coming round me with his drunken eyes and dirty hands. I hate him"—her colour rising and her voice full of emotion now—"I hate them all." She begins to cough on account of her excitement.

Miss Merryview rises and speaks sympathetically. "My poor girl. Can't I help you in some way?"

The girl looks at her keenly. "So you are one of them missionaries after all? I thought at first you was a lady."

Miss Merryview makes a gesture of deprecation. She feels strangely ill at ease with this daughter of the tenements.

"I——" she begins.

"You needn't say anything to apologise," interrupts the girl. "I'm used to it," wearily. "They come down here every once in a while to have fun—'slumming' they call it. They come into our houses, uninvited. They ask impertinent questions. They say 'My poor girl, I want to help you;' some leave tracts and tell me to trust in God. What right have they to come here? What good do they do? The women only come once; the men come again—and they don't bring tracts."

Miss Merryview shudders.

"You had better stay at home," continues the girl recklessly. "Stay in your pretty gold cage like a beautiful bird. We are in a cage, too, a cage that is a trap—a rat-trap."

Miss Merryview at lasts takes the initiative. "I wish I could say something to you," she murmurs in her sweet, shy way. "I want to and yet I cannot somehow. Miss—miss——"

Digitized by Google

"Maggie," mutters the girl.

"Won't you take these flowers, Maggie?" unpinning some lilies-of-the-valley from her breast and handing them to the girl who is struggling to strangle another cough.

Maggie looks at her in surprise, and then takes the flowers, gazing at them thoughtfully. She lifts her head and looks at Miss Merryview in the face.

"You are not like the rest," she says slowly.

"I wish you would let me do something for you, Maggie. Can you sew? We need a seamstress at the house."

"I couldn't make such things as you wear, miss."

"Well, then, couldn't you——"

"No! don't say anything more. I must stay here. I'm needed to look after the house. Grandmother's not fit to do it. Then, the children and dad!"

"Your mother?"

Maggie rises abruptly and walks to the window. "Five years ago dad pushed her downstairs. He was drunk; it killed her."

Miss Merryview gives an exclamation of mingled horror and sympathy.

"Oh, you've come into a nice family," says the girl with a bitter little laugh. "I told you you'd better go home. What can you know of us and our suffering? We live in another world. No sun shines in our lives. The clouds hide it. I am no older than you Yet look at me. I've been to night school, and had books from the library. I wish I hadn't, they taught me too much. I wish I was like the rest, for then I wouldn't care. I could stand this life here at home though—I'm often hungry, but that doesn't matter; I'm in rags, but that doesn't matter; there's a great pain in my chest, but that doesn't matter—nothing would matter to me if he would only come back."

"He! Who?"

"Who? The man I love—the only man I ever did or could love. But he left me. He came from your people." She turns fiercely on Miss Merryview. "Yes, that is what you do for us. That is why we hate you and your people and your money."

Miss Merryview is trembling, but she walks straight to Maggie. "You must not get so excited, Maggie. It it is not good for you. Come," leading her to the table, "sit down." She puts her white hand on the girl's brown one, and speaks gently. "I hope you do not hate me."

The girl bursts into tears. Miss Merryview wipes them away with her dainty white handkerchief.

"No," she sobs; "you are so kind—I love you."

"And now, Maggie, tell me. Why does he not come back, this—this man?"

"Because he's going to be married. I read it in the paper this morning." She speaks sullenly again in a dull, unemotional voice.

"Who is he?"

"No, I'll not tell you. I'll be true to him even if he did leave me. I'll never betray him."

"But, Maggie——"

"I tell you I won't!"

Miss Merryview notices a newspaper on the table and picks it up. "Very well, then, I can see for myself."

Maggie, who has buried her face in her hands, hears the rustle of paper and springs up wildly.

"No! No! Let it alone. You shan't see it." She tries to snatch the paper from Miss Merryview.

"Why, you silly child! There are a dozen announcements. How could I tell? There is even my own marriage notice."

"Your own?"

"Yes, here, the fourth one," pointing it out to Maggie.

Maggie reads with blanched face and frightened eyes.

Before Miss Merryview observes her, a noise is heard from the outside, and she walks towards the door, while Maggie stares at the paper gasping: "Her!"

The noise outside increases. It is Mike O'Donnell, Maggie's father, climbing the stairs heavily. His voice comes in at the door before his burly person presents itself to view.

"Shure I'll have none of them in my house. They're a blatherin' pack of liars. The cursed aristocrats!" Here he enters, red and reeling with drink.

Miss Merryview runs towards Maggie, who pushes her behind with a protective gesture.

"Father!" calls the girl in her clear young voice. This displeases Mike immediately, for he knows that Maggie only calls him "father" when he is drunk enough to merit reproof.

"I tell ye, I'll have none of 'em. Shure and didn't they turn me away from me wurk, and then come sneakin' and pryin' round an honest man's house. An' you a harbourin' of 'em here. Ungrateful hussy! Git out, I say!"

In his drunken frenzy he has drawn a pistol and waves it threateningly.

Miss Merry view screams. Maggie advances tohim.

"Father!" she cries again warningly.

"I say I won't have it, and you can go too—a nice daughter ye are, a turnin' up yer nose at Tim O'Neill. Git out!"

He reels towards her, looking, however at Miss Merryview. Maggie steps in front of the latter with arms outstretched. In his excitement, having worked up to what he thinks a righteous indignation, the man waves his arms, muttering curses and brandishing the pistol. The pistol explodes and Maggie falls to the floor. He drops the weapon immediately, sobered by the sight. Miss Merryview kneels by the girl's side, speaking frantically.

"Maggie! Maggie! Are you hurt? Speak to me!"

She raises the girl's head on her arm. The man falls on his knees, blubbering. "Maggie! Maggie! Shure I didn't mane to hurt ye."

The girl opens her eyes and looks up at Miss Merryview.

"I don't feel hurt," she says faintly, "but everything seems so queer. I fancy I'm dying. I'm not sorry—it isn't hard—on account of him."

"Oh, Maggie, don't!" moans the distressed Miss Merryview. "Why don't you go for a doctor?" she cries to the stupefied man and the people who have gathered about the door. "Quick!"

"No," says Maggie weakly. "It's no use. My—my flowers!"

Miss Merryview hands them from the table, laying them on the girl's breast and in her hands. She bends over to catch the faint whisper.

"You were good to me and I love you; but go home; don't—don't do any more slumming!"

Her head sinks on Miss Merryview's arm, her limbs relax, a peace steals over her white face, and her breath goes out with a soft sigh: "It's for the best and I'm glad."

BEATRICE STURGIS.

Digitized by Google

AN INDIAN RAID.

THERE are not many people in this country who can say that they have had a brush with Indians—with the noble red man we hear so much about. But then, there are very few who have been such a roving stone as I have.

In my youthful days, when I read with bated breath the stories of Fenimore Cooper and others, my soul yearned for Indian adventures and narrow escapes from the scalping knife. In my flights of fancy, I remember that I always escaped unharmed. But when I did have an experience of the actual thing, it fell short of what I had imagined; in other words, it wasn't so pleasant. I only had one experience, and I cannot honestly say that I am sorry that my acquaintance with the redskins was not more extensive. It occurred while I was assisting (as a soldier) in the construction of a telegraph line.

To get the telegraph poles for the line from Fort Johnson to the railway, or at least for the northern fifteen miles of it, we had to get over on Pine Mountain, ten miles from the fort. As the poles were cut they were slid down the mountain side and then drawn along the line by a span of mules or carried on men's shoulders. The work was hard enough for a gang of lumbermen, but it was made worse by the peril from Indians. While there was a peace treaty in force, no Indian who had a chance to pick off a soldier or settler felt bound to observe it. Therefore, when it became the turn of company G to send out a sergeant and six men to cut, distribute, and set up five miles of poles, the colonel at Fort Johnson warned us to be on the look-out for trouble, and to neglect no precaution for adding to our safety.

We went into camp at the head of a narrow valley, close up against the precipitous side of a hill, and were safe from attack except by the front. As it was fine midsummer weather, we made a foundation of rock, and then erected a hut of poles and brushwood, and in a day or two we were snug enough. For the first four days there was nothing to create alarm. One man was left in camp to act as sentinel and cook, and the other five were more or less scattered, as they cut and distributed the poles. The sergeant took charge of the mules and the hauling, and this work took him beyond our support much of the time. He was a veteran Indian fighter, however, brave as a lion, and had no fear.

On the morning of the fifth day, while he was returning with the mules after hauling a pole to a spot two miles away, a party of ten Indians suddenly confronted him. They were led by a sub-chief named Little Bear, who was a frequent visitor at the fort, and well known to all the soldiers. During the war, which had closed only a few months before, this sub-chief had shot and scalped a corporal near the fort; and after the treaty he had come swaggering into the post with the scalplock attached to his belt, an action which so provoked Sergeant Milton that he snatched the ghastly trophy away, and offered to go outside and fight Little Bear in any manner desired. When the Indian demanded his trophy it was refused, and he left the post vowing vengeance.

Since then they hadn't met until now, and the soldier had but to look into the eyes of the redskin to see the pleasure he felt at thus finding his enemy alone and seemingly helpless. As the meeting took place the sergeant backed up against a mass of rock, got his carbine and revolver ready for shooting, and was so cool and determined that the Indians were awed.

They were anxious to kill him, but had only just arrived in the neighbourhood, and did not know how many men he had behind him or how near some of them might be. For the first ten minutes they were determined on a row, yet the sergeant's quiet way acted as a bluff, and they finally drew off. Before going, however, Little Bear said to him:

"When my father and other chiefs signed the treaty of peace, I told them that I would be against it until I had killed you. There is no war, but I shall not go into the fort again until I can wear your scalp at my belt."

The sergeant replied that if his scalp were wanted it was a good time to take it, but the Indians had other plans in view and left him!

When the sergeant returned to camp he related the incident, and for the next three or four days one of us accompanied him on his trips, and signals were arranged by which we might quickly come together in case of need; but nothing was heard of the Indian.

One afternoon we were cutting poles nearly a mile from camp, leaving a man named Brisbane to act as cook. He had been instructed to fire his musket in case he saw Indians, and having heard nothing from him, we started for camp at about five o'clock with a feeling that all was well.

We reached camp to find the man missing. His musket had been left behind, and nothing about camp had been disturbed. For an hour we expected his return any moment, thinking he had wandered away, but when night came and passed we were sure that the Indians had had something to do with his disappearance.

They had. Instead of being watchful and vigilant, the man had carelessly wandered down into the larger valley in search of berries, with no weapons, and Little Bear's band had pounced upon him and carried him into the hills and at first decided to torture him. That idea was given up, however, that they might make him a messenger to capture the rest of us. Why, after Brisbane was captured, the redskins did not enter and destroy our camp was a puzzle, but as a matter of fact, they hastened away, and we heard nothing of them until about sunrise next morning.

Digitized by Google

We were about to set out in search of our missing man when he appeared at the mouth of the valley with an Indian beside him. He had been stripped of all clothing, and the blood of a hare had been daubed all over him until he seemed to have been wounded in a dozen places. The Indian with him could understand English very well, and Brisbane had doubtless been told just what to say.. As our attention was attracted he called out:

"Sergeant Milton, the Indians captured me yesterday and I have a message for you. They say that if you will come out and surrender yourself they will permit the rest of us to return to the fort, but all must leave their guns behind. If you refuse to do this, they will attack the camp and wipe you all out. Little Bear has been joined by twenty more bucks, and you have no show."

"Jim!" called the sergeant, when he had recovered somewhat from his surprise, "are you talking dead square?"

"No!" was the reply. "The force is the same as yesterday with five on top, who joined last night. There are six of you, and you can stand them off for a week."

The Indian beside the captive pulled his arm and muttered threats, evidently suspicious of his words, which he could not fully understand, but Brisbane continued:

"Let 'em do with me as they will, but do you hold the camp. Their idea is to wipe us all out. You might shoot the brute beside me, but there are two others behind that bush over there who would do for me. You won't surrender. I am to tell Little Bear that and let him do his worst."

"But how can we save you, Jim?" shouted the sergeant.

"There is no way. Make ready for a row, and fight to the last. It serves me right for not being on the watch yesterday. Good-bye, boys, and do the best you can, and tell 'em at the fort how it was with me."

He turned and was soon hidden from view, and we at once began preparations for defence. As I said at the start, we could be approached only from the front, and all six of us felt ourselves a match for double the number of Indians we might look for.

For half-an-hour we heard nothing more from the redskins. Then, from a point down the valley hidden from our sight, came wails, and cries of pain, and distress, as though the soldier were being tortured. Our first thought was to rush out, but after listening more closely all declared that the tones were those of an Indian, and that the plan was to draw us into an ambush. When it was found useless, the cries ceased.

An hour later Brisbane appeared on the same spot as before, having the same Indian with him. At the bidding of his guard he shouted:

"Little Bear has been joined by twenty more warriors, and unless the sergeant surrenders himself all will be killed. You are to have an hour in which to make up your minds."

"Are you prevaricating, Jim?" asked the sergeant in reply, using a term which he knew the Indian would not understand.

"The biggest kind!" shouted the captive, "divide the number of a full company of soldiers by ten and you have the right figure. Don't be humbugged into a surrender."

"But what will become of you if we don't?"

"Makes no difference. Be prepared for a rush and give 'em blazes!"

The soldier spoke so fast that the Indian could not follow him, but suspecting something wrong, the Indian led him away.

We pitied Brisbane, but could do nothing for him. We had no thought of surrender and we were sure we could beat off any attack.

We lay waiting and ready until close upon noon, when Brisbane suddenly appeared at the mouth of the valley, and running towards our camp at the top of his speed. Behind him were the Indians, who had planned it that way, thinking we would hesititate to fire for fear of killing our comrade. That was just what happened, and but for a strange thing the band would have been upon us before a gun was fired.

Thirty or forty feet down the valley was a shaky spot in the ground. We had noticed it in walking over the spot, but apprehended no danger. As the Indians charged they came in a solid body, and on reaching the spot the earth suddenly gave way, and all went out of sight in an instant, while Brisbane fell forward, clung to the edge of the hollow for a moment, and then disappeared.

A crust of earth about thirty feet square had given way, and when we rushed out it was to look down into a hole thirty feet deep, and see the Indians at the bottom of it.

Two were badly hurt; Brisbane's neck was broken as he landed at the bottom. No body of Indians ever received a greater surprise, and all their thoughts of fighting were gone at once. We saw plainly enough that the roots of several trees growing on either side of the valley had stretched across and interlaced to hold up the earth over what had once been a natural hollow. It must have been years and years before the crust was thick enough to hold up a man, but it had finally become strong enough for that, though not for the weight of eleven men rushing upon it.

The Indians looked upon it as a trap set for their destruction by the great Manitou, and were frightened into helplessness for a time.

The only way for them to get out was to be hauled out. We got the ropes, and first drew up the body of our comrade. This we looked carefully over, and found that the poor fellow had not been gashed or tortured, as we all feared would be the case.

Next we made them send up their rifles, tomahawks, and knives, and their own dead and injured. One redskin had a leg broken and a bad scalp wound, and the other had a shoulder dislocated and an arm broken at the wrist. When all were out, the living were commanded to pick up their wounded and be off, and even the defiant sub-chief was so humbled and awe-stricken that he obeyed without a murmur.

The sergeant warned them that if ever seen again in the neighbourhood they would be shot on sight. Not even a knife was restored to them, and they bore off their wounded and appeared only too glad to escape.

The two dead Indians were dropped back into the pit, while the body of Brisbane was taken to the fort that evening for a soldier's burial.

It was expected that Little Bear would demand a terrible revenge for the defeat and humiliation, but, as a matter of fact, the working parties did not catch sight of another Indian that summer, nor was there ever a claim made for the arms we took from the band.

H. PETERS.

Digitized by Google

Professor Whirlwind.

HE was a majestic, taciturn man, with a beardless, bloodless face, and a massive head, entirely bald except for a tuft of coal-black hair just above the nape of the neck. What his real name was I never knew, but, for reasons that will appear later, I always think of him as Professor Whirlwind.

Our acquaintance came about on board the ocean steamer Teutonic. For several days I had noticed this strange figure pacing up and down the deck, often casting swift glances seaward and muttering to himself.

One morning, as I lay in my steamer chair watching this curious proceeding, I was astonished to see the Professor stop short, his head thrust forward and inclined to one side as if listening intently, while his gaze was riveted on a funnel-shaped cloud that had suddenly loomed up in the horizon.

For a moment he stood like this, as rigid as a statue, his eyes, ordinarily dull and filmy, flashing forth a lurid light. The next instant he threw up his hands convulsively, as if to shut out some dreadful vision, and tottered backwards like a drunken man. Fearing an accident, I sprang to aid him. But by an effort he recovered himself, and, wheeling about, walked hastily away.

As he turned, something fell from his person and rolled swiftly across the deck. Another moment, and the object would have disappeared into the sea, had I not caught it up out of harm's way. It was an oval case of gold, whose spring, broken by the jar, had started open, disclosing the miniature portrait of what seemed, to my momentary glimpse, a very young girl, with the delicate beauty of a flower. Closing the case, with the feeling that I had involuntarily intruded upon another's private affairs, I hurried after the portrait's owner. I found him in his stateroom, his eyes carefully scanning the floor, apparently searching for the miniature case, which I now produced. As he grasped it, with a sigh of relief, the spring once more started open, and, though this time I looked away, I felt that the Professor divined that its contents were known to me. At any rate, after a moment's hesitation, he began:

"Very likely you were amazed at my actions on deck and think me a coward, if not a maniac. And then this picture—you must have wondered what relation could exist between that beautiful young girl and one like myself. But since you have seen—well, do you care to hear a story, a true story, though one that staggers human belief?"

"Certainly," I said, "if you are sure that you care to confide in a stranger."

I had observed that while I was speaking, his eyes, instead of looking into mine, were fixed upon my mouth. It was not, however, till he touched his ear significantly that I knew he was deaf and could understand my speech only by watching my lips.

"Well," he continued, "I had two companions in my strange adventure; you have seen a portrait of one; let me show you a photograph of the other."

Rummaging in his trunk, he drew forth a photograph, cabinet size, of a very queer-looking biped, which, on a close inspection, I saw was a rooster. The curious thing about it, however, was that the fowl had been photographed in what an artist's model, perhaps, would term "the altogether," there was not a feather on it. And yet it seemed alive, and stood with its neck stretched forward, its bare wings partly raised, and its bill open, as if in the act of crowing lustily.

I laughed heartily.

"You would not have been so merry," the Professor said gravely, "if you had met him when I did. He was not then the swashbuckler that he appears in this photograph, which was taken a short while after the eventful day on which I fell in with him—the seventeenth of June of the year eighteen hundred and eighty-two.

"At that time I was living in the States, and was deeply in love with the most beautiful girl that I have ever known, the original of the portrait that you found. Oh, you need not smile, for I was then a good-looking, athletic fellow of but twenty-five years. Well, for some reason my love-making didn't progress. Alice seemed to care for me, but her parents, though they showed no opposition, somehow always made it impossible for me to see her alone. It was as though they suspected my purpose and were determined that I should have no chance to speak to Alice of my real feelings.

"But I was as determined as they. So, when the professional aeronaut, Lugui—you remember the furore he created—came to town with his monster balloon, a scheme came into my head that I thought would enable me to be alone with Alice.

"Lugui had found it profitable to let the public take short rides in the air, the balloon being attached for this purpose by a rope, several hundred feet long, to a windlass on the ground, worked by two strong men, who would allow the rope to unwind, and the daring passengers slowly to ascend.

"Now, my plan was simply to induce Alice to slip away and take a ride in the great air-ship with me, providing against the presence of other passengers by paying for the entire five seats."

"And the scheme succeeded?" I asked, as the Professor paused.

"Yes," he said gravely, "up to the moment when we began our ascent. But, just as the aeronaut's assistants had obeyed his signal, the balloon began to pitch like a ship in a storm, wrenched the handle of the windlass from the grasp of the men, and then—the earth bounded away in a succession of rapid leaps, like a jack-rabbit, and, before we could realise that the rope had snapped asunder like thread, we were so far from land that the shouting of the excited multitude sounded to us like the slumbrous drone of insects.

"'Well,' I exclaimed, secretly glad that the parting of the rope had prolonged our companionship, 'this may prove a longer journey than we bargained for. Shall I pull the valve-line and descend? Not frightened, are you?'

"'No,' she answered, laughing; 'a little higher. This is glorious!'

Digitized by Google

"As for me, to be alone with her in the quiet regions was Heaven itself. Scarcely feeling the motion of our ship, up we glided through the blue silence, till the earth, covered with transparent mist like a veil of golden silk, began to assume a concave appearance; and, at last, our balloon, glowing like a golden planet, seemed to hang at the centre of the visible universe. Below us lay the earth—another sky—its horizon looming up to meet the upper bowl of the heavens. Around us slept an ocean of blue, its serenity unbroken save towards the west, where masses of clouds softened the fierceness of the sun, and threw a mellow radiance over all. Poised in mid-air, our balloon motionless, except for a dreamy swaying to and fro, the deep silence unbroken save by the soft Æolian murmurs of the wind in the rigging, we dwelt in a world all our own. Hand clasped in hand, we gave ourselves up to blissful dreams.

"Suddenly there was a rush of warm air from below that sent our balloon careering through space. Dense mists gathered over the earth, and a shrill wind, tearing the mists into long streamers, drove them northward, where they banked themselves in a towering mass of gloom against the sky.

"Alice, overcome with terror, begged me to descend, but the valve-cord had become entangled with other parts of the rigging, and resisted all my efforts to let out the gas, which now swelled the balloon until it threatened to burst.

"I had read enough of the history of aeronautics to know that the explosion of a balloon in the upper air is not very dangerous, and tried to calm my dear girl's fears by explaining that in such cases the resistance of the atmosphere soon throws the envelope of the balloon into the form of a parachute, that breaks the force of the fall.

"But I was not given much time for theorising. It had now grown so dark that we could scarcely see each other. As we cowered in the car, uncertain of what a second might bring forth, a ball of fire whizzed through the sooty darkness, illumining two peculiarly angry clouds that had made their appearance, one in the north-west, and the other directly opposite in the south-west. Swaying and swelling for a moment, as if moved by the impulses of living beings, they rushed madly together and formed a single, olive-green, funnel shaped cloud, that glowed in its upper part with a weird light, and began to whirl and hum like some gigantic top. It was a tornado spout!

"At the same time the air round us was filled with so stifling a smell of sulphur that Alice fell fainting into my arms. Our quivering balloon again bounded upwards, and then there was a report like a distant pistol shot. I knew that the balloon had exploded, and braced my nerves for the terrible descent. Kneeling, I supported Alice with my left arm, and with my disengaged hand got a vice-like grip on the rim of the car. As we began to fall, the car swaying frightfully from side to side, I heard a hoarse, rumbling sound like that preceding an earthquake, and glanced westward. The tornado funnel, humming and whirling round and round, like a mill-wheel, casting an unearthly radiance far above it, zigzagging at times from side to side, and lashing its tail like some maddened leviathan, was rushing straight towards us! What occurred the next instant I heard rather than saw. A whirr as of mighty wings, a rattle, as of musketry, a bellowing as of mad bulls, and we dropped like a stone into the abyss.

"I hardly expect to convey any conception of my sensations. For the first second there was the sickening feeling that one has when dreaming of falling from a high cliff. But, instead of the awakening bump, I felt a galvanic-like shock, my hair and beard standing erect, a pricking as of needles over my face and neck, a painful light shooting through my eyeballs, and my whole body alternately tossing and stiffening, as if from strychnia poisoning.

"The next moment I was plunged into a delicious bath of cool vapour, the rapidity of the descent gradually lessening, until at last the sense of falling ceased altogether, and the car began spinning in a jerky, pulsatory manner, but with incredible rapidity, round and round, as it appeared to me, in horizontal circles.

"All round me was a pitchy darkness, and from out that darkness came two sounds that Heaven grant I may never hear again. One, a commingled roar and wail that seemed to burst upward from the bowels of the earth: the other a continuous cutting, high-pitched, humming sound for which earth affords no comparison, unless it were the noise that would be made by the simultaneous buzzing of innumerable circular saws. This humming, never ceasing for a moment, and cutting through the fearful darkness, was inexpressibly horrible. Pitched high above the roar and wail that came from below, it jarred my very bones.

"To add to the horror of it all, Alice had slipped to the floor of the car, and my hands, feeling for her in the darkness, encountered a face cold as marble. As I strained my eyes to see her, a tiny shaft of light filtered down through the gloom above and fell upon her upturned face. It looked white as snow in the sickly ray. But her eyes were only partially closed, and for a moment my heart throbbed with joy as I fancied I could detect a tremulous movement of the blue-veined lids. Then the light went out like a snuffed candle, and left us again in the whirling, humming darkness. But only for an instant. Again it shone downward, and soon a dull, spectral glow lit up the glow around us.

"What I now try to describe to you, I saw, of course, after my senses had somewhat recovered from their utter bewilderment. I found our car, on the rim of which the hoop had fallen with the wreck of rigging and silk still hanging to it, whirling, without visible means of support or propulsion, in the interior of an immense hollow, funnel-shaped cloud, that was spinning round and round with such bewildering rapidity that I should not have known that it moved at all save for the fact that it revolved, not in a regular, continuous manner, like a top, but in a pulsatory, intermittent way, like the ratchet-wheel of a clock (except that the revolutions were from right to left), and caught up at intervals visible spirals of vapour that swirled from the central axis of the funnel and sometimes dashed over us in a fine spray.

Digitized by Google

"The upper portion of the funnel was filled almost to the central axis with a luminous mist which was apparently in a state of rapid vibration, and through which could be dimly seen, floating on its upper surface, a phosphorescent disc of light, about the size of a dinner plate, from which there radiated towards the outer wall of the funnel concentric rings of light that were continually shifting and wavering in their hues.

"Brain-sick as I was, from the incredible speed, and appalled by the deafening noises, I still had some confused idea that we were in a tornado cloud. But what supported us? The envelope of the balloon had long since been shredded by the fury of the blast.

"Glancing downward, I saw indistinctly numerous objects in the embrace of the whirl.

"Once what looked like a large iron bridge was sucked up into the cloud for a short distance and, after floating for a few seconds, fell and disappeared. I believe I caught a glimpse of the earth as the lower part of the funnel ceased for a moment its furious lashings to and fro, and became partly cleared of the innumerable objects that were rushing pell-mell into its mouth.

"Suddenly the truth flashed upon me! It was the air itself that supported us! We were in the interior of an immense revolving flue, into which, as it travelled forward, powerful ascensional currents of air were indrawn at the earth below, and it was these upward, spiral streams, howling and shrieking as they were sucked into the vortex, by which we were carried round and round like a leaf in a small dust storm. But, oh, with what fearful velocity! Looking back on that vertiginous flight, I can but smile at the calculations of meteorologists that in the most violent tornadoes the centripetal whirl of the wind has a velocity of eight hundred miles an hour!

"I now began to feel a singular buoyancy of spirits. I rapidly recalled miraculous escapes of persons struck by tornadoes, and recollected especially having read that in the New Brunswick tornado of 1835, a lad had been carried upward and onward for a distance of a quarter of a mile, and afterwards deposited in safety. I remembered, too, that the spout which passed over Mount Carmel in 1877, and of which I myself had been an unwilling spectator, had carried bodily the spire of the Methodist Church a distance of over fifteen miles. I was even seized by a transport of joy at the thought that I alone, of all men, had been permitted to ride on the very wings of the wind.

"But how soon that elation collapsed! Suddenly something whirling near us became entangled in the mass of cordage and silk hanging to the hoop. I got the thing, and pulled it into the car. It was a rooster, entirely denuded of feathers, but still gasping with some sort of life. In spite of all, I could not help smiling at this unexpected visitor from the farmyard, and the picture of fear he presented as, with mouth agape, eyes protruding, and plumage gone, he lay quite still on the floor, occasionally sticking his head under his wing to shut out the horrid sights and sounds.

"A deathly chill crept over me. No mere wind, however violent, could divest a fowl of its feathers without killing it outright. But one agent in all nature could do it. I suddenly remembered my own sensations during the first sweep of my descent, and clapped my hands to my face and head: both were as free of hair as a newborn baby's. 'This rooster,' I then thought, 'has evidently been carried to the top of the funnel into that electric sea, which has stripped him of his plumage as it has me of my hair and beard. He had fallen again into the path of the tornado, and has been sucked up the second time into the vortex by the indrawn currents. Is it possible for the same thing to happen to us?'

"I now began rapidly to reflect upon what I had merely noticed before, that some of the objects that were sucked up would whirl past us and very suddenly shoot outwards through the walls of the funnel, while other and heavier objects would continue to circle below or sometimes fall back to earth. Plainly there was an altitude in the funnel where the ascending air-streams tended so strongly outwards from the centre that the objects light enough to reach that altitude were hurled through the walls.

"We might ourselves reach that altitude, for the violence of the whirl was increasing, the humming noise growing shriller and shriller, till it was elevated to the highest pitch of screaming. Suddenly something seemed to burst in my head, and all was silent. I looked up. The humming disc, the swirling spirals of vapour had not vanished, nor did it seem possible that such motion could exist apart from sound. There could be only one explanation. I had become wholly deaf!

"To add to the horror of the moment, I now discovered that our car was ascending. Instead of travelling horizontally in our circuits, it would shoot spirally upwards for a few feet, where it would make the circuit of the tunnel till another stronger current from below would whirl it up a few feet further. Another moment and the funnel was lit up with an intense light. Again I glanced upwards. The disc that had hung at the top of the funnel was sinking towards us, and we were slowly rising to meet it.

"Like a bird before a basilisk, I gazed at the fiery disc. Nearer and nearer it came, larger and larger it grew. Swimming about in the mist, now fiercely luminous and shooting from side to side of the funnel, now of a dull and dying red, and slowly rotating on its axis, but ever sinking, sinking.

"Stone-deaf as I was, I could hear it splutter and hiss like red-hot iron plunged into water. I know not what power of action at length possessed me. I rose to my feet. I caught Alice up into my arms. Rather than pass through that hell of fire I determined——"

Here the story was abruptly broken off. As his narrative neared its crisis, the Professor had been labouring under intense excitement, and at this stage of the narrative he suddenly stopped, and there was a repetition of his singular actions on deck. His visage assuming an expression of the most abject terror, and his eyes dilating like the eyes of a cat in the dark, he thrust forward his head and inclined it as if in the act of listening. Remaining fixed in this posture for a few moments, there flashed forth from his eyes a fire so vivid that the very atmosphere in front of him appeared to be thrown into a tremulous luminosity. Then, trembling like a man about to have an attack of epilepsy, he threw up his hands with a convulsive motion and fell to the floor in a swoon.

I hastily summoned assistance. The ship's doctor took him in charge. His malady must have been a serious one, for he was confined to his state-room the rest of the voyage. Though I made repeated efforts to visit him, the doctor's orders were peremptory that no one should see him. When we reached port the Professor was still ill. I have neither seen nor heard of him since.

ALLEN QUINAN.

Digitized by Google

BY GEORGE GRIFFITH.

Author of "Valdar the Oft-Born," "Briton or Boer?" "The Outlaws of the Air," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XXXI.

CAPTAIN PETERS AS ANANIAS.

CAPTAIN HIRAM PETERS, as the reader will already have guessed, was the sort of man who, when he has taken anything in hand, puts it through at all personal and other hazards and in the shortest possible space of time. He was fully impressed with the absolute necessity of getting on board the Minnehaha and running her out of the Bay of Santo Domingo with as little delay as might be. He thought of his three hundred thousand dollars and the time when he would be not only captain but owner of the beautiful craft, and he made up his mind that before she fell a prey to anyone else he would either fight her guns while he had a man or a cartridge left, or drive her engines till the boilers blew up and, as he put it to himself, whooped her into glory with all hands.

The consequence was that, shocking horseman as he was, he not only managed to keep his seat in the saddle, but he covered the fifty odd miles to Santo Domingo in a little over twelve hours, and arrived in the city soon after sunrise the next day, stiff and sore, hungry and sleepy, with an exhausted vocabulary, and in the vilest of tempers, but still solidly resolved not only to get the Minnehaha out of the bay, but to make the treacherous little President help him to do it.

As he had humped and rolled and jolted over the weary miles, a plan had somehow shaken itself together in his mind which was at once daring and characteristic. Instead of attempting to go surreptitiously on board the yacht, he rode into the city with all the dignity that his aching bones would let him assume, dismounted thankfully in the courtyard of the Grand Hotel Central in the Plaza Mayor, drank three cups of coffee well dashed with brandy, ordered a room, and went and laid down for an hour or so for a much-needed rest and a quiet think. His companion he sent down to the jetty at the Bastion San Gil with orders to get a boat, if the Minnehaha's were not there, and go on board and tell the Chief Officer to have a full head of steam by ten o'clock. Soon after eight he himself got up, had a wash and a couple of cocktails, and went to the palace. The President was up taking his coffee with Madame Sybil on the veranda overlooking the patio.

As no one knew anything of the two messengers having been sent up to Lorrain, Don Gregorio was not a little surprised when the Captain's note requesting an immediate interview was brought to him. There could be no great harm come, as he thought, by granting the request and satisfying his own curiosity, so he gave orders for Captain Peters to be shown in at once, and as he came along the veranda he rose to meet him and shook hands with the greatest affability, and Madame Sybil graciously did the same.

"Well, Señor Capitan, this is indeed a surprise," said Don Gregorio, when the morning greeting had passed. "We thought you were far away up the Ozama, treasure-seeking with Don Francisco. May I ask what brings you back so suddenly to San Domingo?"

"I guess no one has a better right to, your Excellence," he replied, speaking very seriously, "seeing how very much it's got to do with you."

"Ah, what is that!" said Don Gregorio a trifle anxiously. "With me? How can that be, Señor Capitan? May I ask if my excellent friend, Don Francisco, has also come back, or is coming?"

"Well, Excellence, it is just about that that I came to see you. I've brought you a message from the Seenyor. He didn't have any pen and ink with him. It got forgotten, so he wants you to kindly excuse a letter. No, he is not coming back, and what's more, he isn't going to. He's found the treasure all right——"

"Ah! What, already?" Don Gregorio interrupted, with a start of surprise. "His good fortune has been our wonder! How did he do it so quickly?"

"Waal," replied the Captain quietly, and looking steadily at him while he spoke. "As far as I could see the Seenyor and her ladyship just walked straight along the stream till they came to a certain place, the seenyor looked at the map he'd got, took a good stare round at the scenery, found three biggish palm trees standing in a sort of triangle, two on one side of the stream and one on the other. Then he got a long bit of line and ran it round these trees, and started the chaps digging in the middle of the space. Pretty soon they found a thick old rusty chain leading to the stream, then he had a bit of a trench dug round to take the water off the bed, and then plumb under the bed of the stream they came on old Don Christoval's treasure-chest."

"Ah!" interrupted Don Gregorio again, with flushed face and eyes a-glitter. "Ah, how great was his fortune! And was there anything in it, Señor Capitan?"

"Waal, I should smile, Excellence. It was a mighty big chest; old hard oak, covered with lead and bound with iron, and when we got the lid clear and ripped it off, it was full chock-a-block with good old Spanish doubloons, fresh as if they'd been coined yesterday, and there were gold chains and rings and bracelets, and crosses and other religious fixings set with diamonds and rubies and emeralds. Great snakes, I tell you I never saw nothing like them! And then there was another box—a little one—inside it, and when we got that out and opened it it was just full of jewels and precious stones. No gold, mind you, there wasn't room for that, but just stones, regular big shining beauties, and I reckon three or four hundred thousand dollars wouldn't be far off the price of that one box?"

Digitized by Google

He paused for a moment or two to watch the effect of his words, and saw that it was all he had meant it to be. He could see that the madness of the gold lust was in their blood, flushing in their cheeks, and shining in their eyes. Don Gregorio's short breath was coming shorter and quicker than ever, and the lace of the mantilla which Madame Sybil had thrown round her shoulders showed that her breast was rising and falling more quickly than usual beneath it.

"Pray, go on, Captain Peters," she said very graciously. "I, for one, am dying to hear the rest. Tell us now what Don Francisco is doing with this wonderful treasure."

"That is just what I was coming to, ma'am," said the skipper, with a most provoking slowness. "Just as we were getting it out and doing it up in the packs, up comes one of our fellows from the yacht on horseback, galloping for his life to tell the Seenyor about this new craft that has come in here. She belongs to a couple of, well, I won't just call them pirates, though they ain't much better, who have also got on to this treasure of old Seenyor Christoval's. It was a bit of a race out here, in fact, and the Minnehaha got in first. The Seenyor knows their plans to a hair, and that's why he is not coming back. They are going up after him with a lot of their men, and if they were to meet him coming down with the treasure, there would be considerable shooting, which, as the Seenyor's got a lady with him, he isn't having any of just now; so he sent me down here to take the Minnehaha out and round to a certain point on the coast which I am not at liberty to mention just now while there might be anyone listening, and there he'll meet me with the treasure and ship it before they get a chance to put their thieving-irons on to it."

Captain Peters paused again here and took a sip at the coffee that had been brought him, and while he was doing so he saw the President and Madame Sybil exchange a swift and stealthy glance. Then he went on again:

"Seems also that there is another serious bit in the business which makes it pretty inconvenient for the Seenyor to come back to the city just now. There is a young lady on board who is the sister of his late lamented lordship, Sir Langton, and also aunt to that youngster who had the accident out at sea the other morning——"

"Ah! What is that you say?" exclaimed Madame Sybil, leaning over the table towards him. "What is that? An accident? Tell me of it."

"Certainly, ma'am," replied the skipper, who had no idea of the deep interest that she had in asking. "It was this way. The poor little fellow was playing about the deck and climbing about the rail aft when her ladyship wasn't looking, and a bit of a sea hit her on the other quarter, and being a very lively craft she gave a jump and when we looked the lad was gone. We stopped, of course, and lowered a boat and did what we could to find him, but it wasn't no sort of use, for we never saw him again. He must have gone right down. It maybe a shark helped him, poor little beggar. We were pretty sorry I can tell you, for he was as nice a little lad as ever you saw, and we were all getting to like him.

"But that," he went on in his ignorance of Madame Sybil's thoughts, "although it was an accident, doesn't go very well with the other one that happened to his lordship. I guess you will see what I am driving at there, your Excellence, and the plain American of it is that if the Seenyor was to come down here, or the Minnehaha was to stop much longer in the bay, Mr. Tristam and his friend would be going to the British Consul, and sending cablegrams to Kingston and Barbadoes and St. Thomas, and making things generally unpleasant for everyone concerned, and you just bet it would be unpleasant for everyone if they got up an inquiry here with two or three British warships cruising round the mouth of the harbour ready to land a squad of marines and blue-jackets just to see fair play. What do you think, your Excellence?"

It was a home thrust for Don Gregorio, and it didn't make Madame Sybil herself feel particularly comfortable. Neither of them knew just how much Captain Hiram Peters knew, and certainly no one could have spoken with a more perfect assumption of knowledge than he did. Moreover, neither of them had any notion how much Tristam and his friends knew, or just what their intentions might be. They were both haunted by the paralysing consciousness of blood guiltiness, and Don Gregorio more especially knew that anything in the shape of an inquiry conducted on the lines of cold-blooded, impartial Anglo-Saxon common sense, might be an exceedingly disastrous thing for himself; while as for Madame Sybil, she was already so utterly disgusted and sick at heart with her present lot in life that any promise of change would have been welcome to her, for in her soul she loathed and hated the greasy little scoundrel on whose protection she had been driven to cast herself. Hence Captain Peters' next words fell on ears more than ready to welcome them.

"And that being so," he went on after another of his judicious pauses of observation, "it seemed to the Seenyor that it wouldn't be quite a bad thing for your Excellence and her ladyship here just to come aboard the Minnehaha and take a run out to sea with us. You see, it's this way. If your Excellence comes along and we hoist the Dominican flag, as we did before, they daren't shoot. It 'd be more than the commission of any British or American officer would be worth to do it, so we shall get clear out. Then your Excellence can meet the Seenyor and take over your share of the treasure.

"A trip to Europe or up the States wouldn't be a bad thing when you get it. You see it'd pan out at a couple of hundred thousand dollars at least from what I've seen of it, and that is not bad spending money, to say nothing of getting out of a bit of a tight place. But of course that's for you to decide. I've got the Seenyor's orders to take the Minnehaha out of here, and I've got his orders to ask the favour and honour of your Excellence's company and her ladyship's on board, and I think that's about all. I have said what I was told to say and it's for you to say what you'll do, but anyhow the Minnehaha's going out at ten o'clock this morning, peaceable, I hope, but she's going."

There was a considerable silence after Captain Peters had delivered himself of this ultimatum. He lit another cigarette from the stump of his old one, paying a good deal of apparent attention to the process, and waiting with the air of a man who has done all he is going to do. Don Gregorio and Madame Sybil were each busily pursuing the especial line of thought which the circumstances laid down for each respectively, and in the end these two lines converged to the same point of conviction.

To Madame Sybil the idea of getting away from this dull, hot, evil-smelling old Spanish town, back into the great European world which had now been lost to her for so long was irresistible, and she was prepared to run any reasonable sort of risk to get there even for a few weeks or months. To Don Gregorio the prospect was no less inviting, and in his case, too, there were other considerations. If Lorrain had got the treasure and was taking it down to some other point on the coast, his idea of allowing the two search parties to meet and shoot each other to death fell to the ground. If Tristam went up to the Ozama, he would go to find nothing. Why not let him go? After all, he was a stranger, while Lorrain was an old acquaintance, bound to him at least by the ties of common crime.

Digitized by Google

Of the two it was certainly better to trust Lorrain, to say nothing of the awkwardness that might result from an inquiry by the British Consul and the captains of the men-of-war into the mysterious disappearance of the man whom he had forced to die by his own hands in the cell under the citadel. Altogether the chance of an easy get-out looked very pleasant indeed to both of them, especially when viewed in conjunction with the near prospect of a substantial share in the treasure and all the immediate advantages that it would buy.

"Señor Capitan," said Don Gregorio at length, "for myself I thank Don Francisco for sending me this friendly invitation, and you for bringing it. I always knew that he would give his old friend a part in his good fortune when he found it. For my myself I say yes, we will take a little trip with you. The city is not healthy at this time of year.

"And the Minnehaha's propellers, ma'am, shall begin to go round between that and five minutes past, and I guess we'll have a real pleasant trip. And now," he continued, rising from the chair, "I'll just go on board and get everything fixed up. I presume, Excellence, that we shall go out under the Dominican flag?"

"Assuredly," said the President, as they shook hands; "assuredly, that will be safer. They will not dare to violate the flag. Under that we shall be safe."

"Safe!" chuckled the skipper, when he got outside the palace. "Ye-es, you'll be mighty safe when I get you on board the yacht, you yaller-skinned, half-baked son of a heathen greaser! You bet you'll be safe! Hiram Peters, you're a darned good steam-boater and not any particular slouch in a fight, but, by the ghost of Ananias I believe you're a better liar on the spot than either! I wonder what the Seenyor'd have thought of me if he'd just have been sitting there list'ning to me slinging off those lies just as if

The Pocahontas was not falling behind.

I'd been raised in a newspaper office. Waal, anyhow, that's not a bad morning's work—you bet it ain't!"

CHAPTER XXXII.

A STEAM TRIAL.

The rebellion is broken and that thief Manuelo is dead. I shall say that I am going to Europe to raise a big loan for the treasury, and that I shall bring it back in that wonderful ship of yours. Garcia, the Vice-President, belongs to me, and he will keep things in order till I come. Besides, they will not forget those guns soon. What think you, querida, will you come?"

"With pleasure!" said Madame Sybil decisively. "After all the trouble we have had with this wretched revolution, we could not have a pleasanter change. Do you say that you start at ten, Captain Peters? Don't you think you could give me another hour? You know a woman isn't like a sailor, always ready to go anywhere at a moment's notice. She wants to pack. Don't you think you could make it eleven?"

"Madame," replied the skipper with one of his very best bows, "sooner than put a lady to any inconvenience in that way, I'll take it on myself to stretch my orders by a couple of hours. Will twelve o'clock suit you?"

"Perfectly," she said. "The President's launch shall be at the bottom of your gangway steps as the clock strikes, so far as I am concerned."

As the cathedral bells were chiming mid-day, Tristam, who had just been up to the palace and paid his five hundred pounds to Don Gregorio and come back on board the Pocahontas with the signed concession and a lengthy, but hastily scribbled note from Madame Sybil in his pocket, to which he had already replied with a single word over his signature, saw the presidential launch leave the end of the jetty and run alongside the Minnehaha, whose anchors were already hauled short.

A minute or two afterwards his glasses showed him Don Gregorio and Madame Sybil standing on the deck of the yacht shaking hands with Captain Peters. At the same moment the Dominican colours ran up the flag-staff at the stern, the next her screws began to revolve and she glided ahead over her anchors.

Tristam, who was standing forward near the conning-tower with Courtland and the two lieutenants, said, as he took his cap off and bowed to Madame Sybil:

"Courtland, with your permission we'll have a bit of a speed trial outside. At any rate, I suppose that's what Captain Peters expects, and there is no object in disappointing him."

Digitized by Google

"I'm there!" he replied. "If we can't have a fight, a race will suit me down to the ground. I'll go and tell the skipper."

"And you, gentlemen," Tristam went on, turning to the two lieutenants, "will you oblige me by signalling to the Hermione and the New York to follow us at their best speed, and to keep on round the coast as far as the entrance to Samana Bay, where they will probably pick us up again. I have the best of reasons for doing this, and I'll explain matters fully when we get outside."

"I'll make the private signal to the Hermione," replied Lieutenant Stockton, "and she can pass it on to the New York. The little skipper won't understand it then. He'll just think it's a signal to follow."

As he moved away to do this Muriel and Gwynneth came up arm-in-arm to ask what the meaning of all the sudden blowing off of steam and rattling of winches meant.

"Well, you see," replied Tristam, "the Minnehaha is putting to sea, and we're going after her to have a sort of speed trial, and later on we hope to pick up Lorrain and her ladyship."

"And that means that you're going to fight them somewhere," said Muriel, turning a trifle pale for the moment. "For I don't suppose you expect to pick up Mr. Lorrain without a fight."

"It may come to that," replied Tristam a little gravely. "But I hardly think so. Still, if you would prefer it, we could put you ashore at the British Consulate, or I'm sure Captain Arbuthnot would be delighted to receive you on the Magicienne."

"Oh, certainly not!" she said, and Gwynneth nodded decided acquiescence at the same time. "We haven't come as far as this to be left out at the end, and besides, if you go I'm going."

"Very well," he said. "We shall be only too glad to have your company, of course, and, after all, I don't suppose there'll be anything more exciting than a good steaming race. Ah! there she goes."

The Pocahontas, looking about twice her size, came along a couple of cables behind her, and both saluted the warships as they passed. The Hermione and New York were already under way, standing outside and waiting to take what part they could in the race. Both yachts saluted the Magicienne's flag as they passed at a speed of about twelve knots, with the impatient steam roaring from their pipes. As the Pocahontas went by the Magicienne's men cheered her, and Captain Peters, standing proud, happy, and confident once more on the bridge of his beloved craft, laughed quietly as he heard it, and said to Don Gregorio and Madame Sybil, who were standing beside him:

"I don't call that quite polite to us, but I guess Mr. Tristam will want more solid comfort than a whoop like that when that hooker's busted her boilers trying to keep track of us. Now we'll quicken up a bit."

He put his hand on the telegraph handle and sent the signal: "Half Speed" to the engine-room. This meant nominally fifteen knots, and almost simultaneously a faint tinkle came from the Pocahontas. Captain Peters grinned as he heard it, and turned his glasses intently on her for two or three minutes. The two yachts were moving at exactly the same speed, and the Hermione and New York had now joined in and were steaming abreast about half a mile to the southward.

"I wonder what in thunder those fellows think they are going to do!" said the skipper, continuing his running commentary, speaking partly to himself and partly to the others. "They know darned well that they daren't fire a shot, and if it amuses them to convoy us a bit of the way, they can just burn as much of Uncle Sam's coal or Queen Victoria's as they want to."

"Then you don't think there'll be any fighting?" said Madame Sybil, with an air of relief.

"No, ma'am; at least, not till the Seenyor gets on board. My orders are to run, not fight, and you'll see a run inside the next hour that'll make them brass-bound fellows on board them old fish-kettles over there open their eyes just about as wide as they'll go. I wonder what speed that chap behind has got. Let's try him at twenty."

The telegraph bell tinkled again, and Madame Sybil felt the bridge begin to quiver under her, and, although the day was almost absolutely calm, the wind began to rush past her ears and through her hair. The bell was almost instantly echoed as before, and again Captain Peters took his glass, only to find that the distance between the two yachts hadn't increased by a yard; but the two cruisers had now evidently got all they could do. The smoke was pouring out of their funnels in dense black volumes that looked solid enough to walk upon, and the Hermione was beginning to forge a little ahead of the New York.

"Bully for you, sonnies!" chuckled the skipper again. "Stoke up, you'll want all your steam to keep sight of us soon."

They were well clear of the land now and in deep water, and steering a course by about east to south. The sea was one wide, waveless expanse of long, lazy, oily-looking rollers, and in absolutely perfect condition for a steaming race.

"I guess it's about time to say good-bye," said the skipper, after another look round with his glasses, and he sent down the signal for twenty-five knots. Then he went on, turning to Madame Sybil:

"I hope you won't think me rude, ma'am, if I suggest that you'd better go down on deck and get behind something. In another minute or two it'll be blowing up here fit to take the horns off a cow."

"If you don't mind, Captain Peters," she replied, "I'd rather stop up here and risk the wind. One can see so much better, and really it's getting quite exciting."

"As you please, ma'am—as you please; but if you get your hair blown out by the roots—well, you won't blame me. Anyhow, there's the wheel-house you can go into when it gets too strong."

"For me, I shall go below," said Don Gregorio, "and take a smoke; it is not comfortable here any longer."

While he was climbing down, Captain Peters again turned his glass on the Pocahontas, and, somewhat to his displeasure, found that, instead of being half a mile or so behind, as she should have been, she was still only about three cables. The war-ships were visibly dropping behind.

"That's pretty tall steamin', Mr. Tristam," he said. "I own up I didn't think it of you, but anyhow I see you mean to run us down if you can. Waal, we'll see. Jackson, make the course east south-east."

As he said this he sent another signal to the engine-room, and to the astonishment and envious admiration of the officers of the two cruisers, which were now doing their very utmost and making a bare twenty knots, if that, the beautiful craft swung slightly round and went skimming across their bows at a good thirty knots an hour.

"Now, mister," he continued, turning his glasses on the Pocahontas again. "I guess you've got to hump yourself some if you don't want to say good-afternoon. Twenty-five you may do, but thirty——"

He stopped and stared with his eyes glued to his glasses, and his teeth audibly gritting on each other. The Pocahontas was not falling behind, and what was more, the steam was still singing merrily from the escape-pipes, and that showed that she still had something in hand.

"Waal I'm darned," he muttered between his clenched teeth. And then he went down on deck and sent a quartermaster to the chief engineer The gaunt, dreamy-looking man of machinery came up from the engine-room with a flush on his thin cheeks and a bright light in his eyes. His beloved engines were making 400 revolutions a minute, and he was beginning to live.

"Well, Captain," he said, "we're doing a good thirty, and the engines are working to perfection. Eh? What's that?" he went on with a little start, as he looked aft and saw the Pocahontas still hanging stubbornly on the quarter. "D'you mean to say we haven't shaken her off yet?"

Digitized by Google

"I mean to say, Mr. Pinner," replied the skipper with a distinct snap in his voice, "that if we're doing thirty, she's doing thirty. There she is. Every time I've rung my bell I've heard hers go, and, judging by them pipes, she's got a bit in hand still. How much have you got?"

The engineer looked a little anxiously at the beautiful white shape that was flying through the water astern of them at a speed so exactly regulated that the two yachts seemed stationary. "I can give you three more knots with safety, Captain, and five more with a certain amount of risk. We haven't got the oil blast on yet."

"Then put it on right away," said the skipper, "and give us all you can without taking any risk. When the Seenyor gets on board he can drive her for all she's worth, but there is no need for a bust-up just now."

"Very well, Captain. You shall have the other three knots within ten minutes. Then I think you'll find our friend will begin to drop behind."

Sent for the chief engineer again.

"Great snakes, I hope so!" said the skipper, turning aft and taking a cigar out of his case. "I reckon the Seenyor'd be pretty wild if he found there was another craft afloat that the Minnehaha couldn't show her heels to. I wonder where in thunder Tristam found her. Now if we only had both of them. Waal, we'll see about that later on. I'd give more'n twenty-five cents to be able to put a shell through those funnels, and I reckon the Seenyor will do it too if Mr. Tristam wants to make any trouble, but I would like to know how much the engineer of that craft has up his sleeve. Ah, now she's feeling it again!"

The quivering deck under his feet seemed to grow steadier as he spoke, but this only meant that the vibrations were more rapid. The green swathes of water swirled away faster than ever astern, and the foam-bubbles churned up by the whirling screws swept away so fast that the wake looked like a track of smooth snow. Minute by minute the speed of the flying craft increased. He cast another look back at the Pocahontas, and went on the bridge again.

The hand on the dial of the speed-indicator had already passed thirty-two knots, and was wavering on to the thirty-three. Again his glasses went up and again he could see no difference in the relative positions of the two yachts. He looked round at the dial again; the hand was touching the thirty-three. Again his glasses went on to the Pocahontas and now—yes, the white, outward-curved prow, with its gilded head scroll-work, began to go back, ever so slowly, but still back out of the field of vision.

"Got him!" said Captain Peters, putting his glasses down, with a quiet smile that had a lot of meaning in it. "I guess that's your limit, Mr. Tristam, and at a pinch I've two more knots, but I won't give those away just now."

He walked leisurely down from the bridge and sent for the chief engineer again. He came up looking brighter and happier, and ten years younger than before.

"Well, Captain Peters," he said, rubbing his perspiring hands together. "How will that do? Ah, now he is dropping astern. But a wonderful craft, Captain Peters, a wonderful craft. I wouldn't have believed that anything afloat could have held on to us for so long. I wonder where she was built and who made her engines?"

"Bully for you, Mr. Pinner, bully for you and your engines!" said the skipper, clapping him on the shoulder. "Never you mind who made his. Now just you go and slow her down to ten knots and then we'll split a bottle of the best, for I guess we've earned it."

All this time the excitement on board the Pocahontas had, as may be easily imagined, been growing higher and higher. The desperate ardour of the chase had got into everybody's blood, men and women, civilians and fighting-men alike, and at last the chief engineer had come on the bridge to Courtland to tell him that the yacht was making thirty-two knots an hour, and that she had barely another half-knot in her. The words were hardly out of his mouth before a screaming roar of escaping steam blared out from the Minnehaha. She seemed to stop dead on the water, and the next minute the Pocahontas, flying through the water at nearly forty statute miles an hour, had swept past her and forged several hundred yards ahead.

"Broken down!" said Courtland curtly. "I don't think we shall want that other half knot, Mr. Foster. We've got his measure, I think. Well, Tristram, what do you think of the Pocahontas?"

"A daisy!" laughed Tristram, "if I may venture to make use of the American language. What a gorgeous pirate she'd make. Hullo! That fellow's altered his course. Take care he isn't fooling you, Courtland. There is evidently a pretty smart man in command over there."

"Not much fear of that!" said Courtland confidently. "We've got him in speed, and we're much heavier armed if it comes to a scrap. Now I guess we'd better slow up, too, or we shall lose him. Captain Ferguson, will you do the needful?"

Then the steam roared out from the pipes in relief of the panting boilers, the revolutions of the engines dropped from 420 to 212 and the yacht slowed down to fifteen knots. He swung round on the same course as the Minnehaha was making. In half an hour they were together again heading a little more to the eastward. Whether or not anything had happened to the Min ehaha's machinery, all that could be seen from the Pocahontas was that she made no attempt to do more than ten knots. The afternoon waned into evening and the evening darkened into night. The night was cloudy and bade fair to be very dark, just as Lorrain, far away up the Ozama, was just then wishing it to be. Both yachts showed their lights then in the usual way and so they went on through the night round Saona Island, up through the Mona Passage, and round by Cape Macao and Cape St. Raphael until the darkest hour before the dawn. Then suddenly out went the Minnehaha's light, leaving only a black spot on the water melting into the surrounding darkness.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

The Curé's Story.

WE were sitting down to supper.

It was the last night that I was to spend under the hospitable roof of the Ibach parsonage. On the morrow I was to start for Paris en route to London.

A sprained ankle and a shoulder badly bruised, owing to a nasty fall on the Gibal, had compelled me to seek the assistance of a doctor, and, luckily, I found him in Father Seydell, the curé of Ibach, under whose wise treatment my progress had been rapid.

Supper had always been the meal at which conversation flowed freest. At supper the curé was wont to recount the small experiences of the day, and at supper I would often put in a reminiscence of the old hunting county in the Midland shires, where I had spent my first youth.

Father Seydell was a good listener. To anything I had to say about Loamshire folk and Loamshire ways he would listen with undisguised interest and intelligence alert.

Once, in the middle of a narrative, I asked him point-blank if he knew anybody in Galsworthy. He was filling his evening pipe, but stopped suddenly at the mention of the dear old Loamshire village which claims me for son; and looked up quickly as if recognising the sound of a familiar name. "No," he answered slowly; "he knew no one—nobody at all in England. He had never seen the country, and had no acquaintance amongst its people."

Our frugal repast being ended, and the talk beginning to drag, I started up sagacity in animals. The curé had shown himself a great lover of the four-footed friends of man, and apparently had a large fund of information regarding them to draw upon. I began a story about a horse which had belonged to Squire Galsworthy, of Galsworthy Park. But this evening my narrative somehow failed to interest. The good father listened only from habit. My words seldom got beyond his ears.

The gathering gloom of a dull autumn evening filled the chamber; a wood fire burnt on the hearth and threw weird shadows on the walls. Father Seydell sat silent and motionless, staring at the logs without seeing them, and neglecting the pipe and jar which thoughtful hands had placed within easy reach of his arm.

My wandering thoughts, going to and fro in search of an explanation, were still busy creating imaginary woes, when the door was pushed gently open, and Anna, the fat housewife, came forward, bearing in one hand the little copper lamp, and, in the other, a long, narrow bottle, which proved to be a sample of fine old Gallen-spitz, brought out from its hiding-place in honour of the parting guest.

Placing the lamp on the table, Anna drew the cork and carefully filled the tall green glasses. For a moment she lingered near the door, then vanished as silently as she had appeared. I smoked away solemnly, and awaited events. Presently, with a quick, impulsive movement, the curé pushed away his glass, spilling some of the contents, and, thrusting a hand into his bosom drew thence what I supposed to be some saintly token belonging to the service of his church. To my surprise, however, it proved to be a locket. Just a bright, gleaming silver locket, such as women wear; but of a shape and size which had long gone out of fashion. It was attached to a narrow ribbon of black silk that passed twice round the neck of the wearer.

If no relic of the church, it was a relic of human life and sweet human affection. Evidently, too, it had gathered about it memories both sacred and cherished.

Opening the pretty trinket with tender hands, the curé raised it reverently to his lips. There must have been virtue in the action, for it operated like a charm. The atmosphere began to clear immediately—the gloomy vapours to roll themselves away, and Father Seydell to recover somewhat of the bonhomie and geniality which had made my stay at the parsonage more of a pleasant interlude than a painful necessity.

"Souvenir du temps passé," he said, smiling rather mournfully as he extended the locket towards me.

A few strands of light flaxen hair skilfully worked into a simple design was all the treasure it contained.

"You shall hear its history," continued my worthy friend, and the locket was closed with a snap and returned to its place.

"The story is not a long one; but it concerns a countryman of yours, whose offence against myself I have forgiven. Yet the blood of the innocent shall not cry unto Heaven in vain. God Himself will be their Avenger."

The words were spoken with an emotion that revealed the curé in a light that was altogether unexpected. It showed that a man's heart beat under the priest's soutane. For a moment he paused; then, in the calm, steady, even tones that were habitual to him, he proceeded:

"My present age is fifty-three. I look back over the nine-and-twenty years which separate the parish priest of Ibach from the events connected with the silver token, which day and night lies always next my heart, and find myself chief cattle-tender in the Schächenthal. I enjoyed the fullest confidence of the Count, my master, and had under my orders many herdsmen and shepherds. It was I who selected the grazing ground. It was I who chose the cattle for market. Mine was a pleasant enough life. Honest work and willing hands make a contented mind. I lived on the best terms with the simple people amongst whom my father had cast in his lot, in the hope that change of settlement would heal the deep wound which the loss of my mother had made in his heart. But ere the first snow fell upon her grave, the poor man himself followed her, and left me an orphan in a land of strangers. A child soon finds friends. I was five years old, and a stout, sturdy lad. Happiest season, the springtide of life, when the days are long, uneventful, and man's estate looks a great way off!

"As soon as convenient, I entered the service of his

Digitized by Google

Excellency by favour of his steward, and rose rapidly, until I was appointed head cattleman in the Schächenthal.

"Every soul in the valley, from Burglen away to Linthal, had a kind word and welcome for Franz Seydell; and Franz had a friendly nod and smile for each. But it was to the Widow Sulzer's that Franz went oftenest; and it was there he stayed longest. Mère Sulzer kept the Falcon, and put up the few tourists who, in their summer wanderings, would stray into the quiet valley to enjoy its tranquil beauty, and taste the sober pleasures of pastoral life.

"It was Marguerite Sulzer who took Franz Seydell so often to the Falcon. Tall and supple of figure, graceful as the lilies over which she bent, Marguerite was the belle of the valley. Her face was one to dream over. You may see it to-day in the Munich Gallery. Look for Carl Haag's "Maid of the Mill." Crowned with a glory of pale golden hair, which flowed in long ripples down to her feet, her head was the praise of sculptors; she carried it so superbly. And her eyes, blue and clear as the sky in summer, looked out shyly upon the world, and spoke a language more tender than words.

"What wonder, if many of the young fellows cast glances of admiration at the landlady's pretty daughter and envied the good fortune of light-hearted Franz, whose frequent visits to the rustic inn were slyly encouraged by the dainty, blooming maiden, and certainly were not frowned upon by the prudent, industrious housemother.

"On one of my journeys with the cattle I saw the pretty bauble which you have seen to-night. It was in the Kirchestrass at Constanz. For a man whose earnings were but sixty francs a month, the price was high. But what worshipper ever counted the cost of the sacrifice offered to his divinity? I bought it.

"On my return I went straight to the Falcon. The present from Constanz made me a welcome wooer. That night the 'old, old story' was told to no careless or unwilling ear. Before I had left the house Marguerite had pledged herself.

"Almost with the advent of the travelling season, there came into the Schächenthal a young Englishman of distinguished manners and good appearance. He was attended by his own servant, and travelling, so he gave out, for the recovery of his health. He was going up to the baths of Stachelberg.

"At our first meeting I conceived an unaccountable dislike to him. It was unreasonable, but I confess to feeling glad when I learnt that his visit was not likely to be long. Mother Sulzer was not so well pleased. The Englishman was the first visitor of the season, and evidently belonged to the class which can afford to pay for attention. But while the good mother would have delayed his departure I was anxious for him to be gone; and fervently did I hope never to see his handsome face in the Schächenthal again.

"But in a few weeks the English stranger was amongst us once more. This time he came alone, came, he said, to stay. 'The valley,' he told Marguerite, 'was a haven of rest to a weary soul.' God forgive him!

"The men lived like lords that year. The tap was always running, the kitchen always busy. The Englishman's money flowed like rivulets in spring.

"If fear lends us wings, love sharpens our sensibilities, and I was not slow to discover that a hateful presence had stepped between my love and me.

"From being merry as the sunshine and open as the day, having neither trouble to conceal nor sorrow to hide, Marguerite grew constrained, nervous, and shy. If I upbraided her she would take refuge in tears. 'I was jealous,' she said, 'and frowned at her so frequently that I frightened her. No wonder she was unhappy!'

"One day I noticed a necklace she was wearing. It was composed of curious-looking, greenish-coloured stones, strung on fine gold threads. She blushed, hesitated, and stammered that the English milord had given it her—he had wished her to accept it as a small acknowledgment of services rendered. He was leaving, she said, at the end of the month, and to refuse his gift would surely have been a breach of good manners, and certainly very ungrateful. Would I give her my permission to wear it?—for she would never do so again unless she had my consent.

"'And, see!' she ran on, in her soft, prattling way, 'here is your locket, sweetheart. It has never left my neck, Franz, since your hand placed it there. I sleep with it on my bosom, and every night when I lay down to rest, it is with your name upon my lips. Are you satisfied now, foolish boy that you are?

"It was a week exactly from the date of this incident that I received a summons to meet his Excellency at Constanz. It was a long journey in the forties. I was gone sixteen days. As I travelled back, counting the slow miles impatiently—I was bringing good news—news that I hoped Marguerite would rejoice to hear. His Excellency had been pleased to appoint me under-steward——I beguiled the tedium of the way with 'castles in Spain.'

"On reaching Aesch, however, I got news which staggered me. My limbs trembled, while my ears greedily drank in the words—words which destroyed my hopes and laid waste my happiness. All faint and weary, I pushed on without stopping to rest.

"Mother Sulzer, I found in bed. The severity of the blow had nearly killed her. The Englishman had gone, but Marguerite—my Marguerite, had fled with him.

"How I got through the next few weeks I cannot tell.

"The summer went, and winter came; but of Marguerite Sulzer the passing months brought no tidings to the valley, which for eighteen years had been her home.

"It was July of the following year, and I had just returned from a visit to the chalets and herdsmen on the Urner Boden, perhaps the highest pasturage in Switzerland. About halfway through the village, I noticed three women standing together. They were talking. Their voices did not reach me, but their faces, I saw, were sad and serious. As I drew near, they ceased speaking, and looked at me with the look which had struck a chill to my heart twelvemonths before. I knew then that Marguerite had come back."

"Weak, exhausted and miserable, she had crawled home to die. Her first inquiry was for me. I was at the old quarters they told her. She waited two days. I made no sign and she sent for me. My first impulse was to refuse, and I hardened my heart. But where is the man can withstand the pleading of a mother's tears? With streaming eyes, Mother Sulzer implored me to consent. 'For the love of Heaven! Franz,' she urged, 'come, come with me. Till she has looked into your face, the priest himself can bring no blessing—the poor child can get no rest. She has suffered more than she will tell. As you hope for pardon, Franz, come!'

"What could I do? I went, and the mute appeal of the silver locket, which lay in trustful confidence upon her breast, moved me as no words would have done.

Digitized by Google

More eloquent than passionate entreaty, its silent pleadings sounded in my ears louder than sobs and cries and doleful lamentations. I trembled with an emotion I had thought nothing could ever awaken in me again. In that moment the old love came back upon me in full flood; and I forgave her as freely as I hope to be forgiven.

"'I am unworthy, Franz,' she murmured; 'unworthy to wear it, unworthy even to touch it; but——you will let me keep it to the end? Without it I should have died upon the way—with it I shall die here in peace. Then it spoke to me of hope; now it will speak to me of pardon.'

"Of all else she had stripped herself. Of all save the silver locket, the gift of honest love in happier days. Upbraid and condemn her as it might, my own poor gift had been religiously preserved. 'No, Franz,' she whispered faintly; 'no, sooner than part with it I would have perished by the road. It burnt me, burnt me like fire; yet I wore it by day and slept with it at night, though often it felt as if a burning coal was laid upon my heart. It was the locket, Franz, your locket, dear, which gave me courage to begin the journey and found me strength to finish it.'

"The graceless vagabond had taken her to Berne, induced her to sign a paper which, doubtless, he intended, if necessary, to be used against her—the place, he told her, was the office of the English Consulate—persuaded her that the affixing of her signature in the presence of the officials made her his wife according to English law, and then basely deserted her in Paris.

"In little more than a week Marguerite Sulzer and her infant babe were laid to rest in the quiet God's-acre at Untschüchen. To-day she would have been forty-seven."

The curé bent his head reverently, his lips moved, and the low ticking of the clock seemed the louder from the sudden hush which had fallen directly on the chamber. Resuming, he proceeded quickly:

"Some months later I obtained my discharge, and went into Wurtemberg. There I entered a seminary, studied medicine, and qualified for the Church. The remainder of my days I determined to devote to works of brotherly love and Christian charity. After the lapse of nearly thirty years my conscience and judgment approve my resolution.

"Throughout all that time I have striven to forget the name of the man whose lying lips brought shame and sorrow upon Marguerite Sulzer. Yesterday, and again to-night, I have heard it spoken. You were speaking, I think, of a Squire Galsworthy of Galsworthy Park. Would that be Thomas Galsworthy?"

"The same, Father. Squire Tom all through Loamshire."

"Is the man living?"

"No," I replied. "Squire Tom was killed in the hunting-field six years ago come Christmas. When his master fell, the horse stopped dead and stood over him whinnying till he brought assistance. But the Squire was past helping—his neck was broken. He left no family and the estate went to a nephew."

"'Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord,'" fervently ejaculated the curé.

There was a tap at the door. Anna came in with the candles, and Father Seydell bade me "Good-night," with a promise of God-speed in the morning.

H. HUNTER.

RESULT OF CHRISTMAS COMPETITIONS.

No. 1.

THE prize of £2 goes to Miss H. Giles, 7, Stafford Street, Old Bond Street, W.

A copy of "When the Birds Begin to Sing" goes to the following twelve:

Miss L. Higgs, Andersonstown, Falls Road, Belfast; G. H. Chittenden, 18, Lacon Road, East Dulwich; G. F. Matthews, 20, West Street, Chichester; Mrs. H. Rogers, 18, Baronsfield Road, East Twickenham; F. H. Parker, "Wensley," Manor Road, Wallington, Surrey; J. Shain, Longfellow House, 29a, Palmerston Road, Bowes Park, N.; E. Shalcross, 71, Myddleton Street, Clerkenwell; W. E. James, "Rosedale," Leighton-on-Lea, Essex; Prof. G. Townend, 5, Devonshire Place, East Barnet Road, New Barnes; W. Leslie, 1, Bannermill, Cottages, Aberdeen; Mrs. Dettmer, 46, Kingsgate Road, West Hampstead, N.W.; Miss A. Bullock, Blaby House, Drayton Road, King's Heath.

No. 2.

£2. W. H. Gillett, Gwithian, Hayle, Cornwall.

A copy of "Valdar the Oft-born" to the following twelve:

C. W. V. Clarke, 5, Grosvenor Road, Rugby; A. Randall, 3, Seymour Road, Harringay; D. Gilchrist, 29, West Scotland Street, Plantation, Glasgow; S. Bevan, 8, Stanley Terrace, Mt. Pleasant, Swansea; Miss Warwick, 16, Cornfield Terrace, Eastbourne; C. Clarke, Osborne Stables, East Cowes, Isle of Wight; E. Coulson, 36, Prairie Street, Queen's Road, Battersea; G. F. Saunders, 37, North Road, Bishopston, Bristol; Miss M. E. Wycherley, 10, St. Julians Friars, Shrewsbury; F. Morgan, 1, East Street, Bexley Heath; H. Robinson, The Parsonage, Heywood, Westbury, Wilts; F. M. Kew, 3, Albert Terrace, Farnboro', R.S.O., Kent.

No. 3.

£2. D. Gilchrist, 29, West Scotland Street, Glasgow.

A copy of "Guilty Gold" to the following twelve:

W. A. Smith, 33, York Terrace, Leigh, Lancashire; G. V. Wood, 2, Woodside Terrace, Onchan, Isle of Wight; H. J. Taylor, Collegiate School, Glastonbury; J. K. Engall, 1, Springfield Lodge, Springfield Road, Guilford; F. C. Spendelow, 45, Ling Street, Holt Road, Liverpool; R. Page, 43, Cadogan Place, Chelsea; Miss A. Sweet, 50, Portman Street, Rowbarton, Taunton; F. M. Whittingham, 5, Alvington Terrace, Cattedown Road, Plymouth; A. Coulson, 2, Notts Cottage, Chase Side, Enfield; Miss A. Walker, 14, Esk Terrace, Whitby, Yorks; W. Gibbins, 7, Church Grove, St. Andrews Road, Small Heath, Birmingham; J. D. Lister, 105, Noel Street, Nottingham.

No. 4.

£2. F. M. Whittingham, 5, Alvington Terrace, Cattedown Road, Plymouth.

A copy of "The Impudent Comedian" to the following twelve:

H. Gillett, Gwithian, Hayle, Cornwall; R. H. Williams, Wellington Road, Camborne, Cornwall; W. Ashton, The Drive, Chingford, Essex; Miss L. Grey, Clovelly, 100, King's Head Road, Catford, S.E.; W. Gyde, The Barracks, Warley, Essex; J. H. Hutchinson, Ivy Cottage, Hollybank Road, Drumcondra, Dublin; H. Owen, 32, High Street, Wimbledon; T. Marsden, Studley House, Upper Belgrave Road, Clifton, Bristol; G. W. Blake, St. Martin's Terrace, Salisbury; C. Kille, 1, The Avenue, Minehead, Somerset; Miss A. Walker, 14, Esk Terrace, Whitby; A. Coulson, 2, Notts Cottage, Chase Side, Enfield.

No. 5.

£1. G. Cooper, 75, Maryville Street, Donegall Pass, Belfast.

£1. Miss M. Wood, "Kelton," South Croxted Road, West Dulwich.

A copy of "Jumbles" to the following twelve:

F. Jones, Sutton Weaves, near Warrington, Cheshire; S. H. Gordon Able, Onecote School, Leek, Staffordshire; W. King, 105, Gaythorne Road, W. Bowling, Bradford, Yorkshire; E. Jay, 12, Clwyd Street, New Brighton, Cheshire; G. Beadle, Elsie Villa, Kinver Road, South Sydenham; Miss E. Bringloe, 34, Tremlett Grove, Junction Road, N.; Miss V. E. Carter, The High School, Lichfield, Staffordshire; Miss G. Mayfield, 18, Stamford Road, Page Green, Tottenham; W. Collins, 24, Oglander Road, Maxted Road, East Dulwich; Miss H. Stille, 25, Snowdon Road, Eccles, Manchester; C. Ambler, Prospect View, Thornton, near Bradford, Yorks; E. Beach, 3, Newchatel Road, Perry Hill, Catford.

RESULT OF PUDDING COMPETITION.

(MAP OF ENGLAND.)

£2. Miss B. G. Jeffrey, 4, Albert Terrace, St. Edmunds, Church Street, Salisbury, Wilts.

Digitized by Google

MERESIA

CHAPTER XXIII.

How can One Tell?

Spring had come, with its plethora of life, its atmosphere of beginnings, its green sunlit days suffused with poetry—surface poetry, such as the singing of proud father birds—the cooing of the dove upon her nest, and the universal motherhood of the natural world.

All things aged and experienced seemed out of place—intrusions—and the country, with its creative powers, and its scope for imagination, gave back to Meresia some taste of her not long absent girlhood, which Aladros had gathered in the bud and killed.

She was staying at her old home, occupying her old room, with the same aimless little ornaments decorating the shelves, the same pictures, the same books, but not the same Meresia! The past, which had left but faint traces in her face, could not fail to express its tragedy in her eyes.

It was a haunting, indescribable expression, that none failed to perceive, and all felt, hardly seeming to represent the mystery of suffering, but giving the impression of pain nevertheless, or rather the concealment of something too terrible to name.

Meresia had changed. She was a stranger among the old situations, branded by her crime, though no one saw the brand. As she met the familiar faces at every turn she thought of her secret, half bitterly, half triumphantly, and wondered if she had yet to pay the price.

Perhaps she would tell it at the end—gasp out the hideous details one by one to incredulous ears. They would say her mind was wandering and let her pass out of life unstained; speak of her as a child of Heaven, pure, untempted, bright with the image of God. Why, even since her husband's death she had found out to what lengths the charity of the quick may go towards the dead. A thousand virtues previously unexisting were now attributed to Alfonso, illuminating his memory with artificial light. People spoke to her of his tenderness, his liberality, his self-denial, for death had laid aside all his pride, his selfishness, ferocity, sensuality, and self-absorption! No, he had been kind, well-beloved, a benefactor in all the vicissitudes of his past existence, and this for the consolation of his widow, which filled her with secret disgust and anger.

After an elaborate description of Alfonso's goodness, given by Mrs. Milford for her daughter's benefit, Meresia took her severely to task, showing so much marked disapproval that her mother's vexation was aroused.

"If it is not true," she exclaimed, "you should be the last in the world to proclaim the fact—you who bear his name."

"Yes, I bear it mother, and find it not the least heavy of my burdens. I would give anything to dispense with it—to be Meresia Milford again."

"Why?"

"Because by being so called I am daily reminded of"—she paused for a word—"of my imperfection."

"Really, I do not understand."

"No, I hardly expected you would. Can't you imagine, though, that while I lived away from you, there may have been passages in my life of which I never speak—passages of an unsavoury nature, that even now are bitter to my taste? You have formed a habit of idealising the dead, and of painting my married life immoderately beautiful. This chafes and irritates me, when I know what weak, frail, fallen ideals you are holding up to worship. Human nature is a poor thing to exhibit—at best it must bear the traces of ruin—human nature, guilt, disorder, seem inseparably connected."

"But, my dear child, you must forget and forgive any little faults on the part of your husband."

"Oh! forgiveness is easy now, I do not pride myself on that. It must be a consolation to everyone to feel that, sooner or later, they will only be spoken of kindly. We are all subject to the law of death—but we are almost too proud to own it while we live. It is an implied insult to our physical strength."

"You are morbid and tired, Meresia, the dullness of these sad days have affected you morally as well as bodily. We thought—your father and I—that it might please you if we invited Dr. Serano to come down to-day to stay over Sunday, it makes a little change."

"Thank you, mother, but I don't want him. I am quite happy here with you."

"Just as I expected! You have no heart, poor child, to see anyone, and that is why I wrote without telling you, to Dr. Serano. Now it is too late to put him off; he is coming by the afternoon train, and bringing a friend who was staying with him in London. It will do you good to pull yourself together, to have people about that talk of outside things. I shall never forget Dr. Serano's kindness and forethought at the time of your trouble! He might have been a brother."

"Still I have no sisterly affection for Dr. Serano, and I wish you had not asked him. He always recalls that terrible night so vividly, and I never feel comfortable or happy in his presence. How soon will he be here?"

"Almost directly; the carriage has gone to the station."

Meresia's heart beat faster with a certain dread alarm. All unprepared, she was to meet again the partner of her crime. The secret between them made companionship unpleasant, for if she seemed gay, then his eyes convicted her, and if she proved melancholy, he suspected her of regretting the deed, or perhaps of betraying herself through weakness or fear. The wider the space between them, the better for Meresia's peace of mind.

There were days, here in the old home, when that night of reality became as a half-forgotten dream, an impossible thing! Now it was to live once more, José Serano was coming, to bring the past back!

"I must have time to grow accustomed to the idea," Meresia told herself, "I will escape for a little while."

She fetched her hat, called the dog, and slipping out into the garden by a side door, walked quickly away from the house. The lanes were quiet and peaceful, alone with nature, she could find rest. Every turn of these narrow ways, overrun with weeds and grass, and trimmed on all sides by wild primroses and violets, brought back some memory of her childhood. The very ground was consecrated to affection as she recalled the happy hours, and every stile and hedge had a value that a stranger's soul could never know. Each recollection was entwined with the threads of her existence. She wandered on, sensible only to the sweet things around her—the leaves, the scent, the air, the sparkle of life everywhere, the bloom, the glow, the majesty.

Digitized by Google

Meresia's poetic temperament could but rejoice in the spring. The activity of growth thrilled her soul with its energy and sense of beauty. Yearnings to escape from her black past and visions of good too great for earth were working in her now. Emancipated from the daily sufferings of her mind—the galling thought of the shamed fate she deserved—Meresia inhaled the fresh breeze, and, flinging herself on a bank of primroses and grass, felt every power within her invigorated and renewed.

"Ah, if I could always feel strong and brave!" she sighed. "It is this constant musing, thinking, remembering, that wears away my mind and body! One cannot kill a man for nothing; one cannot expect to go free!"

As Meresia laid her hands tenderly on the mossy grass, and buried her face in the scent of the flowers, a sudden development of her sensibilities stirred her imagination to hopes of a vast and undefined good—to prospects of a boundless future! The present appeared too narrow for her, and yet no words could have expressed exactly what she desired. For the moment her faults and failings, her very crime itself sank into obscurity, and remained blissfully forgotten. Her eyes lost their mystery, and shone with the joy of childhood, or the anticipation of a possible angelhood. Yet if Meresia had only known, she was committing the greatest fault of all in being conscious of none.

Before her marriage she had never paused to study herself, or to search into her own motives and secret processes. They were the natural outcome of a healthy spirit! Alfonso first taught her to shroud herself in the gloom of melancholy, to feed upon a fevered sensibility, to glorify sin, and thus lowered irredeemably her standard of judgment and action.

Now, during these months of reaction since his death, she had feebly groped her way back to the light, and sought to find out the common mysteries of Nature, to learn something of her soul—something of her end!

There was nothing of the cowering, shuddering criminal in Meresia. She regarded her deed as a circumstance of her life decided by Heaven, and the strength of this conviction brought solace to the hopeless fret of the passing days in which she grew to own herself a murderess, to herself.

Sometimes she felt almost grateful to Aladros for having broken down in her mind the prejudices of education. But for viewing this murder through the medium of his logic, it must indeed appear terrible—appalling!

He boasted a superior intellect, the off-spring of his personal vanity. He never overruled his feelings or desires, and thus, plunging into error, dragged his wife down to his own level, who in silence, "the element in which great things fashion themselves," dared his death, and accomplished the same.

Alone on her primrose bank, Meresia seemed inspired, while a whole series of truths branched out before her vision. All her doubts and hopes, her mistakes, perplexities and mental conflicts, raised her to intercourse with the supernatural world. Mysteriously her spirit appeared in communion with spiritual realities; it was the working of unappeasable desire to investigate the great problems of human nature, human destiny and duty, by the light of a higher power.

So deep was her reverie, so real this lifting up from transitory things, that Meresia neither saw nor heard the approaching steps of Serano and his friend.

The two men paused, involuntarily ceased their talk, and looked upon the picture.

In her plain black dress Meresia appeared singularly girlish and astoundingly beautiful. The sunlight had changed her auburn hair to ruddy rich gold. Her eyes were softened with emotion of an unusual kind, stirred by the inner workings of the soul. She had caught the freshness of the spring day, the purity of the flowers, the anticipation in the atmosphere. As her hands lay lightly on the primrose heads, no one could have dreamt those small white hands were red with crime. As her eyes watched the feathery clouds chasing each other across the blue, few would have thought they had looked on the bitterest side of life; here amid sounds, and colours, and forms, all innocent of guilt.

José marvelled at the enigma. This was the woman who had poisoned her husband; this frail, fair thing on a bed of primroses, with the pensive lips and wistful eyes, she was the lawful prey of the gallows! He would have moved forward to break the spell eagerly, angrily, but his friend held him back.

The sight of Meresia kindled a fire in the stranger's heart that he could not analyse. Perhaps it was merely admiration, the momentary wonder experienced by those who see great natural beauty for the first time on lake or mountain, sea or shore. At first they are breathless, bewildered, but with custom the sensation fades, their dazzled eyes grow clear, and in five minutes they are blasé and turn to a fresh scene. Yes, perhaps it was only this.

"Is she a woman or an angel?" he asked Serano.

José's lips curled.

"All women are angels," he said in bitter sarcasm; "but to the eye of reason this is a human vision. She is the widow of Aladros."

"You did not prepare me for so much loveliness. A mere girl, with all her soul in her eyes."

As he spoke Meresia looked up and saw them. She shook off her dreams and sprang to her feet like a frightened animal. It was a rude awakening. Her voice trembled in welcoming them, and touched some kindred chord in the stranger's being that had never been played upon before. The touch kindled warmth and excited rapture.

"Allow me to introduce my friend, Mr. Brockbank," said José Serano, watching her with his quiet, unchanging eyes, the eyes that to Meresia seemed piercing the outward surface, and dissecting the secret depths within. She turned to the stranger and offered her hand. It was part of her general niceness—Meresia's frank unreserve to strangers.

She saw a man of medium height, with a settled frown on his forehead, that remained through his smiles, which came spontaneously enough in her presence.

His was a face that, in spite of youth, looked wearied by hardships, and provoked by varying passions. A physiognomist would have called him jealous—petulant, but at the same time constant—enduring—a man who would under no circumstances change an opinion once formed, or swerve from a definite purpose.

"We are disturbing your reverie," he said.

Meresia smiled faintly, and glanced back at the impression left among the violets and primroses, crushed by her lounging.

"I am too old to dream," she replied. "Don't you think so, Dr. Serano?"

"Not too old," he answered; "shall we say too experienced? But without a little dreaming, happiness would be wholly lost—life loses its rapture through insensibility. Dream on, Mrs. Aladros, and do not deprive yourself of humanity's best enjoyment."

"I had almost forgotten the past," she said; "you have recalled it. After all, real life betters imagination, for the tales are true, and must needs be interesting if true! Do you know those lines—those very human lines:

"How can one tell which way one's heart may turn?
Back to the old, or for the newer yearn.
We are so young—we have so much to learn!
How can one tell? How can one tell?"

Her voice sank to a whisper. The stranger had never heard so mellow a tone.

"Ah! how, indeed?" he ejaculated.

Digitized by Google

CHAPTER XXIV.

Man is Fire.

Life had proved no smooth rose-bed for Herbert Brockbank, and, strangely enough, from his earliest youth he had never expected it to be so. He was a man who breasted his troubles as a strong swimmer meets the waves of the sea—with a certain satisfaction and reckless defiance.

His singularly imprudent nature naturally made his journey through life stormier than it need have been. No love episodes had brightened or clouded the pages of his history till he saw Meresia on that quiet afternoon in the lane amongst the violets. The sight of her was a revelation to the man, and sent the blood coursing to his head as he gazed, silently wondering, and in no way trying to repress his ardour. Herbert Brockbank found it easier to dilate than to compress—hence, doubtless, the mistakes—the falls—of his career.

He had held women but lightly in esteem—as creatures barely worthy of notice. Now, with a mind prone to run to extremes, he glorified Meresia into an ideal of his own creating.

Here, at last, he was permitted to behold humanity in a perfect and delightful form, adorned with beauty, exalted by a rich vigour of thought, enhanced by the charm of a golden, mellow voice. His views were ecstatic, large, generous, so far as Meresia was concerned.

His first impression not only remained, but deepened, turning all that summer day to a dream of unsubstantial beauty. He had read of love upon first seeing, of passion stirred into being at a moment's notice, but he never believed in the truth of these tales. Now, in the twinkling of an eye, the thing had come to pass, was actually with him, proving itself in his own being with a certain mocking conviction.

"Halt, unbeliever!" he pictured Dame Nature saying, "come into the love age of the spring and judge for yourself. I will lift the veil and test your strength. I will show you Meresia in all her glory, and enthrone her as the goddess of your heart, with all her sins, with all her virtues; find them, sort them, keep them, or discard them. There she is, a woman, and nothing more!"

And he had looked—looked with all his eyes, as a blind man who finds light, to whom the brightness of the day has been a mystery since birth—and for the first time sees forms and moving creatures.

The wonder of it awoke him from a low, despondent state, and a new soul kindled in the man. He hardly appeared to himself as the same being, so fresh, tender, and animated were his feelings.

So they walked back to the house together—Meresia and Herbert Brockbank, shadowed by the woman's partner in crime, who left the conversation chiefly to them. In her manner, José marvelled that he could trace no sign of insincerity—no underlying hint of the dark, unforgotten days. Instead, he defined a tenderness of sensibility—a deep enthusiasm with an added charm of romance which coloured her talk and her actions. Elastic in movement, and erect in bearing, her ghastly deed had given her an air of self-reliance, rather than of shrinking. The sweetness of her ways were, he could see, captivating his friend, winning his confidence, warming his hopes, inflaming his passion.

This first meeting was the great root from which all the events of the future were to grow.

Meresia alone was perfectly unconscious of the workings of fate. Her joyousness sprang from the magnetism of the spring, and to the man at her side she was indifferent.

Her first impressions of him were nil, he made no impression at all, perhaps for the reason that after a preliminary glance she hardly looked at him. She talked because all the birds were talking to each other, with prattling sounds that made meaningless music.

Later in the day, when Nature's early closing hours brought back a taste of the winter, Meresia's light-heartedness vanished with the sunshine.

"Where are your spirits?" whispered José, as they stood apart together watching the fading light.

She held the tassel of the window blind between her fingers, and he noticed that they closed upon it suddenly with vehement pressure.

"My spirits go with the sun," she answered. "The whole world is a lifeless page when that has gone. It is the only thing that keeps the corpse out of sight!"

José drew back, then a servant came and shut the shutters.

Meresia took scant time over her toilette for dinner, since it was but the plain black gown of widowhood, and she found the drawing-room empty.

Taking a book, she sank into a low chair, behind a standard lamp.

Presently Herbert Brockbank came down, and seeing that she was unobserved, Meresia remained motionless from apathy.

He crossed to a table and picked up an old photograph of her as a girl, taken in the garden, with her dog in her arms, and the merriment of childhood in her face. He looked at it long and studiously, as if gazing upon something near and dear to him.

Meresia leant forward and spoke with a little catch in her voice.

"That is not me," she said; "not me, at least as I am now."

The man started, and had his face been less brown, he would have flushed a guilty red.

"You have not changed," he replied, "you are just the same."

Meresia smiled scornfully.

"It is a ghost," she said, "that girl died; I buried her long ago, or perhaps she is not the ghost, I am the resurrection of the dead girl, with the same outward form, but not the same spirit."

He laid the picture down.

"Then she no longer interests me," he answered. "Your theory is a true one, Mrs. Aladros—we change—we develop—we bury the old—we give birth to the new—we hurry on the law of Nature by dying a thousand times before the appointed hour. I think life would be less interesting if this were not the case, don't you?"

"I suppose we grow tired of ourselves. We want something different—something new. When we are good we want to be bad, and when we are bad we would give all the world to be good again."

"Beautiful women are a law unto themselves," he replied.

"And so expose their foolishness," added Meresia quickly. "They misunderstand the true rule of life. It is only after abiding by their own laws, and suffering immoderately in consequence, that they learn self-conquest is self-expansion, not self-repression!"

José came into the room as she spoke. Meresia half rose with a little nervous gesture new to her, and dropped the book on her lap.

José picked it up.

"I see you have been reading Rousseau's 'Eloise,'" he said, glancing at the cover.

"Yes. Rousseau is the only French author I have ever read who knows the way to the heart."

José smiled—anyone who observed could have detected a strong-rooted cynicism in the Spaniard's mien. Brockbank had a good eye for character, and summed up the doctor accurately. He saw that Serano had no great respect for his late friend's widow, and yet he divined something of the secret understanding existing between them. It annoyed and irritated him. If José did not love this woman, what else could there be between them, what tie—what private knowledge apart from the world?

The Spaniard was conscious of Brockbank's scrutiny.

"Why do I interest you?" he asked jokingly. "Is my tie crooked, or have I unwittingly offended in any smaller detail?"

Digitized by Google

"I was thinking," replied Brockbank, "how rare a thing it is to find a man who has made his fortune through well-doing. Serano saved my life, Mrs. Aladros, when I was down with fever last summer—it is a saying that he has never let a patient die!"

The moment the words passed Herbert Brockbank's lips he would have given worlds to recall them, for in a flash he remembered that Aladros was a patient of this same doctor, and that Serano had actually been in the house at the time of the death.

Meresia broke the awkward pause that naturally followed so ill-advised a remark.

"Is it a very rare thing to make money by honest means?" she said, and her voice had lost none of its sweetness.

"I have only to quote a Spanish proverb in answer to that question," replied José with alacrity.

"Oh! I know your Spanish proverbs," Meresia declared; "they are all terribly cynical. By them a nation may be judged out of its own mouth. You can tell the character of a people better by their proverbs than by horoscopes, palmistry, or reading the forehead, the eyes, or even the nose, which betrays much!"

"Fancy reading a nose!" laughed José. "But I won't rob Brockbank of the superior Spanish wisdom, 'Renounce the Devil, and thou shalt wear a shabby coat.' So the only way to success is, according to native logic, through the Gate of Hell. Remember, please, I was educated in England, and I am no believer in the favourite sayings of my mother tongue, for this latter leads to only two things: be 'either rich or hanged.'"

Meresia turned a shade paler, but the crimson lamp concealed this. She did not trust herself to speak, for the very word "hanged" paralysed her faculties.

"This is not absolutely a cynic's pessimism," José continued, "which I can prove by the fact that 'the poorer houses contain the most honest people.' But words will not convince Mrs. Aladros. She does not believe even in deeds, resembling in that particular instance, the Spaniard's maiden aunt, to whom this same assertion is affixed."

"Your countrymen are very narrow-minded," said Meresia, finding her voice with an effort; "they reduce their study of human nature to a limited formula."

"One hundred tailors, one hundred millers, one hundred weavers—three hundred thieves! There is arithmetic for you!"

Meresia laughed scornfully, but it was a forced laugh, with no ring of mirth in its melody.

"That proverb has stood the test of centuries," murmured José.

"I see no error in it, but here are your good parents, Mrs. Aladros; let us bury our profane sayings with the advent of dinner."

The gong sounded as he spoke, and Meresia rose wearily—yet glad to escape the scathing cynicism of the Spanish doctor.

But the evening had barely begun, and the torture of the coming hours was still undreamt of. It was not till long after they had again returned from the dining-room that a chance whisper from Serano set Meresia's nerves tingling with fear, and painfully hastened the beating of her heart. He had asked her to show him some rare plant in the lighted conservatory that led from the hall, and Meresia—all ignorant of what was to follow—readily assented.

Herbert Brockbank, detained in conversation by Mr. Milford, watched the departing figures with envious eyes and jealous suspicions.

Perhaps, after all, he had been mistaken, and Serano loved this woman. Men frequently love the women they least respect when their beauty is such as Meresia's. So he soliloquised, and answered his host vaguely.

"When are you coming back to town?" asked José Serano somewhat abruptly of Mrs. Aladros.

She paused, surprised at a certain command in his tone, though it was but a question.

"I don't know."

"Next week?"

"I don't know."

The monotony of the replies annoyed him. He tapped his foot impatiently on the floor.

"Take my advice; return quickly—as early in the week as possible—and come straight to my house. I cannot talk to you here; I only came to-day to give you the hint. It may be necessary for you to leave England next week."

Meresia tottered back, white to her lips and trembling.

"To leave England!" she gasped. "Great Heaven!"

"Don't be frightened. There is no danger for you if you follow my directions to the letter; but if you fail——"

He shrugged his shoulders, with a gesture peculiarly terrifying to the woman.

"Tell me, for Heaven's sake, am I suspected?"

"Hush!"

They stepped back against a large flowering azalea, till Meresia's slight figure was almost lost in the white loveliness of prolific bloom.

Someone was crossing the hall and walking towards the conservatory. A moment later, and Herbert Brockbank, who had escaped his host, came eagerly in search of Mrs. Aladros.

The sight of José and Meresia confirmed his fears. This was undoubtedly an arranged meeting. They were neither of them looking at the rare plant on the opposite side, but each had a set purpose written on their faces. The woman was trembling, the man had his hand on her arm, and their conversation ceased abruptly as Herbert Brockbank entered.

They joined him hurriedly, Meresia unable to conceal her agitation, the more that the stranger's eyes gazed unsparingly upon her distress.

She excused herself on the plea of fatigue, and went early to bed. Serano's words were burning into her brain—torturing her by their brevity and vagueness. What fresh terror, what fatal development had come to light? It seemed so easy—with Serano's aid—and now her sin had found her out. He spoke of her having to leave England That must mean fleeing from justice, with the bloodhounds ever on her track, and the penalty to pay!

She crept to bed—the criminal at last—with evil shadows building unsubstantial gallows and half-realised torments in the dark atmosphere, heavy with threatening spirits surrounding her in gradually thickening throng, till with reeling senses she fell back fainting from fear on the pillows of her girlhood.

In truth, the old Meresia was dead, the guileless, innocent Meresia, who had dreamt youth's happy dreams in that same unaltered room. The new tenant was a woman with a sin upon her soul, and she held nothing in common with the girl of past days.

"I want to speak to you alone," said Brockbank to Serano.

"Come to my room, I am at your service," replied the Doctor lightly. "Now, what have you to say?"

"It's about Mrs. Aladros. Is she a free woman, or are you——"

José stopped the sentence with a harsh laugh.

"Good gracious, Brockbank, you surely don't intend to go in for her yourself?"

"I merely asked if she were free."

"That is a large word! Are beautiful women ever free? But if you respect yourself, my dear fellow, don't burn your wings at her candle. Man is fire, woman is tow, and the Devil comes with the bellows. Be warned in time!"

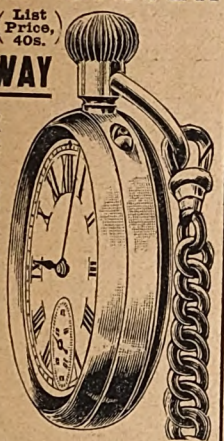
"Warned!" he muttered, "I did not come to be warned, Serano. Good-night."

"Good-night, Brockbank."

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

A SOLID SILVER WATCH (List Price, 40s.) GIVEN AWAY



to every person who carries out the conditions mentioned in our Catalogue of further wonderful bargains, for which you must send. In sending for it enclose 1/6 (nominal price) for one of our handsome Black Star Diamond 18-ct. Gold-cased Half Hoop Rings equal in appearance to one costing £5 5s. At same time state whether you require Lady's or Gents' Watch. This is NO SWINDLE, and I am not an AMATEUR Watchmaker, but an experienced Watch Manufacturer and Diamond Merchant. Send at once. You will be delighted. If not, money will be returned. The Watch is warranted for 5 years, and is sent post free on your complying with our conditions. Send at once, enclosing P.O.O. 1/6 for ring and offer of watch. Send string size of finger. Address:

Specimen of the List Price £2 Watch (Lady's or Gents') I am giving away.

W. W. WADE,
Dept. 6, Gold Exchange, Hammersmith, LONDON W.

SULPHOLINE LOTION.

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

FREE TO ALL,

Our 60/- Silver Watch and Chain, who comply with this advertisement and the offer which we shall send. It would be ridiculous to expect us to continue giving away these Watches and Chains for any length of time, so kindly send at once if you wish to secure one. This is our first advertisement, and by it we are determined to bring our name before the public.

OUR 60/- SILVER WATCH AND CHAIN.

For 1/6 we will send an 18-carat Gold-cased Brooch or Scarf Pin, together with our marvellous offer; and on your complying with offer, we shall forward, entirely Free of any charge, our 60/- Watch and Chain. Understand, we charge no money for these Watches and Chains. Number is limited. Money refunded in full if sent in too late. Send 1/6 with stamped addressed envelope.

WHAT A GENTLEMAN SAYS OF OUR FREE GIFT SILVER WATCH AND CHAIN:

"North Jesmond.

"GENTLEMEN,—I beg to thank you for the handsome present which came to hand on Tuesday morning. I simply answered your advertisement, thinking it was only a fraud, but to my pleasant surprise I received a silver watch and chain. I wish your Company every possible success, and I will recommend you to all my friends. You may make what use of this you like if it will be to your advantage.—I remain, yours truly, "W. STAVELY."

WHAT A LADY SAYS:

"Ingoldsby House, 18 High Street, Redcar.

"DEAR SIRS,—I must say I think it is a most beautiful little watch and chain, a most handsome present, for which I return you many thanks. If you should think proper to make use of these few lines, you are at liberty to do so.—Yours respectfully, "E. STOTHARD."

RENNIE & CO.
(Dept. 16), 236 Sauchiehall St., GLASGOW.

NOSE MACHINE.

This is a contrivance by which the short cartilage of the nose is pressed into shape by wearing the instrument an hour daily for a short time. Price 10/6, sent free for stamps.

ALEX. ROSS,
62, Theobald's Road, London.

Opposite Bedford Row.

(Est. 1850.)

Parcel free from observation.

£20

Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates Free. Tobacconists Commencing. See Illustrated Guide (259 pages), 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000.

TOBACCONISTS OUTFITTING COMPANY, 186, EUSTON ROAD, LONDON.

The largest and original house (50 years' reputation). Mgr., H. Myers.

THE John Noble

HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES

Worn throughout the World,

are supplied in the following two good cloths:

I. John Noble Costume Coating, and in II. John Noble Cheviot Serge.

PATTERNS and New Costume Album sent POST FREE.

Model 876.

Smart Double-Breasted Coat with Velvet Collar, Tailor skirt, which drapes well. Price 10/6 complete. Sent carriage paid 10/6 and safely packed for 9d. extra. Skirt only 5/6. Carriage 6d.

JOHN NOBLE KNOCKABOUT FROCKS.

Thoroughly well made, with saddle top, long full sleeves and pocket. Lengths and Prices.

21 24 27 30 in.
1/6 2/- 2/6 3/-
33 36 39 42 in.
3/6 4/- 4/6 5/-

Postage 4d. extra.

'Brewer' Caps (all shades), as sketched, 1/-. Ladies' well-knitted Tam o' Shanters at same price.

COLOURS.—Black, Navy, Electric, Brown, Ruby, Myrtle, Cinnamon, Fawn, Grey, Moss, Sage Green, Reseda, and Purple. SIZES IN STOCK are 34, 36, and 38 in. round bust (under arms). Skirts being 38, 40, and 42 in. long in front. Larger or special sizes made to measure, 1/6 extra. Mourning Orders executed and despatched within twelve hours.

Please mention SHORT STORIES when ordering. Bankers: London & Midland Bank.

JOHN NOBLE LTD., BROOK STREET MILLS, MANCHESTER.

The Best Hair Dye

in the World for Lashes, Eyebrows, and Hair on the Head, with Moustache and Beard. For Ladies' Hair and for all Colours. Had at 3s. 6d., post 3s. 9d., of ALEX. ROSS, 62 Theobald's Road, High Holborn, London, W.C. Spanish Cantharides for fallen hair, 3s. 6d. 5s. 6d. & 10s. 6d.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably"

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

MR. CLAUDE CARTER, of Thorn House, Johnstone, N.B., says: "Your Tablets much reduced my weight and I have been waiting to see if it was permanent, and so it has proved."

MR. CANHAM, 87, Alexandra Road, Norwich, says: "Tablets cured my wife two years ago of extreme stoutness. It has never returned."

MARION TAYLOR, of Church Farm, St. James, Halesworth, says: "Have lost quite two stone."

A. PEEL, of Darley Hydro, Matlock, writes: "They have reduced and benefited me a good deal."

MISS MONEY, Broadway House, Newbury. "I am greatly reduced in weight."

MR. G. LOVE, 4, Kirk Street, Peterhead. "I think them wonderful not only to reduce fat but as a medicine."

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

A. A sum of from 10/- to 20/- per week offered for spare time to either sex everywhere. Work can be done evenings. Send addressed envelope to Box 60, Eclipse Works, 89, Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 188B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W. 63 Seven Sisters Road, N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

DR. MACKENZIE'S

Deliciously and expensively perfumed, the most luxurious Soap in the World. Produces a most lovely complexion, eradicates spots, pimples, and all imperfections, makes the skin exquisitely clear, and produces the healthy bloom so much desired. It is absolutely harmless, and each tablet is accompanied by a medical certificate.

ARSENICAL

6D. & 1S. PER TABLET.

This Soap prevents the growth of superfluous hairs, removes wrinkles, feeds the skin. You can get it at all the Stores and first-class Chemists. The Family Doctor says it is the most economical beautifier known to Modern Dermatology. It clears away all pimples, spots, redness, or roughness, and makes the skin smooth and clear as a baby's. Use it in the bath and for all Toilet purposes; it is most delicious. For irritable or sensitive skins it is matchless and delightfully soothing.

MADAME PATTI sends her best thanks for Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap, which she finds most excellent—Craig-y-nos Castle, South Wales.

SOAP.

Use also Dr. MACKENZIE'S "ARSICAL" Face Lotion. Beware of many Imitations. Have Dr. MACKENZIE'S or none.

PLAIN SPEAKING.

NEXT week will begin in Short Stories one of the most exciting war stories ever written. It will treat on a subject uppermost in all men's minds at the present moment—namely, the dismemberment of China. The author has written a story of naval warfare which, for picturesque word painting and vivid wealth of detail, has never yet been equalled. Britain, France, Germany, Russia, Japan, and China are all embroiled. It is a magnificent story, and you must not fail to start it. Tell your friends all about it. They will thank you.

THE result of the 1897 Coupon Collecting Competition will be found in Pearson's Weekly dated January 29th.

IGNORAMUS writes to ask if the temperature of a large town is any higher when all the street lamps are lit than during the daytime.————Yes, it makes a material difference, naturally.

P. H.—writes: "What is the origin of the expression 'scot-free'?"————Scot is the equivilent of the Anglo-Saxon word "sceat," meaning taxation; therefore "scot-free," originally meant "free from the payment of taxes," and now it has become a general expression for freedom from anything.

PAUL.—America is America to all the world, and is pronounced in the same way except in France, where it becomes Amérique.

D. D. wants to know why donkeys have such a strong objection to crossing running water.————The wild ass is very fond of saline herbage and drinks brackish water only. Being unaccustomed to running water, he naturally looks upon it with suspicion. Ergo, by the natural law of heredity, his domesticated descendant would, in all probability, inherit the aversion.

M.G.B.—Almost any Italian title can be bought by paying enough for it. A dukedom is somewhat costly, its price reaching as high as £3,200.

U. L. S.—It is quite a mistake to suppose that blinkers are an essential part of a horse's equipment. They merely became fashionable owing to the pride of persons who imagined their horses presented a finer appearance with these appendages, and custom and ignorance combined have perpetuated their use. It is the unseen object which terrifies a horse. The animal who will became unmanageable when made to turn away from an approaching train will quietly stand its ground if allowed to face the object.

Q.—The number of people who have lived upon this earth since the time of Adam is calculated to be somewhere about 36,627,844,600,000,000,

H. H.—Taking all the year round, the coldest hour of the twenty-four is five o'clock in the morning.

D. S.—It is quite true that giraffes are now almost priceless. They were once to be bought for £40 each, now a good one would fetch over £1,000. The Jardin d'Acclimatation of Paris some time ago refused to sell three very young ones for £2,000. Elephants, on the contrary, range from between £160 to £480.

W. W.—Yes, there is such a thing as a yearly paper, and only one; that is the Esquimaux Bullelin, and it is the only journal published within the Arctic Circle.

S. C. W. wants to know if rainbows are ever seen anywhere else but in the air.————Yes; they may often be noticed in the spray of fountains and of waterfalls. They are sometimes seen on the surface of the sea, and upon wet meadows lying opposite to the sun.

T. H.—The eye is the first feature to show the approach of old age in man, by the fading of the colour at the circumference of the cornea.

R. D.—The wines of ancient times were quite different to our modern wines. They were simply the product of fermentation, like our home-made currant wine or cider. Your friend is quite right in supposing that they contained alcohol, and could intoxicate if taken in sufficient quantity, but it was only a very small amount, many having none at all, and the strongest of all only twelve per cent.

A. G. M. is in the habit of catching very severe colds, accompanied by violent fits of sneezing, which, as he says, "is most embarrassing when in a crowded railway carriage or omnibus."————Perhaps the common remedy of tightly pressing the upper lip with the finger when you feel a sneeze coming on would meet your case. At all events, you might try it.

F. B. wants to know if negro babies are born black.————No. At birth a negro infant is of a reddish nut-brown colour, which turns to slatey-grey by the time it is a week old. It does not become black for a period varying from one to three years, according to the nature of the locality and the influence of the climate.

MOLAR is anxious to know the reason one's double teeth decay before the single ones.————For two reasons. In the first place, the double teeth have more work to do; nearly all the work of mastication falls upon them, which causes the enamel to wear away, thus exposing the dentine to the injurious action of the saliva and the various acids of the mouth. In the second place, the enamel is proportionately thicker on the single teeth than it is on the double.

W. B. S.—An "artel" is a Russian institution, a kind of syndicate, in fact, amongst the working men of that country. A certain number of mechanics of all descriptions join together, forming gangs, and undertake such work as railway making, dock work, agricultural work, and all kinds of skilled artisans' trades, and then share the profits between them.

S. H.—The most northerly town in the world is Hammerfest in Norway.

AN IRISHMAN wants to know why the first thing people usually do after a great mental shock is to put their hands to their heads.————Because that is where the brain is, or should be, and the brain is the headquarters of all sensation—more especially the fore-brain. It receives impressions from all parts of the body, and every sensation communicates with it, so that when a sudden shock is experienced, the disturbance is so great as to cause pain, and the hand naturally goes to the part where the pain is felt, in order to afford relief.

RODERICK.—No, the Duke of York would not inherit the title of Prince of Wales, in the event of H.R.H. dying before his mother, the Queen. Only an eldest son is entitled to be a Prince of Wales, and he is made so by Royal patent. Should Queen Victoria survive her son, Albert Edward, Prince of Wales, the title would most probably fall into abeyance.

S. L. D.—The tolling of church bells on the occasion of a burial, is based on the old Pagan custom of banging gongs when a body was to be interred in order to scare away the bad spirits that were supposed to haunt the dead man in order to secure him for the lower regions.

F. M. D.—I am indeed sorry to hear that you are such a martyr to asthma. Have you seen those new patent pocket inhalers?—a most useful little article for anyone who suffers from difficulty in breathing to carry about with them, especially during the foggy weather we have had so much of this season. I believe they are obtainable from Mr. Booth, of 11c Farringdon Avenue, E.C., for the sum of five shillings.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

A CHANCE OF A LIFETIME.

GIGANTIC CLEARANCE SALE.

£50,000 worth of Goods Offered at Half Price.

THE ENORMOUS STOCK OF CARPETS, CURTAINS, SHEETS, BLANKETS, QUILTS, &C., MUST BE CLEARED WITHOUT REGARD TO COST, OWING TO THE L.C.C. REQUIRING PRESENT PREMISES FOR STREET IMPROVEMENTS.

New Premises having to be acquired by us, this Sale is held in order to Clear Out Heavy Stocks previous to the removal. NEW GOODS have to be sacrificed, together with all Regular Stocks, as it would be almost impossible to remove the Valuable and Heavy Stocks to New Premises without great risk and loss by damage to the Goods in transit, and this renders AN ABSOLUTE CLEARANCE IMPERATIVE. The magnificent opportunity is therefore afforded the readers of Short Stories of buying the NEW SEASON'S GOODS that are just coming in fresh from the looms at prices lower than the cost of production; and in many cases the Goods are being offered at less than HALF PRICE.

This Offer Will Not be Repeated.

ALL GOODS WARRANTED ABSOLUTELY PERFECT IN EVERY WAY. Money Willingly Returned if not Approved.

The BRITISH CARPET WEAVING CO. strongly advise intending purchasers to send on orders at once to prevent disappointment. Orders by post must be accompanied with cuttings from this advertisement for lots required, and will receive the same attention as customers attending our warehouses, and will be executed strictly in rotation on the same day as received.

Lot 1.—4s. Lace Curtains for 1s. 11d. These beautiful Lace Curtains, containing about 6 yards in the pair, 48in. wide, shaded ground, taped edges, with handsome double borders. Undoubtedly the cheapest ever offered. Special Offer: 3 pairs for 5s. 6d. Satisfaction guaranteed. — 4s. Lace Curtains for 1s. 11d.

7s. Lace Curtains for 3s. 11d. — Lot 2.—7s. Lace Curtains for 3s. 11d. per pair, measuring 3½yd. long, by 52in. wide, shaded ground, taped edges and handsome double borders; wash easily. 3 pairs for 11s. 3d. Money returned if not approved.

Lot 3.—Specially handsome Drawing-room Design, entirely new and most successful. In white or cream, with scolloped and taped edges, made from thoroughly sound cotton yarns; warranted to wear well. Sale price, 5s. 11d. per pair. Each curtain measures 3½yd. long by 60in. wide. Special Offer: 3 pairs for 17s. Money returned if not approved. — 10s. 6d. Lace Curtains for 5s 11d.

Lot 7.—10,000 Special Extra Quality, Heavy Loom Kitchen Table Cloths, made from the heaviest and strongest Linen Yarns. Numerous artistic patterns. Specially recommended for hard wear. Warranted to give the best possible satisfaction, being very neat, inexpensive, and durable.
Size 54in. by 45in., price 1s. 2d. each, or 3 for 3s. 3d.
Size 56in. by 56in., price 1s. 5d. each, or 3 for 4s. 0d.
Size 62in. by 62in., price 1s. 11d. each, or 3 for 5s. 3d.
Size 68in. by 62in., price 2s. 2d. each, or 3 for 5s. 11d.

Lot 22.—10s. 6d. White Scotch Blankets for 5s. 9d. per pair, measuring about 56in. by 76in.; light, warm, and durable. Admittedly the cheapest blankets ever offered. Special Offer: 3 pairs for 15s. 6d. Satisfaction guaranteed or money returned. — 10s. 6d. White Scotch Blankets for 5s. 6d.

25s. Special Heavy Blankets for 14s. 9d. — Lot 23.—25s. Special Heavy Witney Yorkshire Blankets for 14s. 9d., measuring 75in. by 96in. Manufactured entirely of pure long staple wool, bleached by the sun and beautifully white. Give endless wear, and are easily washed. For perfection of finish, durability, and economy, they are unequalled. Special Offer: 3 pairs for 42s. Money returned if not approved.

WITNEY BLANKETS.

EXCEPTIONAL VALUE.

Lot. 24.—800 pairs of best quality Witney Blankets, with fancy borders, very soft, warm, of great durability. Made from the best wool, and warranted to give every satisfaction. Prices given below are little more than half the original cost.

Size	Weight.	Price per Pair.	3 Pairs for
53in. by 70in.	4lb.	6s. 3d.	18s.
60in. by 80in.	6lb.	7s. 9d.	22s.
70in. by 90in.	8lb.	11s. 6d.	33s.
75in. by 96in.	9lb.	13s. 0s.	37s.
80in. by 99in.	10lb.	15s. 3d.	43s.
86in. by 104in.	11lb.	16s. 9d.	48s.

Lot 20.—9s. Bleached Twill Sheets for 4s. 11d., measuring 64in. by 81in. Made from the best cotton yarns, thoroughly shrunk, soft finish, and hemmed ready for use. Special Offer: 3 pairs for 14s. 3d. Satisfaction guaranteed. — 9s. Twilled Sheets for 4s. 11d.

15s. 6d. Sheets for 7s. 11d. — Lot 21.—15s. 6d. Bleached Twill Sheets for 7s. 11d., measuring 90in. by 100in. Made from the best cotton yarns, thoroughly shrunk, soft, finish, and hemmed ready for use. Special Offer: 3 pairs for 22s. Money returned if not approved.

Lot 39.—1,500 yards of Best Quality Kidderminster Carpeting, 36 inches wide, at 1s. 11d. per yard; usual price 3s. 6d. per yard. Can be supplied in numerous handsome and effective designs and rich colourings to harmonise with all requirements. Impossible to repeat this offer. Money returned if not approved. — 3s. 6d. Best Quality Kidderminster Carpeting for 1s. 11d.

3s. Best Brussels Stair Carpet for 1s. 9d. — Lot 48.—3s. Brussels Carpeting for 1s. 9d. per yard, 22 inches wide. Handsomely bordered, superior quality, light and dark shades, magnificent design and colourings. Satisfaction guaranteed or money returned.

10,000 RUGS

GIVEN AWAY.

GUARANTEED GENUINE BARGAINS.

Lot 50.—THIS PHENOMENAL OFFER is made to the readers of Short Stories only. On receipt of Postal Order for 6s., or 74 stamps, we will forward DIRECT FROM OUR LOOMS to your address, one of our 10/6 genuine SEAMLESS, WOVEN, REVERSIBLE CARPETS, suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bedroom, etc., handsomely bordered and woven in 20 different patterns and art colourings to suit all requirements, and large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room. These Carpets will be sold as an advertisement for the goods of the British Carpet Weaving Company BELOW THE ACTUAL COST OF PRODUCTION. They are made of material equal to wool, and, being a speciality of our own, can only be obtained Direct from our Looms, thus saving the Purchasers all Middle Profits. Over 200,000 sold during the past twelve months.

GIVEN AWAY.—With every Carpet we shall ABSOLUTELY GIVE AWAY a very handsome RUG to match: or we will send TWO CARPETS and TWO RUGS for 10/6.

Money Willingly returned if not Approved.

THOUSANDS of REPEAT ORDERS & UNSOLICITED TESTIMONIALS RECEIVED.

50 Berkeley Square.
The Countess of Selkirk would thank the British Carpet Co. to send her another Carpet, similar to the one she got from them a fortnight ago, which is most satisfactory.

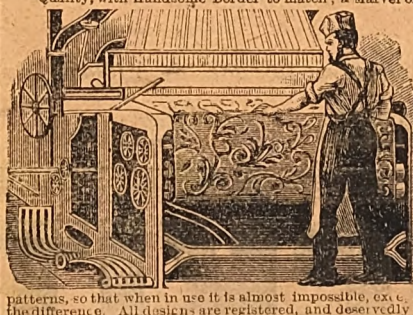
1 Tyne View Villas, St. Helens, I. of W.
Lady Ida Lowe begs to inform the British Carpet Co. that she is so much pleased with the two Carpets and Two Rugs they sent her a week ago that she begs them to send her, to the above address, two more similar Carpets and Rugs.

SPECIAL NOTE! This offer is made to the readers of this paper, owing to premises being required by the London County Council for Street Improvements. All Goods must be Cleared, Regardless of Cost.

BRUSSELETTE CARPETS

ADMITTEDLY THE CHEAPEST IN THE WORLD.

Seamless, Woven, and Reversible, Rich Turkey Patterns and Colourings, Superior Quality, with Handsome Border to match; a Marvel of Excellence and Beauty.



Lot 60.

No.	SIZES and PRICES. ft. in.	ft. in.	Sale Price.	Former Price.
1	9 0 by	6 0	5/6	9/0
2	9 0 by	7 6	7/0	11/9
3	9 0 by	9 0	8/6	13/6
4	10 6 by	7 6	8/9	13/9
5	10 6 by	9 0	10/0	15 6
6	12 0 by	9 0	11/6	18/0
7	12 0 by	10 6	13/6	20/6
8	13 6 by	10 6	15/3	24/0
9	12 0 by	12 0	15/3	24/0
10	13 6 by	12 0	17/0	27/0
11	15 0 by	12 0	19/0	32/0
12	18 0 by	12 0	22/0	36/0

These Carpets are splendid imitations of real Brussels Carpets, the designs having been carefully copied from the originals, both as regards colourings and patterns, so that when in use it is almost impossible, except by close scrutiny, to detect the difference. All designs are registered, and deservedly considered works of art. We can confidently recommend them for use in the dining and drawing rooms, or any rooms and landings where hard wear is a necessity.

GIVEN AWAY.

As an advertisement for the introduction of these goods to all readers of Short Stories we have decided to give away to every purchaser a very handsomely-woven Hearthrug, 6 feet long and 3 feet wide, to match carpets in colours, etc.

THOUSANDS of REPEAT ORDERS & UNSOLICITED TESTIMONIALS RECEIVED.

DEAR SIR,—
9 Bedford Row, High Wycombe, Bucks.
I have seen some of the Carpets and rugs sent by your firm, and think they are really a marvel. Please forward goods as follows, etc.—Yours faithfully, Rev. F. H. MAY.

"SHORT STORIES" COUPON.
On receipt of this Coupon and P.O.O. for amount we guarantee to send any goods as above.
THE BRITISH CARPET WEAVING CO.

SATISFACTION GUARANTEED OR MONEY WILLINGLY REFUNDED.

All Orders despatched same day as received. Cheques and Postal Orders should be made payable to J. HARGREAVES, and crossed UNION BANK. ADDRESS:

THE BRITISH CARPET WEAVING COMPANY, Sale Dept., 31 OLD STREET, LONDON, E.C.

HAVE YOU TRIED THE NEW BREAKFAST FOOD?

"TRITICINE"

Is not only one of the most Delicate and Delicious Dishes, but is especially recommended for persons of weak digestion.
Send two stamps, to pay postage for sample, to TRITICINE MILLS, CASTLEFORD, YORKS.
WHOLESALE AGENTS IN LONDON: Messrs. BURGOYNE, BURBIDGES & CO., 19 and 16 Coleman Street, London, E.C.

LYLE'S GOLDEN SYRUP

In 1lb., 2½ 4lb. tins of all Retailers.

LONGEST ESTABLISHED, PUREST & BEST.

LYLE'S GOLDEN SYRUP. TOFFEE.

ENTIRELY NEW PROCESS.

WILLIAMS'

Established 1875.

INVALID'S TEA

Invalids, as well as those in health may enjoy drinking this tea without the least fear of the injurious effects which so frequently result from using other teas.

Invaluable to persons of weak digestion.

Price 2s. per lb.; 20lb. 2d. per lb. less.

3lb. and upwards sent Carriage Paid. Terms Cash.

Bankers: London & Midland Bank Limited. (Mention Paper.)

J. WILLIAMS, TEA MERCHANT, WAIN HOUSE, TONYPANDY.

RECKITT'S BLUE.

ASK FOR IT AND SEE THAT YOU GET IT.

Digitized by Google

GRAND WAR STORY BEGINS TO-DAY.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY G. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 475. FOR WEEK ENDING FEBRUARY 5TH, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

DR TIBBLES' Vi-Cocoa

THE WONDERFUL FOOD BEVERAGE.

A Food Beverage such as Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, with its unique powers of nutriment and exceptional vitalising properties, is a means whereby strength and nervous energy is gained as a rational outcome of increased vitality.

It has the refreshing properties of fine tea, the nourishment of the best cocoas, and a tonic and recuperative force possessed by neither, and can be used in all cases where tea and coffee are prohibited.

Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, 6d., 9d., and 1s 6d. can be obtained from grocers, chemists, and stores, or from Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa Limited, 60, 61, and 62, Bunhill Row, London, E.C.

DAINTY SAMPLE FREE.

But mention SHORT STORIES.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"Its food value is double that of Bread made from ordinary wheaten flour."—Lancet.

HOVIS BREAD

will not only help to improve your digestion and consequently your health, but will also bring back that energetic and happy feeling of good health. Man does not live a natural life, so a good portion of a natural food, in the shape of HOVIS, at each meal will largely counteract the bad influence that modern life has upon the health and digestive organs. This is not an idle remark, but a proved statement, daily being verified.

HOVIS is baked and sold by all good class Bakers. No loaf genuine unless stamped HOVIS. 6d. and 1/- samples of Bread and Biscuits sent on receipt of stamps by

S. FITTON & SON, Millers, Macclesfield.

MAKE FRUIT WINES AT HOME.
Ask for MASON'S.

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. THE VERY BEST.

MASON'S GINGER WINE ESSENCE.
A Sixpenny Bottle will, in six minutes, make sixty glasses of Delicious, Non-Alcoholic Wine.
Agents Wanted.
NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.
MASON'S (NOTTINGHAM) COFFEE ESSENCE (THE BEST MADE)

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

MASON'S WINE ESSENCES
are made in all Fruit Flavours, Ginger, Lemon, Orange, Blackberry, etc.
YOU WON'T BE DISAPPOINTED.

The Best Hair Dye

in the World for Lashes, Eyebrows, and Hair on the Head, with Moustache and Beard. For Ladies Hair and for all Colours. Had at 3s. 6d., post 3s. 9d., of ALEX. ROSS, 62 Theobald's Road High Holborn, London, W.C. Spanish Cantharides for fallen hair, 3s. 6d. 5s. 6d. & 10s. 6d.

A sum of from 10/- to 20/- per week offered for spare time to either sex everywhere. Work can be done evenings. Send addressed envelope to Box 60, Eclipse Works, 89, Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.

Palatable Substitute for Cod Liver Oil.
DEVONSHIRE CREAM.
(REALLY GENUINE.)
In Patent Air-tight Tins, ½lb., 10d.; 1lb., 1s. 4d.; 1½lb., 2s. 4d.; including tin and postage.
MRS. CONYERS MORCHARD BISHOP DEVON.

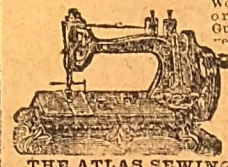
SULPHOLINE LOTION.

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.
SHILLING BOTTLES.

NOSE MACHINE.

This is a contrivance by which the short cartilage of the nose is pressed into shape by wearing the instrument an hour daily for a short time. Price 10/6, sent free for stamps. ALEX. ROSS, 62, Theobald's Road, London, opposite Bedford Row. Est. 1850. Parcel free from observation.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE



Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.
39/-
THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE Co., 183B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W. 63, Green Lister Road, 114 High Rd., Kilburn

£20

Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.

Tobacconists Commencing. See Illd. Guide (250 pages) 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000. No accountants. Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers.

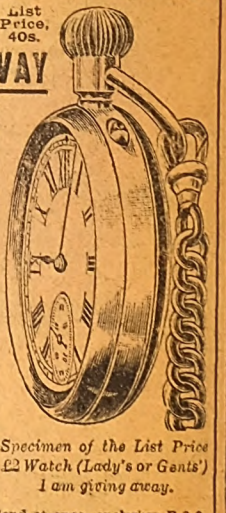
EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

A SOLID SILVER WATCH GIVEN AWAY

List Price, 40s.



to every person who carries out the conditions mentioned in our Catalogue of further wonderful bargains, for which you must send. In sending for it enclose 1/6 (no prize price) for one of our handsome Rich Star Diamond 18-ct. Gold-cased Half Hoop Rings equal in appearance to one costing £5 5s. At same time state whether you require Lady's or Gents' Watch. This is NO SWINDLE, and I am not an AMATEUR Watchmaker, but an experienced Watch Manufacturer and Diamond Merchant. Send at once. You will be delighted. If not, money will be returned. The Watch is warranted for 5 years, and is sent post free on your complying with our conditions. Send at once, enclosing P.O.O. 1/6 for ring and offer of watch. Send string size of finger. Address:

Specimen of the List Price £2 Watch (Lady's or Gents') I am giving away.

W. W. WADE,
Dept. 6, Gold Exchange, Hammersmith, LONDON W.

DR. MACKENZIE'S ARSENICAL SOAP.

Deliciously and expensively perfumed, the most luxurious Soap in the World. Produces a most lovely complexion, eradicates spots, pimples, and all imperfections, makes the skin exquisitely clear, and produces the healthy bloom so much desired. It is absolutely harmless, and each tablet is accompanied by a medical certificate.

6d. & 1s. PER TABLET.

It is Soap prevents the growth of superfluous hairs, removes wrinkles, lessens the skin. You can get it at all the Stores and first-class Chemists. The Family Doctor says it is the most economical beautifier known to Modern Dermatology. It clears away all pimples, spots, redness, or roughness, and makes the skin smooth and clear as a baby's. Use it in the bath and for all Toilet purposes; it is most delicious. For irritable or sensitive skins it is matchless and delightfully soothing.

MADAME PATTI sends her best thanks for Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap, which she finds most excellent.—Craig-y-nos Castle, South Wales.

Use also Dr. MACKENZIE'S "ARSICAL" Face Lotion. Beware of many Imitations. Have Dr. MACKENZIE'S or none.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 475.] For the Week ending February 5th, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

A New Serial Story] [Starts to-day.

THE EMPRESS OF THE EARTH

The Tale of the Yellow War.

BY M. P. SHIEL.

Author of "The Man-Stealers," "Prince Zaleski," "Shapes in the Fire," "The Rajah's Sapphire," etc.

CHAPTER I.

THE NATIONS AND A MAN.

As all the world knows, the Children's Ball of the Lady Mayoress takes place yearly on the night of "Twelfth Day," January 6th, at the Mansion House. In the year '98 the function was even more successful than usual, owing to Sir Henry Burdett's fine idea that the children in their fancy dresses should be photographed in support of the Prince of Wales' Hospital Fund. The little Walter Raleighs, the tiny Amy Robsarts, and the white-robed angels in miniature, flocked in gaudy throngs to the specially-fitted-up photographer's studio adjoining the grand salon of the Mansion House; while all that wide space outside between the Mansion House, the Bank, and the Stock Exchange was a mere mass of waiting, arriving, and departing vehicles.

If anything tended to take a little of their exuberance from this and other New Year jubilations (so far as the older heads were concerned, at least), it was a certain cloudiness in the political sky; nothing very definite, nothing terrifying; yet something so real, that nearly everyone felt it with disquiet. An Irish member, celebrated for his "bulls," was heard to say: "Take my word for it, there's going to be a sun-set in the East." Men strolled into their clubs, and said, with or without a yawn: "Is there going to be a row, then?" Someone might answer: "Not a bit of it; it'll pass off presently, you'll see." But another would be sure to add: "Things are looking black enough, all the same."

It was just as when, on a clear day at sea, low and jagged edges of disconnected clouds appear inkily on the horizon-edge, and no one is quite certain whether or not they will meet, and whelm the sky, and sink the ship.

But the horizon had hardly darkened, when again it cleared. The principal cause of fear had been what had looked uncommonly like a conspiracy of the three great Continental Powers to act in concert in ousting England from her predominance in the East. First there was the seizure of Kiao-chau, and the bombastic farewells of the two German Royal brothers; then immediately the aggressive attitude of Russia at Port Arthur, and her demand that a Russian should take the place of Mr. MacLeavy Brown as Controller of the Corean Finances; then immediately the startling rumour that France had seized Hainan, was sending an expedition to exploit Yun-nan, and had two ships of the line in Hoi-How harbour.

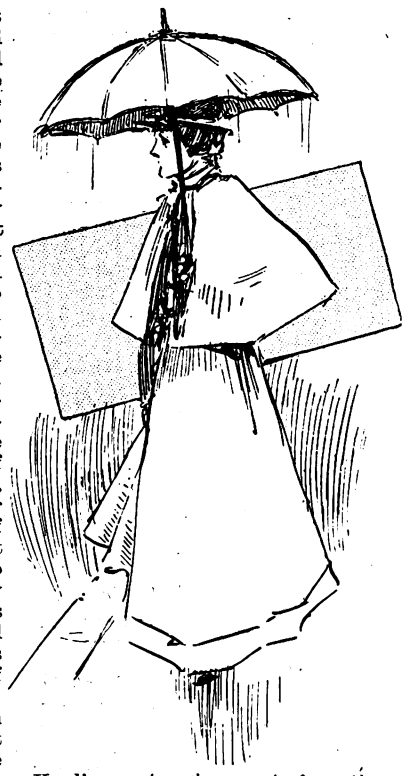
All this had decidedly the look of concert between the Powers concerned; for within the last few years it had got to be more and more clearly recognised by the British public that centuries of neighbourhood on the Continent had fostered among the Continental nations a certain spirit of kinship, in which the Island-Kingdom was no sharer.

In the course of years the Straits of Dover had widened into an ocean. Europe had receded from Britain, and Britain, in her pride, had drawn back from Europe. From the curl of the moustache, to the colour and cut of the evening-dress, to the manner in which women held up their skirts, there was similarity between French and German, between German and Russian and Austrian, and dissimilarity between all these and English.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

It is true that the Russian hated the German, and the German the Russian and the French; but their hatred was the hatred of brothers of the same family, always ready to combine against the outsider in case of need. All this had begun to be suspected, then definitely recognised, by the British nation. Alone and friendless must England tread the wine-press of modern history, solitary in her majesty; and if ever an attempt were made to stop her stately progress, she was prepared to find that her foe was the rest of Europe.



Her lips went up in a pout of vexation.

But very soon after the unrest caused by the activities of the three nations in China had arisen, it began to subside. France denied the annexation of Hainan; the semi-official Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung, inspired by Wilhelm, painted Germany as the patron of peaceful commerce, with an amiable weakness for theatrical displays; Russia was defeated in the matter of the removal of Mr. MacLeavy Brown, and seemed sufficiently limp after it; while the spirits of everyone were raised by the probable guarantee of a Chinese loan of sixteen millions by the British Government—a step certain to secure the unchallenged predominance of England in the commerce and politics of China.

But, meanwhile, at the children's fancy ball at the Mansion House on the night of the 6th of January, events were working in a quite different direction to that of peaceful settlement.

Ada Seward was the presiding deity in the nursery of Mrs. Pattison, of Fulham. On the night of the 6th, Dr. and Mrs. Pattison had to be present at a ball in the West-end, and Ada on that night was busy; for it was necessary for her, first of all to convey Master Johnnie Pattison, costumed as Francis I., to the Mansion House; and then to hurry homeward again to take Miss Nellie Pattison to a children's evening with charades in South Kensington.

The fact that it was wet when she reached the Mansion House may have had something to do with her after troubles. The landing-place was occupied by some other carriages, and dismounting with her charge, with an umbrella over him, she cried to the coachman in a hurried and indistinct manner through the drizzle:

"Wait till I come back."

The man afterwards declared that he understood her to say:

"Go away, and come back."

At any rate, when Ada again came forth into the crush of the carriages to look for the Pattison brougham, it was nowhere to be found.

And now her lips went up in a pout of vexation. "What on earth is anyone to do now?" she said. She was pressed for time, and yet at a loss.

The throng of private carriages seemed to have banished all cabs from the region of the Mansion House. She looked, and saw none; then she looked into her pocket, and found only sixpence. These two circumstances decided her against the cab. Instead, she ran a few yards, dodging among the carriages, and at the entrance to Poultry, skipped into a moving 'bus.

She sat in a corner for about five minutes, with agonised glances out of the door at the slowly receding clocks. Then someone—a man sitting nearly opposite, whom she had not noticed—addressed her:

"Why, Miss Ada, is that you?"

"Oh!" she cried, "Mr. Brabant, is that you? It's a long time since—how are you?"

"Well, I'm pretty fair, Miss Ada, as times go, you know. Hope you are the same."

"Still in the army?"

"Oh, yes—the 23rd, as ever. B Company, you know. You living in London now?"

"Yes—at Fulham."

Here conversation flagged; and in that minute's interval, Brabant, with a sudden half-turn to his left, said:

"Just allow me to introduce you to my friend here—Miss Seward—Dr. Yen How."

In the light of the 'bus lamp Ada Seward saw a very small man, dressed in European clothes, yet a man whom she at once took to be Chinese. With a wrinkled grin, he put out his hand and shook hers.

He was a man of remarkable visage. When his hat was off one saw that he was nearly bald, and that his expanse of brow was simply majestic. There was something brooding, meditative, in the meaning of his long and narrow eyes, and there was a brown, and dark, and specially dirty shade in the yellow tan of his skin.

He was not really a Chinaman—or rather, he was that, and more. He was the son of a Japanese father by a Chinese woman. He combined these antagonistic races in one man. In Dr. Yen How was the East.

He was of noble feudal descent, and at Tokio, but for his Chinese blood, would have been styled Count. Not that the admixture of blood was very visible in his appearance; in China he passed for a Chinese, and in Japan for a Jap.

If ever man was cosmopolitan, that man was Dr. Yen How. No European could be more familiar with the minutiæ of Western civilisation. His degree of doctor he had obtained at the University of Heidelberg; for years he had practised as a specialist in the diseases of women and children at San Francisco.

He possessed an income of a thousand tael (about £300) from a tea-farm; but his life had been passed in the practice of the grinding industry of a slave. Nothing equalled his assiduity, his minuteness, his attention to detail. He had once written to the Royal Observatory at the Cape pointing out a trifling error in a long logarithmic calculation of the declension of one of the moons of Jupiter, originating from the observatory.

In the East he could have climbed at once, almost without effort, to the very top of the tree—even in the West he might have done it, had he chosen. But he chose to lie low, remaining unnoticed, studying, observing, making of himself an epitome of the West, as he was an embodiment of the East.

In whatever country he happened to be—and he was never for very many years in any one—he was most often to be found in the company of people of the lower classes, and of these he had a very intimate knowledge. So great was his mental breadth, that he was unable to sympathise in the least with either Eastern or Western distinctions of class and rank. He often struck up chance friendships with soldiers and sailors about the capitals of Europe; and these patronised and exhibited him here and there.

Digitized by Google

Yen How knew that he was being patronised, and submitted to it—and smiled meekly.

He had two great defects—his shortness of sight, which caused him to wear rather big-lensed spectacles; and his inability, in speaking without effort, to pronounce the word "little." He still called it "lillee."

On the date of January 6th, when he drove westward in the 'bus with Brabant and Ada Seward, he was perhaps forty years of age, but he might have been anything, to judge from his appearance, between sixteen and sixty; a hard, omniscient, cosmopolitan little bundle of a man, tough as oak, dry as chips.

Yet in that head were leavening some big thoughts, and his heart was capable of tremendous passions.

In reality, could one have known it, as he fared onward through the fog and drizzle in the trundling and homely 'bus, smiling behind his big spectacles, he was the most important personage in London, or perhaps in the world.

Dr. Yen How was capable of anything. In him was the stoic, and the cynic, and the tiger; with a turn of the mind he could become a savant, or a statesman, or a crossing-sweeper, or a general. He possessed this excellence: a clear brain.

By one of those extraordinary freaks of nature for which there is no accounting, this strange man wanted to see Ada Seward a second time after parting with her that night. Brabant, who had known her formerly in her native town of Cheltenham, accompanied her to the gate of the Pattison villa, Yen How with them.

As he was leaving her, the little doctor put his mouth close to her ear, and whispered hurriedly:

"I will wait here to-morrow night at eight for one lillee kiss."

The girl was astounded.

"Well, the idea!" she just gasped.

Before she could definitely proclaim her indignation, the two men had turned off.

Till he reached his home in Portland Street that night, Yen How was engaged in one long, continuous, secret smile—a smile at his own expense. This outburst of his in the rôle of lover was new to him, absolutely. His whole relations with women hitherto had consisted in the business of curing their sicknesses. By what subtle physiological or psychological affinity this one particular English girl had been able to evoke from this particular dry Chino-Japanese a request for "one lillee kiss," he was utterly unable to divine. Such an affinity there undoubtedly was, but its origin lay among reasons far too abstruse for the unravelling of Yen, or of anyone else in fact.

Yen How smiled that first night, but he presently found that this was no smiling matter.

At eight the next evening he was duly at the Pattison gate, but, alas, no Ada was to be seen. Ada, however, was there, though invisible. She, with the Pattison cook, whom she had brought out to enjoy the fun, was hiding behind a shrubbery, and, peering through, shaking with laughter at the futile waiting of the little doctor.

And now Yen How, for the first time in his life, began to suffer on account of a woman.

He loved; and in his love was the concentrated passion of a thousand other men. Melted rock is lava—and he suffered.

He used to hang about the house for hours, day after day, waiting. To his patience there was no end—to his resolution to possess her, by fair means or foul, no end. That one face, by day, by night, was "always before his eyes"—so the old knights used to say when they loved princesses far above them. But Yen How's love was a British nursemaid, and his torment was very much more real and intense than that of any of the verse-writing troubadours.

Even in the matter of love the Eastern is essentially different from the Western. It is impossible for us, in anything, to understand them fully, so utterly foreign are they. With us love is frequent, and is merely a powerful mood; with them, when it rarely happens to seize them, the whole nature of the man is involved, and love becomes a passion having all the characteristics of ordinary flame.

One day, as he lurked about, he met her in the street returning from some shopping. By this time Yen How had become a standing joke for Ada in the kitchen and the servants'-bedroom. He walked up to her.

"Ah," he said with sideward head, and a cajoling smile, "you are here, then? You will give poor Yen How one lillee kiss?"

The whole idea of courtship possessed by this clownish and unpractised lover consisted in asking for one little kiss. Ada Seward's views of the matter were more elaborate. She despised his strong simplicity.

He was duly at the Pattison gate.

"Perhaps you are not aware who it is you are talking to," she said with dignity.

Yen was aware; he could have shut his eyes and drawn an exact picture of her face.

"Ah!" he said; "not even one lillee——"

"I'll give you one lillee box of soap to wash your face, if you like!" she cried, running and looking back. The house was near; he could not overtake her.

Perhaps it would have been impossible for Miss Seward to utter any set of words more calculated to drive Yen to madness than this heartless reference to "soap." If his suit was hopeless, it was now borne in upon him that it was hopeless on account of his race. The girl did not listen to him, and then reject him; she rejected him without taking him into consideration at all. It was as though a mule, or a cat, had asked her to be his.

But his persistence did not fail. He flung all his other pursuits to the wind, and the Pattison villa became for him the centre of the world. Sometimes he caught heavenly glimpses of her. Once again he met her in the street, and once again she overwhelmed him with jeers. So passed January, February, and March.

Digitized by Google

At the beginning of April he stood one night outside the Pattison gate, waiting as usual, when he saw her. It was after eleven o'clock; she was coming home from the theatre, leaning on the arm of Private Brabant. Brabant, since their meeting in the 'bus, had several times been "out" with her.

As the two approached the gate, Ada saw the little doctor.

"There's that little Chinaman again, John," she said, pressing Brabant's arm. "It's getting too much of a good thing now, isn't it?"

"Confound the little rat," said Brabant, "he wants his nut cracked, I should think, doesn't he?"

The doctor tripped up to them, smiling nervously. Before he could speak Brabant, who had had a glass, said:

"Come, come, Mr. Yen How, get out of this. Can't you see the young lady doesn't want you fooling round her?"

"Well—but—my soldier-friend," said Yen, "there is no harm done——"

"Come, get out of it!" said Brabant more roughly.

"No, no, you go too fast, you see," began Yen apologetically.

"Are you going—yes or no?" said Brabant, now flushing angrily.

"Go away, why don't you?" put in Ada.

"Ah! I—I am here to see my lillee girl," hazarded Yen.

"Oh, don't be a stupid little goose of a Chinaman! Just fancy!" she said.

This was the most unkindest cut of all for poor Yen How. He winced, touched with anger.

"Are you going or not?" said Brabant, with an ultimatum in his tone.

"No!" said Yen; then, more decidedly, "no, no!"

Brabant put out his arm and pushed him on the shoulder.

It was not a violent push, but in an instant the doctor's face was almost black with rage. He had in his hand a stout bamboo stick, which he at once lifted and slashed with terrible force across the soldier's cheek, leaving a bruised weal which Brabant bore visibly with him to the grave.

In retaliation the soldier lifted his large and bony fist, and sent it with crushing vehemence into the doctor's face. Yen How dropped, bleeding.

The street was deserted. Not knowing what to do, the girl and the soldier bent over him for about five minutes, when, to their surprise, Yen How raised himself slowly, placed his handkerchief against his red and dripping face, and slowly limped away without a single word.

Once he stopped deliberately as he moved off, turned, and looked at them; and in the moonlight they distinctly saw him twice shake his forefinger warningly in their direction.

Then he went on his way.

Between that night and the beginning of May he never once stepped outside the house in which he lived. He had resumed his close and far-reaching studies.

At the beginning of May he was on board the Peninsular, bound for the East.

By the end of July he was a member of the Japanese Parliament.

In November we find him a leading spirit in the Tsung-li-Yamen, or Chinese Foreign Office, and making frequent voyages between Tokio and Pekin.

CHAPTER II.

The Heathen Chinee.

Yen How was nothing if not heathen. He was that first of all.

His intellect was like dry ice; he not only had no religious belief, but he despised all religions—the faiths of the West, the superstitions of the East, he despised them all alike. He was full of light, but without a hint of warmth; and so lacked the religious sense.

It is not likely that ordinary ethical considerations would have much influence in checking the aims of such a man. He was like an avalanche, as cold, and as resistless.

What was Dr. Yen How's aim? Simply told, it was to possess Ada Seward, ultimately, and after all.

If the earth had opened and swallowed him, then he would have renounced his hope; but for no lesser reason. He went coolly and patiently to work to secure her.

But no man, surely, ever employed means so huge and complex to an end so small. A European, or perhaps any other man, having once conceived the means, would very quickly have forgotten the end in the tremendous interest of the means themselves. But in all that Yen did the face of Ada Seward was always consciously "before his eyes." The nature of this man was as simple as the elemental rock.

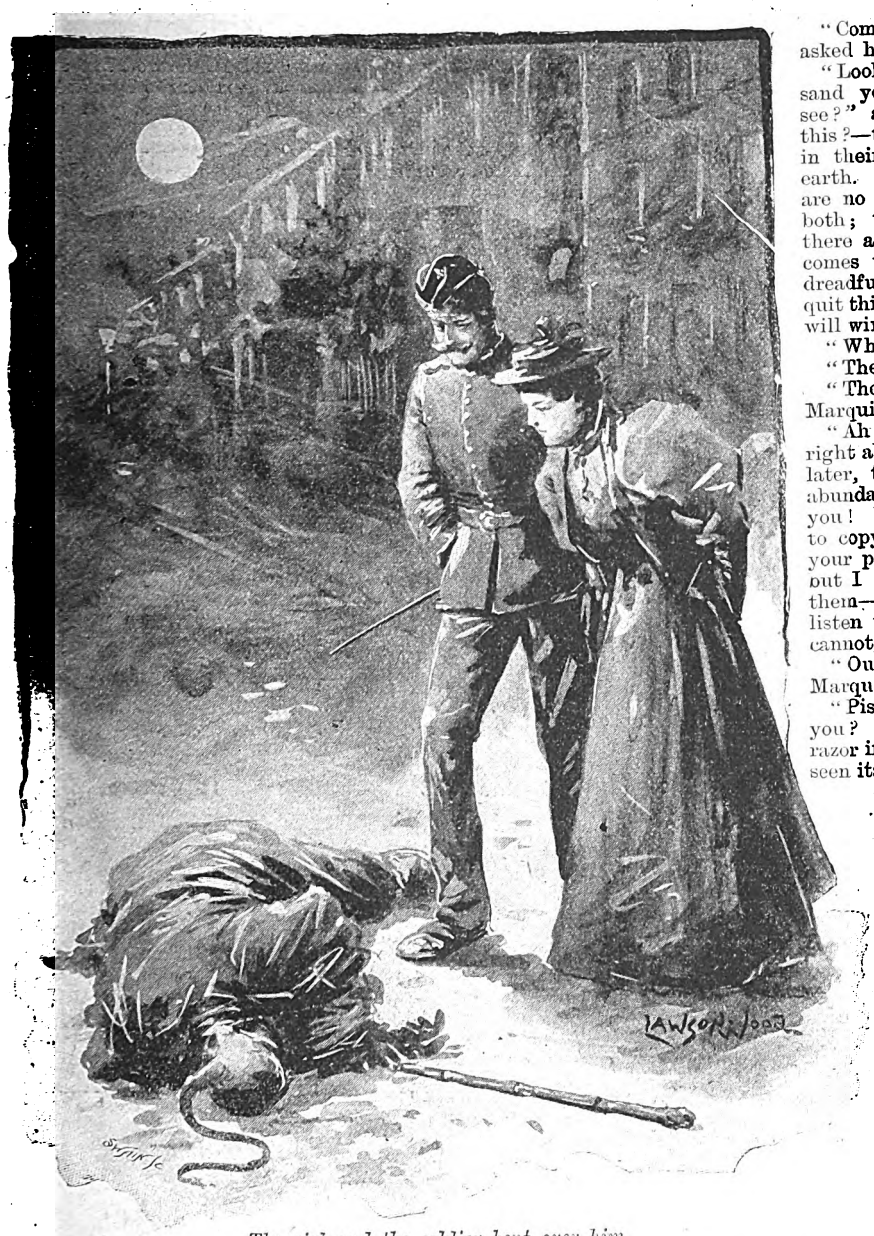
His career in the East, from the first hour of his return, was meteoric. He rose like a rocket. The order of the day in China, and especially in Japan, was Western modernity: and here was a man who simply breathed Western modernity, and who yet was an Eastern of the Easterns. His skin was more yellow than the yellow man's, and his brain was more white than the white man's. When Professor Jepp, the Inspector-General of Roads and Bridges at Tokio, asserted that the Imperial tax in Britain on railway passenger-traffic was, he believed, £3 per cent., Yen How's face wrinkled up into a very chaos of smiles. "No—two," he said quietly; and no one had the least doubt which was right. Yen introduced a new method of protecting bridges from collapse during the almost daily earthquakes of Japan, by means of articulated joists and sleepers. When Dr. Hirsch, the Naval Director at Pekin, introduced a specification for a new battle-ship to be mounted with two 111-ton guns, Yen proved by statistics (which he quoted from memory), that the tendency of the most modern ship-building was rather in the direction of quick-firing and machine-guns, than of heavy armaments. The 111-ton became 67-ton. He was soon invaluable.

About the beginning of the year a new Ministry had been formed in Tokio, and immediately afterwards dissolved; whereupon the Marquis Ito had undertaken to organise a Cabinet and assume the reins. At this time, the people of Japan were strongly excited against what they called the free-booting of Russia and Germany in China, and equally strongly animated in favour of the claims of England in that country. England was, in fact, the beau ideal, the object of imitation, the Great Pattern, of Japan. It required no great force of imagination for her to call herself "the Britain of the East"; this notion at once occurred, of itself, to everyone, and, of course, the copyist sympathised with her original rather than with others. With England predominant in China, moreover, there would be an assurance of free trade; and Japan was a trader. So strong was the enthusiasm in favour of England in consequence of these facts, that the nation was even willing to put its whole fleet at the disposal of its Big Model in case of need.

The ulterior purposes of Japan, of course, remained in doubt. She was even then building in various parts of the world an enormous additional fleet, which, when finished, would make her a sea power far in advance of any nation in the whole earth, with the exception of England herself. What in the hour of her manhood, when she had cast away her leading-strings, she would do with this vast force was a disturbing question to many; but, meanwhile, it was clearly her intention to use England as an ally—till the years ripened.

Under the Marquis Ito's Ministry Yen How was offered a post of Under-Secretary, but he refused it. He suggested that he should become secretary to the Minister as his private servant; and this was arranged. He knew that high public

Digitized by Google



The girl and the soldier bent over him.

rank in Japan would exclude him from high public rank in China, if ever his double personality should become known—and China, for the present, was the chief field of his labours. Meanwhile, he was drawing large revenues as a mandarin, and lived, for his own purposes, in a style nearly princely.

"Pooh!" he said to the Marquis Ito, sipping tea among rugs in his courtyard with the cosiness of the Geisha girl—"there are no statesmen now. Statesmen!—there are no such things. Not here—not in Europe. An ordinary man is a man who thinks in days; a statesman proper thinks in thousands of years. The outlook and computations of a statesman should be as much vaster than those of a private person, as a country is vaster than a tea-house. Believe me, there are no statesmen."

"Come, doctor, why do you say that?" asked his interlocutor.

"Look forward five hundred, a thousand years, Marquis, and what do you see?" answered Yen How. "Is it not this?—the white man and the yellow man in their death-grip, contending for the earth. The white and the yellow—there are no others. The black is the slave of both; the brown does not count. But there are those two; and when the day comes that they stand face to face in dreadful hate, saying, 'one or other must quit this earth,' shall I tell you which side will win?"

"Which do you think?"

"The white will win, Marquis."

"There I differ from you," said the Marquis Ito.

"Ah! you differ from me. But I am right all the same; and I mean, sooner or later, to prove it to you abundantly, abundantly! The white will win, I tell you! You great men in Japan are trying to copy them, to vie with them straining your poor necks to come up with them; but I have passed my life in studying them—and I've got something to tell you: listen to it: you cannot, Marquis, you cannot, you cannot!"

"Our Navy already——" began the Marquis.

"Pish! your Navy! Who built it for you? It was they. Your Navy is like a razor in the hands of an ape which has seen its master use it. The brute may or may not cut its own throat with it. And as soon as they build a navy for you, they will build one twice as big for themselves, and twice as good. There is no reason why you should not follow them, and go on following them—only understand that you cannot catch them! And this is another thing that you should understand—that the longer you follow them, the farther they get away from you. Their rate of progress is continually increasing. Every day that passes over the world gives them an additional advantage over you. To-day their guns can mow you down by hundreds; in a hundred years they will mow you down by thousands; in five hundred years by millions. Can't you see?—You are losing time!"

"Time? What do you mean?"

"Ah, I mean that there are no longer any statesmen, Marquis. The eye of the statesman ranges far, far into the tracts of the future, doesn't it? But we! Here are we now—we Japanese, we Chinese, we yellow men—playing about in little diplomatic mud-puddles with French, and Russian, and English, and German, as if all that mattered two sen! And all the time we keep sitting down idly, blind to the fact that French, and English, and the rest are equally our foe, and tyrant, and vulture, one not more than the other! That if we do not eat them all now, at once, they all will swallow us whole some day. And to see China fighting with Japan in such a case, and Japan banging into China—is it not childish enough to make a donkey, or even a Grand Lama, laugh? There are no statesmen any longer, Marquis."

"Well, come, I see something in what you are driving

Digitized by Google

at," said Ito. "We and China fighting were like two birds pecking at each other on a bough, when suddenly they are both down the belly of a serpent, which has been Yen How rose slowly to his feet.

calmly watching them. Well, but what are we to do? By your own showing, the birds can do nothing against the serpent."

"Did I say that?" asked Yen, lifting his eyebrows in a sly, innocent surprise. "Oh, I didn't mean it! There are many birds, you see, and few serpents. In the world to-day there are 408,000,000 Christians and—mark the figures!—1,004,000,000 non-Christians. I can see that you are startled."

"You think that by sheer force of numbers——"

"Yes, if we had taken our opportunity in time—if we had struck two hundred—a hundred years ago. Even to-day I believe that it is hardly too late, if the yellow race can find a great leader. I am perfectly sure that in a hundred years' time it will be too late."

"Why so?"

"I have told you. By that time the white man will have something like a magician's power over all nature. He will say to the mountains and the seas: 'Be removed!'—and at his mere whisper they will obey him. We yellow men, too, will have advanced, but they will have vastly outstripped us. We cannot follow them, I tell you. The day will come when our mere numbers will no longer be of any importance in baulking and overthrowing them."

"You talk of big things, my friend," said Ito. "Are you serious?"

"Yes, Marquis, I am serious."

"You advocate a League of the Yellow Races?"

"I do."

"Ha! ha! the idea tickles me; it is so very far from realisation—there are so many obstacles——"

"No, really—I think not. I believe it is very near to realisation. Events are at this moment in progress at Pekin which will force it to accomplishment—soon. Suppose I tell you that I, personally, have laid those events in train?"

"You, doctor? What, are you going to lead us all, then, against Paris and London? Ha! Ha!"

"Perhaps, Marquis."

"What, to face the Nordenfeldts, and the Maxims, and the Krupps? The Chinese will run from the first twelve-pounder!"

"There may not be any twelve-pounders there when they get to Paris and London," said Yen How, with absolute coolness, yet with an emphasis and an intonation of solemnity in his voice which held the Marquis from answering for quite a minute.

"Really, I don't understand you," he said at last.

"Yet my meaning should be clear."

"No—do explain yourself."

Yen How rose slowly to his feet before he answered.

"Marquis," he said, "is it possible you do not see that China has it in her power to turn Europe into an exhausted waste within, say, three months from to-night, without firing a single shot or spending a single tael?"

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

"Good-morning! It's very wet to-day."

"Yes, it generally is when one wants it to be fine."

"You have further to go than usual?" questioningly.

"Certainly—as it's wet."

"I'm sorry, but perhaps it will be fine presently," and raising his hat, as his companion marched off, the speaker turned in the opposite direction.

They resided in a building of flats—he in Flat G and she in F.

They always met at the entrance in the morning, when starting off for their day's work, and the preceding conversation on the weather usually took place, the tenor of it merely varying according to the kind of day it happened to be.

He was an "old young man," with the worn, grey face common to those who work hard, live alone, and view life's pleasures from afar off.

She was an "old young woman" whom hard experiences had embittered and hard work aged.

She was in the Civil Service, and went off to an office every morning, returning at five o'clock each evening. An old woman waited on her occasionally, but she lived quite alone. Sometimes she had a friend to see her, but not often, and she always looked tired.

The inhabitant of Flat G lived alone, and was always tired also, so he was able to feel for her.

He would like to have been friends with her, but she was very short in her manner and resolutely repulsed any overture on his part.

She had had an unfortunate experience with men and distrusted the whole sex. The idea of friendship between a man and woman was to her an absurd idea, if not an impossibility. She laughed scornfully when a friend alluded to such a compact and deplored the depravity of the present age, particularly the freedom of intercourse between the sexes.

Her neighbour guessed her feelings on the subject, and refrained from noticing her as much as he would like to have done.

Not that he admired her in any way, but there were times when he thought a woman's voice might have cheered him. Besides, they were both lonely and had to work hard and find for themselves, so that even though she was so brusque, they would have had enough in common to feed a passing friendship. He had neither mother, sister, nor relative to care what became of him, and he was too poor and proud to make friends, so he had to content himself by just saying "Good-morning" to this strong-minded lady-clerk and discussing the weather.

He thought about her that night after he had taken off his wet things, lighted his fire, and set his own frugal supper. He supposed she was sitting in the room across the landing, feeling just as tired and lonely as he.

It seemed a pity they could not have brightened an hour for each other. He was in that mood when any living creature's presence would have been better than the stillness and loneliness.

It was a mood he often experienced in the evenings, and somehow he did not get used to it.

As it happened, on that particular evening there was company in Flat F. Miss White had one of her fellow-clerks spending an hour or two with her, and the two were chatting over their supper.

"Nell Thurnall is going to be married next Thursday," remarked Miss Poole, the visitor.

"Poor thing," replied her companion; "only a few days more and she will have given up her freedom."

"Nonsense, Annie, you talk like a sour old maid."

"Naturally, since I am one."

"It is your own fault if you are, I expect. Why do you persist in scoffing at love and marriage? Nell

Digitized by Google

Thurnall will be much happier than drudging at the office every day."

"Possibly, but it's open to doubt. I don't blame her, I only pity her. She'll find out what men are now, and then it's just a chance if she won't wish for the old office days again."

"Men are not all bad."

"Aren't they? Well, I suppose there may be a few exceptions. Anyhow, they're all selfish."

Miss Poole knit her brows thoughtfully, but changed the subject; she had learnt to know that her friend was incorrigible in this one.

"Do you know your neighbour?" she asked. "He walked upstairs just before me this evening."

"I know him by sight. He always takes upon himself to say 'good-morning' to me, but what on earth for I don't know."

"There's no harm in his wishing you 'good-morning.'"

"No; only my replies are not as a rule appreciative."

"Don't you think it would be nice if you knew him? Perhaps he's dull sometimes, as well as you. I thought he had such a sad, careworn face. Does he live alone?"

"Yes, but he could invite a friend in if he wanted to."

"Does he ever?"

"I don't think so; I've never heard anyone come or go."

"Poor fellow! If I were in your place I should want to be kind to him."

"A lot of thanks you'd get for your trouble!"

"I don't know that I should want any. It might be sufficient to have brightened his life a little. I'm not specially religious, but I do believe in helping to bear one another's burdens when we can. You might have a Platonic friendship."

"Nonsense, the thing is an impossibility; the race is not educated up to it."

"And can't we even have sympathy between men and women?"

"There's too much of it. I've no doubt the good gentleman of Flat G has plenty of friends out, if not in."

"He has a nice face," continued her companion, unheeding her. "I couldn't help feeling sorry for him; he looked so worn and tired."

A month later, Miss Poole again visited the occupant of Flat F.

"Well, are you friends yet?" she asked, in the course of the evening.

"Friends with whom?"

"The gentleman across the landing."

"Indeed, no; what an absurd idea!"

"I hoped you would change your mind after our talk."

"Never likely; besides, I don't suppose he wishes it."

"On the contrary, I think he would be glad. When I went home the last time I was here, I met him again on the stairs, and he looked so miserable. I can't tell you how sorry I felt, he looked so hopeless. Why not try a little friendliness, it could not hurt and you could so easily tell if he preferred to be left alone."

"My dear girl, I'm not a child, and I know men. If he wants a friend he needn't look to me for one. It takes me all my time to keep myself going," and with a determined air she changed the subject.

Upstairs in Flat G the tenant crouched over his fire. He had been shivering all day and his head ached. He felt as if something hot would have set him right, but he had not sufficient energy to get it.

Besides, he felt that he shouldn't mind if he did fall ill and die. No one would miss him and there were many ready to step into his post. It would be hard to die alone, but it couldn't be helped, and perhaps it wouldn't really be any worse than living alone.

The next morning, when he opened his lips to give his usual salutation to his neighbour a violent fit of coughing came on.

She stopped a moment and a faint suspicion of compassion came over her face.

"You have taken cold," she said brusquely.

"Yes," he replied. "I'm afraid I have."

"You don't take care of yourself."

"Why should I? It isn't worth while," he answered, drearily.

His answer rather annoyed her, so she remarked coldly, "Perhaps not," and walked away.

When she had gone a few steps she repented her coldness, and wished she had been a little more sympathetic, for he really looked very ill.

"Still, it's no use now," she argued, "and, after all, it might be a little awkward when he was all right again."

But his face haunted her during the day in spite of her efforts to forget it, and his listless, hopeless eyes seemed to follow her about, asking for a few crumbs of sympathy. Then she grew angry with herself, and argued, "He should get a friend if he wants one. I have shown him that I don't intend to unbend," and she applied herself more assiduously to her office-work.

The next morning she walked downstairs with a set, determined face, but for the first time the tenant of Flat G did not go to his day's work, so her intended hauteur was not called into action.

The following day he was again absent, and her hardness evaporated a little.

During the day she relaxed still more, and decided to speak to him kindly the next morning. But he was absent again, and so she said, "If he does not come to-morrow, I will ask the caretaker about him."

The following day she ate her hurried breakfast with an anxious feeling, in spite of her determined efforts to persuade herself that she was unconcerned.

When she found him again absent, however, the anxious feelings conquered.

She turned aside and knocked at the caretaker's door.

"Is Mr. Hedley ill?" she asked.

"Yes, miss."

"Do you think there is anything he wants?"

"He never asks for anything."

"Has he had a doctor?"

"No, he won't. He gave me strict orders not to send for one."

Miss White glanced at the clock and saw she had not a moment to spare. She hastily slipped her hand in her pocket and drew out a two-shilling piece, which had somehow got loose there, and giving it to the woman, said, in her usual brusque manner, "See that he is well looked after," and vanished.

She set her lips hard as she hurried to the station, and her face was almost forbidding as she elbowed her way down the crowded platform into a third-class carriage.

At the office she was even shorter in speech than usual, and her fellow clerks looked at her and shrugged their shoulders. They thought it was a pity Annie White so completely spoilt herself by her disagreeable temper.

In the evening, she knocked again at the caretaker's door; but she was out, and her husband said she would not be back again for half-an-hour.

So she went upstairs and sat down to her solitary meal as usual. Her mouth was still hard set, but every now and then she found herself gazing vacantly into the fire, and her food went almost untasted.

Digitized by Google

After the third fit of vacancy she shook herself angrily and muttered. "What is it to me? If I were ill no one would bother. It's no use making a fuss. Life's desperately hard for some people and child's play for others. It doesn't seem fair; but that's the long and short of it, and worrying does not mend matters. It's no use making a fuss."

Half-an-hour later she was disturbed by a knock, and, in answer to her summons, the caretaker entered.

"I came to tell you, miss, as Mr. Hedley was asking about you this afternoon. He wondered if you'd be late. I think he'd like to see you. He seems very bad."

"Did he ask to see me?"

"No, but he seemed pleased when I told him you had asked after him, and wondered if you would be late."

"Has he all he wants?"

"Yes, I think so."

"Well, perhaps I'll go in presently," and she turned away rather curtly.

When the door closed she sat down and stared hard at the fire, and knit her forehead.

All day long she had experienced an impulse to go and see him, and all day long she had fought against it. She argued that when he was well again she could not easily return to the old conditions, and she was still resolutely opposed to the idea of commencing a friendship.

And all the time she knew that she had missed him; had missed his salutation, missed his familiar figure, and was longing to speak that unsaid word of kindness, which was waiting for him.

But she would not approach him first. It was against the principles of her life. He should take the initiative, and send for her if he wanted her. And she sat there hoping and hoping that he would call her to his bedside that she might smooth his pillow and care for him tenderly.

And he, the sufferer, lay in his little bachelor room, yearning for a word from the lips of the woman who had so studiously avoided him, yearning for the touch of her soft cool hand on his burning forehead. But he would not ask her to come. He feared that her susceptibilities would be shocked, and that her opinion of him would become poorer than even now he was afraid it was.

If only she gave him one thought! If only she missed him, even ever so little! But no; he knew she would never trouble her head about him, and a slight flush suffused his cheek as the pain of it gripped his heart.

Then he gasped, and lay perfectly still.

* * * * *

The next evening a white-faced woman crossed the landing, and in her hands were white flowers.

She stepped softly into the chamber of death, and, with set lips, stood beside the still, dead form.

And the little tired smile was still on the dead man's face, for it had not faded at all, and so he went out of the world, longing for that woman's touch which might have soothed the anguish and loneliness of his soul.

Annie White saw it all, and as she laid her flowers in his thin, wasted hands, her lips relaxed and hot tears coursed down her cheeks and fell like bright dew-drops on the delicate blossoms.

When she moved away at last, her head was bent and her steps dragged wearily.

In the outer room she glanced round quickly.

Then, with hands that would tremble in spite of her iron will, she took up an old pipe and a worn tobacco pouch.

"No one will miss these," she thought, and stole back to her solitary fireside.

Gertrude Page.

A GREAT SCHEME.

HOW TO GET ANY BOOK YOU WANT.

WE are constantly receiving complaints from readers that we do not devise competitions in which everybody can enter.

It is difficult to do this—to give everybody an equal chance of success.

However, we think we have hit upon something this time.

Every week we shall give away half-a-dozen books.

All a competitor has to do is to send us one Book Coupon cut from The Sunday Reader, one from the Athletic Record, and one from Short Stories.

Send these to us in one envelope together with a request for any single book in the whole world of literature.

From the applications we receive we shall each week pick out six and send the books asked for.

If you are not successful one week, keep on trying, you are bound to be successful some week.

All applications to be addressed to "BOOKS," Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please let me have: S. S.

Book .....

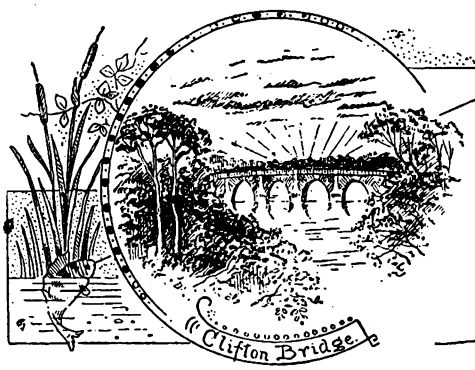
Price .....

Name .....

Address .....

.....

Digitized by Google



A CURIOUS COMBINATION.

"Yes, I think you have a very interesting collection of curious things picked up abroad," I said as I sat down in the cosy armchair in my uncle's study and smoking-room. "But there is one curio which surprises me, I confess."

"Which was it?" asked my relation, passing the box of cigarettes—he never smoked a cigar. "Why did you not mention it as we passed, as you did several others?"

"Well, to tell you the truth, I scarcely liked to do so," I returned. "I have always understood that you were dead against betting—at least, since you settled down in this country; for I did not know you personally before that time. As I was saying," I continued, "you were so much against betting that it did strike me as rather odd that you should have among your curiosities a piece of wedding cake and a racing card under a glass case! And it is a strange combination, too."

My uncle smiled, then his face became grave.

"There is a story attached to that curio," he said, "and that is what turned me against betting. The incident occurred soon after I returned to England. I saved a man's life—somewhat by accident. As we have another hour to while away, I'll tell you about it, if you like. It may point a moral instructive to you," he concluded with a sly glance.

"I should much like to hear it," I replied promptly.

My uncle placed his cigarette on the ash tray, brushed his moustache with his handkerchief, and narrated the following story:

"One of the first persons I met on my return to England—that is, of those known to me, of course—was Sir Ralph Waters, whose acquaintance I had made while he was hunting big game in South Africa. He had no title when I saw him out there, but his father had died in the meantime and he had succeeded to the baronetcy.

"He was pleased to see me and insisted upon my going here, there, and everywhere with him. He was a devotee of horseracing and—to come to the point—I agreed to accompany him to see the City and Suburban. I believe that is the first important race of the year, but perhaps I am wrong. I don't take much interest in the sport.

"Sir Ralph was rather in advance of his appointed time in calling for me on the morning of the race, but as I was ready we started for the station, and consequently had several minutes to wait for our train. While strolling about the platform, Sir Ralph nodded to a good many persons and spoke to some.

"'Hallo, Grainger!' he exclaimed suddenly, as a young man came up to him. 'Are you going down to-day?'

"'Going down,' echoed the new-comer. 'I should think so!' He seemed very much agitated; he continually felt his necktie to see if it were quite as it should be, twirled his slight moustache, and did many other things that people generally do when they are in a nervous state.

"'Well, of course,' said Waters apologetically, 'there's no—— But I am forgetting my manners. Allow me to introduce you to my friend, Mr. Harvey.'

"The usual exchange of compliments passed between us; then Waters resumed the thread of his remarks.

"'I thought you were—h'm—otherwise engaged, you know, and too busy to run down to-day. But perhaps she is coming down herself with her father?'

"'N—o—o,' answered the young fellow, nervously toying with his watch-chain.

"'Nothing wrong, I hope?' queried the Baronet. 'You appear to be rather agitated.'

"'N—o, nothing amiss in that direction,' was Grainger's reply. Then, as though he wished to confide in somebody, he continued: 'Got rather a lot on—er—I——'

"'Ah! Been backing the favourite heavily, eh? Feel a bit shaky about it? Got much on it—how much?'

"'More than I can raise, if I lose,' said Grainger, staring absently in front of him.

"'H'm, that's bad,' remarked Waters thoughtfully. 'Whatever made you go it so strong on that horse? You know it's a bit risky under the circumstances, don't you? Suppose the owner were to die before the race—the horse would be scratched and your money gone.'

"'Heavens!' groaned Grainger. 'Don't talk about that! It's like this,' he went on, 'I am to marry her in a fortnight, and I am supposed to have a certain sum put snugly by. But I haven't got it! I have lost a heap lately at cards and so on, and I am in a hole. So I made up my mind to have a big try to recoup over this race. If it wins, I'm all right.'

"'And if it doesn't?' asked Sir Ralph.

"There was just a second's pause; then Grainger, his face a shade paler, opened his coat a little wider and passed his fingers significantly over his waistcoat pocket.

"'Nonsense!' exclaimed Waters with a light laugh.

"Then we had to hurry to take our seats and we lost sight of Grainger.

"'Do you think he will do anything desperate?' I inquired of my friend when we were seated and the train was running along. I felt a trifle nervous about the young fellow. But Waters laughed.

"'My dear Harvey,' he expostulated, 'I have no doubt that the horse will win. The only uncertainty is the life of the owner; if he dies before the race is run—or if a telegram is received after the race, to say that he died before the race—I believe the horse is disqualified, and Grainger would lose the bets. I believe that's how it is, and, as he takes it in the same way, I suppose it's correct. But it would be the very perversity of fate if such a thing were to happen! Moreover, if it came to the worst, Grainger wouldn't do anything rash. They all feel like that. He would get over it; his people—or hers—would put things straight.'

Digitized by Google

"I said nothing, but my friend's lightly spoken words only partly reassured me.

"You do not need that I should describe the races or the other happenings. I waited anxiously for the great event, inwardly praying that nothing would arise, and that Fliegend would win—for Grainger's sake. Strange that I should take such interest in a man who was really unknown to me.

"At last the appointed time arrived. The horses started and went over the ground in splendid style. Fliegend was behind at first, but he pulled up steadily and won easily. I was glad. Others grumbled because there had been 'no race'; Fliegend had had it all his own way, they declared.

"Sir Ralph laughed at the heartfelt manner in which I said I was glad, and left me for a few minutes to talk to some friends. I was watching the scene with some curiosity and forgot him until he grasped me by the shoulder.

"'What's the matter?' I asked, on noticing his agitated face.

"'Just received a wire to say that the owner of Fliegend died fifteen minutes before the race!' he replied; 'and I hear that the news has just reached Grainger and he went off with a fearful oath! I'm afraid he will do himself some harm. Of course he thought he was saved, and the revulsion of feeling is enough to make him desperate. Had it been after the race, I shouldn't have thought so much about it, but now——! Come on!'

"We had been making our way out of the crowd while he was speaking; we now hurried along.

"'Why did the news not reach us sooner?' I asked.

"'He's away, you know,' said Waters, forgetting that I knew nothing.

"'Where are you going?' was my next inquiry.

"'To try to overtake young Grainger. I feel a bit scared about him now. I was told he went in this direction.'

"'But surely they will not disqualify the horse now?'

"'They will. I don't quite understand how it goes with the betting, whether the horse's backers lose or the bets are off; but in any case Grainger means mischief, I fear.'

"We hurried along, making an inquiry whenever we could, but could not find a clue to the young man's whereabouts. We were beginning to despair, when we met a man who, in answer to our inquiry and description, told us that he had seen such a man turn into a quiet lane quite close.

"'He means it, by George!' muttered Waters, just loud enough for me to hear. And he dashed off at top speed, I following at his heels.

"The lane was a winding one; one of those along which you can never see for a much greater distance than half a dozen yards. We ran quickly and quietly along the road. Suddenly, as we turned a bend, the Baronet uttered an exclamation and shot forward with a fierce spurt.

"I could see it all. Grainger stood against the hedge holding a pistol to his temple. Waters leapt forward. There was a report and—although I am accustomed to scenes of bloodshed and the sound of firearms—I shut my eyes.

"'Why did you stop me?' I heard a voice cry, half in sorrow and half in anger.

"Then I knew that Waters had been in time. I opened my eyes and went towards them.

"'Because I don't wish to see you make an ass of yourself,' was Sir Ralph's answer to Grainger's interrogation. 'You will pull through it. Don't be a fool.'

"'I shan't,' cried the young fellow moodily. 'There is no getting out of it, and if you had let me alone I should have been at peace now. I shall do it as soon as you are gone.'

"'Then we won't leave you,' said my friend decidedly.

"'All right,' said Grainger sulkily. 'Take me home, since you constitute yourselves my guardians.'

"'That's the way,' said Waters cheerily. But I was not deceived so easily, and kept my eye on the wretched man.

"It was lucky I did. Just as we reached the end of the lane, I saw him take out a tiny knife and raise his hand. I jumped to his side and grasped his hand just as he was about to plunge the point into a vein.

"We three had a fierce struggle for a moment. We prevented him from accomplishing his purpose, but he would not lose his grip of the knife, and I had to hold the hand while Waters seized the other. We were standing in that attitude, wondering what on earth we should do with him, when an idea flashed across my brain.

"'Where did the owner die?' I asked. The question seemed irrelevant, but I remembered the answer of Waters when I inquired why the news had not arrived sooner.

"'In Madrid.'

"'Madrid?' I echoed in a confused manner. 'But the time is different there! Perhaps the race is legal after all. There's about half-an-hour's difference.'

"Grainger stared at me, then at Waters, and the latter returned the stare.

"'I believe you've hit it,' said Sir Ralph slowly. 'What idiots we were not to think of that before! That means that he died some minutes after the race!'

"Grainger looked from one to the other, scarcely daring to believe that it could be true.

"'Perhaps the telegram stated English time?' he ventured.

"'Not at all!' exclaimed Sir Ralph promptly. 'Grainger, my boy, you are safe! Come away at once. We will arrange it in London.'

"Grainger was more hopeful after that, and we returned to London to find that our ideas were correct, and that the authorities—stewards do you call them?—had decided the matter as we expected.

"When Grainger's marriage took place, I was invited. He took the opportunity to tell me that he had vowed never to bet again; and he also said that he owed his life to me. I brought away with me a piece of the wedding cake and placed it with the racing card in my collection.

"Of course," concluded my uncle, "this is between ourselves! I should not like the story to get to the ears of Grainger's wife or his people. And I have never explained that curio to anyone else."

"You ought to have changed the names before telling me," I remarked with a smile.

"I did," he answered dryly. G. E. Lingen.

Digitized by Google

THE PRICE OF A SOUL.

The narrow brown path wound up between the dark green laurels to the door of a cabin that was perched like a bird with wide-spread wings on a shelf of the mountain.

In some places that path was covered with brown, polished pine straw, and overhead the blue sky twinkled between the interlaced needles of the sturdy mountain pines.

At the cabin the path widened out, forming a little unfenced yard where dahlias and sunflowers and mountain lilies grew, and then went out into the blue distance far above.

From the little flower-bordered yard there was a view of a town five miles distant in the valley, and a glimmering river.

Two men sat on wooden benches under the chestnut trees in front of the cabin. One was a young man with a Hercules form and an Apollo face. He was looking now at a train of cars that was crawling like a huge worm through the valley toward the town.

A look of discontent clouded the blue of his eyes, and a frown rested on his brow.

"I wish I'der gone with you, that first summer," he said, in the soft, musical drawl that belongs to the southern mountaineer. "I warn't twenty then, an' I mighter been rich by this time."

The elder man gazed. He was sunburnt and grizzled and keen-eyed. He had just come up to the mountains after a long stay out West.

"I don't know that you'd have made anything worth while, if you'd gone then, seeing that you might have lost what by staying here you have won." His grey eyes turned to the open door as he finished. The keen brightness left them, and they grew dark and tender. The whole face softened.

Inside, a woman sat on a low chair with a baby in her arms. Down in Mexico, Jack Hawley, the young English engineer, had seen a picture of a Madonna with a face like the one before him. Such a satisfied, beautiful face, with its great brown eyes, waving dusky hair, and gentle smiling lips. For Jeane was happy—simply happy. She knew nothing of the world beyond her quiet mountains—nothing of the pressing forward, the ceaseless struggle that went on there. It had reached Dick, but not the happy heart of his wife. Jeane lived in her own Arcadia, her own Eden!

"It seems to me, Dick, that you've a sort of Heaven up here. I shouldn't want any other if this were mine. And as for money, what could it buy you, man, if in all the world you wanted only this?"

There was a curious ring in the man's low voice.

Dick dragged his eyes slowly from the train of cars that had come to be a slender, moving shadow beside a silver ribbon. An amused smile curved the beautiful lips beneath the dark moustache.

"Shucks, Jack Hawley. I recollect that old foolishness er yourn. Ain't you over it yet? Well, I wisht I'der let yer had her. I wisht I'der swapped chances with you, then I'der had the boodle. I'd ruther have that than——"

"Dick!" Jack's eyes flashed.

"It's so, Jack Hawley. There's no use beatin' about the bush! Hearin' er your luck's brought hit out whar I can't cram hit back. What kin a man do hampered with a wife an' chap?"

"What in the world should he want to do but live and love them?"

Jack Hawley looked at the splendid face before him, and his eyes flashed fire and his tall form quivered. Inside the Madonna face above the sleeping baby slowly whitened and the brown eyes turned black.

"That'll do fur sweetheart talk," Dick said with a bitter laugh. "It don't sound the same when you're tied hard an' fast. If I's foot loose I could make my way with other men. If I's free with a thousand pounds, I could be somebody."

"You could be—you are a fool or a devil," Jack Hawley exclaimed, springing to his feet. "Would you rather have a thousand pounds than that?" He stretched out his long arm towards the cabin door.

"Well, then, though I don't see as you've got a durn to do with it, I would." Dick could not see inside the cabin. As he finished speaking he rose lazily, glanced up at the sky, and went down the brown path, leaving his visitor alone under the chestnut trees.

Shading his eyes with his great hairy hand Jack Hawley watched him, as with long, graceful strides the man went down.

Digitized by Google

Jack's heart was bursting. How lightly this man held what he would have died to win!

He turned to the cabin when Dick's form was no longer in sight.

In the doorway stood Jeane, still and white, her brown eyes shining.

"Jeane!"

"I understood, Jack. It's goin' ter kill me, I reckon."

"No, it shall not. He's a brute, Jeane. He hasn't the heart of a dog."

"It ain't that, Jack. It's that something's kept him back from successin'. It don't hurt any worse than the something's us." She held the baby closer to her breast.

"You love him, Jeane?"

"Yes," she said simply. Her eyes told how well.

"Has he seemed—" The man hesitated, a flush showing through the brown of his face. He brushed back his grey-streaked hair and went on:

"There's no one else—you are so alone, Jeane, since the old gran'ther died. And he said it to me—Dick did. To me, and he knew it's been with me all these years—such weary years, Jeane. He let me know and you heard; so there's no one else to help you, Jeane—no one but me." His face glowed, his voice rang out triumphantly. "So tell me, has he been careless—or—or——" He took out his great red handkerchief and wiped his lips.

"I don't know, Jack. How should I? I warn't looking for that. I love him."

"Woman, what manner of love is this?"

He was inside the cabin now, standing before her with the little sleeping baby between them.

"Is it strange? It seems mighty nachal ter me," she said.

"And you missed nothing?"

"In Dick? Oh, no! You ain't a woman, Jack, an' so you don't understand. Poor Dick! How han'some he is! He could be a great man where you've been, Jack."

"He's a fool—he's a coward.—"

"No, he ain't. He's just disappointed—he made a mistake. I wisht he'der let you have me, Jack."

"Heaven knows I do. A thousand dollars! Would you rather he had them, Jeane?"

"Yes, he'd rather."

"Maybe he didn't mean it."

"He meant it! I felt that. I see now; it's such a pity. I wisht he 'der gone with you. He mighter had a thousand dollars by now."

Jack Hawley's eyes burnt like flame. He dropped the lids over them. A dark, slow flush reddened his cheeks above the grizzled beard.

"He can have it, Jeane. Come away with me, you and—and the little kid, and I'll give him twice—five times a thousand dollars and he will be free. The world can have him."

She caught her breath and looked up at him. His eyes were on the floor.

"Will you do that, Jack? I'm not worth it, but will you? Five thousand dollars! Dick can surely be happy with that. Will you?"

"Yes. I've got it, every cent down in town. I'd double it. I'd give every cent, my last penny, and work for you and—and the little kid, only to be near you, Jeane."

"And he will be rich and free—Dick will," she said, a radiant smile on her white face.

"And you, Jeane?"

"Me? Oh, I shall know that Dick is happy! I can't see any further than that."

The man's face was full of love, burning, intense love as he looked at her, but another face was between, just as it had always been, and she did not see.

"I'll send the money, Jeane. Leave it here where—where he can find it, and come down to the station in time for the six o'clock train. I will meet you somewhere on the path."

"I'll come."

He went quickly away. An old woman hobbled past him and went into the cabin.

She sat down before the smouldering fire, and Jeane laid the child in her arms and began slowly to collect in a little bundle some pieces of coarse clothing.

"Air ye fixin' ter go off? Hit's gwinter rain 'fo' night. I look fur hit to po' cats an' dogs," the old woman said, shivering.

"I got to go, mother. It's fur Dick."

"Fur Dick? He's my own boy, but you're a fool to humour an' do fur 'im an' he keerin' no more'n he does."

Jeane caught her breath sharply. Even the dim eyes of Dick's fond old mother had seen.

Low, rumbling thunder sounded among the mountains. The western sky was dark, the falling of the water not far away sounded sharp and clear. Birds called shrilly to each other.

A boy came to the cabin door with an envelope. Jeane took it and laid it on the table. There was no writing on the outside. She brought a rusty pen and a small bottle of ink and slowly wrote a line across the brown surface. As she wrote a deep crimson dyed her brown, but it faded when she laid the pen aside, and her face was pale again. The characters she had traced on the envelope were cramped and unbeautiful, for Jeane's hand was not used to such work, but it was steady as she wrote the words. A sob rose to her white lips as she turned away, but that was all.

She put on her calico sunbonnet and drew a shawl over her shoulders. Taking up her bundle she slipped it on her arm, and then took the baby from the nodding old woman.

One glance at the envelope on the table, a long shudder and she was gone.

It mattered so little about the storm. The wind was rising. It screamed and sobbed like a lost soul as it twisted the trees and rushed through the rocky gorges. She held her baby close, and clung to the steep brown path. She was sure-footed. It was almost cold on the mountain.

The tall trees twisted and bowed under the blackened sky, a hundred echoes repeated the crash and roar of the thunder. Awful flashes of lightning cut their terrible way across the hurrying clouds, and then a sheet of blinding rain almost swept the struggling woman from her feet. But she went on.

Once through all the crash and roar she heard a voice calling her name. But it seemed to her that it must be only fancy. Who would be calling her back?

She turned when the sound reached her again and looked back. Through the falling rain she saw a face—Dick's face. He was calling her. Of course he did not know that she was getting out of his way. He must have missed seeing the envelope.

She stumbled on. She could not wait to explain now.

Farther down the path she saw Jack Hawley leaping up the mountain side towards her. His tall form was bent, and he was coming facing the terrible storm. The path was straight here and she could see both men.

Digitized by Google

And then the very mountain seemed to be on fire. There was a flash and a crash; the earth trembled. The two men started back, the eyes of each found the other's white face, and between them on the rain-drenched path, her baby on her breast, lay Jeane, her Madonna face turned up to the sky.

Suddenly the rain ceased and the wind was still. There was a great calm. Nature held her breath in pity—in horror.

The two men stood for an instant looking into each other's eyes, then Dick stooped and lifted the little dead baby in his arms.

With a deep sob Jack Hawley raised Jeane's body and held it close to his breast.

Dick turned towards the cabin and Jack followed slowly.

With a soft gurgling sound the fallen rain swept down the mountain side, across the broken flowers in the little unfenced yard under the chestnut trees in front of the cabin door.

The two men went in and silently laid their burdens on the bed.

The old woman sleeping and nodding before the fire did not hear.

Dick pointed to an envelope that lay upon the table. The end was torn across.

Jack Hawley bent down and read the words:

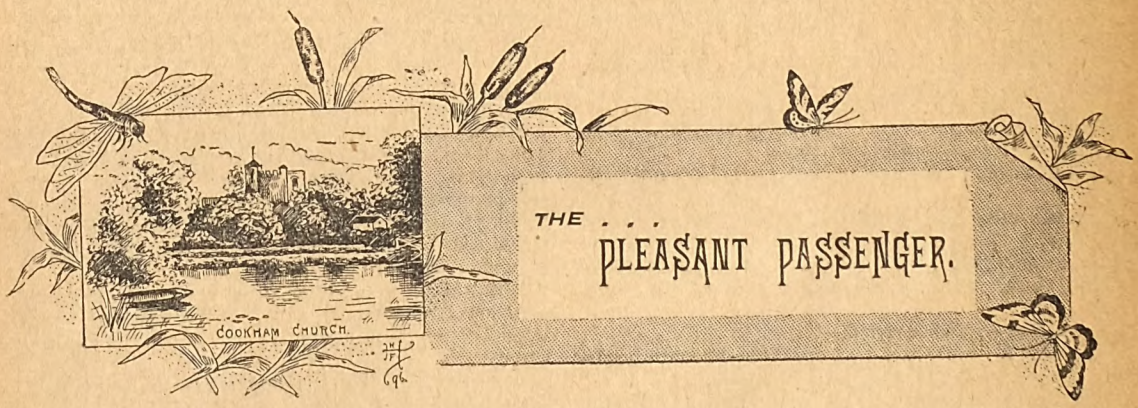
"This is what you wanted, Dick. It is the price of a soul."

"I told you they warn't worth having. That's a woman for you. She was runnin' away with you," Dick said calmly.

A strange smile flittered across Jack Hawley's face He went to the bed and reverently kissed the marble face of his Madonna.

"Yes," he said, turning to Dick. "But a man like you could never understand. I shall not explain. Jeane is safe. You have your wish, Dick; good-love—I hope it is forever," and he bowed his head and went out from the cabin and down the brown mountain path, for beyond lay the world where men forget!

Ellen Wycoff.



"I am afraid the return voyage will seem rather dull to you, captain, after the pleasant time we are all having on the voyage out. Speaking for myself, I can safely say that I have never met such an entertaining companion as our fellow passenger Mr. Merino."

"Yes," I replied, "he has made the trip a very pleasant one, and no doubt the return journey will be a bit dull."

This little talk took place on the deck of the Bodmin Castle about three weeks after she had sailed from the Mersey for Melbourne. I thoroughly endorsed all that the speaker had said concerning the personal charms—that is by no means too strong a term to use—of the young Spaniard who is one of my passengers. He was really the most agreeable man I ever met, either on sea or land.

He was a young man about twenty-five, and was making this voyage for the benefit of his health; as he himself had told us, his stay in England—for the purpose of acquiring our language and a knowledge of our business methods—had developed the seeds of consumption which he inherited, and he had been advised to take a long sea trip as the best means of fighting the dread malady.

Everyone on board felt sorry for him, and this sympathy served to make more attractive the charm of his witty conversation. Even the pretty foreign accent and the occasional slips made us like him all the more. I believe that most of the passengers wondered however they would have passed the time had he not been making the trip with us.

The Bodmin Castle did not convey many passengers at any time, and on this voyage there were nine. The ship usually carried a large cargo of a mixed nature.

My nine passengers consisted of the following persons: First on the list I place the young Spanish señor; then there was an elderly gentleman, Mr Langton, a merchant in a large way of business (it was he who had made the remark with which the story opened); a brother and sister, aged between thirty-five and forty, who were going out for the purpose of taking up some property; a Mr. Ruston and his wife, middle-aged people; and two other gentlemen who need not be specially mentioned.

All were simply charmed by the Spaniard's amiability and polished manner. In spite of his own delicate health—he always wore a thick scarf—he was a good sailor and not in the least affected by the motion of the vessel, whereas the others were all ill. When they were able to return on deck, he was most attentive to them, helping them here and assisting them there, and winning his way into their good books until—by the time we had made three weeks sail—I really believe they would have told him all their private business without scruple had he asked them to do so.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Langton was about to make some further remark to me when he espied the pleasant passenger.

"Ah!" he exclaimed. "There is Señor Merino. He looks a little better. I will see how he feels."

And he went off to speak to him and left me to my duties. I saw Merino seat himself on a stool by the side of an empty cask and set to work diligently at a model of the Bodmin Castle which he was making for me, and then I had to turn my attention to something else, and for the time I forgot him.

All went well until we were within a week's sail of Melbourne. One morning, Merino came towards me on the deck, and I noticed that his face wore a worried expression. This was so contrary to custom that I was struck by it.

"Don't you feel well this morning, sir?" I asked. I never called him "señor," as the others did—I'm not much of a hand at those foreign words.

"The fact is, captain," he said hesitatingly, nervously twisting one end of his moustache, "I am a leetle worried."

He looked towards the empty cask, which he had been using as a table while making the model.

"Ah!" I said, noticing the direction of the look. "I know what you are worried about; you are afraid that you won't be able to finish that model of the Bodmin Castle that you wish to present to me. Now, it's very kind of you, sir, and I quite understand that a gentleman so good-natured as you are should feel vexed at not being able to keep a promise. But you have kept at that old tub too long for your health, and I shall refuse to allow you to work there any longer. I'll have it taken away."

"Oh, no, you must not do that, captain," he cried, looking quite upset. "Now, promise me you will not have that cask disturbed."

He seemed so bent upon it that I felt bound to assure him that the cask should not be touched on any account.

"But you are wrong, captain," he went on. "It is not that which worries me. I hardly like to mention it, but—but——."

He hesitated, and I waited for him to go on.

"The fact is"—he often made use of those words—"I have lost my gold watch—it has been taken out of my cabin."

I stared at him in surprise.

"Do you mean to say that it has been stolen?" I asked.

"I do," he replied emphatically. "There is no other explanation of its disappearance."

I was furious. The idea of anyone committing a theft was quite annoying enough, but that the victim should be the man who had done so much to make the voyage a pleasant one, who had been so kind and attentive to everybody on board—well, it made me about as angry as any one man could be.

"I'll have this inquired into," I cried. "If that watch is on this ship, it shall be found!"

"Wait a leetle, captain," said Merino rather more quietly. "I should like to find that watch because it was my father's, not so much on account of its value. But I think you will spoil the chances of getting it back if you lose your temper over the matter and order an investigation. I would not have said a word about it, but I think it should be known for the sake of the other passengers. Will you leave it to me and act as I may suggest?"

He spoke in such a winning manner that it was impossible to refuse him. So it was arranged that he should act as he thought best.

When the passengers were all seated at the table, he gently told them what had happened, with many apologies for disturbing their peace of mind.

"I think it only right to tell you," he observed in his most amiable manner, "so that you may take extra care of any valuable property which you may have brought with you. But," he added, "perhaps you have not brought anything very valuable?"

"Bless me!" exclaimed Mr. Langton, and all the other passengers looked very serious. "Why, I have a matter of three hundred pounds in cash and notes! What's to be done, captain?"

"I have asked him to leave the matter in my hands, and I think I may recover my property," rejoined Merino before I could speak. "It may be that no further attempt will be made on the goods of the passengers."

"It is to be hoped not," observed Mrs. Rushton nervously. "I wish I hadn't brought so much jewellery with me."

And as similar remarks were made by the other six, I began to get nettled.

"Such a thing has never occurred before while I've been captain," I exclaimed with some show of feeling. "I think I must ask you to release me from my promise, Mr. Merino, and let me work this affair through."

"No, captain," was his decided reply. "I will do it. Perhaps it will be best to begin at once. In the first place, we must search the chests of the seamen. I don't like to do this, but it is evident that the robber must be a seaman. But I understand the British sailor's character, and I know that the men will not like that. Therefore, we—the passengers—must submit to the same ordeal, just to satisfy the sailors. We have no reason for avoiding a search, is it not so?"

He looked round at them, and they all signified their willingness, and thought it very considerate of the young Spaniard.

Well, I passed the word round to the men and the officers that a search was to be made of their chests and belongings for Mr. Merino's watch, which had been stolen; and I took care to explain that the passengers' things were to be overhauled as well. The men took it more easily than I expected; they were sorry that Mr. Merino should have lost anything, because he had been so pleasant, and I suppose that quieted them. That is, all but the bo'sun, and he was as mad as a March hare.

However, all had to submit. My chief officer and one of the gentlemen passengers—a quiet man, who said very little—made the search together. But nothing was found, although we ransacked everything and looked everywhere.

"Well, I am sorry," said Merino with a sigh. "I was particularly attached to that watch because it was my father's; but it is—what do you say? Oh, yes, it's no good crying over spilt milk. No."

After that he seemed to forget his loss, and his cheerful manner returned. He went to work at the model, and remained sitting at the cask best part of the day.

Digitized by Google

He was really very clever at carpentering. I admired the way he carved the model of the Bodmin Castle and mentally promised myself that the model of the good ship should have the best place in my little home when I got back to Old England. Our ship's carpenter was loud in his praises of the Spaniard's cleverness with tools, and lent him anything he might want for the model or any of the other odd jobs that Merino was fond of doing.

We all turned in that night feeling a little more settled. Merino had quite recovered his spirits, and said he supposed that in some way he must have dropped the watch overboard, and he was glad for everybody's sake that the crew had been proved innocent. We all thought it was very good of him to admit that.

But the second morning after the search there was a rare to-do. Every one of the passengers had been relieved of his or her valuables during the night! Merino himself had lost two rings and some cash, but the other eight had lost all. I reckoned it up, and the haul of the thief reached nigh on a thousand pounds!

"I can't stand this," I exclaimed when the news reached me. "I'll turn the ship inside out but what I'll find it!"

The gentlemen were in a rage—even the Spaniard lost his temper and said things in a foreign language that sounded wicked to me. But perhaps they were prayers; I don't care about taking away a man's character when I don't understand the lingo he's talking.

I had another search, but it was no good. Nothing was found.

That night they all turned in as usual, and I suppose they went to sleep some time during the darkness. It was my turn to take the "captain's watch;" I was too vexed at the mysterious affair to turn in before the watch, so it was past four in the morning when I got the chance. But even then I couldn't sleep, so I threw on my things again and made up my mind to sit in my cabin and smoke.

My cabin was situated amidship, and from my window I could command a view of the whole of the deck. I drew aside the curtain and looked out; it was beginning to get light. To my surprise, I saw the señor on deck. I was about to open my door and go on deck to have a talk to him and ask him to join me in a cigar, when his peculiar movements attracted my attention, and made me hesitate.

He looked carefully round, and then walked cautiously towards the empty cask at which he was accustomed to work on the model. Then he gave another very careful glance round. It was now clear to me that he was looking to see if he was being watched; but why?

Then he turned again to the cask and lifted half the top bodily off the barrel.

I leave you to imagine my astonishment and excitement. I could scarcely contain myself. He cast another hasty glance along the deck, then he dived his hand into the cask and drew from it a small black bag which he quickly concealed beneath his coat. Again his hand went towards the cask, but something made him seize the top and replace it quickly.

The cause of this was soon apparent. I saw the bo'sun walking across the deck towards him.

The whole thing flashed across my mind in an instant. I threw open my door and hurried on deck. During the few seconds that passed while I was leaving the window and opening the door, the bo'sun had dashed upon our amiable passenger; so, when I looked again, they were struggling desperately together.

The bo'sun was no chicken, but he had all his work cut out with the Spaniard, and there is no telling how it would have gone had they been left to themselves; but I was on the spot like a flash and we soon had Merino a prisoner.

So this very pleasant young foreigner was the thief after all! The loss of his watch was a get-up to enable him to get an idea of the extent of the valuables on board and—by means of the search—where they were placed. He was a very skilful thief to have managed the robbery in the night. He had secreted the things in two small bags which he hung on nails inside the cask. The way he had faked that cask was very ingenious.

To say that the passengers and everybody else were amazed would be putting it mildly. Nobody suspected him for a moment, except the old salt who had been so annoyed at having his things searched and who had kept a watch on him and discovered the little game.

We handed him over to the authorities on landing, but as no one wanted to stay long in Melbourne, we asked the magistrate to deal summarily with the case. So Merino got off lightly with six months' imprisonment.

I always remember to this day what a very pleasant passenger he was, and regret that a man who could be so agreeable should have turned out such a rogue.

You will get a complete shilling novel and a coloured plate with HOME NOTES published on February 19th, and every subsequent number—all for a penny.

Digitized by Google

BY GEORGE GRIFFITH.

Author of "Valdar the Oft-Born," "Briton or Boer?" "The Outlaws of the Air," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

BLOCKADED.

THE searchlights flashed out instantly from fore and aft and swept a wide area of the sea, but they only revealed a brief and fleeting glimpse of the flying yacht, for by this time the Minnehaha's topmasts were down, her funnels were painted black, her decks covered with black tarpauling, and her white stern and quarters also shrouded in black. And so, with her stern pointed to the Pocahontas and affording the least possible object of vision, the saucy little Minnehaha raced away at her full thirty-three knots an hour out of the field of light and into the darkness of the great ocean that stretched away to the north-eastward.

"I reckon we fooled 'em pretty slick that time," said Captain Peters to Madame Sybil, who, finding sleep impossible owing to the heat of the night, had left her state-room to come up to the bridge again.

"I really do hope you've given them the slip, Captain," she replied with a little shiver. "I was beginning to be afraid that they would fire one of those big guns at us. I think they would have sunk us if they had done."

"Well, ma'am," said the skipper with a little twist of his beard, "you see the shells from those six-inch guns weigh a hundred pounds apiece, and I guess if one of them hit us and bust anywhere in the veecinity of our boilers the Minnehaha wouldn't be good for much except scrap-iron, and that'd have to be dredged for. Still them dynamite guns of ours are mighty handy pepper-boxes, and if we got the drop on them at a good range I don't know that we couldn't keep our end up, for all they carry in the way of heavier metal. But to my mind, running's much more our game than fighting. I hope the Seenyor'll think so too. Buccaneering is a darned sight healthier in a dime novel than on the high seas at this time of day."

"I quite agree with you, Captain," she replied with another shiver, "and I most sincerely hope that Mr. Lorrain will be guided by you. Now I think I'll say good-night again. There is rather too much wind up here for comfort."

As she went down the steps from the bridge Captain Peters looked after her dim white form and said to himself, "That's a mighty fine woman. I guess she wasn't far from the front row when faces were being handed round. Anyhow she's a darned sight too good for that greasy little porpoise that's got her in tow now, and I shouldn't wonder if she was a widow again before long.

"The Seenyor won't have any further use for His Excellence now, if he's located old Christoval's treasure-chest, and I don't think he's just the sort of man to keep useless things like that hanging around any longer than he's got to. She'd suit me all over the back from what I've seen of her so far. A fine woman. Yes, sir, a darned fine woman!"

Meanwhile Madame Sybil had sought a sheltered corner of the deck, and as she sat there with her eyes shut and the swish of the water rushing past the vessel's sides ringing in her ears, her thoughts went back some seven years to that open grave on the little coral island where the first chapter of her life-tragedy had been written in blood. Now that tragedy seemed to be drawing to a climax. How would it end?

What she had said to Captain Peters on the bridge had meant less than nothing. She knew perfectly well that the Minnehaha's escape was as hopeless as she had been able to make it. She had an old and bitter grudge to pay off against Lorrain, for she had suffered at his hands the most grievous slight that a man can put on a woman, and now he had murdered her son and, as she believed, robbed her of her one chance of regaining all she had lost and more.

But an opportunity for revenge had come at last. She saw that if the Minnehaha were caught in Samana Bay with the treasure on board and the Gold Magnet in the possession either of himself or of the woman who called herself Lady Pendril, not only would his plans be ruined, but the investigation which would be held by the Consul and the commanders of the warships into the disappearance of Sir Harley Pendril and her son could hardly fail to have very serious results for them both.

She had weighed all this very carefully while Captain Peters was telling his story at the palace, and one of her reasons for asking him to delay the sailing of the yacht was to get time to write a letter to Tristam, in which she told him, not only all that she knew, but a little more which she guessed, including of course the destination of the Minnehaha.

She had stipulated for half of what might be found in the treasure-chest as the reward for her information, and the risk that she had run in making Lorrain an open enemy, and Tristam had sent a reply back by her own messenger accepting the terms. It was this letter which had brought the Hermione and the New York on their apparently useless journey, in the wake of the Pocahontas and the Minnehaha. They were bound for Samana Bay as the Pocahontas was, and while Captain Peters was congratulating himself on having given them the slip so nicely, the three vessels were steadily ploughing their way round the east of the island to their common destination.

Digitized by Google

It was towards the evening of the next day that Lorrain and her ladyship, with the remains of the expedition, reached the squalid little town of Savana la Mar. They had brought none of the treasure which the Gold Magnet had pointed out with them. Lorrain had contented himself with digging down into the bank of the stream with his little pick, until he had found the chain attached to the treasure-chest. He had then made a few measurements and a rough plan which no one but himself and his companion could understand, and then he had covered the chain up again and they had left the spot. Her ladyship would dearly have loved to have had a glimpse of the chest itself even if she could not see its contents. Those she was prepared to take on trust, for the present, for the behaviour of the Magnet had shown her that it must have been attracted to the spot by a very large mass of gold. But Lorrain had satisfied her that, all things considered, it would be much better to postpone the pleasure to some other time when circumstances should be more favourable.

There were no signs of either the Minnehaha or the Pocahontas when they reached the shore, although either of them could have run round from Santo Domingo in a day. From this Lorrain concluded that Captain Peters was lying well out to sea waiting to run in under cover of darkness, and this proved to be correct, for a little after ten o'clock the yacht's long boat grounded on the beach, and Captain Peters himself came up to the camp which they had pitched a little behind the village, which did not boast accommodation for travellers. When he had told his story Lorrain clapped him on the shoulder and laughed.

"Well done, Captain Peters, very well done! We have found where the treasure-chest is, and when it's convenient to go and dig it up you shall have a bit more than your share for bringing my friend the President and Madame Sybil round. That was very clever, and as soon as we're well outside I'll give my little friend Gregorio the choice between a dance at the end of a rope, or the jump from the end of a plank in the good old style. That would have been a very pretty little scheme of his to start Tristram and a squad of men up the river after us. The little blackguard knew perfectly well that there would be a fight if we met and he meant that there should be one, which would have taken the form of a convenient massacre of the survivors by disbanded revolutionists, and His Excellency would have come into a nice little thing. I shall be interested to see what he and Madame Sybil say when they find we haven't brought the treasure with us."

"I guess his Excellence'll be about the maddest man this side of the Arctic circle, and as for Madame, why she'll be a trifle mad, too. Still she might have a chance of some of it later on. To tell you the truth, Seenyor, that's a mighty fine woman, and it wouldn't exactly break my heart to see her a widow."

"A widow!" laughed Lorrain again. "I don't suppose if the truth were known she's anything else now, Captain, but anyhow we'll make quite sure of that to-morrow, if not to-night. You don't strike me as exactly a marrying man, but for all that I wish you the best of good luck in your love-making, or whatever other means you propose to use to bring the lady round to your views. I'll give the bride away with pleasure."

"And I shall be most happy to act as bridesmaid," added her ladyship, who had her own reasons for thinking the arrangement a very satisfactory one.

In a couple of hours the boat had put off again with the remains of the expedition and its impedimenta on board, and for two hours more its six oars propelled it quietly and swiftly over the smooth waters of the bay towards Cape Samana, off which the Minnehaha was lying about a couple of miles or so from the land, as Captain Peters had not thought it prudent to take the risk of being blockaded in the Bay.

A single faint light guided the boat to the yacht. The showing of this was an unfortunate necessity, for it also betrayed her whereabouts to the Pocahontas and the two cruisers which were lying about five miles farther out, and which so disposed themselves that the Minnehaha would be forced to run out to sea between the Pocahontas and one of the warships or go dangerously near the shore.

When they got on board the first thing Lorrain did was to send for Madame Sybil and tell her point blank what she and Don Gregorio had been brought on board the yacht for, and how he proposed to punish the President's treachery as soon as they got out to sea. Startling and even terrifying as the news was, she took it with a calmness that would have surprised him less had he known as much as she knew about the Pocahontas and her consort. She merely shrugged her shapely shoulders and said:

"Of course, you are master here, Francisco, and you can do as you please. As for Gregorio, well, I am even more tired of him than I got of you, so I don't suppose I shall be inclined to put on weeds for him."

"You are candid, if not very complimentary, my dear Sybil that once was," he replied, with a sneer in his tone that brought the blood to her cheeks. "But I'm glad that you take it so sensibly. By the way, talking about weeds, it may interest you to know that you really are a widow. Our mutual friend Tristam buried your late husband about six months ago up country yonder. We saw the grave a day or two ago, and curiously enough it isn't a thousand miles from the very spot where the treasure-chest is buried. Rather a singular coincidence, isn't it?"

"Yes," she said; "it is. And so poor Arthur is really dead at last. I treated him very badly, didn't I, poor fellow?"

"And yet not quite so badly as you and he treated poor Sir Harry Viney, if his last dying speech and confession to Mr. Tristam was true," added Lorrain.

"What!" she said starting back. "He must have been mad. Besides what was there to tell? Harry died on the island of exposure and fever, and added to that he was very badly injured on the night of the shipwreck."

"Exactly," said Lorrain with a little wave of his hand. "Exactly. He died on the island, and, after all, the particular illness doesn't matter now. You needn't be afraid. You can rely absolutely on my discretion so long as I can rely on yours. And now I would suggest that you should retire and get a little sleep if you can. I don't suppose you will be anxious to see Don Gregorio again, and I will spare your feelings by settling my little account with him before you are up. Good-night and pleasant dreams! Come in. Well, Captain, what is it?"

Captain Peters came into the cabin with a very ugly look on his face.

"It seems to me," he said in an even drier and harder tone that usual, "that someone's been and blown the gaff on us. Anyhow, there's that darned yacht outside and them cruisers on either side of her, and they've got a drop on us with their searchlights so's we can't get away nohow without being seen. Darned if I know how it's happened! Maybe his Excellence might be able to tell us."

Lorrain looked round at Madame Sybil with an expression on his face that she had seen there before, and she gathered from it that something very uncomfortable was going to happen before long. Then he turned to Captain Peters and said:

"That's rather awkward. I was in hopes we should be out before they got here. I have no doubt friend Gregorio left a message for them. Well, we have to get out somehow. Peaceably if they'll let us, but if not I shall fight. You've got plenty of steam, I suppose?"

"You can gamble on that, Seenyor; the Chief ain't quite the man to leave his pets without breath when there's a chance of a run on hand. You can have thirty knots right away, I reckon, and five more when they're wanted. And I guess you'll want them too."

Digitized by Google

"Very well," said Lorrain, getting up from his chair. "If you'll go and have everything ready I'll be on deck in a very few minutes. Stand straight out to sea at ten knots, and have the ammunition out and the guns loaded. Send someone to rouse up the President and tell him I want him on deck at once. Sybil, if you can keep awake for another hour or two you will probably see something interesting now. I'm going to wake her ladyship up to see the fun. There'll be room for both of you in the wheel-house if you would like to go up there. If there is any shooting it won't be more dangerous there than in any other part of the yacht, for if one of their big shells hits us it will sink us, I suppose, and you may as well be drowned in the fresh air as in the cabin."

When they got up on to the bridge Lorrain saw that the Pocahontas and her consort evidently meant business. Their searchlights flooded the water, and the yacht was an easy mark for their guns. When the astonished President came up he said to him with a harsh ring in his voice that made the little man feel anything but comfortable:

"Don Gregorio, you've been playing me false——"

"By the Holiest Mother, Don Francisco——"

"That'll do. I don't want any more lies. You know how I deal with anything like treachery. No, it's no good trying to kneel down, and if you kick up a row I'll have you gagged."

Don Gregorio was already grovelling at his feet, praying and whining for mercy in mingled English and Spanish, but Lorrain soon cut this short by ordering a couple of quartermasters to pick him up and tie him to the starboard end of the bridge. Then he slipped his arm through her ladyship's and drew her to the other end, leaving Madam Sybil to her own devices in the wheel-house.

"Are you really going to fight them all, Francisco?" she said, after a quick, half-frightened glance about her. "Surely this one little ship won't be anything like a match for them!"

"I shan't fight at all if I can help it, Jessie," he said, "for this is distinctly a case for running away if I can manage it in safety, but if I have to fight I will, and if I do get out and Tristam persists in following me, he'll get hurt. I shall try and give the two cruisers the slip, and then if he likes to follow, he can do it at his own risk. It's rather a curious situation. They have no real right to stop me or even to follow me about like this, and yet I can only stop them by committing an act of piracy which would make me an outlaw and render the Minnehaha liable to be sunk on sight. And yet, you see, if I don't stop them and if I can't run away from that infernal ship of Tristam's, he can follow us all the world over if he likes and have us both arrested the first chance he gets in a British port—you for having unlawful possession of the Gold Magnet, and myself on suspicion of having unlawfully disposed of the boy and your late lamented husband."

"Fighting would be better than that, whatever the consequences," she replied, coming closer to him. "Fancy the horror of a trial and all the rest of it! Ugh! I hope we get away all safe."

"Well, we'll have a try anyhow, and it shan't be my fault, dear, if we don't. Captain Peters, are those guns ready?"

"They are, Seenyor, and we've a full head of steam whenever you want it."

"Very well then, quicken her up to twenty knots and see if you can run through between the land and that cruiser."

The cruiser was the New York, and as the Minnehaha swung round and put on speed she too quickened up and stood in towards the land as though to head her off.

Lorrain watched her for a few moments as though calculating his chances, and then he said in a low, sharp tone to the Captain:

"We can just do it I think. I shan't fire unless he does, but we must be ready. Full speed ahead now, every ounce you've got!"

Captain Peters sent the signal down to the engine-room and repeated it, and the next minute the whole vessel was throbbing and quivering and panting like a labouring, living thing in agony. Her stern seemed to sink into the boiling mass of foam churned up by her whirling screws, and her sharp, graceful bows rose till the fore-foot was out of the water. The captain of the New York saw that in a few minutes she would slip through between him and the land, and he knew that if she once did that she was lost, for the Pocahontas was a couple of miles away at least, and the enormous speed of the Minnehaha would very soon take her out of range of the searchlights.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

Gone Away!

So fast were the two vessels going that it was a matter of some little difficulty to keep the light on the Minnehaha, and every now and then she seemed to change from substance into shadow, but when she was about a thousand yards away a combined glare fell on her deck again. The captain of the New York saw the long, wicked-looking dynamite guns trained on to his own vessel and the men standing beside them ready to open fire.

"I can't stand that!" he said, taking his glasses from his eyes. "I don't know whether she's bound for Cuba or not, but she's going that way and that's near enough for us. We'll try what a four-inch shell over her bows will do."

A few moments later those on board the Minnehaha saw a pale flash leap from one of the cruiser's forward broadside port-holes. The gunner had miscalculated the speed of the yacht and the shot, instead of passing, as was intended, across her bows, went over them, striking the man on the look-out and killing him instantly.

"First blood!" said Lorrain with a note almost of exultation in his voice. "Now I think we can give Uncle Sam a lesson in the new gunnery. Ready with those after-guns there! We are round the Point now. Lay her dead stern on to the cruiser, Captain. Then you and Mr. Lennox take a gun apiece. Go for his funnels and top-works. Don't let a light be shown on the ship."

The Minnehaha swung half round and at once vanished out of the field of the searchlights. The next instant there was a little flash of fire from her stern, then another and another, and within the next few seconds nearly forty pounds of dynamite had exploded on board the New York, for as long as the searchlight was not falling full on the Minnehaha it made a splendid mark and every shell went home.

The damage done by the dynamite was of course immense in proportion to the size of the shells which carried it. The steel armour of the deck and the casemates was burst in and split up. One shell had passed into the forward upper battery and burst inside it, killing every man and disabling every gun in it. The third had struck the forward funnel and instantly reduced it to a crumpled mass of old iron. The speed of the New York at once dropped from twenty to about fifteen knots. A few moments later every gun that could be brought to bear on the flying yacht, which was now only a dim little shadow on the dark oily water, burst into thunder and flame, and a perfect storm of projectiles from eight inch shell to Gatling bullets went hurtling and hissing through the night.

Lorrain had anticipated this, and as he had fired his third gun he ordered the helm to be put over, and the nimble little craft spun round and darted away at right angles to her former course. The result was that when the shot storm arrived she had left, and several hundred pounds worth of Uncle Sam's ammunition plunged with a great splash uselessly into the sea.

"That'll do for her, I think," said Lorrain. "They won't get twelve knots out of her now the funnel's gone. Here come the others. Now, Captain Peters, that one to the left is the English cruiser. I'll give you £500 if you'll do the same thing to one of her funnels, or both. You've got her dead on now. Hit her hard! If we can make her drop back out of range the thing will be evened up a bit. Steady the helm, get her dead stern on. Now I think you've got her."

Digitized by Google

Captain Peters "let her go," just as the Minnehaha rose on a long swell and the Hermoine was sliding down the slope of another one. His glasses showed Lorrain a bright flash bursting out close beside the six-inch quick firer on the Hermoine's fore-deck, and the next instant her searchlight vanished.

"Good, but not quite good enough, Captain!" said Lorrain. "Still, you must have done something besides putting the searchlight out, or he would have answered with that big gun before now. Let's see what you can do, Mr. Lennox."

The chief officer had meanwhile been watching his opportunity, and, as the fast-flying Minnehaha rose on top of another swell, and the range-finder showed that the gun was truly laid, he dispatched his projectile. It struck the cruiser somewhere on the side, probably on the superstructure, and as it burst it must have done some damage. At the same moment the Hermoine opened fire herself, although there was very little to shoot at, for the Minnehaha was now nearly four miles away. A couple of six-inch shells burst on either side of her, but did no damage, and meanwhile Captain Peters fired on the flash, and again, thanks partly to his own skill and partly to the perfect automatic aiming apparatus attached to the guns, the shell dropped on the Hermoine's deck amidships. She answered, but the shot dropped short a couple of hundred yards behind the Minnehaha.

"That'll do, Captain," said Lorrain. "If you haven't stopped him he's lost the range, and that comes to the same thing. It's splendid shooting and worth the money. Now we've only got our good friend Tristam to deal with. I think he's within range. Try a sighting shot at him. We shall have to fight it out now, whatever the end of it is."

Captain Peters fired almost as the last word left his lips, and at the same moment a burst of flame came from the decks of the Pocahontas. A six-inch shell went screaming through the air just over their heads, but a ripping and splintering about the deck and one or two shrill cries of pain showed that the projectiles from her lighter batteries had taken effect. One of these had also chipped a piece out of the side of one the Minnehaha's funnels, and the imperfect draught at once began to tell on her steaming power.

Captain Peters was immediately equal to the occasion, and after clapping a sheet of canvas over the wound in the outer skin he lashed it firmly on and stationed a man by it with a mop and a bucket of water to keep it cool. On the other hand those on board the Pocahontas found that firing their heavy guns dead ahead perceptibly diminished their speed, and the two lieutenants decided to content themselves for the present with the three-pound and four-pound quick-firers which could be trained dead ahead.

The Minnehaha of course showed no lights, but her pursuer was forced to keep her searchlight going even to catch an occasional glimpse of her, and this searchlight afforded Captain Peters a very convenient mark. In fact his twelve-pound dynamite shells kept dropping in such unpleasant proximity and burst with such well-timed precision in the water, that the two lieutenants, who now had charge of the ship, felt obliged to order all non-combatants below, an order which Courtland and Tristam flatly refused to obey, although they were very careful to see that the ladies did so.

The two yachts were now doing their utmost, and were flying through the water at a speed never attained by any vessel of their size before. Courtland had promised his stokers a hundred pounds an hour for every knot above thirty that they got out of the engines, with a thousand pounds to the engine-room if the Minnehaha was overtaken, and Lorrain had been even more magnificent in his promises; but after all the result of the chase depended as much on the guns as on the engines, for a shot that wrecked a funnel or tore out a plate near the water-line would settle the race in a very short time. Their speed was so nearly equal that if no accident happened to either they might remain within reach of each other for hours.

"I guess, Mr. Lennox, this is getting a bit too sultry to be healthy," said the skipper as another six-inch shell went screaming just over head. "He's only got to hit us once with one of them bottled thunder-storms and then come and pick up the pieces if there's any left. Wait until we rise on the next swell and shoot with me. Go for the light and shade your eyes careful. Ready now. There she goes, rising nicely. Now—let her go!"

The two guns spoke simultaneously. A few moments later the searchlight on the Pocahontas vanished in the midst of a blaze of yellow light. Another flash followed instantaneously lower down.

"Good shot, Lennox! I don't know which it was but it's doused his glim anyhow. Now I guess we'd better get out of this track. We hit him pretty hard that time, Seenyor. It wouldn't be a bad thing if we made a due east course now till we've cleared the islands and went and got a bit of breathing room in the Atlantic. These waters are getting a bit too crowded for us according to my way of thinking."

"Yes, that's not at all a bad idea," said Lorrain, "if we really can give that fellow the slip, though I should rather like to know how much we've hurt him before we say good-bye."

"It's a bit risky, Seenyor, unless you're on for a fight to a finish, if you'll excuse me giving an opinion, but if you want to give him the slip we can be ten miles away while he's groping around looking for us now that he's lost his eye. Ah, there goes his after-light again. But see, we're out of range. That means he's falling back, so I reckon we hurt him somewhere in a tender place with those last two shots. Shall we go round, Seenyor?"

Lorrain hesitated for a few moments before he replied. He would dearly have loved a fight to a finish, and if the Pocahontas had been alone he would probably have sacrificed his prudence to his hate and continued the fight until one of the two had gone to the bottom. But there were the other two cruisers coming up behind. He could see their searchlights playing and signalling on the horizon, and before the work was over one or both of them would come up, and then it might not be the Pocahontas that would go to the bottom. He thought of Jessie, too, and the Gold Magnet and its wonderful possibilities, and he felt a natural inclination to try them a little further after the wonderful, if unsatisfactory, proof he had had of them up the Ozama. So, after a brief debate with himself, prudence got the upper hand and he turned to Captain Peters and said:

"Well, yes, perhaps that's the best thing to do. There's no point in fighting the three of them and getting blown out of the water. Put her due east and go ahead for all she's worth."

"Right, Seenyor!" was the reply, and the word was at once passed to the wheel-house to alter the course to due east.

Lorrain then went forward and met her ladyship just coming from the bridge.

"Well?" she said; "is it all over?"

"It is all over for the present, your ladyship," he said. "We've managed to give them the slip without getting very much damaged, and now you see we are practising the better part of valour. I should very much have liked to stop and have it out with friend Tristam and, if possible, given him and his wife and perhaps Miss Harley, too, the pleasure of our hospitality for a little. It would have been a pleasant little change for you to entertain your late mistress and her friends here, wouldn't it?"

Digitized by Google

"I don't know," she said rather dubiously. "Your hospitality seems to have rather unpleasant consequences sometimes, and I'm afraid you'd do something horrible to them. By the way, may I ask what you're going to do with the President?"

"Hang him at daybreak!" said Lorrain shortly. "The treacherous little hound isn't fit to live. That's all the hospitality he's going to get, the little rat. Quite good enough for him. But if I had Tristam and his wife safe on board, I should feel inclined to take them down to Trinidad and tie them up to a couple of rocks face to face, so that each could watch the land-crabs pick the other one's bones. But perhaps I may have that pleasure yet. I've not done with them by any means."

"And what about madame yonder?" she asked, with a little motion of her head towards the bridge where Sybil was talking to the still captive President.

"Well, I suppose I should be justified in stringing her up beside him," he said, wondering whether her ladyship had any idea of the cause that Sybil had to hate him. "It's just possible, you know, that she may have had as much to do with putting those cruisers on our track as Gregorio had, but still, although I have no very particular reason to love her, I hardly think I could bring myself to perpetrate such woeful waste of handsome femininity as that. Physically, at any rate, she's a great deal too good for hanging."

"Then why not bestow her on the gallant captain?" said her ladyship, with a malicious little laugh. "What a pair they would make, and what a life he'd lead her! Can't you imagine what a hateful little tyrant he'd be as a husband?"

"Yes, that's not at all a bad idea," said Lorrain. "The skipper as a married man would be distinctly a study in matrimony, and if Madame Sybil doesn't like it, well, I'll give him carte blanche to make her."

"Capital!" she said. "And now that we have so far settled our domestic affairs, may I ask what we are going to do next? Are you going to the island to find the old treasure-ship?"

"No," he said. "I'm afraid I can't do that yet. You see, Tristam knows about its being there, and as he's lost us he'll go and look for it. He knows that you are here, and will therefore guess that you've told me about it, so the odds are that by the time we got to work he'd turn up with the two cruisers, and take the lot of us prisoners. No, I've been thinking a good deal the last hour or two—I always do think well when there's any excitement on—and I've come to the conclusion that we may as well fly at higher game. You see we're pirates now, just as much pirates as any lot of ruffians who ever flew the Jolly Roger. We have fired on two warships and a private yacht, and hurt them badly. We've probably killed several men fighting under the British and American flags, and so, as we have graduated in the profession, we may as well go ahead.

"Now there are plenty of treasureships besides that old Spanish one on the Cay, which may or may not have anything in it. The rivers will be opening in a week or two up in Alaska and the gold will be coming down in millions from Klondyke. That's the sort of happy hunting-ground for us. We know there'll be gold in those ships and we shall be able to clear half a dozen of them out before any one can stop us. We can be round in less than a month if it's decent weather. Of course we may have to collar a steamer or two and take her coal out, but we can't help that. I don't see why we shouldn't have a royal time and make millions in a few months. Then we'll buy some more ships like this and a slice of nice territory somewhere in South America, or else an island in some pleasant out of the way situation and start a kingdom on our own account. How does that strike your ladyship?"

"Glorious!" she said. "I can fancy myself a pirate queen."

"I'm glad you said queen," he replied, slipping his arm round her waist, "because that implies a king, and there isn't going to be any other king in that country——"

"But your noble self, I suppose?" she interrupted, looking up with a smile that was half shy and half saucy.

"Exactly," he said, stooping and kissing her. "And now I think it about time your majesty went to bed. When you come on deck to-morrow you will find yourself a good distance on your way to El Dorado in the north. Good-night!"

(To be continued.)

A Fine February

MAY OR MAY NOT BE PREDICTED BY THE WEATHER PROPHETS, BUT WE CAN GUARANTEE

A Fine February Number

OF

PEARSON'S MAGAZINE

JUST GLANCE OVER THE CONTENTS:

ARTISTS AND THEIR WORK. This feature includes beautiful reproductions of some of the finest pictures ever painted, as well as some interesting notes about the painters themselves and art matters generally.

HOW SOLDIERS FIGHT. In this magnificent article Mr. Connell gives a splendid description of the duties of a cavalry man on the field of battle. The illustrations, by Mr. Stanley L. Wood, are very striking.

REAL GHOST STORIES. By E. and H. Heron. No. II.—The Story of Medhans Lea. Illustrated by B. E. Minns. (A complete story.)

NEW KINGS ON OLD THRONES. By B. Waters. There are many people in England—far more than one would think—who cherish the belief that Queen Victoria is not the rightful occupant of the Throne. An interesting account of the societies they have formed, of the personality of the lady whose cause they espouse, and the life she is now leading, is set forth in this article.

THE POWDER PLAY. By A. J. Dawson. Illustrated by Warwick Goble. (A complete story.)

ONLY A VAGABOND. By Philip Hemery.

THE LIGHT WEIGHTS OF NAVAL WARFARE. By George Griffith. The author of this article was accorded special permission to be present on the trial-run of one of the speediest torpedo-boat destroyers yet built for the British Government, and his vivid description of the trip is now published for the benefit of the readers of the Magazine. Some striking photographs and illustrations accompany the article.

A BOOM IN THE DEVIL'S GULCH. By Merridan Howard. Illustrated by D. Murray Smith. (A complete story.)

THE GARDEN OF EDEN DISCOVERED. By Herbert C. Fyfe. Mr. Seton-Karr, the famous explorer, has been good enough to place at our disposal an account of his wonderful discovery in Somaliland, together with the beautiful photographs which he took during his wanderings through the country.

THE SPELL OF THE SWORD. By Frank Aubrey. Illustrated by A. Jule Goodman. A complete story by the author of one of the strangest and most popular novels of the year.

YOUR SONG. By J. J. Bell. Illustrated by Hana.

FREAKS. By J. R. Creed. Many cases have been known of men and women who have had horns growing from their heads. The illustrations here given of the most curious of these deformities are very remarkable. It is surprising to notice that the horns are in some instances quite ornamental.

A QUESTION OF RIGHT OF WAY. By C. K. Burrow. Illustrated by E. F. Sherie. (A complete story.)

A DAY ON A TROUT FARM. By Alfred Arkas. The methods of breeding trout, and of feeding and rearing them on scientific principles, make up a most interesting article, which is characteristically illustrated with photographs of the ponds and the fish at various periods of their existence.

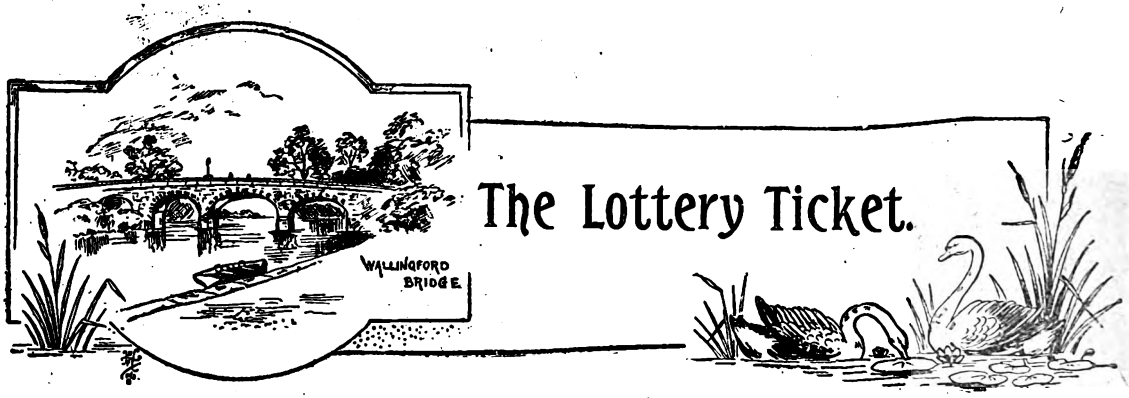
THE ADVENTURES OF CAPTAIN KETTLE. One of Captain Kettle's most exciting adventures.

TOTEMS. By Laura B. Starr. An interesting article on a curious subject, profusely illustrated with curious photographs.

LIFE'S LITTLE WORRIES. Mr. Alden is particularly amusing this month. He discourses upon the troubles and worries of neckties, plain boiled potatoes, blunt razors, newsboys, and waterproof boots.

ON SALE FEBRUARY 1st. PRICE SIXPENCE.

Digitized by Google



The Lottery Ticket.

So you want to hear the story of my marriage? Listen then, and you will say that it is an odd one.

It was late—near midnight—one cold, stormy night. I came out of a café, when a slender little girl, with dishevelled hair and wrapped in an old ragged shawl, begged me to buy the tenth of a lottery ticket. I took it and gave her an enormous sum—in her estimation—for it. I gave her a peso. Her sweet smile fully repaid my generosity.

"It will bring you luck, señorito," she affirmed, with the soft, clear pronunciation of the girls of Madrid.

"Are you sure?" I asked jokingly, as I slipped the ticket in my overcoat pocket, and folded my silk muffler closely round my throat, to protect me from the chill December winds.

"Of course I'm sure of it! Just as sure as you are that you have bought the ticket. The number—you watch the list when it comes out—is 1420; the exact number of the years of my life, fourteen, and the days of the month over, twenty. I wish I had bought the whole of the ticket instead of the tenth."

"Well, child," I responded, with the generosity, and tranquility of an old gambler who knows that he has never gained a cent, "don't worry, if the ticket draws a prize half of the tenth is for you and half for me."

"Señorito, for Heaven's sake, tell me your name, your street and number. I know that in four days more we shall win the grand prize."

I hesitated for a moment, then told her my name and where I lived. Ten minutes later, when I hurried through the Puerta del Sol to the Calle de la Montara, I had completely forgotten the incident.

Four days passed. I was still in bed one morning about ten o'clock, when I heard the "grand list" being called out through the streets. I sent my servant out to buy one, and when he brought it to me, my eyes immediately fell upon the number of the first prize. I thought I must be dreaming! No, I was awake! there it was! 1420—my tenth part of the ticket, the age of the seller, and good luck for her and me! Those blessed cyphers represented many thousand duros.*

I got up hastily, completely overwhelmed by my good luck, my legs shook, and cold perspiration came out all over my body. Do me the justice to believe that I never for one moment thought of taking back my offer. The little girl had brought me luck, she had been my mascot! It was a business transaction! We must divide the gains!

*A duro equals four shillings.

Then it occurred to me to take a look at the ticket I remembered perfectly that I put it in an outside pocket of my overcoat in order not to unbutton it. Where was my coat? Ah, there, hanging on its hook. I searched that overcoat thoroughly. Not a sign of the ticket.

I shouted furiously to the man and asked him if he had shaken my coat out of the window. Of course he had shaken it and brushed it carefully, but he had seen nothing drop out of the pockets, absolutely nothing! I looked at him, his face showed his veracity and honour. During the five years he had been in my service I had never detected him in the smallest theft.

I blush now when I think how I swore at that poor fellow.

I was frantic over my loss. I lighted a candle and searched in every corner, emptied my wardrobes, looked over my old papers, and carefully investigated the waste-paper basket. Nothing! Nothing! My hands were burning, my mouth dry, my heart filled with rage.

Late in the afternoon, I was lying on the lounge, smoking and still pondering over my horrible disappointment, when I heard a sharp ring at the bell, the sound of a discussion at the door, the protestations of someone who wished to enter, and then there appeared before me the little lottery ticket seller, who threw herself into my arms, with tears in her eyes, crying: "Señorito, señorito, we have drawn the grand prize!"

Alas for me! I fancied that I had already gone through the worst of my trouble, but I was mistaken. I had to tell this poor little girl, stammering like a criminal all the while, that I had lost the ticket, I could not find it anywhere, and therefore she could expect nothing from me.

I dreaded to see the look of sorrow and distrust come into those beautiful brown eyes.

But the little girl, raising her head, looked at me serenely and said, shrugging her shoulders: "Well, señorito, you and I were not born to be millionaires."

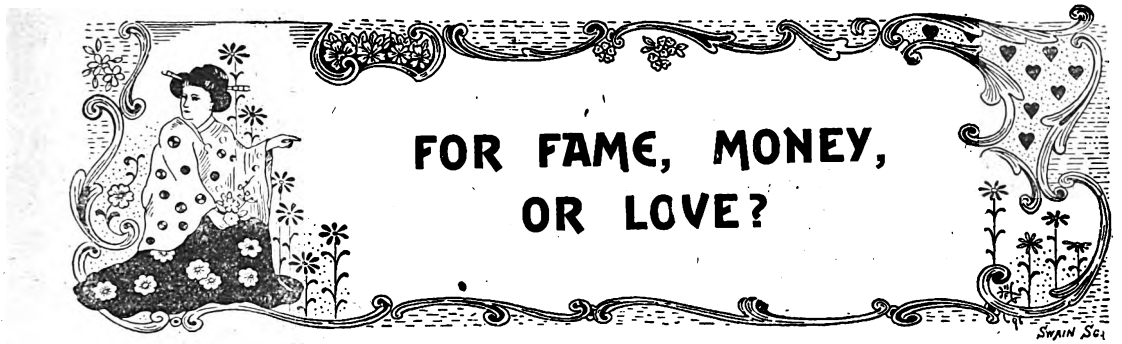
How could I repay the confidence of that disinterested child? How could I make fitting compensation for what I owed her? Yes, what I owed her!

My remorse and the conviction of my grave responsibility weighed upon me so heavily that I sent her to my mother to be well brought up. I educated her and finally married her.

And the most notable part of this story is that I have been perfectly happy ever since.

Emilia Bazan.

Digitized by Google



I was supremely happy. I use the superlative because, in all truth, I had never been so happy before. The cause of this ecstatic condition was the very ordinary fact that I had asked Beatrice Alden to be my wife, and she had consented.

I do not know what other men have felt under similar circumstances, but I can assure you that I felt and thought myself a very superior sort of being. I held myself very erect as I walked down the Strand on my way to my office.

Perhaps it might even be said that I "strutted." I don't know, certainly. I believe that I blindly walked into several persons. I have an indistinct notion of apologising more than once.

At any rate, I am confident that I was excusable under the circumstances. A man feels such sensations as I was experiencing only once in a life time. This was my turn at happiness, as it were.

I remember that I walked that morning because I felt compelled. I started in a 'bus, but abandoned the stuffy vehicle after a few yards. I could not endure confinement at such a time. You see, I was so happy. And yet, when I look back upon that moment now, and view my situation critically, I see that had I been perfectly sane, I must have realised that I was actually in a serious predicament.

I had asked Beatrice to marry me, and she had accepted in a dainty little note which greeted me at breakfast.

It had been a most foolhardy piece of presumption on my part to propose to her, for the reason that I often found it difficult to pay my own bills. How then could I meet even the expense of feeding and clothing a handsome woman accustomed to the good things of life—to say nothing of providing for the possibilities of the future?

I had known Beatrice for only a few months, but with me it had been love at first sight. I had devoted all of my spare time and most of my cash to the gratification of her little desires. I paid her marked attention, and, before long, became satisfied that she was not indifferent to my suit.

Discretion whispered to me to wait until I had built my dove cot before catching the dove, but love shrieked in my ears day and night: "Take her now or you will lose her." This seemed quite possible, for she was constantly surrounded by an admiring circle of men wherever she went.

My final proposing had been precipitated the night before by a streak of jealousy which overtook me whilst at the opera. I had bought a box, at considerable pecuniary sacrifice, and she and her mother had accompanied me. Much to my disgust, several men dropped in to visit, and remained to converse.

One man, who posed in society as a German count, particularly annoyed me. He monopolised Beatrice as though she were his personal property. Worse than that, she seemed quite willing for him to do so. I think, now, that this was but a feminine trick to make me anxious, and so hurry the crisis.

At least, it accomplished that result, for I left the box, obtained writing materials, and penned a formal proposal of marriage, which I slipped into her hand at parting. The result was the afore-mentioned note of acceptance, and the coincident happiness that this morning had already reached the pitch where I longed for a confidant.

It was in this frame of mind that I entered the building wherein I occupied a suite of two small rooms, upon the door of which appeared my name.

As I stood waiting for the lift, I mechanically allowed my eyes to run down a list of names of the other occupants. Suddenly my attention was arrested by one which seemed quite familiar—that of Andrew Manning. I had known a man by that name at Oxford, where we had been close friends. Then he went abroad and I had never seen him since.

On the way up I spoke to the lift boy, and my curiosity was whetted. From his account it seemed that this Andrew Manning not only had his business offices in the building, but had taken a large suite there, where he lived in bachelor style.

I at once sought his rooms. The office door was still locked, but upon wringing the bell of the next door, I was received by a servant, who, in response to my inquiries, said that Mr. Manning had gone out to breakfast, but would soon return.

Upon expressing a wish to wait, I was ushered into a really cosy apartment, which at first impressed me as the most luxuriously comfortable little box that I had ever entered. The next moment I experienced a sensation of oddity in my surroundings, the cause of which I was at a loss to name, as everything seemed so entirely in keeping with everything else that there was no incongruity. Yet there was an unconventionality about that assailed the senses.

At length I discovered the primary cause. The walls, ceiling, and carpet were black. The latter, upon closer scrutiny, I found was not a solid black, as it appeared, but a black background into which figures were interwoven in dark blue. The effect was very rich. The walls were covered with jet-black cartridge paper, but this was relieved at intervals by small fluer-de-lis in burnished blue steel.

The ceiling was covered with the same paper, studded with silver stars, arranged exactly as are the constellations in the heavens. In one corner was a crescent moon, which could be illuminated with electricity so as to light the room at night. A few of the planets could also to be made to serve as electric lamps.

Digitized by Google

The sombreness which would ordinarily prevail in such a room was entirely obviated by the furnishings. Rich Dagnestan rugs and heavy silk Oriental portières in warm colours, partly lightened up the prevailing blackness, whilst the walls were so covered with pictures in gilded frames that the papering served only to heighten the general effect. The furniture was all in bright though not gaudy colours. After taking in my surroundings in a general view, I began to walk round for closer inspection of the pictures, many of which I found to be rare gems. Presently I stopped before a frame which excited my curiosity to the utmost. Whereas the other pictures had all been paintings in water colour, or in oil, this was merely a photograph, a portrait of a woman. That much I could discern, though I could not see the features.

What riveted my attention was this. The photograph was cabinet size, placed in rather a large frame, surrounded by a wide mat. Covering the picture entirely was a black veil, folded several times and fastened to the glass at each corner by a red seal. This arrangement in itself was curious enough, but the mystery was heightened by the fact that a small gold hook had been driven into the upper edge of the frame, and that from this hook was suspended a bit of blue ribbon, at each end of which was attached a solitare diamond ring.

What could it mean? I had barely asked myself the question when a footstep in the adjoining room warned me that Manning had returned. Reflecting that after all it might not be my friend, and that, in any event, it would not be pleasant to be caught in front of a picture so suggestive of a secret history, probably of a personal character, I hastily stepped across the floor and dropped into a chair.

The next moment Manning entered, and, though changed, I at once recognised him as my old college chum. I arose and greeted him effusively, as was natural in my happy fame of mind. He took my hand cordially, remembering me also, but his manner was by no means demonstrative.

On the contrary, I detected a certain reserve, a sort of dignified quietness of speech, which at first jarred upon me. Indeed, I felt almost as though I had made a mistake in calling and that my old friend was not overjoyed in renewing my acquaintance. In this, however, I was entirely wrong, for upon my attempting to depart he peremptorily insisted upon my remaining to talk over old times.

After that we became almost chummy—at least, I did, though he still exhibited that phlegmatism which was so foreign to his character, as I recalled it. Finally, in spite of this reserve, I began to feel so much at home with him that I ventured to direct the conversation to the veiled picture.

"I suppose, Andrew," said I, "you must have trave'led in many countries since we last met; you have brought home such a number of curios from foreign climes."

"Another evidence, my friend," he replied, "of a poor deduction from good premises. Most of the pictures and bric-à-brac about this room attest a personal collection in many countries. But there their value as evidence ceases. I did not collect them myself; I simply inherited them."

"Inherited them?" I asked. "Why, none of your family have died, I hope?"

"No but a very dear friend. You may even remember him. He was at Oxford with us a short time—Julius Kraig!"

"Not the tall blonde fellow who was crazy on the subject of music?"

"The same. He went abroad immediately after graduation, and travelled everywhere. I eventually met him in Paris. We became great friends, and remained so till he died."

"What a pity that he should have died so young; for though we used to guy him I always thought that he had the seeds of genius in him." Here I determined to venture upon a bold stroke. "But tell me, Manning, why do you drape his picture with crepe?"

"How do you mean? Oh, I see! You have been looking round my room and allude to the veiled picture. You are wrong. That is not Kraig's portrait, though the crepe, as you term it, is there as a memento of him."

"In what way? I do not understand."

"My dear fellow, you have unwittingly touched upon a subject which is very painful to me; one upon which I seldom speak. But you are my old college chum, and I see that, unlike myself, you have retained your youth. I will tell you the story of that picture if you wish, but I warn you that it might be better for you not to hear it."

"Why? How can it affect me?"

"By shattering some of your ideals. By affecting your faith in human kind. Shall I tell you?"

"If you please!" I was too anxious to hear the story to hesitate for such a seeming trifle.

"That you may fully comprehend the strange tale," began Manning, "I must first tell you something about Kraig. As you have admitted, he was a genius. A greater musical genius than his never lived, perhaps, and yet he died without fame, almost unknown! I became very intimate with him shortly after reaching Paris. He had a bachelor suite on the Rue de la Paix. His principal room, a combination of dining-room, smoking-room and study, was fitted up exactly as this one is, with the exception of that picture which is veiled. Even the wall paper and ceiling I brought over with me."

He paused, and I stared about with renewed interest in my surroundings. I began almost to feel that it was uncanny, this scheme of inheriting a man's belongings, and perpetuating his living-rooms to such an extent as Manning had done. One could almost fancy that, if such things can be, Kraig's ghost would be about the place.

"Kraig had an odd theory about music," resumed Manning. "His idea was like this. A man is an embodied spirit. Thought is an attribute of the spiritual man. Language is, as it were, thought materialised; a necessary form of transmitting thought, essential to the physical man, but not used at all by spirits. In simpler language—articulate words are used by physical man to convey his thoughts to other physical men.

"Some thinkers claim that the spirit not only abandons words, but does not even employ any form of sound to convey thought. Kraig counted this a gross error. He argued that if a spirit could conceive the thought of another spirit, clairvoyantly, magnetically, or in any manner which would exclude the will power of the thinker, it would be manifest at once that thought would be useless, since it would be universally known as soon as conceived. Or, at least, spirits would cease to exist as separate individuals, and must necessarily combine as a single mind. Such a theory would destroy utterly our preconceived notions of immortality. The individual would no longer exist as an individual, and at death would simply be swallowed up by this one great spirit mind. This idea is abhorrent to us. Do you follow me?"

Digitized by Google

"Perfectly, thus far," I replied.

"Very well. The next step is to explain Kraig's notion of the transmission of thought in the spiritual world. This is accomplished, he believed, by means of music."

"By music? How ridiculous! Then the angels would all sing to each other."

"Exactly so; but remember, they would not sing words. Words belong to the material sphere. Kraig claimed, with much reason, that the spiritual is present in man, the animal, since man thinks and gives expression to his thoughts. This he does in two ways—by spoken words, the material method; and by music, the spiritual method."

"I don't quite grasp that," I objected.

"Yet it is perfectly simple. Your composer of music is merely a man who thinks out his ideas, and sets them down in musical tones instead of in words. This truth, of course, has not yet been grasped by the multitude, but it is only like the many others that we pass by, because they are so constantly present with us that we do not observe them."

Kraig then argued thus: "Here are two methods of conveying thought-spoken words and music. By the mathematical axiom, 'things equal to the same thing must be equal to one another.' Consequently for every word in a language there must be an exact equivalent in a musical tone, since each represents a thought. The converse is not true, however, for the reason that the language of words is very incomplete, many fine shadings of thought being so incommunicable in one language, that we are forced constantly to borrow from others to meet our wants. Even the sum of all the languages of the earth cannot express thought as accurately as can music, for there must be as many variations of a musical tone as there can be conceivable phases of thought. Thus the spiritual transcends the material."

"But granting all this, to what does it lead?"

"It led Kraig to a wonderful invention. He explained to me that whilst there could be no accurate equivalent of all musical tones in spoken words, at the same time it is quite possible that music composed by a material man would so differ from true spiritual music that, whilst the latter would not be transcribable to human tongue, the former, probably, would contain no ideas that could not be translated into words. This, because the mind in its material environment would not think in music much beyond what the tongue could not express in words. Do you get that?"

"Perfectly."

"Kraig's hope was to invent a new musical instrument which would accurately translate music. To be more explicit, his instrument when played upon would respond, not in ordinary tones, as does the piano, harp, or violin, but in actual spoken words, which words would be the equivalent in thought of the musical tones of the composition. In other words, the instrument, played upon like a piano, would respond somewhat as though a human voice were singing. Thus we should have spoken words and musical tones blended in a single expression of thought. Was not that a grand idea?"

"It sounds like insanity to me," I said dubiously.

"And to me, also, at first. Finally, however, I accepted the whole theory, but endeavoured to discourage Kraig from attempting the impossible. He would listen to my argument and shrug his shoulders with a smile, saying, 'Nothing is impossible. Man may accomplish what he wills! If it is conceivable in thought it is possible! The impossible cannot be conceived. The only difficulty is that the material man may wear out before the spiritual accomplishes his purpose. This, however, is no argument against endeavour, for what is unfinished in this life may be completed in another. We will begin where we left off. So all progress counts in the total sum.'

"Thus, you see, it was not easy to prevent Kraig from pursuing his hobby. Now I come to the story of the picture."

Manning paused a moment, but I remained silent. Presently he began again:

"In Paris I met and loved a beautiful girl. To make this part of my tale brief, I will only say that after a few months' acquaintance I was made excessively happy by her accepting me as her future husband. At the time, I had not seen Kraig for several days. I had never spoken to him of my love, because he always seemed so wrapped up in his music that all other topics of conversation were excluded. It was three days after my engagement when I walked up the stairs that led to Kraig's apartments. I had become so intimate that I did not even knock, but turning the door handle I entered the room—the room which was like this.

"Kraig was not there, but before I could look for him elsewhere I observed a new piece of furniture. It looked like a piano, and yet it was dissimilar, too, being like an upright piano, but double the usual length. Like a flash it dawned upon me that this was Kraig's new instrument. I advanced to examine it, and, raising the lid, I noted the white ivory keys. There were no black ones. My curiosity was at once so great I could not wait for Kraig's return. I was possessed with the desire to hear this instrument sing. I may say sing, because I have no other word that will express it. An evidence, you see of the poverty of language. I touched a key and produced a prolonged 'Oh-h-h,' which was so like grief that I released the note quickly. I glanced round in search of some music, and observed a freshly written manuscript lying upon Kraig's desk. This, evidently, was a composition made expressly for the new instrument. I took it with supppessed excitement, and with trembling fingers I began to play."

"Well?" I asked excitedly, as Manning paused. I was now thoroughly aroused by his weird tale.

"My friend," he continued, "I hope that you will never experience the agony that was mine during the next few minutes. As soon as I pressed the notes indicated in the manuscript, a voice as from another world spoke, or sang, or chanted—what you will; no words can describe it. It was a combination of musical tones of supremest purity with words in English. There was the only incongruity of discord.

"The harsh gutturals of our language sounded out of place, and yet they told a sad tale that has been burnt into my brain.

"I will repeat the words to you. The composition was entitled 'The Wail of a Broken Heart.' The music began in a monotonous but melodious chant, and the opening stanzas were devoted to an impassioned defence of the constancy of men, whose love, so the poet-musician declared, was no less often betrayed than was that of women. Then, leaping from the general to the particular the chant continued:

Digitized by Google

'This I know, that I, myself,
Am just that doting fool that trusted all to one.
She came into my life but five short months ago,
Yet in that brief, sweet space of time, I've dreamed of joy
So great that I have pitied those in Paradise,
Who die unhallowed by such love as I thought mine!

'In these fantastic visions I have seen myself
By emp'rors crowned. In fancy have been hailed Music's greatest master! Musician, world-renowned!

'But dearer yet than emp'ror's crown, within my heart
I prized the smile of love upon my sweetheart's lips;
For she it was whose sacred love had aided me,
To reach the pinnacle of fame. But these were dreams!'

"Here the melody changed, this time wailing out in mournful cadences the story of how, an hour before, all the composer's hopes had been dispelled by a brief note from the woman he had worshipped.

''Twas thus she wrote: "Forgive me, love!" What mockery
To use that word! "But I must tell the truth. Alas!
I have deceived thee. My love cannot enrich thy life!
I think I have no love—no heart—but in its stead Ambition stirs my soul. To share thy fame I would Have joined my life to thine. But I have changed my mind,
And now give all for wealth, which hath the mystic pow'r
To buy whate'er the heart may crave, including fame,
And love, perchance. And so I sell my love for gold!
For wealth I sell myself—and thee! Farewell! Forgive!"

'O God! that one so fair in form should be so foul
In soul! Ah! well! 'Tis over! Ended! Done! But——'

"Here the voice ceased, for the composition had never been completed. By an odd chance, however, I once more rested my hands upon the keys, absorbed amidst a riot of thoughts, when, to my horror, the voice again was heard, a terrifying shriek, ending in a prolonged moan, as from a soul in purgatory. I quickly lifted my hands, and silence reigned. At length this became so oppressive, that I hurried from the room in search of Kraig."

Manning was silent a moment or two, overcome by the emotions aroused by the recollection of the scene which he had depicted.

"I found him in his bedroom," he continued. "He lay prone on the floor, with blood oozing from his mouth. I hastened to him, but he was already dead. A post-mortem became necessary, and it was discovered that the heart muscle had actually been ruptured. He had literally died of a broken heart. I found in his tightly closed hand a copy of the letter referred to in the music. The words were identically the same, so you see how accurately he had transcribed his thoughts into musical composition, and how admirably his instrument had portrayed his emotions as well as his music. The greatest shock to me was yet to come. I found the envelope in which the note had been inclosed, and within it was a diamond ring, one of those now hanging from the ribbon. The inscription gave the name of the girl who had thus rudely sundered her engagement and killed my friend."

"Well?" I muttered, half expecting what he would say.

"Oh, I read there the name of the woman to whom I was engaged, that is all."

He left his seat abruptly, and went to the window, with a low, empty laugh, which made my heart turn chill. I sat silent, with a portentious feeling of some impending evil. I deeply regretted that I had tempted him into this recital. Now, I understood it all. The veiled picture was that woman's portrait. The two rings were her two engagement tokens, presented to her by Kraig and Manning. Presently he turned and came towards me. Standing near me, he continued with perfect control of his voice, and in that phlegmatic tone which now I comprehended—he had learnt self-repression.

"You see," he went on, "poor Kraig, upon receiving that cruel letter, had evidently tried to drown his sorrow in his music. His great instrument had just been completed. Fame was within his grasp when this blow which slew his love came upon him. With indomitable will he at once realised that, while his heart was so stirred, he might, perhaps, compose a masterpiece. So he sat down to write his own sad story in that spirit language, music. It was a master stroke of spirit over matter. His will would surmount the pain that a woman had caused him. Alas! Poor man! Even in the midst of this grand effort of the spirit to show its supremacy, the link that bound his soul to this earth was rudely snapped—his material self ceased to exist. The shock had broken his heart, and so his beautiful spirit was released.

"But I? I was still alive to face precisely the agony which he had thus escaped. The same note which told him that the woman would have married him for his fame, confessed that she accepted me for my wealth. Of course that ended all. I covered her face with the veil, and hung the two rings where you see them. I took Kraig's things and brought them here. His rooms I have reproduced, as you see; and because I wish to live alone, I have done the eccentric thing of making my home in an office building, away from the regular dwellings of the city. A morbid fancy, if you wish to consider it so. As to the wonderful instrument, that was injured on the way over, and was dumb when I opened it. Kraig being dead, there was none who could restore it."

"But what became of the girl?" I asked thoughtlessly.

"I do not know," he said absently. "To me Beatrice is dead!"

"Beatrice?" I asked with sudden surprise. "Did you say Beatrice?"

"Did I?" he asked, still dreamily. "I don't know. Perhaps I did. It was her name. Beatrice Alden."

No sooner had the words fallen from his lips than I started to my feet and rushed from the room. He tried to stay my flight, alarmed, I suppose, by my appearance; but I eluded him and rushed down the stairs and out of the building, never heeding where I went. All I knew was that my happiness had suddenly ceased.

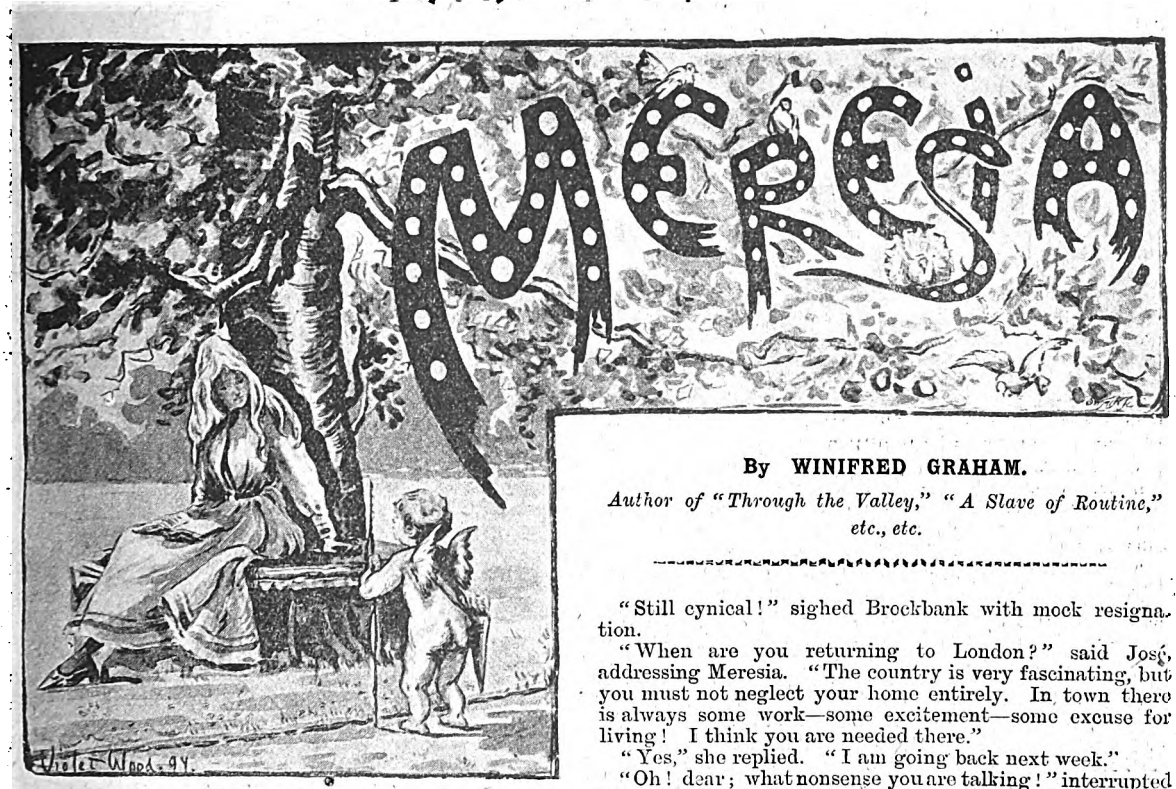
For hours I wandered about the streets like one crazed. When he told me this that she—that woman who had been death to poor Kraig and misery to himself—that she was Beatrice Alden, my Beatrice, the pain at my heart was so keen that I would cheerfully have accepted surcease by sharing Kraig's fate.

At last one ray of hope penetrated to my heart. She had accepted Kraig for his fame, and Manning for his wealth. Why had she accepted me? I have neither genius with which to win fame, nor that wealth which she counts so potent. For love? Why else? Then after all, is not love the greatest power, and has not her heart at last been found by me? Then why not accept the situation, forget this horrible tale, and marry Beatrice?

What would you do in my place?

R. Ottolengui.

Digitized by Google



By WINIFRED GRAHAM.

Author of "Through the Valley," "A Slave of Routine," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XXV.

I Hold Your Life!

Meresia could get no more conversation alone with José. She noticed he avoided her, and though longing to question him, she still dreaded to hear the worst, and half-welcomed delay.

On Sunday he left, summoned, he said, by letter that morning, to a patient. Herbert Brockbank offered to return with his friend, but the Milfords would not hear of this.

"We certainly cannot spare you before Monday," they said, "if you can endure our country dullness until then."

He accepted their invitation with alacrity, and showed scant disappointment at José's departure.

If Meresia looked troubled, the Doctor made no great contrast to her. He wore the air of an over-worked man—one who has thought deep thoughts and remembered them, and his face had aged considerably since the death of Alfonso Aladros. The boyishness which Bertie Haydon had been frequently privileged to witness was now entirely absent, and fresh lines made themselves visible on José's face.

As he bade Meresia good-bye, few would have taken him for a successful, affluent man.

He was thinner, paler, and bitterer even than in the dark days of his gaoler's life in Madrid.

"You might have the weight of the universe on your shoulders, old man!" said Herbert Brockbank. "I hope it is nothing very serious that calls you back to town?"

"Only the matter of a life in danger—one life is not of much consequence among the millions and millions, is it, Mrs. Aladros?"

He turned to Meresia, who stood by the open door, waiting while his luggage was brought down.

She made no reply, but the colour rushed to her face, and she raised her head as if at an insult.

"Still cynical!" sighed Brockbank with mock resignation.

"When are you returning to London?" said José, addressing Meresia. "The country is very fascinating, but you must not neglect your home entirely. In town there is always some work—some excitement—some excuse for living! I think you are needed there."

"Yes," she replied. "I am going back next week."

"Oh! dear; what nonsense you are talking!" interrupted Mrs. Milford. "I certainly cannot spare you yet, Meresia. Really, Doctor, your bad advice is quite demoralising. She had promised to stay another month at least with us. What attractions can London have for her now, poor darling?"

"Mrs. Aladros has a restless spirit—let her be! Besides, she most kindly accepted a little invitation for next week—only tea at my house with a few favoured friends, Haydon, Miss James, and three or four others. Don't fail to come," turning to Meresia, "I shall expect you on Tuesday at four o'clock!"

It was the first she had heard of the invitation, and guessed this to be merely his way of arranging the meeting of which he had spoken the night before, and as a means of enabling her to return without comment.

Her voice faltered slightly as she replied:

"Yes, I will be punctual—for once!"

Then the carriage drove the Doctor away, leaving her standing hatless on the doorstep beside Herbert Brockbank.

The sun had just come out after a heavy shower, and caught the rich colour of her hair—the trees and the grass sparkled and glistened, decked by thousands of unsubstantial brilliants.

She felt like a skeleton fresh risen from its grave, as she stood in the warm glow. What right had she to be there, in the very heart of living creation? By all the laws of the land she ought long ago to have found a resting place with the shamed and degraded!

Herbert Brockbank smiled as the carriage turned the corner of the drive. He had elected to look upon José as his rival with Meresia, and the absence of a rival is always pleasurable.

"If Serano is to have you on Tuesday," he said, "I, at least, am the more fortunate till Monday. Perhaps you will let me call on you—in London?"

"I don't think I shall stay," replied Meresia; "the house is so empty, desolate, and frightening now that I am alone. I suppose a man cannot realise a woman's horror of being left by herself in a house wholly associated in her mind with death, and one dead. It is like living in a tomb."

Digitized by Google

"I think I understand something of that feeling. Then you will only be in town for one night—only on Tuesday?"

"Ah, Tuesday!" she murmured with a little shudder.

"You don't want to go," he said. "Serano has worried you into it. Why not change your mind?"

Meresia shook her head.

"Ah!" thought the man, "she will not disappoint Serano." Then he said aloud;

"I have not been honoured with an invitation to this tea-party. Serano kindly put me up for a day or two during some alterations that were being done to my rooms, but I am to return to them to-morrow."

"Then I shall not see you, unless you care to call on the chance of finding me in on Wednesday afternoon. I will give you my address."

He eagerly accepted this small advance, and was convinced that the reason Serano had so pointedly left him out of Tuesday's invitation was the jealous fear that he had found favour in the eyes of Mrs. Aladros. He could see that Meresia had something on her mind from repeated little vagaries throughout the day, and the haziness of her conversation.

But she bore these minor trials with a quiet consideration and respectful tenderness that, coming from a comparative stranger, touched Meresia deeply. Her suspense was not so selfish but that she saw and appreciated such little things.

A certain sympathy, wordless, but existing nevertheless, sprang up between them. Meresia no longer felt her way towards this new acquaintance, but established a footing of friendliness that raised him to a seventh heaven of delight.

The following day she took leave of her parents, amid protestations from both, and travelled to town by the same train as Herbert Brockbank—for that he blessed Serano's tea party. At least it gave him a few more hours of her society.

The house felt terribly deserted as Meresia entered it, and met again the various objects that reminded her of the dead. They seemed to obtrude themselves at every corner with offensive persistency, and in the faces of her servants, and all whom she met, she fancied she detected suspicion!

Years of anxiety had elapsed since Saturday night, years of suspense and misery rolled into two days. One more night of restless tossing, and then she would know something at least of her fate! She dared not send for Elizabeth as consoler. Alas! she had cut herself adrift from consolation! Elizabeth was far-seeing, shrewd, observant; she would know at once that something was wrong, and perhaps press for explanations. So in friendless agony the hours passed, the night dragged its weary watches to the dawn, the morning waned into afternoon, and Meresia found herself at the appointed time asking for Dr. Serano.

No sign of the friends he had mentioned. It was as she had foretold.

The servant showed her to José's private study, where he was waiting. His eyes looked heavy, and he held an envelope—large and bulky in his hand, sealed with a huge seal, and addressed.

As the door closed, Meresia sank into the nearest chair, giddy from nervous exhaustion.

José did not speak till she had recovered her composure.

"I hope," he said, "I did not frighten you——"

"Then your hope is far from the mark! I have never spent two days more miserably on earth—they were worse than those first days, for then I hardly realised my position."

"No, but now I want you to realise it fully. You understand that I helped you, not because you desired to be free, but to revenge a community for which I would give my heart's blood. I work in the interest of a wronged and down-trodden people. I do not consider myself, or I should never have let you poison your husband, for in so doing I perjured my soul. I gave that with the rest, and I did not give it lightly, nor without a struggle. But we will not discuss the right or the wrong of it—that's over now, for a season. But one thing I must make clear; I need a service at your hands, and I ask you to do it without comment or discussion!"

"What service?"

"Merely to make yourself my messenger. You see this packet; it must be delivered by hand to the man to whom it is addressed, and the person that delivers it must bring back a reply. It is of vital importance to a great number of people. You are the only person I can trust."

He handed her the large sealed envelope. She looked at the address.

"But this is in Madrid," she said.

"Certainly, and to Madrid you must go. That was what I meant when I told you that you might have to leave England this week. Your visit need only be a short one, and your excuse—a desire to see the home of your dead husband. This helps you in your pose of distressed widow, and I have privately warned your parents to thwart you in nothing."

Meresia flung the packet angrily upon his desk. Her bright green eyes were ablaze now, her lips quivered indignantly.

"So it is for this you have made me suffer, and think myself suspected, lost, for this—servant's work! I am not your messenger, Dr. Serano—to be ordered here and there—and I refuse to go to Madrid. Now, if you have insulted me enough, I should be glad to end our interview."

She moved towards the door.

"Stop! you are in too great a hurry, Mrs. Aladros! You talk of being suspected; you have no fear of being betrayed. You forget that I have the means of forcing you to do my will, you ignore the fact that your rash action has put you in my power—that I hold your life, your honour in my hand. God knows that I am no villain wishing to trade on that power, but I think I desire some service in repayment."

"You talk as if you had nothing to do with my crime."

"Had I? Did you not poison your husband of your own free will? And if I gave you that poison, who would believe your story against mine? I have won for myself a position that men are kind enough to call unimpeachable. Your husband was my friend—my helper. If I say to the world certain actions since my friend's death on the part of his widow have aroused my suspicions so deeply that I must take steps to satisfy myself, do you think the world would prevent me exhuming your husband's body? Then I could show that there was poison in the body, and if you said: 'Yes, but Dr. Serano gave it me,' you would acknowledge the crime. I think, too, that a jury would conclude that I, for my part, should have let the dead lie, had the poison been procured by me. But these are gruesome subjects to discuss, and I neither wish to alarm or annoy you. I would much rather you did my bidding quietly and reasonably; it will save an infinity of trouble."

The bald facts he had revealed, and his immovable face, cowed Meresia! Her woman's heart failed; she took back the packet nervously, turning it over and over in her fingers, and trembling as she stood.

"When must I go?" she asked.

"As soon as possible, say, in three or four days; I will make everything easy for you. I can provide you with a courier who is thoroughly trustworthy, but I dare not let him take these papers, for fear he should lose them, or leave them about to be stolen."

Meresia held the envelope away from her, and looked at it with overwhelming fear, and an awful apprehension.

"Is it some conspiracy?" she whispered. "Will it do harm or good?"

"From my point of view, it must do good," replied Serano. "But don't, please, ask questions. It is so much better for yourself not to know. Be assured you are not personally, running any risk; your ignorance is your protection! The papers inclosed are written in Spanish—you would not understand them."

Digitized by Google

"So I am not allowed a point of view," she replied. "You are treating me very unfairly, very cruelly, and I am sorry to have fallen into your net—sorry to be your tool. I am going against my will, because the man is naturally stronger, and a woman cannot fight, unfortunately, such odds alone!"

"You might have paid a worse penalty for your crime," he said. "I did for you what no other living man would have done. I explained away the causes of death satisfactorily, I avoided an inquest. You might have procured the poison elsewhere, but not the doctor!"

She felt the truth of his words, but she was too angry and sore to acknowledge them, for she hated this mysterious mission; this working in the dark like a mere machine, guided by José Serano.

He offered her his hand, but she refused it, and left him in silence, with the envelope hidden under a light cape of some flimsy material.

Out in the London streets the town birds were playing at spring, but it was a poor imitation after country fare! Flowers cut and quickly fading, bloomed in the dust from dirty baskets, and were sold by grimy fingers. Their gaudy coloured counterfeits glared from the shop windows, and reared brazen heads in the hats and bonnets of passing women-kind, while the sun filtered through the smoke and showed the dirt on everything.

José watched Meresia drive away, then turned from the open window and rested his forehead in his hands.

"I've cowed a woman with threats," he said, "wretch that I am!" Then he reflected, and added with conviction: "For the sake of the injured I destroyed my soul; for the sake of the downtrodden she must work and obey. It is the inevitable law of balance, and Meresia Aladros cannot be spared!"

Mistaken or not, José Serano was at least in earnest, and for this, much shall hereafter be forgiven.

CHAPTER XXVI.

Storm and Stress.

Herbert Brockbank found Meresia in, alone. It was Wednesday afternoon. She welcomed his presence gladly, for solitude only deepened and aggravated her depression and resentment against José.

Half unconsciously, the knowledge that this stranger, who had so suddenly become a friend, cared for her—more than the care of passing admiration and the love of the eyes—dawned on the woman. It thrilled her with a new and maddening terror; it was a phase she had not bargained for when she murdered Aladros.

Love she had put aside as a thing apart from her life, but now the inevitable yearnings of her youth for sympathy and companionship rose to wage war with the bitterness that held sway. How could she ever give or receive affection from another man when the past, with its errors, its bloodshed, followed her on—on—and condemned her!

"Did you go to Serano's yesterday?" he asked.

"Yes." Her lips contracted slightly as she answered him.

"Who was there?"

She hesitated, then replied boldly: "No one, the party was a fraud. He wished to see me about another matter, something of importance."

The mind naturally turns to the worst conclusion, and Herbert Brockbank thought at once that the subject of importance which Serano needed to discuss alone with Mrs. Aladros was one of a sentimental nature. Had not José tried to put him off with sneering words and vague warnings—a ruse to clear his own path?

Meresia noticed his vexation, but little guessed the cause. Their talk grew stilted, meaningless, and a gloom fell on both.

"Are you staying in London or returning to the country?" he asked in a desultory sort of way.

"Neither; I am going to Spain."

"To Spain!" he ejaculated, and his fears deepened. Undoubtedly it was as he suspected.

"Only for a flying visit—a whim," she assured him with forced smiles. "I have a desire to see my husband's home in Madrid. It is the outcome of a restless spirit, and Dr. Serano advises, in fact, orders me to go."

"Ah! then you paid him a professional visit; it was on the subject of your health he wished to see you?"

Meresia hesitated to frame the untruth in words, so compromised, after the fashion of the world, by nodding assent.

Herbert Brockbank breathed more freely, but his jealousy now rankled against the dead husband to whose home Meresia was about to journey.

"I suppose you have always had a passionate longing to see Spain?" he queried.

"No," Meresia answered; and there was something fierce, something stifled in her tone. "I am obliged to go on business."

"But you said just now——"

"Oh! yes—yes; I say many things when I talk that I don't quite mean; I say them without thinking; it is a habit I suppose. I felt it might be pleasanter to pretend I was going for pleasure; but somehow, though I have only known you a few days, you make it difficult for me to pretend."

"That is one of the kindest things you could have said," he answered. "But can no one else attend to your affairs in Madrid, and save you unnecessary trouble?"

She shook her head.

"Trouble is always necessary, or we should never take it," she said. "It forces itself upon us, or is forced by other people. If we are strong we may master the enemy, if we are weak we fall, and obey these tiresome orders of fate and circumstance. I am one of the weaklings, so I consent to be driven, and by a tight rein. But you will think I am talking nonsense—at random—you will laugh at me!"

"On the contrary, I would give worlds to help you."

He spoke with the whole energy of his nature, aspiring to an unreserved intimacy, and waiting for Meresia to answer in the breathless expectancy of intense enthusiasm.

But the secret weight of her hidden cares oppressed Mrs. Aladros and deadened her faculties, while every spring of action relaxed. She leant back in her chair feeling limp and nerveless, while the load on her heart pressed even heavier than before.

If she could have taken this man into her confidence and told him all; if she could have trusted anyone with her fearful secret, the burden might have been lightened. But she could neither ask advice nor seek comfort, and the vision of the dreaded journey came back with tantalising clearness before her eyes. Again she felt insulted, ill-used, trapped by the Spanish doctor.

"You are very good," she said simply, with a little gesture of her hand towards Herbert Brockbank. "But you cannot help me. Believe me when I tell you that I am a most miserable woman, but no one on earth can release me from my misery. So far I have confided to you, in owning that, more than I've told my nearest or my dearest. For the rest of my life I must walk alone, and suffer in silence."

Her head bent low, so that he could not see her eyes. The picture of her grief gave him courage—he drew nearer.

"Why alone? And must you suffer—always."

"Yes, always."

"Then let me share your sufferings—give me at least some part in it—some place."

Her eyes were still downcast, for the passion in his voice shook her control. She tried to answer calmly.

Digitized by Google

"But, as a rule, people are not so anxious to suffer."

"I love you," he said slowly, "is that not reason enough?"

Meresia turned cold, for the isolation of her life confronted her. What would his love change to if the mask could be laid aside, and her thoughts revealed? If he could know her sin, would he still say: "I love you!" would that still be reason enough?

A morbid insensibility crept over Meresia, momentarily calming the sharp pain produced by his words. It was an unnatural state of mind—this sudden halting of emotion—a violence on its powers and energies!

"I am fettered—hemmed in," she said at last. "I can give no love and take no love."

Her words sounded hard and feelingless; to the man they came as a blow, though he had half expected them.

"Forgive me," he said; "I ought not to have spoken yet. I said what I thought aloud, hardly realising you would hear and answer me. I could not help myself. Perhaps some day—when time has made the way easier, when you can forget the sorrows, the losses of the past—you will listen to me again—you will let me repeat what I ought not to have said to-day."

Meresia saved herself with an effort from acting on the impulse of the moment, and deliberated. The situation required a caution and reserve to which she had never before been called.

She looked up at him with infinite tenderness in her eyes, and, as he returned the glance, she felt that this—this alone—was the real, the great tragedy of her life.

All she had endured since the death of her husband could not compare to this sudden finding and losing of joy. The warm glow of new sentiments, new anticipations, and then the cold formality of her forced reply:

"There is nothing to forgive, but now or in ten years' time it will be the same. There can be no happy end for me. I have lived in vain. I have missed the mark. If I suffer, you cannot share my suffering. Women, you know"—turning away with a little catch in her voice—"have a special gift for enduring pain."

"What is it that stands between us? Only tell me, only trust me, and I will break it down. Meresia, dear, if I thought you could ever care, nothing should bar the way. Can't you see I'm desperate? Have you ever tried to limit love, to measure it's breadth and depth? For the sake of love, suffering itself is welcome; through good or evil, love, the real, the true, will stand! Only test mine, give it a trial; that is so little to ask, after all. I will go away to wait in silence. I will do anything you tell me for a word of hope."

Meresia shrank from his pleading with a kind of terror. She thought of herself as a creature depraved, shunned alike by men and women. Her conscience rose up to convict her. "This is your penalty," it said, and seemed to take the voices of powerful and malignant spirits, which whispered of punishment here and hereafter.

"Oh! no, no, no," she gasped, half addressing herself to the man, half warding away the unseen tormentors of her tortured brain. "I cannot listen, I cannot hope, I cannot tell, it is all mystery and misery. Don't let me blight your life," rising, and taking Herbert Brockbank's hand in her trembling ones. "I've done enough harm without that. You must not see me again, you must not indeed."

He held the hands she gave him long and fervently, looking into her eyes, and marvelling at the sweetness, and the beauty, of her pale, passionate face.

What could it mean but that she loved him, those tear-stained lashes and trembling lips? But she was overwrought, and some exaggerated care made a difficulty which the man was determined to conquer.

Now he saw she was weak and overwrought, so he left her obediently, with a few soft words that lingered long in her mind, and made the parting harder for Meresia.

She felt at last that she was capable of passionate and all-absorbing love, a love self-sacrificing and devoted. But a strong sense of honour and duty towards the man who had brought this feeling into existence made her determine to crush it, and see him no more.

For a while she sat motionless, wondering what would happen next. This new complication was so unexpected that Meresia felt prepared for anything. That her heart should have gone out with a sudden wild yearning—to Herbert Brockbank of all men—a mere passer-by upon life's stream—a ship sighted in the night—amazed her. But the harbour must be left, forgotten, and the rough seas faced; the waves that would toss and beat till the end of her little span, only to waft her on into the deeper waters of eternity.

The light was fading, and a servant came in with a lamp.

"If you please, ma'am, there is a man downstairs asking to see you."

"What sort of a man? Who is he?"

"A servant of Dr. Serano's, I fancy, ma'am. He said something about an accident."

Meresia waited to hear no more. She flew quickly out of the room and down the stairs.

"Where is he?" she asked, but before the answer came Mrs. Aladros had reached the hall, where a man in livery was waiting.

"If you please, madam," he said, "will you come at once to Dr. Serano? He has been thrown from his carriage—the horses ran away down Piccadilly, and the master is badly, we fear fatally injured. There are two doctors with him, and one of them sent me here to say he had asked to see you."

Meresia listened with a certain apathy to the words—hardly comprehending them, and yet it seemed that some intuition had told her of this before, as she sat alone after her lover's departure. She experienced no surprise, no shock; it seemed a natural event, instead of a startling calamity.

"Bring me a hat and cloak quickly," she said to the maid, and, turning to the man, "call a hansom, please."

"There is one waiting," he replied.

A moment later she was driving at great speed through the London streets. The lamps, which were just being lit, danced before her eyes, and the rush and roar of many waters sounded in her ears. She fancied herself flying through space—now rising, now falling—and her thoughts jumbled themselves into a hopeless tangle.

José ill? José dying? José, the strong—the all powerful? Impossible! This was some trick of Fate—a mockery; it could not mean that he had really sunk to the level of the sick!—the broken!—the stricken of God!

The driver pulled up sharply, and Meresia, waking with a start from her dream, sprang on to the pavement, and ran up the steps of Dr. Serano's house.

(To be concluded.)

WHAT THE WORLD SAYS.

That the new serial in The Sunday Reader—"In Cæsar's Name"—is one of the finest stories ever written.
That it is crammed with incident and interest.
That it will be enjoyed by young and old.
That the first instalment is published this week.
That you can commence reading right away.
That you must purchase your Sunday Reader at once.
That unless you do this you will be too late, for the number will go rapidly out of print.
That every person in the Kingdom, and especially friends of S.S., should read this entrancing serial, "In Cæsar's Name," now appearing in The Sunday Reader.

NOW READY | THE SUNDAY READER. | ONE PENNY.

A Magnificent Coloured Engraving Given Away with Every Number.

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

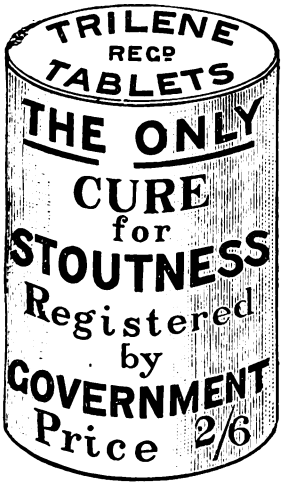
TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY, whether Abdominal or General. They are small, agreeable, harmless, sent privately, and never fail to Improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87, Alexandra Road, Norwich, Oct. 19th, 1896.

"GENTLEMEN,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them—their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was for many years growing too stout; but although the disease was, I consider, chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely. You have our united thanks; and if I can do anything to promote your interests, I will freely use my utmost endeavours to do so.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

PRINCESS LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me directly your excellent Tablets."

SURGEON-COLONEL E. S. BRANDER, M.D., writes from Ihansi, India: "September 12th, 1897. In my experience your Tablets form an efficient remedy for reducing weight."

LADY CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

MRS. BOSTON, of Clifford Street, South Wigston, Leicester, writes: "I am much thinner and lighter in myself since taking your Tablets."

W. G. LOVE, 4, Kirk Street, Peterhead, N.B., says: "I finished Tablets a fortnight ago, and am reduced a great deal—never felt better in my life."

Convalescent Home, New Brighton, Cheshire.

MISS S. J. PRITCHARD says: "They have done me much good. I am 21lb. lighter already."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk either by means of severe dieting or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a case of the wonderful Trilene Tablets, which are guaranteed absolutely harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, or any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing Cure for Obesity. The Tablets are sold in boxes at 2s. 6d., and are obtainable from the Trilene Company, 66, Finsbury Pavement, London."

25, Windsor Terrace, Penarth, Cardiff.

MISS M. FLAVELL says: "I have lost 2st., and am much better in health."

Windsor Hotel, Merthyr Vale, South Wales.

MR. J. THOMAS writes: "When I started the Tablets I weighed 17½st., and have got down to 14st. 9lb."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

MR. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

MRS. HUTCHINSON, 46, Irwell Street, Widnes, Lancashire, writes: "I have taken three boxes and am reduced 2st."

A. D. BILLINGS, Bell Inn, Aldershot, writes: "Have derived great benefit already. Less in size and weight, breathing greatly improved."

MISS WELLS, Aldeburgh Hall, Saxmundham, writes: "I am pleased to say I receive great benefit from them."

MISS DUGGLEBY, 16, New Road, Driffield, writes: "The girl who took your Tablets is reduced about 2½st."

MISS C. E. SINGLETON, 3, Courtenay Terrace, Teignmouth, says: "They have done me a great deal of good, and I will do my best to make them known. You may use this letter as you please."

MISS MACPHERSON, Balmagowan Lodge, Methuen, Perth, says: "I have taken one box, and am reduced 1st."

MRS. EDMONDS, Pontyguesta, Pontychin, Llantrissant, says: "I have lost more than a stone in a very short time."

MARIAN TAYLOR, Church Farm, St. James, Halesworth, says: "I have lost quite 2st. since taking your Tablets."

MISS GILLESPIE, 50, Chaucer Road, Forest Gate, Essex, says: "I have lost just 3st."

E. NICHOLSON, Crossfield, Staniland, Halifax, says: "I am pleased to say your Tablets are lessening my size very much, and my two sisters are going in for your pleasant treatment."

COUNTESS G. FÜRSTENBERG, of Stammheim, Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

Digitized by Google

NOTES OF INTEREST.

THE new serial story of which I spoke last week begins in this number. It is without doubt the most powerful naval war story that has ever appeared in any publication. In order to stimulate interest in this, the first instalment, I offer a volume of "THE FINAL WAR" to each of the ten readers who point out by Monday, February 7th (in envelopes marked "Empress") the greatest number of discrepances between the text and the illustrations. Tell your friends about this magnificent story, "The Empress of the Earth."

THE guinea offered in the recent asterisk competition has been won by Mr. R. Plowman, 1, Walcot Square, Kennington, S.E., whose attempt was the first to hand with only two mistakes. Here is the key: 1, Aberdeen; 2, Braunton; 3, Cliffon; 4, Dalmeny; 5, Lancaster.

H. G. asks: "Which two public men have been most alike physically?" ———Probably no two men of modern times are more alike than Mr. Alma Tadema, the well-known artist, and the late Mr. George du Maurier, author of Trilby. These two gentlemen so exactly resembled one another that even their dearest and nearest friends were sometimes deceived.

A. C.—No, London is not the most cosmopolitan city in the world. This reputation is enjoyed by San Francisco, where the holidays of almost every nation are commemorated by public parades. Every civilised language may be heard, and the ships of every maritime nation, from the British man-of-war to the Maltese felucca and the Chinese junk, are seen in the bay.

MOTHER.—Children seldom shed tears before the age of three months, so there is no reason why you should be alarmed.

P. B. W. is very much in love, and would very much like to tell the object of his adoration all about it, and ask her to marry him. Just at present, however, he is unable to say exactly when he will be in a position to marry, and he wants to know whether he would be justified in proposing under the circumstances. ———There is certainly no harm in asking the lady. She can but refuse you, but if she cares for you she will not mind waiting a little. If you wait until you are able to marry before you declare your love, the possibility of losing her altogether is materially increased.

W. K.—Yorkshire has been the site of more battles than any other English county. From the years A.D. 61 to 1644 thirteen battles are recorded as having been fought on the soil of Yorkshire, and there must be several others of which no record has been kept.

E. N.—The largest of all song birds is the lyre bird of Australia. It has two voices—one a loud, shrill call, which can be heard at a great distance, and the other an inward and varied song, which can only be heard at a distance of a few yards.

M. W. wishes to communicate with the Queen, and, like the wise man I have no doubt he is, before doing so, wishes to find out the proper way to set about it.———To begin with, the paper on which letters addressed to Her Majesty are written must not be folded, for no communication which bears evidence of having been creased will ever fall into her hands. The letter should be written on thick, glossy paper, and inclosed in an envelope that fits it properly. All folded letters are opened by the Mistress of the Robes, and as a rule, the contents never get beyond her, or, if the letter is of any importance it would probably be returned to the writer with directions as to how to forward it.

R. E. G.—An excellent way to obtain a good caricature of anyone is to first of all get a likeness of the person you want to draw, on a sheet of thin india-rubber; then put this over a frame, stretching any parts you wish to exaggerate. In this way you will get an exact reproduction of your friend's face as it would be if it were manipulated in the flesh.

INVALID is anxious to know which is the healthiest place in the world to live.———Judging from the death-rates, the little French hamlet of Aumone might well lay claim to the distinction. There are forty inhabitants, of whom twenty-eight are over eighty-five years of age, and three are over a hundred, and there are no graves in the local cemetery.

B. N. wants to know how a wedding-cake came to be such an indispensable part of a marriage feast.———It is a relic of an old Roman custom. At a Roman wedding, the bride was always supposed to prepare at least a part of the feast with her own hands.

T. H. wants to know if pure water is colourless.———According to a learned professor absolutely pure water, when seen in masses of sufficient depth, is blue, and all the varieties of colour seen in lakes and streams arise from the presence in the water of mineral salts of different degrees of solubility and in varying quantities.

S. C. J.—The tallest structure, compared with the size of the builder, is the hill of Termites, or white ants. If the houses of men were proportionately built, the humblest residence would be a mile high.

WE regret to say that the tale which appeared in Short Stories on December 25th, and entitled "The Sermon that Never was Preached," was inserted in this paper under a misapprehension. At the time we believed that it was an original contribution, and we paid for it as such. We have since learnt that it is the property of the author, Mr. Allen Clarke (author of "The Knobstick," etc.), and we must apologise for having inserted it without his permission.

J. N.—No, mad people never realise that they are mad. The moment a madman realises that his ideas are delusions he is not really insane.

P. M. asks: "How many members is it necessary should be present in Parliament in order that a Bill may be discussed?"———In which House do you mean, the House of Commons or the House of Lords? In the former forty members must be present or all discussion of a Bill must cease, the House is counted out, and adjournment necessarily follows. On the other hand, a Bill may be considered in the House of Lords if there are only three members on the benches.

A-BRIDE-TO-BE.—The bride's veil is a relic of the "care cloth," a canopy held over the virgin bride by our Saxon forefathers to conceal her embarrassment.

PETER.—Yes, large tobacco firms are certainly coming to the front in advertising, and are showing a tremendous amount of ingenuity in the drawing-up of their notices. I should think Messrs. Ogden would probably come first in this direction. For smartness and originality of ideas they are hard to beat.

ACHING HEAD wants to know how it is that the present generation seems to suffer so much more from headache than did their ancestors.———The reason is simple enough. People depend so much more upon their brains for a living than they used, and overwork in this direction will soon bring on a headache. The consequence is that the patent drug market is flooded with different remedies, amongst the best of which may be mentioned the "Kaputine" and "Daisy" cures. Free samples of these medicines may be had by writing to Kaputine Ltd., Huddersfield, for the former, and Daisy Ltd., Leeds, for the latter.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

DEER RECTORY,
MINTLAW, ABERDEEN,
Nov. 8th, 1897.

From Rev. J. H. BURN.

"My own cure with one dose of KAPUTINE was marvellous after ten weeks' incessant neuralgia.

Thirteen years' suffering effectually and speedily relieved by KAPUTINE is the testimony of Rev. T. TAYLOR, VICAR of ST. BREDWARDS, Cornwall.

There is nothing like this wonderful KAPUTINE. Nothing Similar, Nothing as Good.

Sold by all leading Chemists, Packets of 18 Doses, 1s.

If any Difficulty, send and enclose stamped envelope to "A.M.," KAPUTINE Ltd., Huddersfield, for free samples, or 12 Stamps for a Packet of 18 doses.

KAPUTINE

THE SAFE REMEDY FOR HEADACHE.

EASY COMPETITION FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

As a reward to those who assist in selling KAPUTINE, we will forward to each sender of the first ten letters opened Feb. 1st, 1898, with the missing letters of the Eight following words correctly filled in, descriptive of the qualities of KAPUTINE, £1 each; to the next ten 5s. each; to the next ten 2s. 6d. each.

K*PU*I*E	AEEA*LE	P*RF*CT	U*EQLL*D
T*N*C	I*IM*T*BL*	NO*PO*SONS	EECT*VE

As a guarantee that the competitor has assisted in selling KAPUTINE for Headache, each competitor must enclose four stamped outside wrappers of KAPUTINE packets. These four wrappers may be easily obtained if you persuade your friends or relations to let you buy one packet each for them, and you can then get the wrappers necessary. Show them our advertisement and you will have no difficulty in getting them to buy a packet of this wonderful remedy for Headache and Neuralgia, or you may get several friends to join at one packet. You have three months to win the prize in.

In addition to the above prizes we will give a crisp £10 Bank of England Note to the person sending, on February 1st, 1898, the largest number of outside wrappers bearing part of the medicine stamp. These wrappers you may obtain as suggested above.

Address: "A.M.," Kaputine Ltd., Huddersfield. List of Winners "Yorkshire Post," February 7th, 1898.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

NO DECEPTION HERE!!!

During OUR ANNUAL CLEARANCE SALE (which is now taking place) we shall give TWO CASH PRIZES of £15 each, and THIRTY PRIZES of 20/- each. Send a Post-card for Sale Price List and full particulars without delay.

Price Lists and Patterns post free, and need not be returned

Genuine Bargains are being offered in Dress Materials, Mantlings, Suitings, Flannels, Flannelettes, Blankets, Sheets, Quilts, Underclothing, Curtains, Carpets, Towels, etc., etc.

STOCK MUST BE CLEARED.

FIRST ORDER OPENED EVERY WEDNESDAY FREE.

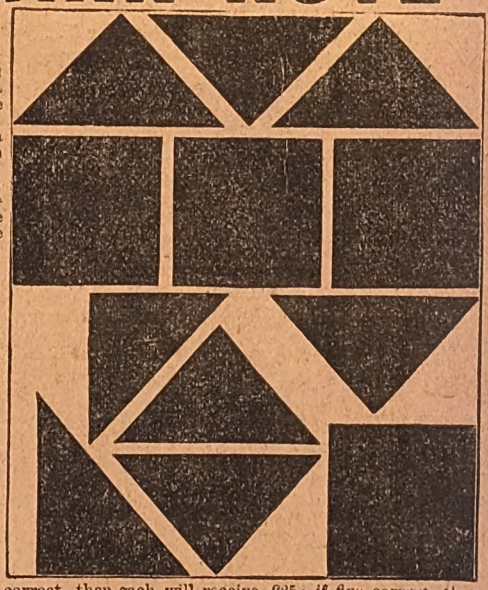
You will honestly save your 5/- in the pound by purchasing now from

LUTAS LEATHLEY & CO.,

Dept. 41, ARMLEY, LEEDS.

£50 BANK NOTE

GIVEN AWAY to purchasers of ZUILIA the new Indian perfume, solely manufactured by the ZUILIA Perfumery Co., Rosebery Avenue, London, E.C. Put up in artistic bottles packed in wool, in handsome box, 1/3; sent carriage free per return for 1/6. This new and powerful scent is a marvellous discovery, being a blend of odoriferous perfumes, from which emanates a delicious aroma, delicate and pleasing, the generous bouquet pervading the boudoir, and, in fact, the whole household. No home should be without it. With "Zuilia" Perfume we are giving free a 6d. sample box of Zuilia Dentifrice, unsurpassed for the preservation of the teeth.



A SPECIAL OFFER.

£50 will be given gratis to purchasers who succeed in placing together the twelve pieces to form a square.

INSTRUCTIONS.—Cut out the pieces and place together in such a way that the whole will form an ordinary square. When done, paste on cardboard or thick paper (in order to keep the square together), then post the same to us, with a stamped envelope addressed, enclosing P.O. or stamps value 1/6 for "Zuilia" scent.

Nota Bene.—This offer holds good for readers of this paper for the next fourteen days. Should there be more than one person succeed in forming the square, then the £50 will be divided thus: If two correct, then each will receive £25; if five correct, then each will receive £10; if ten, then each will receive £5; and so on. The task set being very difficult, it is anticipated that few will succeed in solving, thus making the remuneration very substantial.

It is Surely Worth Trying For.

THE ZUILIA PERFUMERY CO.,

13 ROSEBERY AVENUE, LONDON, E.C.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

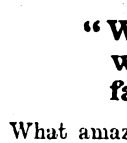
Mind, Morals and Medicine

TO AUTHORS, AND ALL WHOM IT MAY CONCERN.

"Operating on the mind by means of the body," a secret discovered, we believe, by Camus, is remarked upon by several great writers. DRYDEN, for instance, says:

"When I have a grand design I ever take physic, for when you would have pure swiftness of thought and fiery flights of fancy, you must have a care of the interior."

What amazing "fiery flights" we would have been treated to had DRYDEN been lucky enough to have plied his pen in the days of such an approved medicine as BEECHAM'S PILLS, readers will hardly be able to imagine! LORD BYRON is also lucid when he says:



"The thing that gives me the highest spirits (it seems absurd, but true) is a dose of salts; but one can't take them like champagne."

Surely after this we shall be pardoned for exclaiming, "How BYRON would positively have revelled in his box of BEECHAM'S PILLS!" Other old-time philosophers evidently sailed in the same boat, for we read that

"CARNEADES was accustomed to take copious doses of a GREAT APERIENT as a preparation to refute certain dogmas."

Well, we are certainly bold enough to suggest that, had CARNEADES existed later, his "GREAT APERIENT" would have been none other than BEECHAM'S PILLS, for what medicine has proved itself so eminently worthy of the title? The elder DISRAELI also speaks out on the subject:

"If the mind be disordered, we may often look for its seat in some corporeal derangement. Often are our thoughts disturbed by a strange irritability called the 'fidgets,' a disorder to which the ladies are particularly liable."

DISRAELI was quite right. But with the advent to the world of such known fidget-dispellers as BEECHAM'S PILLS matters have much changed. "Fidgets" notwithstanding are allowed to be all too prevalent to-day, and with both sexes. Perhaps the most innocent kind of fidgets is that peculiar feeling which suddenly seizes some people on discovering they are minus their BEECHAM PILL box, a feeling which of course disappears just as rapidly on the pills' reappearance, for BEECHAM'S PILLS are wonderfully trusty companions. But DISRAELI continues:

"Sometimes our dreams present us with images of our restlessness, till we recollect that the seat of our brain may perhaps lie in our stomach, and that the most artificial logic to make us reasonable may be simply a pill."

DISRAELI again hits the nail on the head. And that this knack of "making us reasonable" in cases of nightmare and lively dreams belongs to BEECHAM'S PILLS, we think goes without saying. Finally, with such practical evidence before us, we feel we must agree with BAYES when he says:

"That for a sonnet to AMANDA, and the like, stewed prunes only might be sufficient, but, for a grand design, nothing less than a more formal and formidable dose."

But BAYES doesn't say of what. We most decidedly say a dose of

BEECHAM'S PILLS

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London W.C.

BEGIN READING OUR GRAND WAR STORY TO-DAY.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY G. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

NO. 476. FOR WEEK ENDING FEBRUARY 12TH, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

THE PIONEER OF CONCENTRATED VEGETABLE FOODS.

Fromms Extract.

HALF THE PRICE OF MEAT EXTRACTS.

THE LANCET.

"According to the results of our own analysis, presents the composition of a Complete Food . . . an important nourishing adjunct to the dietary."

THE HOSPITAL.

"A very valuable and condensed food."

FROMMS EXTRACT is a pure and perfect food, entirely free from Organic Germs. Spread on bread and butter it makes

DELICIOUS SANDWICHES, or a small quantity dissolved in a little water and added to greatly improves their flavour and immensely increases their nutritive value.

SOUPS, GRAVIES, SAUCES, STEWS, ETC.,

Sold in Jars at 7½d., 1/1, 2/- and 3/6 by Chemists, Grocers, Stores, etc.

FROMMS EXTRACT CO. LIMITED, 5 WHITE STREET, LONDON, E.C.

"Its food value is double that of Bread made from ordinary wheaten flour."—Lancet.

HOVIS BREAD

will not only help to improve your digestion and consequently your health, but will also bring back that energetic and happy feeling of good health. Man does not live a natural life, so a good portion of a natural food, in the shape of HOVIS, at each meal will largely counteract the bad influence that modern life has upon the health and digestive organs. This is not an idle remark, but a proved statement, daily being verified.

HOVIS is baked and sold by all good class Bakers. No loaf genuine unless stamped HOVIS. 6d. and 1/- samples of Bread and Biscuits sent on receipt of stamps by

S. FITTON & SON, Millers, Macclesfield.

Every Economical Housewife

uses

Tower Tea.

Tower Coffee.

Tower Cocoa.

IN PACKETS AND TINS ONLY.

SOLD EVERYWHERE.

WHOLESALE:

TOWER TEA LTD.,

5, JEWRY STREET, LONDON, E.C.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

SALE NOW OVER SIX MILLIONS YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

MAKE FRUIT WINES AT HOME.

Ask for MASON'S.

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. THE VERY BEST.

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

MASON'S GINGER WINE ESSENCE.

A Sixpenny Bottle will, in six minutes, make sixty glasses of Delicious Non-Alcoholic Wine. Agents Wanted.

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

MASON'S (NOTTINGHAM) COFFEE ESSENCE (THE BEST MADE)

MASON'S WINE ESSENCES

are made in all Fruit Flavours, Ginger, Lemon, Orange, Blackberry, etc.

YOU WON'T BE DISAPPOINTED.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 476.] For the Week ending February 12th, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

The Tale of the Yellow War.

BY M. P. SHIEL.

Author of "The Man-Stealers," "Prince Zaleski," "Shapes in the Fire," "The Rajah's Sapphire," etc.

SUMMARY.

YEN HOW, a shrewd Chino-Japanese doctor, who has spent a portion of his life in almost every country in Europe studying the various nationalities and customs in all classes of life, falls desperately in love with an English nursemaid. His advances are rudely repulsed, however; but he leaves England with a fixed determination to win the object of his affections in spite of all opposition. The means he employs for this purpose are immeasurably vaster than the end.

Yen How goes first to Japan as a Japanese, where, by reason of his authority upon all matters connected with Europe and his high rank, he soon becomes a member of the Japanese Parliament. He rapidly becomes intimate with the prime minister, Marquis Ito, to whom he proposes a league between the two races of China and Japan, and an immense scheme by which Europe may be reduced to a waste, and China become the Empress of the Earth with scarcely an effort of her own.

CHAPTER III.

RUMOURS OF WAR.

As the year wore on, some of the International difficulties centreing round Kiao-Chau, Port Arthur, and Hainan reopened. In England, more than all the old unrest revived.

All rights reserved.]

What added to this unrest was the fact that some of the items of news were quite inexplicable.

From the beginning of the year it had been known that Germany had not made so brilliant a bargain in the acquisition of Kiao-Chau as she had imagined. The territory placed under her "sovereign rights" had been strictly limited by China, and granted only as a "lease." When Prince Henry of Prussia arrived with the Deutschland and the Gefion, he found that there were no "laurels" to win, and nobody at whom to strike out with his mailed fist.

What, then, was the surprise of the world, including the Germans themselves, when, in the middle of October, came the news that China had ceded a large additional region to the Kaiser, absolutely without conditions!

There was not a single brain in Europe which could divine the motive of this virtual gift.

At this time, Li Hung Chang, recalled to power by the Emperor at the beginning of the year, was still at the head of affairs in Pekin. But in the short space of a few months he had acquired the habit of taking no step without the suggestion and advice of that new element in Chinese politics, that far-seeing Oriental-European, that much-toiling member of the Tsung-li-Yamen, the omniscient Yen How. Already Yen had swung himself up into the position of the virtual ruler of China.

Yen How seemed to Li Hung Chang, haunted as the old statesman had always been by the vision of dismemberment and downfall which overhung China, something like an angel of light. Here was another brain which saw as his had all along seen—only far more clearly, and with powers of invention far vaster than his own to avert the catastrophe.

"Let us be definite," Yen had said, in words which old Li long remembered, one night as they smoked together alone on a moonlit veranda. "Do let us be honest with ourselves, your Excellency! You agree with me that the yellow man is doomed—if the white man is not: in your heart you think it. Then let us say it in definite words; for as soon as ever we have said it, we have gone half way toward grappling with our fate."

"Ah, I have said it often and often," answered Li, "but to what good?"

"If you believe that now is the time for action, as I do, your Excellency, you have the matter in your own hand."

Digitized by Google

"How so?"

"To me it is clearer than the moonlight there. The facts of the situation seem to stare me in the face."

"Speak, Yen How."

"I will speak, your Excellency. To me it seems that if we could supply a motive to the combined Japanese and Chinese nations to traverse in their millions Asia and the Urals, and then to overrun the Europe of to-day, there is no power on earth that could permanently check the overwhelming momentum of their progress."

"It is nonsense, my son," said Li, with a pull at his long metal pipe.

"Note this," replied Yen—"I only say that I believe—for who can be sure? The white man is strong and stern; his frown is dreadful. When he thunders through his throat of iron, who can endure it? I only say that I believe—though an army of four hundred millions cannot be mown

There was a brief consultation on board the Majestic.

down in a day, your Excellency. The throats of the Maxims might grow hoarse and burst at this stupendous task. Still, perhaps you are right—perhaps I talk nonsense. I did not seriously mean to propose a march against the Maxim thunder. But I have a thought—a thought. Suppose China and Japan can take away the Maxims first, and then march afterwards."

"Speak your meaning, Yen How," said Li; "all is dark to me."

"We wish the white races killed," answered Yen; "well, there are two ways, are there not? We might kill them ourselves—that you say is nonsense. The other way is to get them to kill one another."

At these words Li's pipe came slowly from his mouth, and the outer corners of his eyes screwed up into an expression of the most exquisite enjoyment. He had come into sudden contact with—a New Thought.

"What is left alive of them after their mutual slaughter," Yen How went on, "we can kill. Their lands will be weak with loss of blood, their treasuries will be exhausted—there will be no Maxims there any more."

At these last words his own eyes, too, wrinkled up into a net of delicious merriment.

"The trump card is in the hand of China," he said.

How the white races were to be made to destroy one another Li never asked, though the conversation lasted far into the night. He knew well. That, at least, was simple enough.

"England," said Yen as they parted, "England—she is the worst. All the others against her."

A few weeks afterwards the cession of large additional territories in China to Germany was rumoured.

And now followed, in rapid succession, a series of the most startling, the most inexplicable reports.

It seemed as if China were not waiting for dismemberment from abroad, but was dismembering herself wilfully, with precipitate frenzy.

First came the intelligence that France had been besought by the Chinese Government to assume the Protectorate, without conditions, of Hainan and Yun-nan.

These few lines of telegram threw Europe into a state of fever. It was decided by everyone that, if the intelligence were true, no earthly consideration of risk would keep the rapacious hand of the Frenchman from grasping at this rich plum.

In a week or so it was definitely known that the news was true, and that France had accepted the offer. Rumours of war filled the air. The world was a-gog, and every spot was an arena for discussion. Only one man was silent—Lord Salisbury. The newspapers besought him to speak, if only a word; but still he remained wrapped in his mantle of taciturnity. A deputation of merchants waited upon the Under-Secretary; but he answered them only with a few strong words of hope.

At this time Yen How's name got into the papers. It was said that this mysterious man, whose dazzling rise in the Celestial Empire was sketched, had recently taken a fresh journey to Tokio. Then a vague telegram, printed in England in small nonpareil type, appeared, stating that the probable object of Yen How's renewed journey was to conclude a secret treaty, offensive and defensive, between China and Japan. But the report was unsubstantiated and not believed.

The real bomb was yet to burst into the midst of Europe. It was hurled by the Petersburg correspondent of the Daily News.

China had offered to Russia the protectorate of the Yangtse Valley.

It was now, for the first time, that it entered two or three of the shrewdest heads in Europe that China was deliberately seeking to plunge the world into war by working upon the rapacity and selfish greed of the various nations.

One gentleman, a private and unknown citizen, living at a country house in Hampshire, wrote to the Times to this effect. But his letter attracted no attention. The few who read it were inclined to regard it as far-fetched.

Yet, looking back now, it seems strange that the same idea did not occur to many others. For it must be remembered that the Yangtse Valley had always been regarded as peculiarly the sphere of British power in China. More than this, toward the early part of the year Britain had governmentally guaranteed the Chinese loan of sixteen millions sterling, and it was agreed that the security for this should consist of the land-tax and the unpledged part of the Customs dues. Now, the chief source of both land-tax and Customs dues was the Yangtse Valley.

Yet the next day the Russian Novosti published an evidently-inspired article, stating that on no account would Russia withdraw from the prominent place into which events had forced her in the East.

The feeling in England was one of horror at the blind and criminal cupidity of the Continental nations. The word "War" was on every tongue. Twice in one day there were hurried meetings of the Cabinet. Thousands upon thousands of private letters poured in upon the Foreign Office, urging patience and firmness.

But the hand of Lord Salisbury was forced in an unexpected manner.

Digitized by Google

Two items of news followed each other rapidly.

First, that on the 21st day of the 12th moon of the 24th year of Kuang Hsü—that is to say, on the 14th December, 1898—the Yellow Jacket had once more been taken from Li Hung Chang; and that the dominant and extraordinary talents of the man, Yen How, had triumphed over all obstacles, and raised him to the very head of affairs at the Court of Pekin. He had held the golden dish in a long interview before the Brother of the Sun and Moon; he was also the confidant of the Empress.

And the next day a telegram from Sir C. M. Macdonald, the British Minister in China, reached the Foreign Office. This was at once made public.

It stated that China professed herself unable to meet the next accruing interest-instalment on the sixteen millions loan, though the Minister had information from Sir Robert Hart, the Controller of the Imperial Maritime Customs, which led him to doubt the avowal of inability.

Whatever else this might mean, it certainly seemed to mean war. The security for China's default, real or pretended, which was due to England, had already been placed under the control of Russia.

In the House of Commons the Under-Secretary stated that there was still a hope of peace—a hope that "the great Empire of Russia would act with that spirit of fairness and magnanimity in this appalling crisis which alone could prove her worthy of her august traditions." These words were borne at a run by dozens of excited members to interested individuals among the crowd, which surrounded the House from Westminster Bridge round to the Aquarium. London went to sleep with some small degree of quietude that night, Mr. Curzon's reply having been published in an eagerly bought-up 10 o'clock edition.

But the next morning, Mr. Goschen being abroad at an early hour, it was suddenly discovered that, by some extraordinary means, Malta was telegraphically isolated from England, and a hurried telegram was at once despatched from the Admiralty to Admiral Sir Michael Culme-Seymour, the Flag-Officer in Commission at Portsmouth.

From the poop of the French vessel rose a wide column of smoke.

CHAPTER IV.

First Blood.

Before eleven o'clock the Majestic, the flag-ship of the Channel Squadron, was leaving Portsmouth harbour behind her at the rate of eleven knots an hour. She was under the command of the Senior Officer in Command of the squadron, Vice-Admiral Sir Henry Stephenson; and with her went the little gunboat Halcyon.

The mystery underlying the sudden journey of this strange couple was not very difficult to be unravelled. The truth was, the Government was greatly startled by the event of the morning. The Majestic was, in reality, a convoy to the Halcyon; the smaller vessel was acting as a dispatch-boat to Malta; and the battleship was seeing her on her journey till she was deemed to be out of danger molestation.

It had come to that already.

Digitized by Google

At the Government offices the words "treachery" and "war" had risen to more than one agitated lip. Europe, it was felt, was drifting, drifting—whither?

The task of the Halcyon was to warn the Governor of Malta, and to order the mobilisation of the Mediterranean Fleet near the Straits of Gibraltar. It might be necessary at a few hours' notice to block the entrance of the Mediterranean; it might even be necessary to hurl back a foreign invader from the shores of Britain; and the Channel Squadron was woefully limited in weight of metal.

During the day business in London came practically to a standstill. Wholesale withdrawals of foreign securities were reported from the City. By 3 p.m. it was generally known that a junior military attaché to the Embassy at Paris had arrived by private yacht with a sealed despatch from Sir E. J. Monson, and had hurried to the Foreign Office.

The leonine growl of the Gardners.

A day of almost breathless tension reached its climax when, at 9 p.m., Mr. Curzon made the announcement to a full House that peaceful negotiations were still in progress with Russia, but that, late in the afternoon, Germany had made demands of Britain and China with respect to the recently-ceded territories, with which England, as he might say at once, would certainly be unable to comply.

The next morning, before break of day, England found herself telegraphically disconnected with the Continent.

About this precise hour the Majestic, having her small companion some half a mile or more away on her starboard quarter, was butting her way, about S.W. by S., through a rough Biscay sea. It was a cold and squally morning, still dark, though a chill hint of day now mingled bleakly with the East. The sea was handling both ships rudely, and the Majestic's ponderous lurching through some six or seven degrees brought the heaving green sea washing about the base of her forward barbette, while from the bows of the Halcyon it went hissing aft in a continuous cataract of spray.

It was just after five bells in the morning watch, at an hour when the gloomy grey of the morning had lightened a little, that the lookout man on board the Majestic reported a big ship steaming leisurely south right upon them about six miles astern. The rate of the Majestic was about ten knots, that of the stranger about six; but immediately after coming into sight, a black cloud of redundant smoke pouring from her funnels at once revealed the stranger's intention to improve her pace.

That she had been lurking about with some object of search was clear. That she was now getting up steam seemed to indicate, if anything, that she had found what she was looking for.

In two minutes it was made out that she was La Gloire, a French battleship of about the weight and armature of the Majestic.

La Gloire's cloud of smoke was premature—it occasioned a suspicion of her motives. The first thing which Sir Henry Stephenson did was to order the Halcyon by trumpet-call to steam at full speed S.W. a distance of five miles. The Halcyon, at all events, had to be kept out of danger.

Yet he could hardly have expressed his reason for giving this order. Was anyone at war with anyone else? He was ignorant of the fact, if so.

He was not long in doubt. La Gloire, even while getting up steam, had pricked off her course four points to starboard. It seemed as if she was about to give chase to the Halcyon.

"What! Are we in for a fight then, Captain?" said the Vice-Admiral with a slight smile of surprise, and a puckered brow.

"It almost looks like it, certainly," replied Fleet-Captain Hardy.

"Well, come now, we shall see," said the Vice-Admiral.

By this time La Gloire had not only hoisted her colours, but had extra colours on the masts and stays. The Majestic wore the ordinary single ensign.

Captain Hardy had ordered steam for full speed. The next moment the Majestic swung round to starboard about four points. She was still ahead of La Gloire. At her present course and speed she would interpose between the English gunboat and the French ship.

For quite half-an-hour the two ships continued to approach each other slowly and obliquely, having started from a separating interval of about five miles. On this course the sea was more aft, and the rolling and sullen plunging of the ships was less marked.

On board the Majestic meanwhile all was bustling action. Decks were cleared, magazines were opened, and ammunition and projectiles got out; water-tight doors were closed. The dawn lightened to a chill and drear twilight.

The real object of La Gloire was to intercept and capture any dispatch-boat from the Channel, which might attempt to take intelligence through the Straits, for it had been anticipated that such an attempt would be made. The sending out of the battleship with such an object was, however, a breach of international law and a base stroke of treachery, for no one had declared war with England, though signed declarations of hostilities were already in the bureaux of more than one of the ambassadors at London.

That the dispatch-boat should be convoyed, and by a first-class battle-ship like the Majestic, was unexpected. La Gloire found herself checkmated. There was her prize before her, but between her and it was the thunder and lightning of England.

But though checkmated, she showed no intention of being checked. She kept on her way with rising speed. The two ships, in malign silence, like two red planets rushing to jarring combat, drew nearer. When their speed had increased to thirteen knots, they were about a mile apart. Decks on both were cleared, collision-mats were ready, preparations were made for rigging torpedo-nets in an emergency. Nearer, in awful silence, they drew, two giants with limbs oiled for battle; and the bleak and raw sea-wind of the dawning made hoarse sounds above their funnels.

But one of the ships was still in doubt whether there was to be fighting, and, if so, why. There was a brief consultation on board the Majestic, and then she signalled:

Digitized by Google

"Are we combatants?"

There was no reply.

To this silence the Majestic sent aloft the answer:

"Trafalgar."

And now the baleful silence recommenced. Both commanders had stationed themselves in their conning-towers.

A furious bombardment of quick-firing guns was opened.

On either ship not a soul was to be made out by the glasses save the crews of the quick-firing guns on the hurricane decks, and of the machine-guns in the tops. By five minutes past seven the fleet-engineer of the Majestic announced that he had steam enough to drive the vessel at her utmost trial speed.

The strategy of the French commander in not answering the Majestic's question was soon apparent, for Sir Henry Stephenson felt himself bound to wait for the first shot, being uncertain how matters stood on shore. And the first shot in modern naval warfare must often mean victory.

The two vessels slowly converged, La Gloire on the other's starboard side, steering S.W.; the Majestic on the other's port bow heading S.W. by W. Suddenly La Gloire sharply altered her course by several points to the eastward, and impetuously bore down upon the Majestic.

"Well," said Sir Henry Stephenson to himself. "That is uncommonly like a declaration of war, if anything can be. Well, then, Mr. Frenchman——"

Immediately the Majestic, too, pricked off eastward, her after pair of 67-ton guns being kept trained on the enemy as she manœuvred. The ships were now so well within effective range that the Majestic's thin smoke, blown into a wide hovering fog by the east wind, half concealed her movements from La Gloire.

For a time it seemed as if the British ship were in retreat and the French giving chase; then suddenly both ships were hidden from each other's sight. Sir Henry, taking advantage of his windward position, had thrown overboard some twenty casks of smoke-producing tow and naptha and tar, which at once separated the two ships with a blackness of thick red-brown reek, mingled near the water with bickering tongues of flame. The commander of La Gloire, fearing that in this fog of fume the Majestic might suddenly turn about and ram him, at once changed his course south-west, and was now the retreating ship. But the English admiral had guessed his thought, and when the region of the smoke-making composition was passed, the beam of the Majestic was abreast of La Gloire's poop.

It was the lieutenant in charge of the fore-barbette of the Majestic who first woke the thunder of this winter morning fight.

Simultaneously, with one awful bang of wrath that shook the Majestic herself from stem to stern, both the 67-tonners of this barbette went crashing into La Gloire's quarters.

Digitized by Google

At this moment the ships were not half a mile apart. When the smoke cleared it was at once seen that the whole stern armament of La Gloire was in ruins, her after-barbette shattered, and the two heavy guns unshipped. One of the shells had penetrated abaft her after armoured tube and there burst, killing fifty men, and rending into a chaos of débris all it met. From the poop of the French ship rose a wide column of smoke. At the same time a furious bombardment of quick firing guns was opened from both vessels. In three minutes every unarmoured or unsheltered spot in each ship was cleared of every living thing. Twelve-pounders, six-pounders, three-pounders mingled in swift-cracking uproar, punctuated by the leonine growl of the Gardners, and the more deliberate detonation of the Nordenfeldts. All the air was war, and all the intervening sea a commotion of hissing foam.

But now the machine-guns in the tops were silent. Their protecting shields had been shot away, and their crews annihilated. One of La Gloire's funnels was gone, and the other pierced, while three projectiles from her had burst their way through shields of six-inch nickel steel, and put three of the Majestic's central battery guns out of action, striking them fairly on the chase. Within three minutes the two ships had belched forth a flaming hail of some twenty-two thousand rounds of shot, riddling all except the most heavily-armoured parts of each other, tearing to shreds all light gun-screens, and turning unarmoured ends and box-batteries into shambles.

Already it seemed improbable that either ship, unless the other were at once destroyed, could come out of this anarchy of thunder, and live.

The starboard side of the Majestic was still presented to the port of La Gloire; but La Gloire's speed had been greatly reduced, owing to injuries to her funnels, and the Majestic had forged forward abreast, then somewhat ahead, of the other.

Vice-Admiral Stephenson was every moment awaiting the second crash of his after-barbette into the French ship's beam, when La Gloire's two fore-barbette guns sent out their voices simultaneously.

One of the shots glanced against the centre armour-belt of the Majestic at the water-line, leapt, struck her fore-armoured tube, and went diving far forward into the sea, where it burst in a high water-lily of spouting foam.

The other wrought terrible havoc. It struck the Majestic's central battery at the height of the deck, burst inside, blew away the chief part of the hurricane deck, and turned all the guns in that battery into a mere débris of twisted and crumpled metal.

But as the British ship staggered and reeled at this blow, her bluejackets sent up a cheer: for the next instant the after-barbette in their own ship was talking, too; and a few seconds afterwards it was seen that La Gloire's forecastle was on fire, that she had gone down by the bows, and that her screws, half out of the water, were furiously revolving in a broad mound of wheeling spume.

Was she sinking, then? The British Vice-Admiral half expected now to see her strike her flag. But even as he looked, he was undeceived.

Yonder, a hundred yards astern, somewhat to his port side, he saw a sight which might have made even the heart of a Nelson leap to his mouth. It was a small object, looking like a cubical box; and even as he glanced at it, it disappeared beneath the waves.

He knew this to be one of the ingenuities from the Forges et Chantiers de la Méditerranée. It was a submarine boat; and the object which he had seen for a moment was the top of her conning-tower as she rose for an observation of distances and directions.

The submarine boat had been secretly lowered into the water from La Gloire's starboard side. Her motor was electric, supplied from storage batteries, and her speed, over at some depth, considerable. Vice-Admiral Stephenson knew that her aim was to pass under his torpedo-nets, carrying an electrically-fired torpedo, to be attached to the bottom of his already half-ruined ship.

At once he went circling at full speed to starboard, crossing the bows of the now slowly-progressive La Gloire, one of whose fore-barbette guns was useless, and the other unready to fire.

At the same time he had rapidly lowered from his port side a second-class torpedo boat which he then carried on deck. By means of hot water from the Majestic's boilers she was already under steam, and with careful handling, in spite of the parent ship's now headlong wheeling flight, she touched the water in safety, and at once went fretting fussily through the billows, a mere cloud of hurrying spray, on her fateful way, at a speed of fourteen knots. Like some buzzing bee with deadly sting, she drove straight upon La Gloire.

The alarm on the French ship at this hastening ruin resembled panic. Disregarding the movements of the Majestic, her commander at once put his helm a-port, and turning upon his small foe the comparatively uninjured armament of his starboard side, poured forth, in one continuous roll of artillery, a bombardment of some twelve thousand pounds per minute. La Gloire was now, however, well in the trough of the sea, which flowed in bulky swells from east to west: the greater portion of her huge outburst of fire failed to take effect; and still the puffing thing came near and yet nearer, overwhelmed, but steadfast, drowned but headlong, tiny but terrible.

The climax of the fight was near. It had lasted but a few minutes: it had seemed like an eternity.

At about three hundred yards from La Gloire the little torpedo-boat launched a Whitehead.

As the oiled and gleaming needle of steel slid swiftly into the water, it passed straight through the body of a great buxom swell, and came instantly out on the other side, making directly for La Gloire's quarter; but before it could reach her, the ship manœuvred slightly to starboard, and the projectile slipped hurriedly under her stern, and exploded harmlessly some distance away.

But even as it did so, another torpedo came shooting through the waves from the little boat.

At the same time the crew of the torpedo boat was seen to be wildly leaping at random over her sides into the waves. Seen—but dimly seen—for the whole craft from stern to stem, as well as all that region of the water into which she was now plunging on her last voyage, was enveloped in one hissing white cloud of stinging vapour. Two of her men instantly sank, scalded to death. A twelve-pounder, shot upwards, had burst into her boiler.

It had not come from La Gloire. It had come from the unseen thing which was cruising darkly beneath the sea in search of the Majestic.

Immediately the submarine boat rose again, and the man in the conning-tower, looking a moment abroad, saw the Majestic—or rather he saw a vast mass of smoke which utterly concealed the Majestic and the direction of her bow. All he could note was that the great ship was now fearfully and wonderfully near to La Gloire; that the huge pillar of cloud was approaching La Gloire—rapidly, rapidly—with horrid impetuosity.

He did not hesitate a moment, but, putting his fins into play, instantly sank, and made for a point at which he believed he would intercept the rushing ship.

The mass of smoke which he had seen round the Majestic had been intentionally caused by her Commander. The Vice-Admiral had ordered every gun which still worked to be discharged, whether they bore upon the French ship or not, and enveloped in the mantle of ascending reek which poured from the hot weapons, he put his helm hard down, suddenly left the evolutionary curve of sixteen points through which he had been circling, and drove straight upon La Gloire. He was going to ram.

Digitized by Google

At that awful moment expectation stood in horror. "Prepare to ram!" went forth the command from the conning-tower, and every man on the Majestic fell flat on his face, as though the trump of doom had sounded. And now, while the clock might tick, and tick again, the men on La Gloire became aware of what was coming. Up out of her envelope of vapour suddenly loomed the Majestic upon them, near and huge, like a monster rising from the deep. Just then the remaining fore-barbette gun of La Gloire was being discharged, and the ships being nearly bow to bow, the shell went forth with disastrous havoc, shattering the thickly armoured fore-barbette of the Majestic, battering the conning-tower, destroying the funnels, and shocking the Vice-Admiral, who was not directly hit, into a state of insensibility.

But even as it did so, the crash came. The ram of the Majestic touched La Gloire on her starboard bow, glanced a little, then with a horrid "z-z-zip-p," "z-z-zip-p," then with a bursting and rending uproar like the cracking asunder of an arsenal, went tearing and smashing a shapeless hole 20ft. in length along her beam. The sea poured into the doomed ship; and at once she lurched bow-ward to starboard.

But the ram of the Majestic was not yet clear of La Gloire when the most stupendous hubbub of the whole battle, drowning every other sound, rent the heavens. It was a double detonation, yet the two reports followed so closely one upon the other, that they seemed almost like one.

They were the sounds of two torpedoes.

The 28,000 tons of the two great ships half-leapt from the water, and jumped with a start apart, shivering to their keels; and two immense pillars of white cloud, which soon were one, rose high above them, shutting them from each other.

One of these two torpedoes had been affixed by the crew of the submarine boat beneath the bow of La Gloire, which they had mistaken for the Majestic; the other was the second of the two which had been despatched from the Majestic's torpedo boat before she had sunk. It had caught on to the keel of La Gloire sternwards, and its explosion had been delayed, perhaps half-a-minute, till now.

When the smoke cleared a little, the commander of La Gloire was seen, with blood-soaked clothes, and haggard face, and eyes staring with horror, standing on the wreck of his after-barbette, and frantically hauling down his colours. He sent forth to the wreck which he had made of the Majestic this cry of terror—

"Au nom de Dieu!—we are sinking!—for God's sake. . . ."

The captain of the Majestic at once lowered the only boat on his deck which was at all capable of floating, though half of even her port-side, too, was smashed away. The whole crew of the British vessel had hurried to deck, ready, even as they cheered in victory, to aid in the work of rescue.

But as the boat pushed off, men were seen leaping hurriedly from La Gloire, in a vain attempt to escape her suction as she went down. She gave them little time. The bursting of the two torpedoes fore and aft had simply turned her into a mass of disconnected débris. She lurched a little aft—up went her bows like two hands laid together in prayer—then her whole length settled evenly lower; she lurched aft again, obliquely, clumsily; then, as if with sudden resolve, she skipped forward, dived her nose briskly into the sea, and disappeared.

Three of her crew of six hundred were saved.

Meantime, the captain of the Majestic was signalling to the Halcyon, waiting, eager for fight, five miles away:

"We are sinking—make haste."

The great ship was settling slowly down by the bows; for the torpedo which had burst beneath the bows of La Gloire had wrought great havoc upon the other's forward bottom also; nor could the pumps produce much impression upon the inrushing waters.

The Halcyon succeeded in taking off the hundred and fifty-two that were left of the brave crew, taking also on board the crew of the French submarine boat, who had escaped injury. They hardly stopped to watch the Majestic settle slowly down before the gunboat's bows were once more turned, to bear her momentous message, toward the Straits.

But if Dr. Yen How had been there to see that battle of the giants, and its result, the corners of his eyes would have wrinkled up into a very web of tickled merriment

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

DO THE DEAD COME BACK?

MANY times during the last few months I have taken up my pen to give to the world the story of Geza Domenico, but always, after having written several pages entirely satisfactory to myself, I have felt the restraining touch of an invisible hand upon my own, and have laid my work aside.

But now that I know he is dead, the impulse to write has come strongly upon me, and I feel that it can be written.

The family of Domenico is one of the oldest and most aristocratic in Italy. It has been for generations one of the greatest refinement, has never been connected with scandals at court, and has always lent the influence of its wealth and great name to the music and art and literature of the time.

Geza first saw the light of day in Florence, and up to his twelfth year breathed in the atmosphere of his romantic surroundings, the poetry and dreamy romances of that most beautiful of all Italian cities. Then through some fancied intrigue of his father, the elder Domenico was banished from Italy. Crossing with his family into Austria-Hungary, he located after several years in Buda-Pesth, that centre whence so many musical geniuses flash upon the world, weaving into their Hungarian melodies all the wild dreamings of love and battle and death, which we find threading so much of the Hungarian composition.
Where the quiet Arno flows;

Here Geza, with every opportunity wealth could afford, perfected himself in his studies on the violin, and in his twenty-first year produced his opera, The King and the Subject, scoring an instantaneous success. The score was of the highest order, and produced a profound sensation in the Hungarian capital. Not so, however, the libretto, which I had the misfortune to write. Innocent enough in itself, in its allusion to the rulers of the country, the artists reading more deeply between the lines than even I had dreamt, and adding to the sentiment the buffoonery of the stage, the libretto, when it reached the court, was as unpopular as the music was acceptable.

The mandate issued from Vienna, and Geza was compelled to quit the country. I, being an Englishman, was treated less cavalierly; but in various ways, which one even less observant than myself could not fail to note, I was led to believe my continued residence in Buda-Pesth, or indeed in any part of Austria-Hungary, would be greatly detrimental to my health.

Geza realised enough from the sale of his score to organise an orchestra, which he took across the Atlantic for an American tour.

Either because New York had been favoured that season with several imported orchestras or because of incompetent management, Geza's venture proved a dismal failure. It certainly was not because of any lack of artistic ability.

Too proud to write home for assistance, crowded to the wall by local musicians who were jealous of his superior ability, unable to speak fluently the language of the country, Domenico, in a moment of folly and desperation, enlisted in Uncle Sam's army and was sent to join a regiment stationed at Fort McKenny, in Wyoming, in the heart of the Wolf Tongue Range of the Big Horn Mountains.

Several years afterwards chance sent me to Wyoming, and at McKinney we renewed our friendship of former years. Here, at least, where Geza was as much out of place as an arpeggio in a dirge, there was no danger of punishment for any shortcomings in the wording of librettos, or the manner in which they are produced.

Every evening after mounting guard I used to sit in Domenico's room in the musician's barracks, and listen to his music by the hour. Often he improvised, but more frequently he played with his score before him, and forgot his surroundings until weariness would recall him to himself.

To me, with only a rudimentary knowledge of written music, his books were only a hieroglyphic maze of bars and dashes, but to Geza they were the Open Sesame which threw wide the gates of Paradise.

Many months passed with these evenings of delight, and I grew to love the man as I loved his music. Later I began to notice that he absented himself more and more in trips to the little town of Buffalo, some four miles from the post, at that time, like the majority of frontier towns, peopled with a rough but generous class.

Of the women who had drifted into the locality little need be said. Among them, however, was one more attractive than the rest, musical, and an appreciative listener. Geza, not understanding the degradation of the life into which choice or circumstance had led her, lost his heart to her.

Not until it was too late did the terrible and shameful truth flash upon him. When he came home that night I knew. He picked up the violin and listlessly drew the bow across the strings, then laid it aside wearily; but he told me nothing.

I left him alone with his grief, waiting till he should come for me. Several days later he was reported missing from the post. He was not in the town, and after forty-eight hours I started out alone to seek some trace of him.

Clear Creek Canyon is one of the most beautiful in all Wyoming. The creek lashes itself to foam over its rocky bed; on either side the tree-clad mountains rise to a great height, and in the far background the snow-clad peaks lift themselves into the impenetrable deep of the sky. To the mere plodder a mountain torrent is a thing of danger, venting its anger in incessant roaring; but to the artist, the musician, and the poet, it is at once a delight and an inspiration.

The artist, in the mad swirl of the waters, sees such graceful curvings in infinite variety as he can find nowhere else; the musician finds there the orchestra of Nature forever voicing its "To Salutiamo" to the infinite; for the poet it is the siren wooing him with the seductive sweetness of her voice, pitched at times to some ruder note, as though she sought jealously to drown the whisperings of the leaves. Knowing

Digitized by Google

Domenico as I did, I felt certain that somewhere here I should find trace of him, and I was not far wrong.

After riding nearly the entire day along the winding and sometimes dangerous trail, at last I reached a comparatively level spot where the waters flowed quietly for a space.

My horse, affrighted at something I could not see, snorted suddenly, reared, turned, and started to run down the cañon.

No amount of coaxing, nor even a vigorous application of the spurs could induce him to return. Slipping the reins over his head so that he might graze along the trail, I shouldered my rifle and proceeded on foot.

Tremulously, as the faint stirring of the leaves when the day begins to make itself felt, there came floating to me the tones of Geza's violin. Strange that I should have happened upon him at such a moment. I recognised the piece that he was about to play; it was the prelude of the second act of his opera, and entitled the "Awakening of Love." One who has witnessed a dawn in the tropics, when a thousand songsters were piping their matin lays, might form a fair conception of the riotous irresponsibility and joyousness of the music that came drifting towards me across the open. At Buda-Pesth, on the occasion of its initial production, the audience rose en masse and called for the composer. Again and again was Geza compelled to bow his acknowledgements, and finally, leaving the orchestra, he rendered the obbligato from the stage.

A peculiar feature of the composition was the impression it conveyed of absolute purity. Resting under its spell, the mind became calm and serene and clear as the depths of a mountain spring.

A short distance up the cañon I saw Geza standing by a large boulder, and near him, to my amazement and horror, a huge mountain lion was dancing and playing with all the abandon and agileness of a kitten.

Thrilled as I was by the music, I realised his dangerous position. Following the overture, he played the part which formed the climax of the second act, "Amor Trionfale." It rang forth with all the strength and vigour of the "Hallelujah" chorus. Then it seemed that a miracle was being worked. A black cloud fell across the sun and the cañon was in heavy shadow. A feeling of intense dread crept over me; the lion, whining, thrust his head between his fore paws and lay there quivering. Through the quiet of the cañon stole the measure of a "Miserere," the equal of which has never been produced. Low over his violin Geza was bending, throwing all the sadness of his soul into those quivering chords, while unconsciously my lips framed the words:

In death's dark hour remain thou near.

Again the theme failed, and I felt it was the denunciation.

I could hear him cursing fate or what you will with all the depths of his nature. The setting sun had slipped round until it shone squarely into the cañon, purpling the leaves of the trees and the grasses, while against the Eastern sky the snow mountains rose like pillars of fire.

I felt the mad blood rushing to my head, and through me crept the desire for retaliation on an untoward fate, which must have animated Geza as he played. Then suddenly the lion broke the spell.

Loud and terrifying, but resonant as a huge bass viol, the roar of the brute woke the echoes of the forest, and sounded in perfect unison with the shriller fury of the violin. The lion's jaws were open, his tail was lashing furiously from side to side, and he began crouching ready for a spring. Then I raised my rifle and sent a bullet through his heart. He was in the air when the bullet struck him.

His huge jaws knocked the violin from Geza's grasp, and the dead body falling upon it crushed it completely. Then I approached Geza, and he started at the sight of me. He did not realise the danger he had escaped. The loss of the violin was a great grief to him.

It was a valued Guarnerius, which had been in his family for generations, and had been his constant companion since childhood.

He picked up the scattered fragments and wrapped them up tenderly. I secured the skin of the lion, and finding my horse, Geza mounted him, and together we returned to the post. Geza lay in the hospital with a fever for several weeks, and shortly after his recovery his troop was ordered to another post, and except in memory he passed completely out of my life. A soldier taxidermist prepared the skin for me and applied a preservative to the head by which it retained its natural appearance.

This was fifteen years ago.

* * * * *

Last evening at home I answered a ring at the door. A figure dressed in black, and but dimly discernible in the gloom outside, handed me a roll of paper tied with a black ribbon, and ere I could ask any question disappeared into the night.

I returned to the drawing-room where my wife was sitting at the piano, and opened the roll curiously. It was an arrangement for the piano, dedicated to me and composed by Geza Domenico.

My wife looked it over for a few minutes and then began playing, slowly at first, and then more and more interestedly. It was the music of Clear Creek Cañon, softened and subdued.

Gradually, as it developed, however, I felt the old sensations creeping over me, and then beautifully sweet and clear rose the notes of the violin blending with the piano in a composition of exquisite harmony. How can I adequately describe the return of the old emotions as the piece progressed? The hot blood surged to my temples as before, and then to my utter horror the lion skin on the hearth gradually assumed the shape it held in life, the tail lashed madly from side to side, and the jaws were red with blood. Then there was a blood-curdling growl, a crash of broken strings, and all was silence.

After a time, which seemed very long to me, I bent to touch the lion skin, and it fell to pieces in my grasp, and as I lifted the head, which had fallen entirely flat, there was underneath it only a handful of ashes on the hearth.

You, who never rested under the spell of Domenico's music, may say that I was imaginative, or under the influence of a self-induced hypnotic condition; but I, I know that Geza Domenico, intangible and invisible, stood in the room last night, compelling through the perfection of his art, a perfect interpretation of the score and joinings with his violin in a production of incomparable beauty.

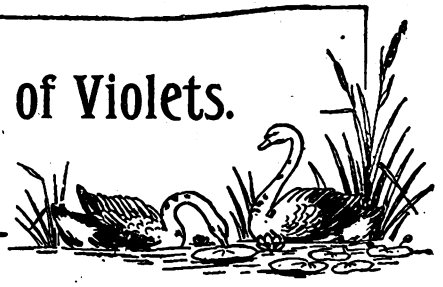
And through my life long I shall carry the conviction that with the brute creation there is a to-morrow of death, and that an all-wise and beneficent God doth in his own good time guide even these

By ways we cannot comprehend
To some unguessed, benignant end.

HOWARD HURLBUTT.

Digitized by Google

A Bunch of Violets.



THERE was tender allurement in the soft spring air, as if nature were capriciously avoiding a definite understanding with the conquered, retreating winter. In the park the tops of the trees showed delicately green, the young foliage sending its subtle, pervasive fragrance over the neighbouring streets. The gardeners had long since begun to set out the primly marked beds of scarlet geraniums and shrubs, and the rich soil, harrowed up in readiness in dark discolorations over the lawn, emitted a pungent, pleasant odour. It was one of those days which depressed one within doors. Escherling had been confined to his office since morning, and his ears throbbed with the din of the noises of the city and the cries of the newsboys. He left the building somewhat uncertain as to his destination, but he finally decided to go to the park.

On his way down to the corner he passed his old florist's shop, the windows a glorious mass of red roses and early Parma voilets. It seemed natural to Escherling to-day to enter, as he had not done for nearly a year, and order the inevitable violets, having but one desire to possess them. He could promptly have furnished a certain address for them to be sent, as he had done the last time that he had been here, but as the clerk paused expectantly with pencil in hand for his orders there rushed bitterly over him the depth of the wide abyss between him and the one who unconsciously filled his very thoughts. A sudden decision struck him—since Elenore Moyne was yet out of town, what prevented him from sending them to her, just as he used to do? She would never be the wiser as to the donor, and to him there seemed an indefinable tender bond between them by these flowers. He gave the number with a voice which faltered, and detaching a few for his coat, hastily left the shop with a boyish feeling of elation he could not yet define.

As he aimlessly made his way across the park, his feet sank deep into the young velvet grass. The violet sellers were crying shrilly their wares everywhere. The air was loud with the birds' vespers and twitterings. Great golden flies glittered in the white sunlight, and two crimson ladybirds coolly paraded his arm.

To his left some children were trying to fly a kite, the white capped nurse looking on with approval. Life had aroused itself. Escherling felt it coursing rapidly through his veins, and he began to take a dignified interest in the success of the childish amusement.

The light folds of a woman's gown arrested his attention under some trees, and he was absently thinking what a pretty spring picture she made, and tried to recall some appropriate lines of Swinburne's to that effect. She suddenly turned her head as if at his mental inquiry, and he forgot about the quotation as he walked to her.

"Fortune favours me to-day." He held out his hand to her as he spoke. "I have met you, and a spider crawled all over my face. Is it an omen of the summer time?" She had flushed a tender pink at his approach, but he had not noticed it.

"I do not know," she said in a pretty voice of soft intonations. "Elenore Moyne is at home again."

Escherling felt the colour recede swiftly from his face. He dropped her hand with a gesture of annoyance. Besides, there were those flowers, the former favourite of both. He had too much pride to force any attempt at reconciliation on her, especially since she had taken the initiative in coldly sundering all between them. And he had never known why, for he could not beg for an explanation from her.

"Surely I may plead other interests than engrossment in Miss Moyne's actions?" he replied with vexation, joining step with her towards the pond. Escherling failed to see the shy, sweet glance the girl at his side gave him. He was endeavouring to meet her light talk and conversational tittle-tattle half way, but his levity sat heavily on him. His entire being surged recklessly with the old feelings which Elenore's very name summoned to life. The birds seemed to chirp it from the boughs above, and it seemed to be murmured in the ripple of the water. A covey of white swans sailed gracefully along by their side, and they paused to watch the gyrations of an ugly duckling deserted and avoided by his more favoured companions. In sudden pity Escherling singled it out for his favour and fed it somewhat extravagantly on divers unhealthful but eagerly devoured foods.

There sounded the staccato beat of horses' hoofs on the hard road near them, and he turned indifferently at their approach. He had only a dim recollection afterwards of a girl's pale, aristocratic face, two cold, scornful eyes on him, and not the slightest recognition from her as he fastened his burning gaze on her, and the Moyne carriage had whirled by. He felt strangely sick at heart and depressed, and tried to believe that she had not really seen him. Perhaps she did not know that he had returned from his trip abroad during her absence, but common-sense dissipated all such idle thoughts, and he was forced by his own conclusion to acknowledge that his hopes were not realisable.

A certain fatigue had asserted itself, and with his companion he reached the chairs and abstractedly seated himself. One thought permeated his being, and he despised himself that he could still think of one who so evidently manifested her aversion to him. At that moment a young fellow passed them whistling "Love's Dream After the Ball," and Escherling told the girl at his side that there were too many hallucinations in regard to the ancient emotion.

Digitized by Google

"Love is one of the illusions of life," he went on, with a hard little laugh, "for, after all, it is only a sort of apotheosis, endowing some particular one with virtues compatible with her appearance. It is our fault, of course, if we were deceived, and I suppose we should not censure the innocent offender for the deception, but that is not human nature."

She paled a trifle as he spoke, but he did not see it.

"You—you have never loved if you can speak like that," she said tremulously.

Escherling turned hotly towards her, but she went on rapidly before he could speak: "Love is God's blessing on man. It purifies our hearts and minds, and without it we would be as shipwrecked beings fighting for safety. It is ennobling, lifting our meaner nature above until we could give in voluntary renunciation our best beloved—even to another."

"I should like to see the man you would love, Esther," Escherling said, abruptly as she finished. She looked away, with a little catch in her breath, to where the pale green foliage fringed the confines of the park. "But I cannot agree with you—in one thing," he continued, his eyes intent on a familiar vehicle which had stopped to allow two ladies to alight.

His heart beat irregularly as the younger of the two seated herself at a short distance from him, where he could catch occasional ravishing glimpses of her proud profile and the glint of her brown, satiny long hair. He dared not look at it long for he was not sure of his control. It seemed to him that she must hear the restless clamour of his heart and leave, knowing that he was near. His voice trembled in spite of himself when he spoke again.

"Love is selfish." He watched Elenore Moyne as he talked. She had given a start of surprise at the sound of his voice and it did not escape him.

"I know that I could not give up—any one I loved to another," he stopped. "That would not be love, in my opinion, for the feeling is purely selfish, as all happiness is. Let me tell you the mistake a friend of mine made. There is no need to begin a monotonous cant about his personal appearance, his position and such nonsense. He was the average young fellow, of good impulse and heart, and he fell in love. Being of an intense nature, it was a whole-souled affair with him, and I suppose from his own overwhelming passion he doubtless attributed more charms to his beloved than she may have possessed, for he thought that she loved him even as he did her, and that was the illusion. There were certain things involving the honour of some one very dear to him—and, well, nearer to her.

"Some distributing element of humanity went to her with malicious tales about this, telling things really as they did exist, but compromising the innocent one—this—this friend of mine. If he cleared himself, he would inculpate the other participant in the affair, and that would hurt this girl he loved more—so he thought—than to let her believe him guilty, for the other was very near to her, while he was only dear—this was his conceit again. So he refused to explain, and she sent him from her, scorned and dishonoured by her. If she had loved him, she would have had faith in him and accepted his version of the circumstances. It was not her fault, of course, that he was deceived in her. That is where the apotheosis comes in. She never had cared for him, but he made himself believe that she had."

"She did not love him," the girl at his side said decisively. "I do not wish to sit in judgment on another's actions, but to me no affection existed, or she would have believed in him, especially at that time when he needed her faith, and——" she ended abruptly. Escherling was watching Elenore Moyne with a white face, as she agitatedly arose and was urging her companion to depart.

Up through the avenue the carriage was coming towards them, the handsome horses impatiently pawing the earth.

"Violets! Violets!" the flower girls were calling. Then there was a sudden silence, and in that stillness it seemed to Escherling that a silent panorama of the barren years before him stalked noiselessly. There was the anguish of the past twelvemonth to verify it. He would humble his pride and take the one chance for happiness, and if he lost he could not be more desolate to-morrow than yesterday.

"Elenore!"

All of the pent-up anguish of his soul rang out as he gently called her name. She paused irresolutely, her head turned away from him. A blur of Parma violets showed on her bosom, and he felt a dull enjoyment, half malicious, that they were his and she did not know it.

"Elenore!"

He advanced half way to her. The girl with whom he had been talking looked after him with a dumb sorrow in her plaintive eyes. Elenore Moyne turned and met him squarely. Her face was whiter than ever, but a certain hard light had settled over it.

"You failed to tell me what those certain things involving your friend's honour were," she said cuttingly. "I infer that, too, was intentional, as was also this pretty little rustic idyll—a sort of 'As You Like It' for my benefit. Allow me to remind you, Mr. Escherling, that you have overreached yourself."

She bowed with slight contempt as she finished talking, and, gathering her skirts in one hand, advanced to the carriage. Escherling in mute despair stood rooted to the spot. Some one touched him on the arm. It was Esther.

"Let us go now," she said tenderly with silent compassion.

But he did not move. Elenore was stepping into the victoria. High in the air above a long expanse of string floated whimsically, following a huge, white object which menaced the tree tops.

A violent gust of wind seized it in a spiral coil, and with a whirring noise bore it to the earth. It alighted on the head of one of the Moyne horses, and at the blow the leader gave one plunge and dragged the other in its frenzy down the drive.

Digitized by Google

Escherling was aghast at the suddenness of it all, as were the other bystanders. Only Elenore was in the vehicle, her face bloodless and distorted with fear. There was the swan-pond directly before them. She cast one agonised glance over the crowd of faces. A hasty bump against a tree threw off the coachman and left the reins dangling on the ground.

Escherling was telling himself that he had nothing to lose now, but he was wondering if she would think of him. Then he realised that another moment might mean death to her, and he bolted pell-mell through the group in hot pursuit to head them off. A woman ran rapidly after him and held him by the arm, but he shook her off madly. He saw the girl on the cushions turn all at once to him. In that brief space her eyes met his, repentant and tearful.

"Guy! Guy!" she screamed. "Save me!"

She had thought of him after all! With one bound he cleared the intervening space, caught at the bridle and pulled the frightened animals towards the earth, checking their progress so violently that the carriage shook. The horses, taken by surprise, stopped, trembling all over.

She was safe. Thank God for that! Beyond a few scratches the carriage was uninjured, and some distance back kindly hands had attended to the coachman. It was all over now. Escherling restored the reins to the driver's hands and turned to go. He would have risked his life again for another tearful glance from her eyes. But instead, feeling suddenly proud as she uttered no thanks to him, he sought out Esther, who, breathless and despairing, had watched the entire occurrence.

"Mr. Escherling!" he heard his name called in the cold voice again. He did not turn round. The veriest beggar, he told himself, would have thanked him warmly. The rustle of a woman's skirts as she alighted from a carriage, and her light swift tread over the sward behind him caught his ear. But still he paid no heed.

He turned half-way towards her; she was biting her lips to keep the tears back. He looked carelessly at her.

"I—I—want to thank—you," she cried brokenly, "I—I——"

"I do not wish for your thanks," he said cruelly; "I would have done the same for any one else."

"But—you—risked—your life to save mine—my very worthless one," she said hurriedly, nerving herself to be calm, "and—and—I would rather die—than—have you—die," she ended inarticulately, with a little sob. He faced her, almost afraid to trust himself.

"And those—other things which involved my friend's honour?" he asked, sparing her nothing.

"I—I do not care," she sobbed. "He could do nothing dishonourable and wrong. He—he—you—will—drive home with me?"

"If you will let him explain that affair relating to his honour"—Escherling's heart was beating so that it was with difficulty that he spoke. "He—he will not go back unless you will trust him and believe him! Will you, Elenore?"

She bowed her head slowly. She could not speak. Regardless of the curious eyes watching them, Escherling stepped to her and touched the violets at her throat.

"There is one more deception," he said, his hand trembling, her face was so near that he had to look away with resolution.

"I—I—know it," she said uncertainly. "I recognised them," and she led him across the soft grass to where the carriage stood, and as they drove off, living only in each other's presence, a woman's figure walked, as if fatigued, over to the entrance, her face drawn and pale, but in her eyes the light of a great, unselfish joy. It was Esther.

Greque.

WHO'S KETTLE?

Everybody is talking about him. Where does he live? What is he?

We can tell you. He is the most popular man in Great Britain at the present moment—not excepting Salisbury, Harcourt, Balfour, Morley.

Kettle!
Kettle!!
Kettle!!!

He's the hero of the most wonderful series of stories that ever were written.

Mr. Cutcliffe Hyne is the author of these stories, and they are appearing month by month in Pearson's Magazine.

KETTLE IS A SEA-CAPTAIN.

He is also the most plucky and most popular little captain that ever breathed, and yet he writes verse and plays the accordion!

Everybody likes him, and if once you read one of his marvellous adventures, you won't be happy till you've read them all.

Some have already appeared in Pearson's Magazine, and there are plenty more to follow.

Here is a rough sketch of him, which, I am afraid, does not do complete justice to his remarkable personality.

Captain Kettle's Adventures, as told in Pearson's Magazine, are illustrated by Mr. Stanley L. Wood, one of the finest black and white artists of the day.

Digitized by Google

The Mystery of One Palm Spring.

A GLIMMERING breadth of sand burning hot, a pitiless hot sun that made the back tingle; far away a desolate range of hills, still farther away the limit where sight ceased and sand and sky met. Cool, sweet water oozed up from a spring and noiselessly meandered out and spread around and lost itself again in the sand. There were a few bunches of green grass at the edge of the well, and some yerba mansa, with its rank smelling white and gold blossoms, grew in the sand where the water spread out. A solitary palm tree stood there, too; the mystery of the desert rustled in the broad fan leaves which it drooped over the water.

A hut built of mesquit poles, gunny sacks and mud—mostly mud, scooped from where the yerba mansa grew—was near the spring, the back of it against the hill of sand which was higher than the hut, and on the top of which grew a tall, ragged bunch of gallete.

The piece of canvas that hung for a door was pulled back and a woman stepped out. She was young and tall and gracious and queenly of presence; her eyes and hair were the soft darkness of a desert summer night.

A man, tall and dark also, but of a forbidding darkness that seemed rather of soul than of complexion, sat lazily against the palm and blew whiffs of pale smoke up among the cool-looking but hot leaves.

The woman paused with the canvas door in her hand; he indolently turned his head and looked a slow, searching gaze into her face, and watching her thus, he slowly quoted:

"A face—a face that launched a thousand battleships, and fired the cloud-topped towers of Ilium."

A flash of displeasure swept red across her face.

She turned away from him and called in a soft voice that had in it a tone of tenderness:

"Children!"

Two fairy-like children, a boy and a girl, slid down from the tall bunch of gallete and trotted round the hut. Their yellow hair glistened like sunlight caught in a spider web, and so exactly alike were they that, but for the clothes they wore, their own mother could not have told them apart.

"What did you want, mamma?" said the girl.

"What did you want, mamma?" echoed the boy.

"I wanted you, my darlings—I always want you." She hugged them to her breast and kissed them again and again.

"How you do dote on those children," said the man still blowing the pale smoke up among the leaves. "I never could understand how a full grown, sensible person could lavish so much affection on a child; it's a sinful waste of material. Nobody with a love nature so abnormally developed as yours ever amounted to anything in the world—ever did anything for humanity, ever made any great discovery in science, or thought out an invention, or found a new planet; they can do nothing but love, love, love!"

"You never loved anybody, did you?"

"Never; I once made a foolish woman believe that I did."

A reminiscent smile lingered in the cruelly curved corner of his mouth.

The woman shrugged her shoulders contemptuously!

"Poor fool! She did not believe it long!"

"Not long—oh, no; not long. Besides," continued he between the whiffs of smoke, "your kind of love-nature is small—very small; it winds itself round its own and shuts the world of humanity out. It would make any sacrifice, even of life itself, for the thing it loved, but would not sacrifice the thing it loves for all humanity. Now, I suppose you would not be willing to give up those youngsters—although they'd make such beautiful angels—if it would stop the plague or save a million lives?"

She clasped the children closer to her breast.

"You have no heart," she said.

"Heart is not what a civilised world needs; it needs intellect and philosophy and reason. Heart is simply instinct; it is what the wild animal has that stands at bay with her young ones behind her and lets the dogs tear her to pieces."

"Mamma, did the dogs tear the little young animals up?" said the girl.

"Mamma, did the dogs tear the little young animals all up?" echoed the boy.

"No, darlings."

They cuddled nearer to her, and patted her face in trustful lovingness.

The man knocked the ashes out of his pipe and put it into his shirt pocket; he laughed an amused chuckle.

"Nature was prodigal of beauty to this family, but was very niggard of brains." He smiled at his own witticism.

The children lay down in the shade of the hut and slept; the woman sat by and fanned them with a leaf of the palm. When the sun had nearly set and the oven-like heat of the desert began to cool, then the man went out to where his horses were staked on the scattering bunches of gallete, and led one of them to the hut and turned the other loose. He saddled as leisurely as though all the time in the world were his, and then called to the children.

Digitized by Google

"Come, children, and take your ride."

They came trotting to him, but when he stooped to lift them, the girl darted away.

"I forgot to kiss mamma," she said.

"I forgot to kiss mamma," cried the boy, darting after her.

He waited patiently; when they came back he set the girl before him and the boy behind the saddle.

"Why do you always put him behind—because he is a boy?"

"No; because he is an echo; why, he hasn't enough individuality to be hypnotised, except through her."

The dark eyes of the woman contracted with displeasure.

"I wish you would not keep the children out so late as you did last night," then wistfully, "please."

"Why?" he asked unconcernedly.

"I was frightened," she said simply; "it was quite dark when you came back."

"Why should you be frightened? This is the safest place in the world for you, and what could happen to the little ones—haven't I had them out riding every evening for a week?"

"And each evening have stayed a little later. Why can I not go with you—I would like to go to-night? I used to ride well."

He glanced uneasily at the loose horse.

"There's no saddle for you."

"I have heard of men who were gallant enough to ride bareback and let women have their saddles."

"They were probably the kind who have hearts," he answered with a joking smile; "to-morrow evening, if you still wish to go."

He touched spur to the horse and galloped away. She stood watching them; a dread settled heavily upon her heart. She watched them till they were a mere moving dot on the sand—watched till she could see them no more; turning away with a sharp sigh she spoke unconsciously aloud:

"I wish I had not let them go."

Startled at the sound of her voice in the stillness, she went into the hut and busied herself shaking up the children's bed. She shook each sheet and quilt, that no bit of dust or sand might be left in it. She patted the pillows lovingly and smoothed them with the palms of her hands.

She sat down in the door and waited. The twilight gathered deeper and duskier, but they did not come. The silence overwhelmed her; it had a million voices. She waited and waited longer yet. A coyotte came stealing up to the spring; she heard it lap, then its light step as it trotted away, then its sharp bark ending in a long whining howl. A big, long-winged black bird swooped over the spring and flopped away in the gathering night; and the big, round moon rolled up out of the hem of the desert.

She could endure the silence and the suspense no longer. She climbed to the top of the sandhill behind the hut and called and shouted their names until her voice was hoarse. A chorus of coyotte howls was the only answer that came back to her.

Midnight came and they did not return. She slung a canteen of water over her shoulder, caught the loose horse, which for some strange reason had not followed its master, and started on their trail. The brilliancy of the full moon made it possible to follow the tracks in the sand on and on, until in the waning light before the dawn she lost them and slid from her horse and sank down and slept.

A lizard ran across her neck and its scratching feet woke her; it was daylight. The horse stood near, eyeing her with human-like intent. She arose and went away again on the tracks.

The day came hot and grew hotter and hotter. It was noon; the baking sun beat down on her head, her back tingled with innumerable blisters, her brain began to be dazed. She came to a place where the tracks confused her, there was such tramping round and round. She stopped and felt strangely dull and puzzled. A coyotte trotted from a knoll; she looked where it had been and saw something lying on the sand. She dropped heavily down the horse's side and staggered to it. Then such a scream broke the silence as never the desert had heard. One of her children lay dead, its little upturned face singeing in the sun; its pretty hands crossed on its breast. Its limbs were straightened and its dress wrapped lightly about its knees. It had been laid there after it was dead. She sat down beside it and gathered it to her breast and rocked it to and fro.

"My pretty one, my little one," she murmured, fondling and kissing it as she talked.

Presently she bethought her of the canteen. There was a little water in it; it was hot. She parted the child's lips and poured the water between them; it ran out of the corners of its mouth. She set it up in her lap and smoothed its silky, hot hair and rubbed her cheek against its cheek, then let it go and clasped her hands, making a hoop round it of her arms. The partly stiffened body balanced for a moment on her lap, then fell over. She caught it again to her breast, laughing a wild, terrible laugh, and started back on the track she had come.

* * * * *

When the grey dawn was fading into light a woman with wild eyes and long, loose-hanging hair, with blistered face and hands and feet, carrying a dead child in her arms, came into the hut by the One Palm Spring and laid it in the bunk in the corner. She crooned hoarsely a sleep song to it. The horse came up to the door.

"Come in," she called to him. "Come in—come in and see the transmigration of souls! Keep still, though—keep still; they are asleep."

* * * * *

One Christmas morning three men awoke in the dawn on the Colorado desert and, shouldering their burden of blankets and fears, trudged onwards through the sand towards the far line of the mountains to the west.

Digitized by Google

They had hunted the traditional ship on the desert, likewise the tradition Pegieg mine; had lost their outfit and lost their way. Their canteens were empty that morning.

"If it would only rain!"

"Rain? Look at that sky, you could as easily expect rain out of a brass kettle."

They stopped short in their tracks. In the twinkling of an eye the far-off range of mountains stood before them; so near they could see the canyons, and trees, and rocks. They turned their eyes to the south. The glimmering, defiant Cocopah range, towards which so many bleaching skeletons lay headed, stood out boldly straight against the dawn. But what is that nearer thing? The men caught their breath and looked harder southward. High in the air—and so gratefully near—it was a house; before it a giant palm-tree—one solitary palm—in the midst of a green lawn. There was a horse on the lawn, and a woman sat in the door of the house. It all vanished in a moment. In another moment it was there again—the house so impossibly tall, the legs of the horse so grotesquely long. A long straggling grove of mesquit was this time a part of the scene.

The three men hailed it with different expressions.

"Deliverance!"

"A mirage."

"But this kind of mirage always has a reality at the bottom of it. There is a horse on that green stuff; there is a house of some sort, and a woman sitting in the door, just as surely as yon range of mountains actually exists. It may be twenty miles away, but it is there."

Quicker than thought it all vanished. The shafts of the sun had touched the sand.

Several hours later, three weary, thirsty men, toiling round the end of a long bluff of sand, stopped and shouted simultaneously:

"There!"

"Look there!"

"Look!"

There, right before their eager eyes, was the place the mirage had shown them. The woman still sat in the door, the horse still stood on the lawn. They felt awed, they knew not why. Nearer, the green lawn was a long irregular patch of coarse grass and yerba mansa; the house, a mere mud-walled hut, roofed with poles, from which hung tattered remnants of cloth.

But the woman sat in the door. She leant against the side of it. They could see her—see her attitude of expectancy as plainly as they had seen her in the mirage.

The grove of mesquit began just a little way from the hut.

The men talked:

"Enough beans on that grove to feast a whole tribe of Indians."

"If I were a great artist I would paint that scene and call it 'Waiting.'"

"No need to name it; every one who saw it would know its name."

"That woman is waiting for some man, I'll bet."

They lowered their voices.

"Maybe she is alone and afraid of us."

"I wouldn't blame her to be."

They stepped round the wide-spread palm and stood before the woman. Then they took off their hats and bowed their heads in silence.

It was a corpse in shreds of a dress. H. T. M.

A GREAT SCHEME.

HOW TO GET ANY BOOK YOU WANT.

WE are constantly receiving complaints from readers that we do not devise competitions in which everybody can enter.

It is difficult to do this—to give everybody an equal chance of success.

However, we think we have hit upon something this time.

Every week we shall give away half-a-dozen books.

All a competitor has to do is to send us one Book Coupon cut from The Sunday Reader, one from the Athletic Record, and one from Short Stories.

Send these to us in one envelope together with a request for any single book in the whole world of literature.

From the applications we receive we shall each week pick out six and send the books asked for.

If you are not successful one week, keep on trying, you are bound to be successful some week.

All applications to be addressed to "BOOKS," Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please let me have: S. S.

Book.....

Price.....

Name.....

Address.....

.....

RESULT FOR THE FIRST WEEK.

David H. Jennings, Privy Council Office, Whitehall, S.W. "Fire and Sword in the Soudan." By Slatin Pacha. 6s.

Mrs. Braidwood, 7, Sciennes, Edinburgh. "Flowers of Spring." 7s. 6d.

Mrs. W. E. Battie, 79, Spring Street, Darlington Street East, Wigan. "Self-pronouncing Teacher's Bible." 10s. 6d.

Jack Ramsden, 176, Albemarle Street, Ashton-under-Lyne. "Poems by Walt Whitman." 10s. 6d.

Robert Freeman, 19, Green Lane, Kettering. "Thelma." By Marie Corelli. 6s.

Arthur Bailey, 15, Archer Street, Osmaston, near Derby. "King Solomon's Mines." By Rider Haggard. 6s.

Digitized by Google

DAN LENO'S COMIC JOURNAL.

THE FUNNIEST MAN ALIVE WILL RUN THE FUNNIEST PAPER PUBLISHED.

IT WILL COME OUT EVERY TUESDAY.

IT WILL COST ONE HALFPENNY.

PEARSON'S WILL PUBLISH IT.

AND EVERY PERSON WHO SPEAKS ENGLISH OR CAN UNDERSTAND A FUNNY PICTURE WILL WANT TO READ IT.

HOW DAN LENO WILL BE SOLD FOR A HALFPENNY.

HOW EVERYBODY MAY STAY AT HOME AND LAUGH WITH THE WORLD'S GREAT LAUGH-MAKER.

FULL PARTICULARS OF THE BIGGEST COMIC SCHEME THAT EVER ENTERED INTO THE MIND OF MAN.

As the historian of the future will some day come to us wanting to know how DAN LENO'S COMIC JOURNAL originated, it is just as well to put the plain facts of the case in evidence at the outset.

We were thoroughly worn out one day recently with Christmas Numbers, competitions, printer's devils, and other editorial nightmares, and when the day's work was done, took an evening off instead of going home.

Chance sent us to Drury Lane Theatre. From the time Dan Leno first came on the stage till the curtain came down we simply sat there and roared. Roared and shrieked and howled, and should have become a disgusting nuisance to everybody around us if everybody around us had not been kept busy howling, shrieking, and roaring also.

The great laugh-maker of the English stage set old Drury ringing with delirious merriment.

It was honest laughter, born of clean wit and clever capers, and the thought, in some strange way, came into our mind that if Dan Leno could be distributed throughout the country, the country would be the better and the happier for it.

Then we went hot and cold in turns, for we saw how this thing could be done.

Five minutes later we were in Dan Leno's dressing-room, discussing the matter with him.

That is how DAN LENO'S COMIC JOURNAL came about.

In a week or two's time it will flood the country—flood every country where the English language is spoken.

There will be no paper in the world like DAN LENO'S COMIC JOURNAL.

It will carry boisterous laughter wherever it goes; it will be the best tonic for a jaded mind; it will be the most reliable doctor to those who are run down; it will, indeed, be the best friend any man can have.

Fun will be its key-note.

It will be the most comic of comic papers.

Those who look for instruction in its pages will look in vain; they will only find genuine and hearty fun—fun everywhere.

Every week Dan Leno will romp and scamper through the illustrated pages of his COMIC JOURNAL; every week he will tell in his own delightful way of the many funny things he has seen, and heard, and done.

All of you have heard of Dan Leno, most of you have seen him and admire him, many of you swear by him and love him.

In future he will take each and every one of you by the hand, as he has never been able to do before, and call you friend, and you will look with longing and pleasure for his weekly visit.

And think what this means!

Was there ever such a thing heard of before?

Here is the funniest man you know coming every week to chat and yarn and laugh with you, and only charge you two farthings for the pleasure of it.

If the people of Great Britain do not rise in their millions and show their appreciation by reading the COMIC JOURNAL, we shall know what to think of them—nothing very satisfactory, let us tell you.

Go to your newsagent now—without delay—tell him DAN LENO'S COMIC JOURNAL is coming out, and tell him, too, that if he fails to keep a copy for you every week, he does so at the peril of his life.

Next week, Dan Leno will say a few words himself, and also tell you the date when the first number will appear—some time this month.

YOUR CHARACTER FROM YOUR HANDWRITING.

To amuse and at the same time to interest our readers we have retained the services of the most expert graphologist of the present day, and even those who do not believe in the art will soon find themselves convinced if they care to send along a specimen of their handwriting upon an unruled sheet of paper with their usual signature and full address. From this their characters will be told. These characters will not necessarily be flattering. They will be bare statements of the truth. In each case six stamps and a stamped, addressed envelope must be inclosed. All letters should be marked "GRAPHOLOGIST," and forwarded to Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

THE SHIFTING SAND.

I had been knocking about the mountains for several weeks, when one evening I found myself in front of a little cabin nestling at the foot of a great mountain, and facing a level stretch of sandy plain dotted with clumps of sage-brush. My horses were tired from an unusually hard day's jaunt, and I was so weary of the solitude of the great trees and hills, and the monotony of self-communion, that I was very glad to pitch camp for the night in a place that promised human companionship.

Dismounting, I removed the saddle from the animal I had been riding, and was busy untying the cords which bound my camp outfit to the other, when I noticed both animals prick up their ears and look intently across the plain. Turning in that direction, I saw coming slowly towards me the figure of a man—an old man apparently, for his long hair and longer beard were snowy white, and his tall form was bent, as with the weight of years. He was dressed in the ordinary garb of a miner—heavy high-top boots, blue denim overall and "jumper," and broad-brimmed white hat. In one hand he carried a long staff, which he occasionally thrust sharply into the sand as he advanced, pausing frequently for a backward glance across the plain.

When he had drawn nearer, I noticed that his staff was peculiarly shod with a long, sharp piece of steel. He was within a few yards of where I stood, when, turning from a last backward glance, his eyes met mine; deep-set, penetrating eyes, looking out from beneath heavy white eyebrows, and taking in with one quick glance my whole array of intruding forces.

I am not by nature a timid man, and years of frontier life have given me an assurance which seldom deserts me; but I do not mind confessing that, as I looked into those eyes, I felt decidedly uneasy as to my reception. I knew instinctively that I stood in the presence of no ordinary backwoodsman, whose rude hospitality belongs to every wayfarer by the right of an unwritten law of frontier etiquette. The cordial note of his rich voice, as he bade me "good evening," reassured me so much, however, that I asked permission to stay all night, hastening to add my name, address, and occupation. He readily assented, and, after showing me where to picket my horses, led the way into the cabin, where he soon prepared a supper to which I did the full justice of a keen appetite.

When the table had been cleared away, and a fresh log laid upon the fire, I got out my pipe and tobacco, offering my host some of the latter, which he accepted; and we were soon chatting together with that cordial good-fellowship peculiar to men under the influence of the seductive weed. I had confided to him my mania for "prospecting," still persistent after years of fruitless efforts to "strike it rich;" and there had fallen between us a short silence, during which I allowed my thought to drift away to a sweet-faced woman whom I had loved silently, hopelessly, for so many years.

Suddenly my host's voice recalled me to the present.

"A mania you called it," he was saying; "and rightly, too, as are all other forms of our greed for gold. Heaven knows no one can realise this truth more bitterly than I!"

The weariness in his voice impressed me painfully. As the lighted match which he held to his pipe flared up, I noted with new interest the deep-set eyes, out of which all gladness had gone, the fine, shapely head, with its crown of snowy hair, the broad sweep of white forehead, and the rugged lines of the face, which must have been handsome in youth. I was speculating as to what his story might be—for that he had a story that set him apart from the common run of men, everything about him plainly declared—when he took his pipe from his mouth, and, without preface or apology, began:

"I have lived in this cabin for eighteen years, never leaving it except for semi-annual visits to the little town across the mountains for my supplies. Eighteen years ago this month I discovered a rich ledge, bearing gold and silver, up the mountain side about a mile. I had high hopes and worked hard, for I possessed the mightiest incentive that can nerve a man to wrest a fortune from fate—a loving little woman back in England awaited my return. Her father, a wealthy, hard-headed old farmer, disapproved of me on general principles, but especially because of my poverty. When I had £2,000 in cash, he said, I might claim her for my wife. We believed the condition equivalent to a refusal of my suit, for the toiling and saving of a lifetime would scarcely win that much money from the few stony acres I possessed. But youth is hopeful and resourceful; so I left my sweetheart, who promised, amid her tears, to be faithful till death, and started for the golden West. I had poor success, however, and at the end of five years was little better off than when I left home. Then it was that I stumbled quite accidentally upon the ledge up the mountain side, so accidentally that I believed it nothing short of providential. Poor fool!"

He laughed bitterly, and then sat watching the smoke which curled in fantastic wreaths from his pipe.

"For some time I worked as seldom men worked before, as man can work only when buoyed up by such hopes as were mine. But I was soon forced to the conclusion that I must have assistance and machinery to develop my mine, both of which required capital—and that I did not have. One day I set out on foot across the mountain in search of someone who would advance the necessary capital for an interest in my mine. You may be sure that it was only after a severe struggle that I brought myself to this step.

"In the first place, I was so greedy for gold that I dreaded sharing the profits with anyone else; and, on the other hand, it was no easy matter to induce anyone to invest in a quartz mine, for this section was then mad on placer mining. Upon reaching town I went straight to the post-office, where, as I expected, I found a letter from my sweetheart. I carried it unopened to my room at the hotel, and sat down to read it, thinking that it would give me new courage for my quest."

The old man paused. Something in his voice kept me silent, too, though I longed to question him as to the outcome of his story. Suddenly he roused himself from his reverie and continued as abruptly as he had ceased.

Digitized by Google

"I need not tell you that my letter contained a story as old as love itself—the story of woman's faithlessness. It put out the light of my life at one cruel blow. I did not heed the protestations, all blotted with her tears; I grasped only the one vital point, that she was no longer mine to win, since she had yielded her vows to a richer man; and the bitterness of this blinded me to all else. All night long I sat with the letter in my hand, and when morning came I started for home, following the instinct which leads the wounded animal back to its familiar haunts to die.

"For a long, long time I lay in my little bunk yonder, praying for death, and then there grew in my mind the suggestion of suicide. In a stupid way I reviewed all the routes to eternity at my disposal; but with the fastidiousness of a sick brain, I rejected them, one after another. There was my rifle or my hunting knife, but the thought of their bloody mutilation turned me sick. Then there was a rope, and there," pointing to the stout beam over our heads, "was the impromptu gallows."

At this gruesome suggestion I could not repress a shudder, and was glad that my tell-tale face was hidden by the gathering gloom.

"But I was something of a gentleman in my youth, and hanging was too suggestive of the felon to be pleasant. I got up at last, and dragged myself outside the cabin. Sitting in the sunshine, I lifted my eyes to the westward, and then leapt to my feet, shouting for insane joy. A great bank of grey clouds lay almost touching the mountain tops, and in those clouds was the solution of my death problem. I was mad, you see."

He refilled and relighted his pipe before proceeding.

"You noticed this evening the level stretch of plain to the eastward. The soil is loose, light sand, and the terrific winds which occasionally sweep down over the mountains play mad pranks with it. Great hills and hollows are piled up and scooped out, familiar landmarks are obliterated, and new ones uncovered to-day, and to-morrow the inconstant wind will undo its work, leaving the plain as level as a floor. In the bank of clouds I saw the promise of one of these periodical storms, and like an inspiration to my muddled brain came the idea of fashioning myself a grave, in which I could lie down, allowing the wind to wrap me deeply in a winding-sheet of sand. To think was to act. With a nervous energy, born of madness, I seized a spade and hastened out on the plain."

The old man got up and went to the door. The full moon had climbed well up the heavens, shedding a soft, weird glory over the plain.

"It wasn't far, just out yonder, at the foot of a giant sage-bush that I chose the spot for my grave."

I had risen and stood beside him, looking out across the sand, dotted with numberless sage-bushes, lifting their stunted limbs to the sky. I had no idea which particular shrub he meant, but the awesome story, and his motionless, intent attitude, which recalled his frequent halting and backward glances, as I had watched him coming across the plain in the evening, kept me dumb. He stood thus some time, and then, with a deep sigh, resumed his seat; but I dropped down upon the doorstep; the moonlight was pleasanter than the ghostly shadows of the cabin.

"I worked rapidly, pausing for an occasional reassuring glance at the bank of clouds. I had scooped out the sand to a depth of, perhaps, three feet, when the point of my spade unexpectedly came in contact with a hard surface."

"The bed rock?" I ventured, as the old man stopped short, as though overcome by the memories he had invoked.

"No—and this was what surprised, almost terrified me. I knew that the sand was from ten to twenty feet deep, and that it was impossible that I could have reached bed rock so close to the surface. Carefully pushing the point of my spade about, I found that the obstruction was apparently circular, and perhaps three feet in diameter. A few moments' work cleared away the intervening sand, disclosing a flat, round rock.

"Using my spade, I lifted the rock slowly from its resting-place, and perhaps you can imagine my surprise when I uncovered the dark mouth of a well. I am not naturally a physical coward, but my nerves were so unstrung by all that had gone before, that it was several minutes before I could bring myself to investigate this unexpected development of my grave. At last, however, I secured a pitch stick from the cabin for a torch, and returned to follow this new 'lead' to its conclusion.

"Thrusting the lighted stick into the opening, I found that the well was about four feet deep, and that the sides were walled with rough stones fitted together without mortar. At the bottom, on one side, was a small opening. Lowering myself into the well, I thrust the torch ahead and cautiously crawled through this opening, to find myself in a small chamber, high enough to admit of my standing upright. The walls of the chamber were of the same rude masonry as the well, while the ceiling was composed of stout poles, laid closely together and resting upon the stone walls. Raising the torch above my head, I made a rapid survey.

"Scattered about the floor were rude implements of stone, specimens of primitive pottery, small jars, covered and uncovered, bows and arrows of gaily painted wood, arrow heads, and spear points. I knew at once that I was standing in an ancient Indian grave, and was, therefore, partly prepared for the ghastly picture which was revealed when the light of the torch put the host of lurking shadows to flight. Sitting bolt upright against the farther wall, grotesquely hideous with feathers and other savage adornments, and wrapped about with gaudy robes falling away from the skeleton forms in decaying tatters, were three figures. It was not a pleasant sight, nor one I cared to look upon—the dark faces with their rows of shining teeth, from which the withered lips were drawn in sardonic grins, and the staring caverns, which the flickering light filled with phantom eyes.

"I turned again, with idle curiosity, to the pottery. Pushing off the cover of the jar nearest me, I cautiously thrust my hand into the mouth, and lifted it full to the light; and then I dropped upon my knees, staring stupidly at the glittering heap of yellow sand in my open palm, asking myself if I were dreaming. Ounces of pure, bright gold. As the stupendous fact worked itself through my bewildered brain, I laughed aloud, moving from jar to jar. All told the same story, save two; gold, and full almost to the brim. Gold enough for a king's ransom, and all mine for the taking. And then upon my elation broke the flood of my misery. I was rich now, but, oh, Heaven, of what use? With the irony of an accursed fiend, fortune had waited until I was ready to die, until my hopes were already dead, and then overwhelmed me with her golden shower. I raved and swore until I was exhausted, and then fell prone upon the floor, overcome by my passion. Presently I grew calmer. The storm of my rage had carried away with it all pain and disappointment. The basilisk glitter of the gold had got into my eyes, conjuring into life another sort of demon than despair. I was rich, and riches meant much; more than love or happiness, perhaps. Riches meant power—and revenge. I could go back to my old home and live like a prince, her next door-neighbour. Many things come to him who has the patience to wait and the money to do. I had both, and would be ready when the time came to pay off her father, her husband, herself in the Devil's coin of hate, and debt I owed them.

Digitized by Google

"So I gloated over my suddenly acquired wealth, and my wild imaginings of revenge, till the charnel-house air of the chamber extinguished my torch, leaving me in Egyptian darkness. With a muttered oath at my stupidity, I flung the useless stick away, and groping about, caught up one of the precious jars, and worked my way to the opening. It was no easy task without a light, and I was very glad to find myself at last in the well, still holding the jar against my chest.

"When I lifted my face above the opening of the well, I was greeted with a blinding, biting shower of sand. The storm, which was to have been my sexton, had come, and, as if to punish me for my defection, buffeted me most cruelly. Carefully replacing the cover to the well, after I had climbed out, I lifted my jar of gold in my arms and started for the cabin. The sky was overcast, and the blinding, whirling sheets of sand so bewildered and exhausted me that once or twice I thought I should have to give up trying to reach shelter. At last, however, I stumbled across the threshold of this room, more dead than alive, and I believe I never before or since was so glad to get inside these four walls.

"All night long the wind raged with a fury I have never known since in the long years of my residence here. When morning came, my first thought was of my treasure-house. I hastily dressed and stepped outside. The sun was just above the horizon, smiling genially upon the quiet landscape, which somehow looked very strange to my anxious eyes, as they sought the particular sage-bush which marked the entrance to the grave. Not a landmark could I see. With fiendish malignity the wind had effaced every familiar bush, and hillock, and ravine. The plain lay glittering in the sunlight, a grey, level, interminable waste of sand. I returned to the cabin disappointed and chagrined, but not uneasy; and thinking myself lucky to have fetched one jar with me, I stooped and stroked its ugly sides with a miser's tenderness. Then, to reassure myself by a sight of the yellow dust, I put my hand into the jar and lifted it full to the light.

"I think I went mad again for a moment, for when I came to myself I was standing over the shattered jar, looking down upon its scattered contents, which twinkled in the patch of sunlight from the open door—white, red and yellow beads! In the darkness I had got hold of one of the only two jars in the grave which did not contain gold."

"But surely you found the grave again?" I said.

The old man shook his head.

"From that day to this I have been searching for the entrance to the grave. I have gone over every foot of yon sand. Storms have swept over it, casting up and tearing down hillocks, covering and uncovering sage-brush! but never once revealing the secret held fast in the shifting sand. Day after day, armed with my steel-shod pole, I've sought so fruitlessly that I should be tempted to believe the whole thing a delusion of my over-wrought mind, were it not for the shattered jar and the beads which I have in my cupboard. I cannot tear myself away from the accursed search, which has grown to be a mania that nothing but death can cure."

The sky had become overcast as he ceased, and the soft soughing of the pines told of a rising wind.

"It is going to blow to-night, and that means no sleep for me," said my host, arousing me as from a dream, after a long silence; "but you are tired, and I have thoughtlessly kept you awake. Let me show you where to make your bed."

I was soon stretched between blankets and left alone to sleep. But the strange story to which I had just listened had so impressed me that for hours I lay awake, thinking how curiously the man's early history coincided with my own. The mania for gold, the incentive to treasure hunting—love for a beautiful woman—the exile to the mountains, all were the same; only in my case the woman loved was bound to me by no spoken tie.

Years ago I vowed that I would never ask Agnes to be my wife until I had made a fitting home for her, and it had been this apparently hopeless ambition that had sent me away to the mountains, where I determined to remain until either death or fortune cured me of my mania. To-night, as I lay revolving in my mind every detail in the story of my host, I felt that death alone would effect the cure.

Just as I sank into a slight slumber a lusty halloo shook my drowsy senses, then voices and the tramping of horses broke irregularly into the softer monotony of the rising wind, and presently my host entered with someone, who, like myself, spread his blankets upon the floor, and then, lulled by the wind, I fell fast asleep.

When I awoke the sun was streaming in at the open door of the cabin. Leisurely dressing myself, I went outside to look after my horses, and met the stranger, a prospector, like myself. As we exchanged words of greeting, my eyes travelled carelessly across the plain until they were arrested by an object lying at the foot of a giant shrub, an object so like the figure of a man that I broke off what I was saying and ran swiftly towards it, with a strange fear tugging at my heart.

Lying on his back, his white face upturned to the smiling sky, I found my old host, his madness cured at last. Grasped firmly in both hands, and lying partly across his dead body, was the steel-shod pole, the point of which was thrust deeply into the loose sand. Together, the stranger and I carried him into the cabin, and then I went to bring the coroner from the settlement across the mountain.

As the last rays of the setting sun slanted across the fateful plain, we buried him close by his cabin door, with the crumpled, time-seared letter from his sweetheart hidden over his peaceful heart. The coroner took possession of his effects, among which we found the broken jar and the beads. The next morning we separated and went our several ways. For two days I travelled, and then a thought, which had haunted me ever since I found the old man lying dead, caused me to retrace my steps; my suspicions proved correct. I found that the point of his staff had touched a rock, the entrance to his long sought treasure-house, and the shock of joy had killed him. The interior of the grave was as he had described it to me, and—but why go into details? Fortune, not death, cured my mania and satisfied my ambitions. A month later I was married to Agnes.

C. C. Orsdall.

Digitized by Google

By GEORGE GRIFFITH.

Author of "Valdar the Oft-Born," "Briton or Boer?" "The Outlaws of the Air," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XXXV.

A Change of Course.

When Lorrain came on deck the next morning at daybreak he found the Minnehaha spinning along over a smooth sea out of sight of land and absolutely alone on the face of the waters. He looked at the compass and saw that she was heading south-east, from which he concluded that she had cleared the island and was making straight for the Mid-Atlantic. Captain Peters was already on deck, so he took the opportunity of telling him of the change in his plans and taking his opinion on his scheme for despoiling the treasure ships of the new El Dorado.

The little skipper walked beside him one or two turns in silence, twisting his goatee and looking straight down at the deck. Then he stepped to the rail, sent a stream of tobacco juice into the water, dropped a well masticated quid after it—very early morning was the only time he allowed himself the nautical luxury of a chew—and came back and said:

"By the Great Snake, Seenyor, you have a head on you, if you'll excuse me saying so. Now I call that just one of the daisiest schemes that a man, a real genius, could think of. Piracy—waal, yes, I guess that's about the size of it, but anyhow we might as well run the Roger up now as anything else. If we're caught we'll just be sunk on sight and that's all there is in it. But as I said before, Seenyor, I'm yours to command while the wages are paid regular, and if there's any galoot aboard that makes any difficulty about obeying my orders I'll make things so difficult for him that he won't find living worth while.

"Yes, it's a great scheme, and I'm proud to work for a man who could think a thing like that out. And what sort of a show do I think we've got? Just about the same as the old fellows had in their day, as far as I can see. You see, we go by steam nowadays instead of sail, and we have handier shooting-irons, and as long as we can steam faster than anything that's sent to chase us and shoot straighter and hit harder than the others, I don't see why we shouldn't have just as good a show as Kidd or Morgan or Blue-Nosed Jake or the best of them.

"Of course, it's only reasonable to allow that there'll be an end of it and us sometime, but that's got to happen anyway, and if we have a good time in between I don't see that there's very much to howl about. We shall want another dozen or so white men on board, but we can pick them up as we go up the West Coast. Callao and Guayaquil and Panama are not bad places either for signing on hard cases who'll do most things for being paid. There'll be plenty of tramps lying around handy on the way to get coal from, and we've ammunition enough on board for a whole naval war, so as far as ship and crew's concerned, Seenyor, you can look on it as settled."

"Very well," said Lorrain when the skipper had completed his review of the situation. "Of course, I shall leave all the details to you. Now I want to get that half-bred little greaser out of the way. I'm pretty certain that he's been playing a double game with us, and certainly those two cruisers could not have turned up at Samana Bay unless they had known where we were going, so somebody must have told them—and that somebody must have been Don Gregorio or Madame Sybil. I think you said the other day that you wouldn't mind seeing the lady a widow?"

"That's so, Seenyor. I've led a pretty lonely and wild life so far, and you know, sir, however fond a man may be of fighting and knocking around the odd corners of the earth money-hunting, there are times when his heart aches, as I believe the poets say, for the sweetness of love and the charms of female companionship. I believe that's how they put it, and anyhow it comes to that. I've seen one or two fine women here and there about the earth, but, by Josh, sir, this lady goes over 'em easily, and if she's got to put the weeds of widowhood on—waal—sir—I'll help her to do it, just as slick as I'll help her to take 'em off again."

"That's the first time I've heard you deviate into sentiment, Captain Peters," laughed Lorrain, "but I'm very glad the arrangement meets with your approval. I'm going to get married myself on the first opportunity, so we may as well make a double wedding of it. I shall leave it to you to talk Madame Sybil over. Of course, if she should have the bad taste to make any objections, I dare say you'll find means to persuade her. I give you quite a free hand, you know, only, for Lady Pendril's sake, we can't have any—well—irregularities on board. I see no reason why even piracy should not be kept respectable. We'll run into Rio and get the ceremonies performed in the proper way, or perhaps we might pick a parson out of some ship we want to borrow coal from on the way. I don't care what it is so long as we put the business through in order. And now, what are we going to do with this wretched little greaser?"

"Hanging's short and handy, Seenyor, but it's a bit violent when there are ladies around. Now, as we've started pirating, what's your opinion of doing things in the good old style and marrooning him?"

"Curiously enough," said Lorrain, "that was just what I intended to do with Mr. and Mrs. Tristam—or at any rate Mr.—if I could once have got them safe on board the yacht. It was in my mind to take them down to Trinidad, you know the one I mean, down south off the coast of Brazil where there's a fine healthy breed of land-crabs."

Digitized by Google

"You've got it again, Seenyor," said the little skipper, looking up with an ugly glint in his eyes. "That's it. His keep won't cost much coming down, for we shall be there in a few days, and it's a place I've always wanted to get ashore on. I suppose you know there are all sorts of stories going around about pirate's treasures buried in it. It used to be a great place two or three hundred years ago by all accounts, and perhaps we could spare a few days for a hunt round."

"Not at all a bad idea, Captain," said Lorrain. "I don't see why the fishes should enjoy our mutual friend any more than the land-crabs. We have plenty of time before the rivers open up north, so I don't see why we couldn't afford a few days at Trinidad. I'll tell General Gregorio that he is respited for the present, and meanwhile you can amuse yourself by making the running with Madame Sybil. That will be a little entertainment for him as well as for you. Altogether, I think we shall be a very jolly party, and if Madame Sybil is inclined to be unreasonable you can tell her what we are going to do with the General, and ask whether she'd prefer to amuse herself with him and the land-crabs on Trinidad. I think when she sees the crabs she'll prefer you."

Captain Peters looked up rather dubiously, as though he didn't consider Lorrain's last remark in the very best of taste. Then he looked down again and laughed and said:

"Waal, I'm free to allow, Seenyor, that I have seen bigger and handsomer men than me, though I haven't met a better one yet in a scrap; but I'm not figuring on any woman who's taken up with that half-baked little greaser giving me the mitten. No, sir! If she does, by Josh, I'll take her ashore at Trinidad, and introduce her to the best assortment of land-crabs I can find, and ask her what she thinks of them."

At this moment her ladyship came on deck, and Lorrain left the skipper to tell her of the change in Don Gregorio's fate, and about the stories of buried treasure on Trinidad.

"You couldn't possibly have a better chance of using the Magnet," he said, "although, of course, we shall have to do it quietly together. If you do find anything and we dig it up, it will be the finest thing possible—not only in the financial sense either. I will let it get about among the crew that you possess some magical quality of going straight to wherever gold is hidden, just as those fellows who find water are supposed to have, and they'll call you the Gold-Finder, and they'll worship you and do anything for you. In fact it'll make you an absolutely ideal pirate queen."

"That's capital!" said her ladyship. "Though I must say I think it's hard lines on that wretched little President. It must be much nicer to be hung or shot at once, than left alone in a horrible place like that to starve to death or be eaten alive. Ugh! What an end—to have pieces pulled off you, until there's nothing but the bones left. Well, I came to tell you that coffee's ready."

For the next week the voyage southward proceeded without event, although there was a good deal of work done on board the Minnehaha. Her white hull was painted black with a gold band running along under the rail. Her name was changed to the Circe, to agree with a convenient duplicate set of papers. A couple of yards were manufactured out of spare spars and slung on the foremast, giving her more of a brigantine look, and the damaged funnel was cut away and the draught led under the deck into the forward one. Her armament was stowed away, and her whole appearance was so utterly changed that if the Pocahontas herself had hove in sight she would not have recognised her.

When she was alone she steamed at twenty-five knots so long as the sea was anything like smooth, as it practically always was, but when she fell in with any of the numerous craft bound for the South American ports she at once slowed down and trundled along at a respectable twelve or fourteen knots.

Don Gregorio had wanted to clasp Lorrain's knees and weep over his shoes when he told him that he was not going to hang him. But when he went on to tell him that he was going to make him monarch pro tem of Trinidad and king of the land-crabs he nearly escaped his fate by a fit of apoplexy, and when he got out of that he raged and raved and wept himself into a state bordering on insanity. He was a hopeless glutton, and as Lorrain took an unholy pleasure in inviting him to the saloon table he made the best of his few remaining opportunities, and got fatter and greasier every day, in spite of the unpleasant remarks which his persecutor let fall every now and then about the kind consideration that he was showing for his future companions on the island.

Her ladyship and Lorrain, meanwhile, were highly diverted by the rapidly developing courtship of Captain Peters. Hard in business, perfect in his profession, and utterly pitiless and unscrupulous as he was in a fight, he seemed for the time being a completely changed man. Until now he had been somewhat careless as to his outward appearance, but now he arrayed himself in the whitest of duck and drill adorned with the brightest of gold lace and brass buttons. He shaved twice a day instead of once every three days, and used the most atrocious language if his boy brought him his pipe-clayed shoes with a speck of anything like dust or dirt on them. Then he brought out a banjo, which he could tinkle with no mean skill, and in the moonlit hours of the middle watch at night he would sing plantation love-songs in a voice like the sighing of steam from an escape-pipe.

At first Madame Sybil had no notion that all this was meant for her, and her ladyship, who treated her with the most consistent politeness and cordiality, took very good care not to enlighten her. She had dropped the President completely, and regarded the terrible fate that was in store for him with apparently absolute indifference, which might perhaps have been modified somewhat had she known of the choice that she would soon be called upon to make.

But one night—it was the night before the yacht was due to arrive at Trinidad—her ladyship arranged it so that Captain Peters should find her alone after dinner on the quarter deck, and the skipper, as he described it to Lorrain afterwards, just saw the coast clear and sailed in. It must be admitted that he was considerably nervous at first, but when Madame Sybil had grasped his meaning and had turned on him in a sudden tempest of scorn and anger, his courage came back instantly. Lorrain had strengthened his hands by telling him of the share she had had in Sir Harry Viney's murder, and so he bluntly put it to her that, if there was any condescension at all in the matter, it was on his side when he offered to give, as he put it, his name and honour into the keeping of a woman who ought to have been hanged some years before.

This only produced more fury, followed by tears and then, unheeding both, and telling her if she didn't sit still he'd hold her or send for a sailor to tie her up to the rail, he proceeded to calmly expound the advantages or disadvantages which would attend her acceptance or refusal of his offer. Then he left her speechless with fear and horror, for she knew that she had not a friend on board, and that Lorrain would leave her on the desolate rocks of Trinidad to the mercy of the land-crabs with every bit as little compunction as he would leave Don Gregorio.

Later on her ladyship joined her on deck and then, strange as was the relationship between them, the natural sympathy of sex asserted itself and, in a perfect torment of remorse and fear, she laid the whole of her guilty soul bare before her and implored her pity and help.

Unhappily, however, her confession included certain revelations about Lorrain which instantly hardened her ladyship's heart, although they made no change in her outer demeanour. She sympathised and remonstrated with her in the same breath, and did both very nicely, but she could give her no better comfort than such as lay in a contrast between her fate with Don Gregorio on Trinidad and her lot as the wife of Captain Peters, drawn very much in favour of the latter.

Digitized by Google

The next morning everyone was on deck by sunrise, looking ahead at a blue-grey mass rising rapidly out of the waters ahead. Don Gregorio was grovelling for the last time at Lorrain's feet, praying for mercy, and Madame Sybil was thinking of the creeping horrors crawling about among those distant rocks of Trinidad and making up her mind that, after all, Captain Hiram Peters was not quite so loathsome as they were.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

A Tragedy and a Treasure Hunt.

Conditions of space as well as considerations of humanity combine at this point in the narrative to render necessary the drawing of a veil over the hideous fate of the miserable Don Gregorio. He was a man thoroughly bad and base, and, as we know, more than one murder could be justly laid to his charge. He was thus doubly and trebly deserving of death—but such a death! A death whose unutterable horror could be mitigated only by madness, even if by that—it is doubtful whether any crime or accumulation of crime could merit such a fate at the hands of human justice. But there was no idea of justice in the cold-blooded, calculating cruelty of those who handed him over to his horrible executioners. It had only two objects—revenge and terror, and both these were amply gratified.

Madame Sybil was taken on shore in the same boat as the victim, who was already reduced to a state bordering on idiotcy, but no sooner did she see the first of the awful creatures come crawling out of their holes among the rocks which strewed the little valley that is their particular haunt, than she went into violent hysterics and had to be carried back, screaming to the boat. Lorrain left Captain Peters to arrange the details of the execution, as he put it, and after bidding an ironical farewell to his almost unconscious victim, he landed from a second boat with her ladyship and four sailors armed with heavy clubs and carrying provisions for the day, and set out across the narrow beach towards a rugged goat-path which appeared to lead to the interior of the island.

The sailors went a little ahead, two on each side beating back the land-crabs which were now beginning to swarm out on the beach as though to repel the invaders of their domain. Her ladyship clung to Lorrain's arm and stumbled along with closed eyes, until they reached the bottom of the path. She was half helped, half carried, up this to the top of the first ridge where the ground became more practicable, and then Lorrain told two of the sailors to go back to the boat and the other two to remain on watch till he returned. Then he took one of the clubs and a satchel of provisions, and set out with her ladyship to explore the interior of the island, which, as the reader is probably aware, is of volcanic origin with a summit broken up into little circular valleys or depressions not unlike ancient craters.

As soon as they were out of sight of the two sailors her ladyship took the Magnet out of its usual hiding-place in her hair, attached a thread to it, and held it out at arm's length. It wavered about aimlessly, swinging to and fro in the wind and betraying no signs of attraction. Then they began their walk again, taking the easiest ground, and this led in the direction of the northern side of the island. They wandered about for a couple of hours or so, without the Magnet giving any indication of the presence of gold, and then Lorrain suggested that they should sit down and have a sandwich and a glass of wine.

They found a shady spot under an overhanging ledge of rock, and while they were sitting there eating and drinking, with no apparent concern for the ghastly tragedy that was about to be enacted on the beach below, her ladyship pointed to the other side of the little circular valley, from the top of which the ledge jutted out, and said:

"Doesn't it look as if there had once been some steps over there? D'you see—leading up round the corner of that big black rock."

"I believe you're right," said Lorrain, getting up. "Perhaps your ladyship's sharp eyes have found the way to what we're looking for. I'll go and explore."

He went across the valley and examined the place narrowly. Then he beckoned to her and called out:

"There has been a way up here to somewhere. We may as well find out where it leads to."

She followed him. He took her hand, and they climbed up a rugged, broken half-path, half-stairway, which became more and more like a stairway the higher they got. It was evidently very old and had not been trodden for many years, for the dust that lay thick on it showed no signs of footsteps. It led them up round the shoulder of a huge mass of rock, but still the Magnet gave no sign. They scrambled on higher still till they found themselves level with the ledge under which they had been sitting, and from where they stood they could see that a narrow cleft opened in the rocks immediately above it.

"That doesn't look unlike the entrance to one of the pirate caves that I used to read about in the days when I never thought of going into the business myself, much and all as I yearned to do so," said Lorrain, pointing towards it. "Let us go and see if the Magnet will say anything there."

They made their way along a faintly indicated path which ended on the ledge itself. Here her ladyship held out the needle again at arm's length, and to their delight it swung steadily in the direction of the cleft.

"There it is!" exclaimed Lorrain, striding towards the fissure. "There's the pirates' treasure-house, if we can only find the way in."

The cleft was only about 6ft. wide and some 30ft. deep, narrowing and sloping slightly towards the end. The floor was covered with loose rubble and dust, and there was nothing from end to end of the fissure to show that it had been disturbed by any work of man since the island had existed.

But the wonderful instrument in her ladyship's right hand proved that this was not the case, for the farther she advanced down the cleft the more steadily it inclined downwards until, when they were stopped by a blank wall of rock at the end, it pointed down at an angle of about sixty degrees and remained steady.

"There's gold somewhere down there," said Lorrain, "and that's enough for us at present. We shall want tools and perhaps drills and dynamite to find the way in, so we may as well get back and have them brought. I'll tell the men a nice little fairy-tale about the way in which you were led straight to it by that wonderful instinct of yours, and when they find it they'll just worship you. They were a little bit disappointed about Don Christoval's treasure-chest, but if they find anything worth having here, you'll be able to do anything with them afterwards. We shan't have much difficulty in getting as many recruits as we want after this."

"No," she said, "I don't suppose we shall. What a pity it is that we couldn't just have gone gold-hunting in a quiet and respectable way without having to become pirates."

"That is entirely due to Mr. Tristam's unwarrantable interference," replied Lorrain as they turned away. "I hope that some of those shells which we managed to land on board the Pocahontas relieved him permanantly of the necessity for gold-hunting."

"It would serve him quite right," said her ladyship, with a bit of a snap in her voice. "It was all his fault They fired on us first. I shouldn't be very sorry to hear that they've all gone to the bottom together. They'd have sent us there if they could have done."

Digitized by Google

"A sentiment well worthy of the future Pirate Queen!" laughed Lorrain. "At any rate we must have hit them pretty hard, but if we haven't sunk them they'll soon hear of our doings on the Alaskan coast, and then we may have the chance of another brush with them. Now, I wonder if I can make those two fellows hear."

He took a whistle out of his pocket and blew a long call on it, which was answered by a faint "Ahoy!" from the rocks to the southward. Then the form of one of the sailors appeared on the top of a ridge making signals to them with his arms. In half-an-hour or so they had reached the top of the path leading to the beach, and Lorrain took her ladyship straight to the boat and sent her off to the yacht. As she was crossing the beach guarded by the sailors sounds reached her ears from a little cove at the other end of it, hidden from view by a row of rocks, which caused her to give one terrified glance at Lorrain and then stop them with her hands. When she got on board she found Madame Sybil prostrate with terror and nervous exhaustion in the cabin.

"Have they done it?" she asked in a weak, trembling voice.

"No," said her ladyship with a gesture of unutterable disgust, "but I think they're doing it. Ugh! It's too horrible to think about! I've got something better to tell you. The Señor and I think we have found a buried pirates' treasure. The men are going to dig it out to-day, so I hope we shall be able to give you a nice wedding-present."

It was on the tip of Madame Sybil's tongue to ask whether it was the Gold Magnet that had pointed the treasure out to them, but happily for her she had self-control enough to keep from speaking the fatal words, for if she had once shown her ladyship that she knew the secret she would have been sharing Don Gregorio's fate within an hour.

Lorrain came off with Captain Peters in the other boat shortly after, and news at once ran through the ship that the whereabouts of a buried treasure had been discovered. An expedition was at once organised and equipped with all the needful tools and blasting apparatus, and Lorrain led the men straight to the fissure, taking care to impress upon them the fact that it had been discovered entirely by Lady Pendril, who had consented to place her wonderful faculty at the disposal of himself and his companions.

The men were naturally a little incredulous at first, but when a couple of hours' work with pick and drill, and the explosion of a dynamite cartridge had shattered the rock floor at the end of the fissure and disclosed a black hole like the entrance to a tunnel, their doubts began to disappear, and when they went down with their torches and candles and found themselves in a great, rough-hewn vault, half natural and half artificial, with ingots of gold and silver piled high up the side and half-a-dozen iron bound oak-chests, which looked as if they had just come out of the treasure-room of an old Spanish plateship, stacked against the further end, they needed no more convincing, and they raised a shout which made the long-silent vault fill with dull echoes as though the ghosts of the old pirates were still guarding their treasure and resented the intrusion.

No time was lost in getting the precious contents of the cave out and transporting it to the beach, but although every man that could be spared from the yacht joined in the welcome task, it was sundown before the last of the chests was got on board the boat.

From Trinidad the Circe steered for Rio de Janeiro, and there, while she was filling her coal-bunkers, there was a quiet double wedding at the English church, in which Madame Sybil played her part with dignified resignation. She had been given to understand that any attempt to communicate with the authorities or to make a scene would lead to immediate and disastrous consequences. But this warning was really unnecessary, for she was well aware that any exposure must necessarily include revelations as to her own past which would certainly result in the loss of her liberty, if not of her life, and so she wisely elected to hold her tongue.

The voyage from Rio round the Horn was eventless, and as comfortable as the weather permitted. The Circe proved herself a splendid sea boat, and her powerful engines answered every call made on them without a hitch. She coaled again at Valparaiso, and here Captain Peters picked up a dozen men after his own heart, thoroughly hard cases who only needed just such an iron hand as his over them to go anywhere and do anything as long as gold and plenty of it was to be the reward either of working or fighting. Those of the black crew who were not considered to be of any further use were quietly shot one night when the Circe was well out to sea and dropped overboard, and the work of doing this was entrusted to the new hands by way of initiating them into the fellowship of crime which now held the Circe's company together.

Another call was made, at Callao, and six more picked scoundrels passed on board under the approving eyes of the Captain. This gave him a clear five-and-twenty men outside his stokers, engineers, and quartermasters. Lorrain had bought regular yachting sailors' outfits for all of them at Valparaiso and Callao, and no one to see them at muster would have thought them anything else than a thoroughly smart and respectable yacht's crew. Their numbers, it is true, would have looked a little suspicious, so too would their weapons could anyone have seen them when Captain Peters—who now thought himself no whit inferior to the commander of one of Uncle Sam's cruisers—was drilling them after notions of his own; but he took very good care that not more than a dozen or so should ever show themselves together on deck when the yacht was in port, and of course not a weapon was ever seen on board.

Several times during the northward passage the dynamite cannon and machine guns were had up and mounted for the men to practice at them in squads or gun-crews, and everything was done to make the Circe as formidable a fighting craft as possible against the coming struggle for the possession of the spoils of El Dorado in the North.

After touching at Callao and San Francisco, mainly for the purpose of keeping the men contented by letting them have a run ashore and of learning the news, the Circe steamed straight on to Seattle. At San Francisco, Lorrain was delighted to hear a full and particular, if not exactly true, account of the running fight between the Minnehaha and the three cruisers off Samana. The Hermione and the Pocahontas had been badly injured by the dynamite shells, but the New York had crippled the pirate yacht and enabled the Pocahontas to overtake her and blow her out of the water with her heavy guns, after which the three cruisers had got back to Kingston to refit—all of which, with a good deal of circumstantial and imaginative detail, was very pleasant reading indeed to the owner and captain of the Circe.

At Seattle, which was reached towards the end of March, Lorrain gave himself out as an English gentleman adventurer named Robinson, who had come out with a party of picked men in his own yacht to try his luck in the new gold fields. He explained to interviewers that the Circe was of very light draught, and he meant to take her right up the Yukon, if possible to Dawson City itself, and see if he couldn't bring her back loaded with gold.

This enabled him to lay in not only as much coal as he could cram into the yacht's hold, but also an ample stock of dynamite and other high explosives, without suspicion, and it further enabled him to get precise information as to the sailings of the different steamers which were to bring the winter's accumulation of gold down from St. Michaels at the mouth of the Yukon river. He had the routes carefully pricked out on the best chart that money could buy, and over this he and Captain Peters put their heads together and decided on the most suitable places for lying in wait for the homeward bound treasure-ships. And thus in due course it came to pass that on the thirtieth of March the Circe steamed out of Puget Sound to make an unique name and place for herself in the annals of piracy.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

THE DOG COLLAR.

A few years ago there lived in seclusion at 13, Rue Fabert, an old major, whom the urchins of the esplanade of Les Invalides had surnamed "Major Zouzou." Everybody in the district knew Major Zouzou, a good-looking old man, who had been decorated with the military medal and the cross of the Legion of Honour for his valuable services on the battlefields of Italy in 1859, and Lorrain in 1870.

For four years the old officer had lived alone with his dog, which responded to the name of Zouzou; hence the surname given to the master.

Somewhat of a cur, Zouzou was part shepherd dog, and part hunter. From the hunting dog he had inherited long ears and searching eyes, and from his shepherd ancestor, he had a shaggy coat and a long tail, ending in a large tuft, which afforded great amusement to the urchins.

Zouzou was a vagabond by nature, and liked to take walks by himself, and one often saw him walking along in a haphazard way, his nose to the wind.

In the morning by sunrise he would come downstairs with a basket hung round his neck. He would then trot off to see the baker, who, being accustomed to his daily visit, would put into the basket a penny roll, which was to go with the chocolate for the Major's breakfast.

From there he would go to a newsagent's in the vicinity, and they would give him a morning paper. Then, triumphant, the sagacious animal would bring the things to his master.

The Major was passionately fond of his dog; he brought to mind many fond memories. It was his daughter, his dearly loved child, who had fed Zouzou with a spoon and watched over him with loving kindness. Now the child was dead and the old man was left alone with Zouzou.

And often in the evening when the dog slept, the old fellow would ask himself what would become of Zouzou if he were taken away.

"Never mind, my friend," he always said, "I will leave enough to care for you. Rest assured, my good Zouzou, your master will never forget you."

A year rolled by. Zouzou became smarter. Every day the Major would brush him and clasp round his neck a magnificent collar, which he had given him at the New Year, for he always gave Zouzou a New Year's gift.

Every New Year's day he would take Zouzou for a walk on the boulevards and show him the pastry shops.

But to-day the old man was too old, too much broken down to go so far; so he had given Zouzou a beautiful brand new collar, fastened with an elegant nickel-plated padlock. On the collar was engraved these words:

> My Name is Zouzou.
>
> I Live at No. 13 Rue Fabert.

* * * * *

The Major fell ill. Zouzou alone remained with him. Sitting on a chair near his master's bed, he never left him for a minute, mingling his plaintive barks with the sighs of the sick man.

Then the Major died. And after the burial the caretaker closed the rooms of the deceased, and chased Zouzou away with a broomstick. But the affectionate dog would not go away; he would lie day and night on the pavement opposite the house whch his master had occupied.

The caretaker would throw buckets of water over him and the children would throw stones at him; but Zouzou never moved. He would lie there as though hypnotised near the house where his master died and from where, he, perhaps, hoped to see him appear.

Several days later there arrived from the provinces some nephews of the Major, who hastened to divide amongst themselves the furniture, linen and other objects of value left by the old man. On seeing the windows, whence his master had so often called him, being opened, Zouzou made one bound, and, notwithstanding the concierge who tried to prevent it, he flew up the two flights of stairs and leapt joyously into the room of the old soldier.

"Look, there's his dirty old dog!" said one nephew, giving the animal a kick. Then Zouzou descended the stairs mournfully and went away. And no one ever saw him again in that part of the town. His vagabond life recommenced. Every day he walked on straight before him, without purpose, his nose to the wind.

The winter came on; for two days the snow fell continuously, and Paris put on a white veil. What thoughts were then passing through poor Zouzou's mind?

Several times he started in the direction of Pere Lachaise, where his master was buried—he knew it; but he was always chased away by the caretakers. Then, worn out by fatigue, dying of hunger, he stretched himself out by a high wall, as though decided to die there.

The hours passed slowly and wearily. Several times policemen went by without noticing the poor black head emerging from the ermine mantle. One hurrying couple noticed him.

"What is that?" asked a woman's cheery voice, "look, Henry." The workman—for this late passer-by wore a workingman's costume—stopped, and that he might see better, put down his little girl of three or four years, whom he had been carrying.

"Don't you see that it is a dog?" said the young man.

"Oh, the poor creature," said Clotilde; "if we took it with us—shall we? Poor brute!" exclaimed Clotilde. "We can't leave him there, can we, Henry? See, he has on a collar; he has probably got lost; to-morrow we can return him to his master." Then she added smilingly: "And perhaps we may get a reward."

"If we take this dog home I am afraid they will put us out," objected her husband.

It was in the house of this honest labourer that Zouzou was that evening installed before a good coke fire.

"Quick, Fifine, some milk; give me the jug; we will get him warmed up," said the delighted Clotilde.

Digitized by Google

"Look, Henry, how pretty he is; what good, intelligent eyes he has! Surely we will get a reward to-morrow."

"The dog is a nuisance, and I fear we shall be obliged to keep him," said Henry; "but if you do not find the owner, take him to the pound and then all will be over."

Clotilde did not respond, but Fifine, the spoilt child, clung to Zouzou and began already to defend him. The child remembered how Zouzou had taken to her and she wished to keep him.

"She will have an attack of the nerves if you take the dog away from her," said Clotilde. And that evening there was a family feud, even in that humble dwelling. The workman reproached himself with having allowed his wife to bring home this dog, who seemed to promise to give them many disagreements.

Clotilde was sulky, but knowing how kind-hearted her husband was, she did not worry much about Zouzou's fate. "To-morrow he will be the first to want to keep him," thought she, and as to sending him to the pound, she would never hear of that—never!

The next day Clotilde and Fifine took poor Zouzou to Rue Fabert. The concierge was at the door of the house. Perceiving the dog she exclaimed loudly. "Oh, the horrid thing!" she cried. "Why did you bring him back to us, madam?"

"But," said Clotilde, "the dog belongs to someone in the house."

"To an old major who has recently died," replied the concierge. "You may keep the horrid creature; we want no more of him here!"

"Very well, madam, I will keep him," replied the young woman gently; "we are already very fond of him. Come, Zouzou; come my good dog."

In the evening, when Henry returned and found Zouzou lying near the fire, he frowned.

"It's decided that we keep him," said his wife. "He belonged to an old soldier who has just died. Have pity on him, my dear Henry."

Zouzou's nature seemed to change; he never went out alone now. Sometimes, in the heavy heat of the summer, when it was almost suffocating in the home of the workman, he would glance longingly toward the Boulevard Diderot and the green trees where the birds were singing. And Fifine, understanding what was passing in his heart would say to him:

"Be patient. On Sunday we will go into the woods at Vincennes and have such a good time, and I will throw stones for you to bring back to me."

Then Zouzou would bark joyously.

Years passed like this, years of perfect happiness. But happiness is, they say, a bird of passage, who never remains for long in the nest he has chosen.

The workman fell ill, very ill. Clotilde, who adored her husband, would not allow him to be taken to the hospital till the very last moment. One by one, every piece of furniture in the modest little home was sold at a miserable price to second-hand dealers; then the linen, the little trifles, the souvenirs of happy days, everything went, little by little.

And when, after five months in the hospital, Henry was able to return to his home, he found a complete change. Misery had knocked at the door, destroying all happiness, and carrying off all their savings. Zouzou had always had his share, caressed by Clotilde and Fifine; he had often wept with them for the absent one who was now returning convalescent.

"I shall go to work to-morrow," said Henry.

And so the next day he went to see his former employer, who engaged him for the day following. But, alas, the poor fellow had over-estimated his strength, and in a few days he was forced to keep to his bed again.

Three months rent were unpaid, and the landlord threatened pitilessly to turn them out.

"When people are as badly off as you, madam, they do not keep a dog to feed."

"That is true, but he was so unhappy," said Clotilde humbly.

And haughtily, with her head very high, Clotilde ascended the stairs to her apartments. But when she was in her own room she broke into sobs.

"What is it? Why do you cry?" asked her husband.

She related to him what had taken place. Then a bitter smile crossed the lips of the sick man. Seated near the window in an old invalid-chair, which had been saved in case of his illness returning, his limbs trembled under the heavy shawl which covered them; he remained silent for a long time, his eyes fixed on the almost purple sky.

Seated beside him was Zouzou, who looked at him intently, and the man's look was mingled with the tender look of the dog.

Henry's eyes suddenly assumed a coaxing expression; a smile crossed his lips, which were as white as wax. Zouzou, advancing, laid his head across the invalid's knees. Slowly the sick man laid his hand on the animal's head. A nail in the collar pricked him and brought a little cry to his lips.

"This collar is in a bad state," said he to Clotilde. "It hurts poor Zouzou; it just now gave me a scratch. Try to find a key to open the padlock. You shan't be bothered with the old thing any longer, Zouzou."

Then he added:

"It will be a nice little amusement for me to do up your collar and make you beautiful, my old dog."

The next day Clotilde borrowed a collection of keys from a locksmith; the padlock was opened and the collar fell off.

For a few minutes Henry examined it to see exactly what had to be done; he turned it over and over in his hands. The leather was much worn in several places, and through the holes could be seen a dirty white paper.

"Papers," said he; "what can that mean?"

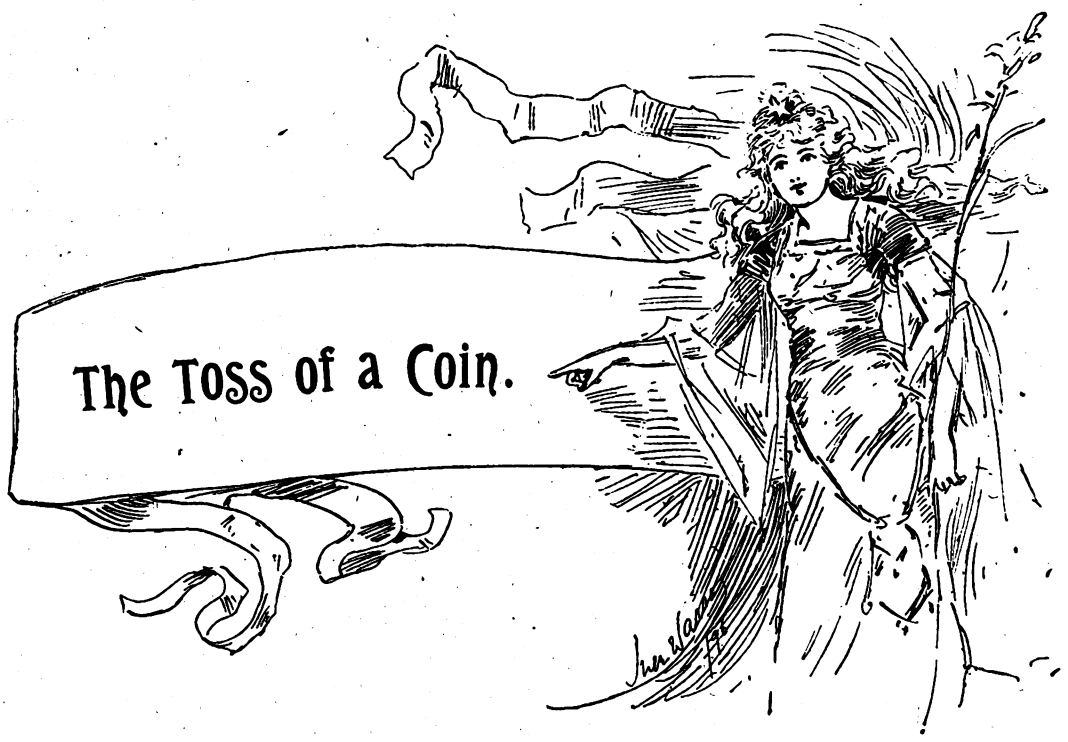
Slowly he tore off the leather, and a roll which had taken the form of Zouzou's collar fell off. From this roll fell ten bills of a thousand francs each. On the paper which had enveloped these bills was written:

"To the charitable person who shall take pity on Zouzou I leave my modest savings."

Zouzou's inheritance made them very happy, and joy has once more returned to their home. Zouzou is the master there; he sits on a chair and eats at the table, patiently waiting until he is served.

Maxim Lauzarre.

Digitized by Google



The Toss of a Coin.

"MARIE," I began awkwardly, for I had never proposed before, "you must know—you must have seen for a long time that—that—I love you."

Marie said nothing, but sat looking down at her hands, which were twisting a bit of lace that she called a handkerchief. She was smiling before I began. She now looked distressed.

I do not like to see Marie look distressed, for she then looks as if she were going to cry. And a crying woman is not pretty. So for the minute I laid aside my own affair to comfort Marie.

"Marie," I began, venturing with much trepidation to lay my hand softly upon both of hers, "what's the matter?"

She looked up. Her lips were quivering, and a tear, balanced for the start, stood in each eye.

"I don't know what to do," she whispered brokenly.

"Well?" I said inquiringly, inviting her to continue.

She hesitated nervously for several seconds. Then she went on almost inaudibly.

"You see, Mr. Transome told me last night what you told me just now."

"Confound Transome!" I said to myself; and to Marie: "Well, Philip Transome is a fine fellow, you know."

"Of course," said Marie, acquiescing a little too readily, I thought.

"And he's good looking."

"Yes."

"And rich."

"Yes."

This itemising a rival's good points to comfort the woman you love, is rather straining on one's generosity. It isn't so bad if the woman rewards your generosity, as of course, she should. But Marie didn't. So I stopped.

"Well, where's the trouble, then?" I asked, at length.

"I don't know what to do," she replied, repeating her former wail.

I began to see. It is hard to decide between two lovers. I could sympathise with Marie, for I had once been in a similar predicament myself.

"You don't know which of us to take?" I suggested, after a minute or two of silence, attempting to put some sympathy into my voice.

Marie did not notice the sympathy. She merely looked uncomfortable at this bald statement of the difficulty. But she did not deny it.

"You like me, don't you?" I ventured with some fear in my heart.

Marie nodded. I felt very complacent.

"And you like Philip Transome?" I continued.

She nodded a second time. I believe I swore at Transome again.

"But you can't decide between us. Is that it?"

"That's it," acknowledged Marie weakly.

"You have tried every way?"

"I have, and I can't"—here Marie blushed, but it was a blush I did not like, because it was for Transome as much as it was for me—"and I can't tell which of you I like the better."

The person who sits in the seat of the undecided sits not easily. This I knew. And any decision is better than no decision. This also I knew. So out of the sympathy which I had for Marie I made up my mind to help her to arrive at some decision, even though I lost by it. But I did not intend losing if I could help it.

Digitized by Google

I thought for a long time, but nothing came. Then I looked up at Marie. Her eyes were fixed expectantly on me, as though she had instinctively learnt of my intention to help her and was awaiting my plan.

"Well," said I, seizing on an idea that just then popped into my head, "since you have tried all other ways, suppose you toss up for us?"

"What!" exclaimed Marie, half starting from her chair.

"Toss up for us," I repeated calmly.

Marie shrank back in her chair and gazed at me in amazement.

Marie's surprise at my suggestion angered me somewhat. Of course, I can understand that choosing a husband in such a way may seem a little queer to some girls. But they needn't act as though it were unnatural. Besides, there are worse ways.

"Toss up for you!" Marie managed to gasp out at length.

"Certainly," I replied with some asperity. "Have you anything better to suggest?"

A reluctant "No" came from Marie.

"You'd better toss up, then," I said decisively, drawing a shilling from one of my pockets and offering it to her.

She took it and gazed at it for a long time. I began to grow impatient, for the coin was like any other of its kind, and I could see no reason why she should study it. Then I saw that her look was the look of one who is thinking. Suddenly she raised her head and gazed steadily at me. And then a smile that I liked strangely well slowly came into her eyes.

"No; you do it," she said, returning the coin. "I don't know how."

We both stood up. "Heads, it is Transome; tails, it is I?" I suggested briefly.

Marie nodded.

I balanced the coin on my first finger. I felt sure of the result, for the man never lived who is as lucky as I am. I even began to pity poor Transome. But before this feeling had much opportunity to grow I flipped the shilling whirling into the air, and, as it struck the floor, placed my foot upon it.

I looked at Marie. "Which shall it be?" I asked softly.

"You," she whispered.

I slipped my foot aside and we both stooped. The head of Her Gracious Majesty was uppermost.

It was Transome.

We both straightened up. I looked at Marie and Marie looked at me. She was pale, and I could not have been otherwise. I had risked all on the turn of a coin—and it had turned the wrong way. Without a word, for I was not wise in the ways of women, I walked out of the room, secured my hat in the hall, and started to open the door and go out into the street.

As my hand was turning the knob something touched my arm. I turned and looked round. There stood Marie, with a litttle smile—a little beseeching smile—on her face.

"Dick," she whispered, and then was silent. I still held on to the door nob.

"Dick," this time the smile was still more beseeching—"can't you see? It's—it's you."

I saw, and my hand left the door knob. And in the little excitement that followed I also may have kissed Marie. Such things have happened.

WALLACE MAYNE.

SHALL WE MAKE A MINIATURE FOR YOU?

WE have made arrangements whereby we are doing a wonderful thing. We are offering exquisitely coloured miniatures (hand-painted) of any family photographs our readers like to send us.

With the enterprise born of repeated success, Pearson's Weekly makes an extraordinary offer to the whole of its readers for a limited time only. We will paint a beautiful little miniature (about 2¼-inches by 1⅞-inches) in exquisite colouring, and completely framed in a dainty gold-plated oval frame.

All you have to do is to send your photograph, together with the coupon, and seven shillings and sixpence. The miniatures may be also had in chased gold ornamental frames, the total cost being 10s. 6d.

Of course, the better the photograph you send, the better will be the reproduction.

Write your name and address on the back of the photograph.

Mark your envelope "MINIATURE."

Specimens of the Miniatures can be seen at:

MANCHESTER—Messrs. Abel Heywood, Oldham Street; and Mr. John Heywood, Deansgate.
LIVERPOOL—F. A. Latarche, 63, Lime Street; and M. Partington, 9, Renshaw Street.
EDINBURGH—H. Robinson, 111 and 115, Leith Street; and David Crawford, 75, South Clerk Street.
GLASGOW—W. Love, 221, Argyle Street; and Mr. Barr, 88, Sauchiehall St.
DUNDEE—Mrs. Littlejohn, The Pillars.
BRADFORD—W. H. Clough, 28, Forster Square.
BRISTOL—T. Thatcher, 44, College Green.
NEWCASTLE—Messrs. R. J. Porteus and Co., 19, Grainger Street West.
LEEDS.—Mr. H. Walker, 37, Briggate, Leeds.
LONDON—PEARSON'S WEEKLY Offices.

Name.....

Address.....

.....

Colour of eyes.....

„ „ hair.....

Complexion.....

Description of dress.....

.....

£ s. d.

Please send..... @ 7s. 6d.
„ „ ..... @ 10s. 6d.

Amount of Postal Orders inclosed... £ s. d.

LOVE STORIES.

The Companion paper to Short Stories.

Costs one Halfpenny.

Each number consists of a complete illustrated novel, besides information on Love, Courtship, and Marriage by the Countess M.

Digitized by Google

MERESIA

By WINIFRED GRAHAM.

Author of "Through the Valley," "A Slave of Routine," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XXVII.

There is no confessor like unto Death!—Longfellow.

Mrs. Aladros was met by a strange doctor, who gave her a brief account of the accident and spoke seriously of José's condition.

"Yours was the only name he mentioned, but if he has any relations they should be sent for at once."

"I know of none," said Meresia; "his parents lived in Madrid, but I cannot say if they are still alive, nor yet tell you their address. I will go to him at once if I may. Will you take me to his room?"

The doctor looked curiously at the pale, beautiful woman. Her face interested him, and he wondered in what relation she stood to Serano. Was it a mere sentimental friendship or something deeper, that had made the dying man call her name repeatedly, in evident anxiety, and stress of mind?

The room of suffering was dimly lighted by candles, for the brightness of electricity hurt José's eyes. He was lying propped up by pillows, with his head bandaged, but that was for a mere cut the doctor had explained to Meresia, his critical condition was due to internal injuries of a most dangerous character.

A second doctor stood by the bed, and looked up as Mrs. Aladros entered, motioning her to advance quietly.

She crept to José's side and took his hand, which lay limply upon the sheet. The coldness of it startled her—it was like the hand of Death.

He turned his head with difficulty and met her eyes.

"Are we alone?" he murmured.

The doctors exchanged glances, and taking the hint, withdrew accordingly.

"Yes, now we are alone," she answered softly in the lowest tones of the golden voice. "Are you in great pain?"

"Yes," he said, "great pain, but it's—it's about those papers. You have locked them away in a safe place?"

"Yes, the key is in my pocket now. They are quite secure."

"I have something more to explain to you," he went on feebly, "before you go to Madrid. I cannot tell you now, for my head is weak. It goes round and round, and aches horribly. I can't move. I think the wheels crushed me, but it is so difficult to remember."

"There is nothing that need worry you," she said gently, as a mother might soothe a fretful child. "I will see to everything, and guard the packet well. We will talk about it when you are better."

He closed his eyes, and murmured something in Spanish.

"You can't understand the papers," he said, and she gathered he was quoting the contents. "They call me their saviour, those poor wretches, the avenger of their assassins. Oh! God! that hell on earth! Do you hear the cries? Aladros has sent him to the upper room, the room of torture and misery! Now the hangman has got hold of him. The screams! the screams! Take me away, for mercy's sake! I thought I should never hear it again, and the sound of the whip cutting through the air! For pity's sake stop it, abominable devils! And the irons have come back too, the red hot irons, and the gag! I can't bear it now, the sight, the sound, the horror, is killing me!"

He rolled over on his side, and great drops of sweat broke out on his forehead.

Meresia tried to comfort him, and the touch of her cool hand calmed his fear, and drove the dream away.

"I thought I was back in the prison," he whispered; "it's weakness, don't leave me, I've no other woman, no one to stay."

His words brought the hot tears to Meresia's eyes, an intense pity stirred in her heart. She forgot her anger against Serano, she remembered only that he was dying and needed her; for a woman that is enough.

The disjointed fragments of his ghastly vision brought up before her all the spectres of the past. Her husband's massive figure loomed through the shadows round the bed, smiling cynically. She gave it one long defiant look, before which it vanished. Surely it was a fitting end that Aladros, the unjust, the merciless, should have died by violence!

As she had listened to the burning truths from Serano's lips, any remorse that reaction stirred in Meresia met a final doom. Triumph, conquest, pride asserted themselves once more. Aladros was dead—she and José had killed Aladros!

He lay for a while without speaking. The doctors came back into the room, looked at him, and went away again. They could do nothing, and Meresia expressed a wish to watch alone.

She forgot the enormity of her sin and his—forgot the bitter suffering, the fear, the unrest, the remorse, the long agonising hours of meditation, the sting left behind, the reproof of conscience.

José lay sleeping now like a little child, and Meresia knelt down and prayed over him. Her prayers were not for deliverance from impending perdition; they were rather the words of one strong in faith, commending a blameless soul to the overwhelming love of a great and merciful God. She seemed to discern—though sin was mighty, death terrible, Satan subtle, and the grave gloomy—a way of escape, an opening out, embodying to her perception, and proving to her satisfaction the reality of those things which the ear cannot hear, nor the eye see.

She knelt as one in adoration, with lips parted, and eyes bright with the fever of her vision; and who shall say that she was wrong; who shall condemn her, or cast the first stone?

Digitized by Google

It may be that at the last the great sins will appear small, and the little, selfish, mean, contemptible ones magnify themselves into mountains of ruin to crush the fallen to dust.

The upshot of the whole is that no man can guess, tell, say, or judge, since none have "tasted the powers of the world to come."

As Meresia knelt with face upraised, and hands clasped, the door was pushed gently open, and someone entered the room noiselessly. She neither heard nor moved, but the man started back amazed, and held his breath.

Bad news travels apace; but Herbert Brockbank had not expected to find Meresia with José Serano. His emotions all but overmastered him as he saw her there. He could neither think nor reason, but watched her with a dead, stunned feeling, that came from love, pity, and jealousy together.

He dare not retreat for fear of disturbing the sleeping man, nor could he speak to Meresia, for the whispered words that rose to his throat choked themselves in utterance. So he stood—just where he had entered—clothed in shadow, an unseen spectator of the praying woman and the unconscious man.

A bitterness such as life had never brought to him before rankled now in his soul. A stranger—apart—in the actual presence of the woman he loved with heart and body, mind and spirit, having no right to be near her, no place in her thoughts. He felt a traitor to look, to make her his own in imagination, to lull his pain by picturing her returning the love she had that very day rejected.

There was something of the expression in her face now that he had seen on the first day, when all that was good and strong in him went out to Meresia in silent sympathy—something of the soft sweetness of the spring.

Why had it come back at this awful moment, when one, who, a few hours ago, was full of life, strength, vigour, lay at the point of death, under the sword of the destroying angel?

Herbert Brockbank could not say, nor did he seek to discover, for the room was full of mystery, and nothing could be restricted within the narrow limits of reason.

Presently a low moan came from the pillows. Meresia started up, as one waking from a dream. She bent over José to catch his words.

"Are you there?" he asked.

"Yes, I will stay; don't be afraid, you shall not be left alone."

"I have found out what is going to happen," he continued; "Aunt Harriet came just now and told me. She looked very sad and thin, and as white as when I saw her in her coffin. She said I was going to die."

His voice trembled so that the words were hardly audible, and Meresia could see that his whole body shook under the bed clothes as if from intense cold, or great fear.

"Should you be frightened to die?" she murmured softly.

He groaned aloud.

"You ask me that? You, Meresia Aladros! How can I die in peace with this sin on my soul? God will not let it go unpunished, not such a sin as mine! He turns the wicked into Hell, there is nothing for me but everlasting destruction."

He shivered again, alarmed by a sense of his imminent peril.

"I thought just now," said Meresia, "that I looked into Heaven. It was not the Heaven we had pictured to us in childhood, no golden streets, no angels in white, but, oh! such a great, such a wonderful beauty, yet all divinely human with the Man-God; the Truth, the Life, waiting to pardon those who believed in His Love."

"Listen," said José, "I want to tell you—I—I——"

He paused for breath.

"Yes," she answered.

"I was a Protestant once—then—in Madrid, I changed my faith. I went over to Rome. After that, I lost touch with everything, it all seemed very weak—falling to pieces I let the rules and the services slide. I still believed in God, but I neglected the Saints—the Holy Mother. I doubted, I wavered, I was not a true Catholic. For a whole year I have not confessed; but there may still be time, time to do something, time to confess—I'm frightened. I dare not die without a priest; I must make my last confession. It may go better with me afterwards; it may reconcile the outraged Saints, the neglected Mother of God. I have plenty of money for Masses, they may save me from purgatory's worst pains. Oh! go quickly—quickly—before it is too late!"

His voice rose, he spoke with extraordinary power, and tried to push her from him. Meresia turned to do his bidding, half ran across the room towards the door, and stumbled against Herbert Brockbank with a little cry of terror.

The moment she saw his face her fear subsided. Instinctively she turned to him for advice and help.

"I heard he was ill, and I came at once," said Herbert Brockbank. "I have been here some minutes, but you did not see me."

"Where can we find a priest?" she asked.

"Stay, he is calling you back," said the man, pointing to the bed.

José was beckoning and trying to speak. Herbert Brockbank went quickly to his side, but Serano's eyes had no light of recognition in them. He feebly clutched at Brockbank's sleeve, and poured forth his story in disjointed sentences.

"Father," he gasped, "Father, I have a confession to make!"

"Come away," cried Meresia, a sudden dread seizing her, "he thinks you are the priest!"

"Let him, poor fellow; he is dying, there is no time to send. Let him die in peace."

"Oh! no, no!" gasped Meresia, frantic with terror.

But Herbert Brockbank was bending over José, who continued his speaking with extraordinary strength, the strength that comes at the last to some. "Father, I sinned, I was tempted, I fell! Aladros, Alfonso Aladros—deserved to die, so I thought, so she thought—his wife! His abominable sins were cruelty—injustice—God knows the rest. I have plotted against the State—I have helped the Anarchists in Spain to escape their torment. I gave that woman Meresia poison—poison for Aladros. We killed him, and then I made use of her—I gave her papers to take to Madrid. She was furiously angry—indignant, but I showed no pity. I cowed her with threats like a villain—her—a woman! Then I was brought home ill—injured, and she came—stayed with me—said no word of reproach. If she could forgive me, surely the good God—He must forgive—He will not be outdone by a woman!"

Meresia fell on her knees, and buried her face in her hands. She let her head sink down—down to the very floor in an attitude of abject humiliation! As the whole truth flashed across Herbert Brockbank—his emotions became suddenly subdued and controlled, as is often the case in a great emergency. He realised the meaning of Meresia's distracted protest—the horror of the moment for her—all the agony of mind she had suffered, and was suffering.

José was gazing fixedly at Brockbank, as if waiting to hear his fate.

An unseen power came to Herbert's aid, and guided his actions. Raising his hand he solemnly—reverently made the sign of the cross before the failing eyes of his dying friend. Then he spoke in a voice new and strange:

"My son, thy sins are forgiven thee—rest in peace!"

José's lips parted, he looked with great wonder and awakening happiness into far reaching space. He tried to speak, but the failing breath could make neither sound nor utterance, and into eternal silence he passed from the temporary hush of this present world.

For a moment Brockbank stood over the body of José

Serano, then he turned, and raised Meresia from the ground.

Her face was ashen pale—as white as the face of Serano—her eyes widely opened, looked fearfully from the dead to the living man, as, convicted of her crime, she waited for the worst.

In her helplessness and misery she appeared even more beautiful than when she basked in the smiling light of a spring afternoon. Her appealing expression touched the man to the core, he held her in his arms and felt her trembling, but for his support she must have fallen.

"This is retribution," she said, and the sweetness of her low, passionate voice thrilled his soul. "What shall you do?"

He lifted her face to his own, and looked into it long and searchingly. Her colour came and went under his burning gaze. Self-condemning words broke forth:

"It was true—all true! Put me away! Do you realise what I have done?"

She struggled half-heartedly to free herself from the comforting clasp—that felt as if it were holding her from the world and from judgment.

But the love that was stronger than all these things retained the treasure it had sought—the love before which sin, mistake, nay, crime—red-handed—waned to insignificance!

He wanted the woman just as she was—murderess or angel. This was Meresia—the thing he craved, the being he had seen, and instantly adored—the half of himself which God had placed in the world and withheld until now!

So love conquered with supreme sovereignity, love swept out the dark passages of the past, the bitterness, the gall—love a law unto itself—answered Meresia with the wordless assurance of meeting lips, which pressed her own, and sealed the secret of their lives.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

"Let All Be Well—Be Well."

It was the day after Serano's death, and Meresia had thought long and earnestly over the fate of José's papers.

The night before, in her excitement, she had half decided to take them to Madrid—to fulfil her mission—but with morning light she saw the folly and danger of this proceeding.

She must consider not only herself, but the true, loyal man who, knowing everything, loved her none the less. Ah! loved her, if possible, more for what she had endured.

Needless to repeat all that passed between them after they left the house of death.

Herbert Brockbank brought her home and listened to the confused story of her life, as in full confidence she eagerly unfolded chapter upon chapter to his wondering ears.

At last she could speak out her whole mind; tell everything to a breathing, living, kindred spirit, who understood her motives and her actions, and could bear to hear them without shrinking, without reproach.

It was like the rushing forth of a pent up river, a sudden outlet and escape from martyrdom and agony—the breaking of the awful silence as the flood-gates of her soul opened, as she took the stranger into the recesses of her heart. So the mutual unburdening of their love must be closed to the merciless eye of the world. Only those who have known love in its strongest form—the love that braves all—meets all fearlessly, and stands like a firm rock amidst the billows of the sea—can picture one half of Meresia's joy as she realised this man's devotion!

Now, in the quietude of her room, she crossed to a desk and unlocked a drawer.

Unhesitatingly she drew the sealed packet, addressed in José's handwriting, from its resting place. What terror this same envelope had once instilled in her brain, and now she was master of it completely; it could no longer unnerve or frighten her!

She gazed at the writing tenderly, for all her thoughts of José, now, were kind. She was grateful to him for his dying confession; glad that he had proved Herbert's love by forcing the knowledge of her crime upon him.

Then, reclosing the drawer, she took the packet in both hands, and crossed to the fire, which burnt brightly as if in defiance of the spring sunshine. Kneeling on the hearthrug, Meresia bent forward and thrust the papers, unopened, into the very heart of the blaze. They writhed defiantly, and as the fire burnt upon them, the writing seemed to rise as if lettered in gold, and the last to fade was the word—Madrid!

"The past is dead!" said Meresia; "thank God! thank God!"

She knelt between the trembling shadows and the sunlight—the shadows full of farewells and mournings for sin—the sun bright as the dawning of a new day, warm and golden, flooding every corner of the room.

The door opened, and Elizabeth announced herself:

"My dear Meresia, what a smell of burning! Old letters?"

"Only some useless papers—documents of no account. You see this little black heap? How unimportant it looks! Once it was thought a good deal of, but now its day is over."

Meresia stirred the charred leaves with the poker, and finally crushed them under the coal.

"I was so shocked to hear the dreadful news this morning," said Elizabeth, "of poor Dr. Serano's accident and death. What a loss he will be!"

"Yes; he was very good to some people."

"And yet," continued Elizabeth, "he leaves no one quite near to mourn him—no wife or child."

"He hadn't time for women," said Meresia; "his family was large and far reaching—he called it Humanity. I wonder if people are really happy who never marry!"

"I am happy," said Elizabeth.

"Are you quite—quite—sure of that? You have put so much away which the world wanted to give—you have mistrusted love?"

"Yes, Meresia. But you married, and were not happy."

"I made my own tragedy, remember. I sowed the clouds and reaped the rain. Now I am going to sow sunshine, and wait for another harvest. Put your arms round me, Elizabeth; hold me very tight; tell me there is such a thing as pure, strong, perfect love, and passion—not of the mere common, earthly kind. The love that is very God, the love that is purity itself, the love that is self-sacrifice—the devotion of a strong man for a weak woman, whose life has been marred by folly and mistake. If I told you I had found all this suddenly—unexpectedly—would you believe me?"

"Yes," replied Elizabeth. "But I should say you had been more fortunate than most women!"

The End.

What a Penny Can Do.

On February 19th, a penny will purchase what a penny has never been able to purchase before. For this one coin you will get a copy of Home Notes, a shilling novel, and a coloured plate.

Digitized by Google

"DELIGHTFUL" TREATMENT FOR CURING CORPULENCY.

The process of curing any physical disorder is so generally the converse of "delightful" that the use of this and similar terms in reference to Mr. F. C. Russell's now popular treatment for corpulency naturally attracts special attention. These terms are to be found in a large number of letters included in the just issued 18th edition of Mr. Russell's little volume of 256 pages, "Corpulency, and the Cure" (Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C.) These communications are from persons of both sexes, and it is apparent that their number is represented by thousands annually, who have found in this system of treatment a safe, rapid, and permanent cure for excessive fatness. This testimony forms in the aggregate, indeed, a wonderful record of the rapid reduction of excessive adipose tissue, and those who have personal reasons for being interested in the subject should send to the above address three penny stamps for a copy (post-free) of Mr. Russell's notably suggestive little book. "I think the treatment most delightful," writes one out of a large number of equally enthusiastic correspondents. And the expressions "Admirable tonic," "Splendid stuff," "A delicious beverage mixed with mineral waters," are of constant recurrence in this singularly interesting correspondence. The details given by many of the writers of these letters as to the results of the treatment fully justify the use of such eulogistic phrases. It must certainly be delightful to experience the sensation of losing unnecessary and dangerous fat by pounds per week, and frequently stones per month, and that by the aid of treatment which simultaneously increases the appetite and renders its reasonable indulgence innocuous. The experience, too, must be rendered still more delightful by the knowledge, which may be gained from a perusal of Mr. Russell's book, that his preparation is a pure vegetable product, without any admixture of the mineral poisons which are too frequently administered. With a candour which also is delightful, Mr. Russell prints in his book the recipe for the preparation.

The following are extracts from other Journals:

GOOD NEWS FOR STOUT PERSONS.

It is a matter for congratulation that obesity is taking its proper place as a disease, and is receiving that scientific attention which it has long lacked. It does not follow that a person need to be the size of Sir John Falstaff to show that he is unhealthily fat. According to a person's height so should his weight correspond, and this standard has been prepared by Mr. F. C. Russell, of Woburn House, Bedford Square, London, W.C., so that anyone can see at a glance whether or no he is too stout. People in the past have been wont to regard fatness as constitutional, and something to be laughed at rather than to be prescribed for seriously; but this is evidently an error, as persons whose mode of life has caused a certain excess of flesh require treating for the cause of that excess, not by merely stopping further increase, but by removing the cause itself. It is astonishing how long we go on perpetuating error, and how difficult it is to make people disbelieve anything, no matter how palpably false the principle if it has become at all firmly fixed in the public mind. These facts with regard to obesity, however, are so obvious that there ought to be no difficulty about their acceptance when once they become known; and, as a matter of fact, the immense number of persons who have already acknowledged their truth by recording the benefits received from Mr. Russell's treatment is simply wonderful. It is marvellous how this "Pasteur" and "Koch" of English discoverers can actually reduce as much as 14lb. in seven days with a simple herbal remedy. His book (256 pages) only costs 3d., post free and he is quite willing to afford all information to those sending as above. It is really worth reading.—Southport Visitor.

CORPULENCY THE THIEF OF TIME.

That procrastination is the Thief of Time is a truism so obvious that it has no claim to be regarded as an epigram. To more practical purpose it may be urged that Corpulency is, in very many cases, the parent of procrastination. The putting off till to-morrow what can be done to-day certainly becomes a mental habit, but it is unquestionably very frequently begotten by physical conditions which render exertion irksome. That in the majority of cases procrastination is easily curable is one of the considerations suggested by a perusal of Mr. F. Cecil Russell's "Corpulency, and the Cure," the remarkable popularity of which is evidenced by the recent issue of the 18th edition. The enormous mass of correspondence which this expert has accumulated, and many extracts from which are included in the 256 pages of this little book, forms the most valuable addition which has yet been made to the literature of obesity. It is specially notable that a very large proportion of Mr. Russell's correspondents who have undergone his course of treatment for the reduction of obesity emphasise the renewed vigour which they have experienced after passing through the process —a wonderfully rapid one, according to this method— of banishing their superabundant fat. The universal adoption of Mr. Russell's system by corpulent persons of both sexes would increase, by a stupendous percentage, the working capacity of mankind. The rapidly-growing popularity of the treatment is due, doubtless, to the author having discarded all the obsolete notions about semi-starvation being requisite to ensure comely and comfortable slimness. It is certain that the more the marvellous possibilities of Mr. Russell's system become known, the less will be the tolerance for the laziness of people who decline to reduce their overweight by the pleasant and facile means which are described in this little book, which can be had, post free, by forwarding three penny stamps to Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C.—Liverpool Daily Mercury.

Digitized by Google

SHORT TRUTHS.

WANTED BY THE PUBLISHER, any numbers of Short Stories published previous to July, 1893. Sixpence each will be given for clean and perfect copies.

G. R.—The proportion of men and women in France is more equal than in any other country in the world, there being 1,007 women to every 1,000 men.

P. P.—It is perfectly true that the Lord Mayor, during his term of office, takes precedence of every subject within the jurisdiction of London. Even the Prince of Wales is not an exception.

ANTI-SMOKER.—Railway companies are compelled to attach smoking-carriages to every train of more than one carriage of each class. The compulsion dates from 1868, and is enjoined by a clause in the Railway Regulations Act of that year.

H. K.—There are twenty-seven Royal families in Europe, two-thirds of which are of German origin.

Q. W. asks: "Which the easiest language to think in?"———Whichever language happens to be the one a man knows best, of course; thus English would be the easiest for an Englishman to think in, French for a Frenchman, German for a German, and so on. However, given a man with a complete knowledge of any number of languages, he would naturally choose the language which has the widest range of vocabulary, and which was capable of expressing the most subtle shades of meaning, and that is English.

D. S. asks: "Which body of dissenters from the established Church of England is best represented in Parliament in proportion to its size?"———The Quakers. There are only 18,000 of them in Great Britian, and they are represented in the House of Commons by eight members.

G. W.—Canada supples about one-fourteenth of the imported food of Great Britain.

J. T. wants to know if there is any advantage derived from the sea containing salt.———Certainly there is. If it were not for the salts of the ocean, the whole sea would become a mere mass of corruption, owing to the decay of the organic matter it contains.

M. C.—In no country is the Government more strict than in Germany. If a foreigner wishes to remain in a town for a few days he must take his passport to the police, with a sixpenny piece; he will then receive a permit-card allowing him to stay for another six months. No German may leave the country unless he can show that he has done the military service required of him, and there is no free Press as we know it.

A. D. G.—Green is the colour most beneficial to the eye in diffused light, and reds and pinks the most harmful. In a strong direct light, however, blue and neutral tints are the best for the eyes, and pure white the most harmful, as is proved by the phenomena snow blindness.

B. A. B.—The "Upper Ten" includes about 14,000 persons.

H. C.—It really does not matter in the least whether you talk of coming "up to London" from Northumberland, or "down to London." As a rule, in every country it is usual to speak of going up to the capital, whether it is situated in the North or South, and that is why people in your part of the world talk of coming "up to London."

W. F. K.—Madame Albani is a Canadian. Her real name was La Jeunesse, and she adopted the professional name of Albani from that of her birthplace, Albany. She is now married to a Mr. Gye.

E. L.—Only the best of the London fire engines can pump 500 gallons a minute, whereas some of the steamers in use in towns like Liverpool and Manchester are equal to 1,500 and 1,800 gallons a minute.

ALPHA.—It is as unusual for a member of the learned societies to use the letters after his name as it is for a man to sign himself "Mr." or "Esquire," unless he is writing on a subject connected with the society's work.

BOB.—It is not at all surprising that your friend looked "huffy," as you call it, when you told him he was looking "seedy." To look "seedy" is to have a shabby exterior, and the best thing for you to do would be to apologise to your friend, and explain to him that what you meant to convey was that he was not looking quite so well in health as usual.

I AM constantly receiving complaints from readers who say that they are occasionally unable to obtain Short Stories, for the reason that their newsagent had none left. It should be remembered that most newsagents only lay in sufficient stock to meet their actual orders, and the only safe way to secure a copy is to order it to be regularly supplied.

W. A. N. comes along with the question "Which human characteristic do animals most markedly manifest?"———Jealousy. Animals are most sensitive to any preference or favour shown to other animals. I have known a cat sulk for the rest of its days simply because another cat was introduced into the same household. The reason for this strange, persistent jealousy is because the selfish instincts of the lower animals have not been subdued and brought under the controlling influences which shape the moral characters of human beings.

T. W.—A cable's length is one-tenth of a nautical mile (6,080ft.). The longest mile is the Norwegian, which is within a fraction of seven times ours.

G. D.—I do not see that there is anything strange in the fact that if a person fans himself in a room, the temperature of which is higher than that of his body, his temperature will become hotter instead of cooler. The object of a fan is to cause the air to pass over the face and take with it some of the superfluous heat, but if the air that is passed over the face is hotter than the face itself, it is obvious that it would have anything but a cooling effect.

W. B.—The oldest paper in the world is the Kin Pan of Pekin. For nearly a thousand years it has been published regularly, first as a monthly, up to the year 1361, when it became a weekly, and for the last ninety years as a daily.

S. R.—Sultana does not mean the wife of a sultan, but is the title given to his mother, sisters, and daughters.

W. P. C. asks: "How is it that froth or foam will form on the top of some liquids and not on others?"———Only diluted liquids will foam. Frothing is not possible with a liquid of pure constitution. Thus pure water and pure alcohol will neither of them foam, but a mixture of water with but 5 per cent. of alcohol will foam strongly. Water impregnated with camphor will foam freely, and a little soap added to water will have the same effect.

O. S.—The little white spots which sometimes appear on the finger nails are due to some subtle action of the blood, upon which all the bones, sinews, muscles, and organs in the body are dependent for nutrition. They sometimes disappear of their own accord; but there is no known cure. In reality, they signify no derangement of the system.

W. E. M.—Yes, there are several varieties of fish that cannot swim. In every instance they are deep-sea dwellers, and crawl about the rocks, using their tails and fins as legs.

R. C.—The only Englishman who ever ruled as Pope was Nicholas Breakspear, who was born about the year 1100 at Langley, near St. Albans. He was unanimously elected for the Papal chair in 1154, and bore the title of Adrian IV.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

NO DECEPTION HERE!!!

During OUR ANNUAL CLEARANCE SALE (which is now taking place) we shall give TWO CASH PRIZES of £15 each, and THIRTY PRIZES of 20/- each. Send a Post-card for Sale Price List and full particulars without delay.

Price Lists and Patterns post free, and need not be returned.

Genuine Bargains are being offered in Dress Materials, Mantlings, Suitings, Flannels, Flannelettes, Blankets, Sheets, Quilts, Underclothing Curtains, Carpets, Towels, etc., etc.

STOCK MUST BE CLEARED.

FIRST ORDER OPENED EVERY WEDNESDAY FREE.

You will honestly save yourself 5/- in the pound by purchasing now from

LUTAS LEATHLEY & CO.,

Dept. 41, ARMLEY, LEEDS.

SULPHOLINE LOTION.

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

NOSE MACHINE.

This is a contrivance by which the short cartilage of the nose is pressed into shape by wearing the instrument an hour daily for a short time. Price 10/6, sent free for stamps.

ALEX. ROSS,

62, Theobald's Road, London.

Opposite Bedford Row.

(Est. 1850.)

Parcel free from observation.

£20

Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates Free.

Tobacconists Commencing. See Illustrated Guide (259 pages), 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000.

TOBACCONISTS OUTFITTING COMPANY, 186, EUSTON ROAD, LONDON.

The largest and original house (50 years' reputation). Mgr., H. Myers.

THE John Noble HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES

Worn throughout the World,

are supplied in the following two good cloths:

I. John Noble Costume Coating, and in II. John Noble Cheviot Serge.

PATTERNS and New Costume Album sent POST FREE.

Model 876.

Smart Double-Breasted Coat with Velvet Collar, Tailor skirt, which drapes well. Price 10/6 complete. Sent carriage paid and safely packed for 9d. extra. Skirt only 5/6. Carriage 6d.

JOHN NOBLE KNOCKABOUT FROCKS.

Thoroughly well made, with saddle top, long full sleeves and pocket. Lengths and Prices.

21 24 27 30 in.
1/6 2/- 2/6 3/-
33 36 39 42 in.
3/6 4/- 4/6 5/-

Postage 4d. extra.

'Brewer' Caps (all shades), as sketched, 1/-. Ladies' well-knitted Tam o' Shanters at same price.

COLOURS.—Black, Navy, Electric, Brown, Ruby, Myrtle, Cinnamon, Fawn, Grey, Moss, Sage Green Reseda, and Purple. SIZES IN STOCK are 34, 36, and 38 in. round bust (under arms). Skirts being 38, 40, and 42 in. long in front. Larger or special sizes made to measure, 1/6 extra. Mourning Orders executed and despatched within twelve hours.

Please mention SHORT STORIES when ordering. Bankers: London & Midland Bank.

JOHN NOBLE LTD., BROOK STREET MILLS, MANCHESTER.

A. A sum of from 10/- to 20/- per week offered for spare time to either sex everywhere. Work can be done evenings. Send addressed envelope to Box 60, Eclipse Works, 89, Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.

DR. MACKENZIE'S ARSENICAL SOAP.

Deliciously and expensively perfumed, the most luxurious Soap in the World. Produces a most lovely complexion, eradicates spots, pimples, and all imperfections, makes the skin exquisitely clear, and produces the healthy bloom so much desired. It is absolutely harmless, and each tablet is accompanied by a medical certificate.

6D. & 1S. PER TABLET.

This Soap prevents the growth of superfluous hairs, removes wrinkles, feeds the skin. You can get it at all the Stores and first-class Chemists. The Family Doctor says it is the most economical beautifier known to Modern Dermatology. It clears away all pimples, spots, redness, or roughness, makes the skin smooth and clear as a baby's, and cures shiny and greasy skins. Use it in the bath and for all Toilet purposes; it is most delicious. For irritable or sensitive skins it is matchless and delightfully soothing.

MADAME PATTI sends her best thanks for Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap, which she finds most excellent—Craig-y-nos Castle, South Wales.

USE ALSO DR MACKENZIE'S FACE LOTION.

Beware of many Imitations. Have Dr. MACKENZIE'S or none.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

39/-

SEWING MACHINE CO.,
188B, High St., Camden Town, London. N.W.
63 Seven Sisters Road, N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn

DIRECT FROM THE PATENTEE & SOLE MANUFACTURER TO THE CUSTOMER AT WHOLESALE PRICES.

THE WONDERFUL ORCHESTRAL ORGANETTE.

☞ SPECIAL OFFER—A FOUR-GUINEA ORGANETTE FOR 35/-

3 STOPS

The very ACME OF MUSICAL INVENTION, an instrument with as much variety of tone as a £25 organ. Every Orchestral Organette has 28 FULL-SIZE AMERICAN ORGAN REEDS, controlled by THREE STOPS, viz. Flute Expression, and Vox Humana, furnishing the GRANDEST ORCHESTRAL EFFECTS. THE RANGE OF MUSIC AND TONE IS PRACTICALLY UNLIMITED. For HOME ENTERTAINMENTS THEY ARE UNSURPASSED. We REFUND THE MONEY AND PAY CARRIAGE to anyone not entirely satisfied after receiving it. Any tune can be played with artistic effect by anyone, young or old. We will give a selection of MUSIC FREE with each Instrument. Send money by Registered Letter, Crossed Cheque or Money Order. For 2s. extra the Organette will be sent carriage paid.

J. M. DRAPER, Organette Works, BLACKBURN.

A MERE CHILD CAN PLAY IT.

By Royal Letters Patent

EASY PAYMENTS

We have decided to sell a limited number on following easy payments: 10s. deposit and 5s. monthly. Price 40s. Full particulars on application.

Size: 14½in. long, 13½in. wide, 24in. high, weighs 61b.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

MR. CLAUDE CARTER, of Thorn House, Johnstone, N.B., says: "Your Tablets much reduced my weight and I have been waiting to see if it was permanent, and so it has proved."

MR. CANHAM, 87, Alexandra Road, Norwich, says: "Tablets cured my wife two years ago of extreme stoutness. It has never returned.

MARION TAYLOR, of Church Farm, St. James, Halesworth, says: "Have lost quite two stone."

A. PEEL, of Darley Hydro, Matlock, writes: "They have reduced and benefited me a good deal."

Miss MONEY, Broadway House, Newbury. "I am greatly reduced in weight."

MR. G. LOVE, 4, Kirk Street, Peterhead. "I think them wonderful not only to reduce fat but as a medicine."

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION 66, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

"GOLDEN SHRED" MARMALADE

A DELIGHTFUL APPETIZER

NO BREAKFAST OR TEA TABLE COMPLETE WITHOUT IT

Unrivalled piquant stimulant for the delicate.

PREPARED BY JAMES ROBERTSON Paisley.

FREE SAMPLE ON RECEIPT OF 2d FOR POSTAGE.

LYLE'S GOLDEN SYRUP

In 1lb., 2lb. & 4lb. Tins of all Retailers.

LYLES GOLDEN SYRUP TOFFEE.

LONGEST ESTABLISHED, PUREST & BEST.

ZEBRA Grate Polish.

In Packets or as a Paste in Tins.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY G. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

NO. 477. FOR WEEK ENDING FEBRUARY 19TH, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.

"Kola is not a food. . . . Kola is not harmless."

—MEDICAL WORLD.

CADBURY's Cocoa is entirely free from all admixtures, such as Kola, Malt, Hops, Alkali, etc., and the Public should insist on having the Pure, Genuine article.

CADBURY's Cocoa is "A Perfect Food."

EXTRACT FROM AN OPINION BY DR. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E.

(Combe and Gilchrist Lecturer, etc.), expressed by him in a Lecture on Foods:

"I am distinctly of opinion that the modern tendency to add to Cocoa other substances, mostly of a stimulating nature, is a dietetic mistake, a practice to be thoroughly discouraged. If you have a pure Cocoa you want nothing else in the way of constituting it a food, for it contains in itself all the principles which go to make up a perfect article of diet. When people begin to add to Cocoa, Hops and Kola and other things, they are interfering with and altering its dietetic value. Cocoa thus treated is not Cocoa but something else, and I have declined for my part, in all my long advocacy of Cocoa as a food to recognise that anything but pure unadulterated Cocoa can correspond with this definition of a perfect and desirable diet. I hope the time is not far distant when the public will awaken to a knowledge of the fact that 'doctored' cocoa is not a thing to be recommended or advised as a food."

CADBURY'S COCOA

IS ABSOLUTELY PURE, AND A PERFECT FOOD.

Digitized by Google

"Its food value is double that of Bread made from ordinary wheaten flour."—Lancet.

HOVIS BREAD

will not only help to improve your digestion and consequently your health, but will also bring back that energetic and happy feeling of good health. Man does not live a natural life, so a good portion of a natural food, in the shape of HOVIS, at each meal will largely counteract the bad influence that modern life has upon the health and digestive organs. This is not an idle remark, but a proved statement, daily being verified.

HOVIS is baked and sold by all good class Bakers. No loaf genuine unless stamped HOVIS. 6d. and 1/- samples of Bread and Biscuits sent on receipt of stamps by

S. FITTON & SON, Millers, Macclesfield.

You Can't Afford to be without

Antiseptic.
Pure.
Preserves Food and Milk.
Stops Smells.
Arrests Decay.
Purifies everything.
Invaluable for the Bath and Toilet.
For Rinsing and Cleansing.

By Special Appointment — Makers to Her Majesty.

THE PATENT BORAX CO. LTD., LADYWOOD, BIRMINGHAM.
LONDON DEPOT: 129 HIGH HOLBORN.
Grocers, Oilmen, and Stores sell it.

The Best Hair Dye

in the World for Lashes, Eyebrows, and Hair on the Head, with Moustache and Beard. For Ladies' Hair and for all Colours. Had at 3s. 6d., post 3s. 9d., of ALEX. ROSS, 62 Theobald's Road High Holborn, London, W.C. Spanish Cantharides for fallen hair, 3s. 6d. 5s. 6d. & 10s. 6d.

A. A sum of from 10/- to 20/- per week offered for spare time to either sex everywhere. Work can be done evenings. Send addressed envelope to Box 60, Eclipse Works, 89, Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.

THE 'ENGLISH' ORGANETTE.

WITH EXPRESSION STOP.
EASY PAYMENTS. 4s. MONTHLY.

Plays Hymns, Popular Airs, Quadrilles, Waltzes, Polkas, Reels, Hornpipes. Any tune can be played with artistic effect by anyone. No musical knowledge required. A mere child can play it. Most marvellous Musical Instrument in the World.

4/- MONTHLY.

Price 30/- Terms: 4/- deposit and 4/- monthly. Organette delivered when first 4/- is paid. Write for list of music and full particulars. Mention this paper.
J. M. DRAPER, Organette Works, BLACKBURN

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably"

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

MR. CLAUDE CARTER, of Thorn House, Johnstone, N.B., says: "Your tablets much reduced my weight and I have been waiting to see if it was permanent, and so it has proved."

MR. CANHAM, 87, Alexandra Road, Norwich, says: "Tablets cured my wife two years ago of extreme stoutness. It has never returned.

MARION TAYLOR, of Church Farm, St. James, Halesworth, says: "Have lost quite two stone."

A. PEEL, of Darley Hydro, Matlock, writes: "They have reduced and benefited me a good deal."

MISS MONEY, Broadway House, Newbury. "I am greatly reduced in weight."

MR. G. LOVE, 4, Kirk Street, Peterhead. "I think them wonderful not only to reduce fat but as a medicine."

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

NOSE MACHINE.

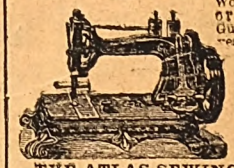
This is a contrivance by which the short cartilage of the nose is pressed into shape by wearing the instrument an hour daily for a short time. Price 10/6, sent free for stamps. ALEX ROSS, 62, Theobald's Road, London, opposite Bedford Row. Est. 1850. Parcel free from observation.

£20

Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.

Tobacconists' Counters. The Illd. Guide (330 pages) 6d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000. Tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.



Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 3/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 188B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W. 63 Seven Sisters Road, N., 14 High Rd., Kilburn

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.

These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. An assorted sample box for 7 stamps from the works, Birmingham.

DR. MACKENZIE'S

Deliciously and expensively perfumed, the most luxurious Soap in the World. Produces a most lovely complexion, eradicates spots, pimples, and all imperfections, makes the skin exquisitely clear, and produces the healthy bloom so much desired. It is absolutely harmless, and each tablet is accompanied by a medical certificate.

ARSENICAL

6D. & 1S. PER TABLET.

This Soap prevents the growth of superfluous hairs, removes wrinkles, feeds the skin. You can get it at all the Stores and first-class Chemists. The Family Doctor says it is the most economical beautifier known to Modern Dermatology. It clears away all pimples, spots, redness, or roughness, makes the skin smooth and clear as a baby's, and cures shiny and greasy skins. Use it in the bath and for all Toilet purposes; it is most delicious. For irritable or sensitive skins it is matchless and delightfully soothing.

MADAME PATTI sends her best thanks for Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap, which she finds most excellent—Craig-y-nos Castle, South Wales.

SOAP.

USE ALSO DR MACKENZIE'S FAC LOTION.

Beware of many Imitations. Have Dr. MACKENZIE'S or none.

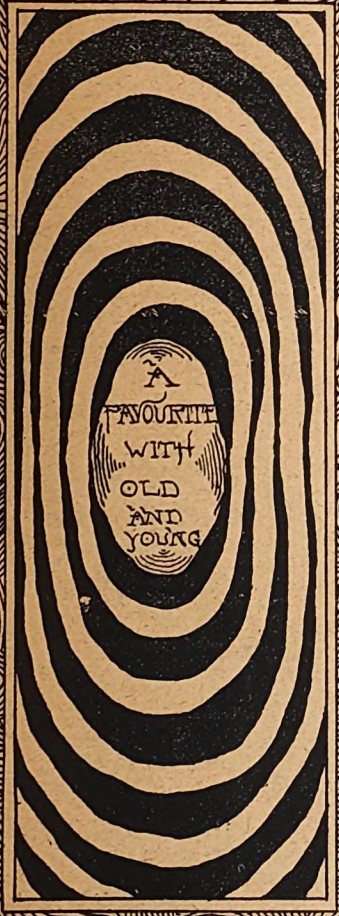
Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON

No. 477.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week ending February 19th, 1898.



DAN'S STRATAGEM.

DAN GREGORY might have known he was too happy. As he lowered his paper that morning, extending a hand for the cup of coffee Poppy proffered him, and caught a glance of her pretty white arm—the loose sleeve of the violet morning gown falling back a little—he was about to tell her she was an angel, when the expression of her eye and the sight of a letter tucked to one side of her plate caused him to substitute: "What news?"

"Oh, something nice!" said Poppy, rather too effusively, giving her coffee a vigorous stir and glancing at him askance; "nice for me, and so, dear, nice for you, isn't it?"

"Ahem—yes—of course, pet, well!"

"Even if you never did like Frances so very much," continued Poppy round-aboutly, "now we are married it's different, you know, and—oh, dear!" as a few drops of the whirling coffee flew upon the dainty damask, "how awkward I am!"

"Frances! What of her? Something nice, you said—not dead, surely?"

"Dan, how wicked!" And Poppy gave him as awful a look as her dimpled face could assume. "It's something very nice—she's coming to live with us."

"Not if I know it!"

"What?"

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

He was blunt and he was angry. He felt just then as a contented old hen might feel who saw a tom-cat stalking down upon her cosy little nest.

It is said that in every family there is one member who may be termed the family's disease. Of the household of Dan's wife Frances Easton was the malady.

"It's exactly what I might have expected," he continued. "After insulting me from the day she first laid eyes on me, getting up machinations to break off our marriage, and scarcely noticing you since, she would now rake us up when it suits her royal pleasure, like a pair of scissors with which to shape her interests. Great heavens, Poppy, your good nature is maddening!" added Dan, swallowing his coffee with one angry gulp, and catching up his paper.

"I think good nature is needed in this family!" cried Poppy, straightening her short self with an absurd little attempt at dignity, as her trembling hand sent another splash of coffee overboard. "Of course, you need not receive Frances, if you don't want to, but I shall!"

"If I were the only one in the family who detests her," continued Dan, willing to justify himself in Poppy's eyes, "you might have more reason to talk; but there isn't a member, except yourself, who can tolerate her, a house where she hasn't made mischief. Beside," he concluded, with that convincing but time-worn adage, "a man doesn't marry his wife's family."

"He is supposed to be decent to them, however," cried Poppy, her voice shaking.

"Decent? Yes, if they deserve it; if not, no; and to be decent does not necessarily mean to live with them. This isn't Mormon City—one woman for one man is considered enough."

"One too many, I should say," gasped Poppy excitedly, rising with such dispatch that a gew-gaw on her sleeve caught in the handle of the ill-fated coffee cup, overturning it.

"Stop, please!" called Dan, as she hastily pushed aside the portière of the door just behind him, "when is this bone of con—when is your sister talking of coming?"

"To-night," she said, tightly clutching the fringe of the curtain.

The portière dropped between them with a spirited flirt.

And arrive that night she did, with her big trunks and boxes, her indescribable air of superiority, her pronounced condescensions, her general atmosphere of intolerable impertinence. Without saying a word, she seemed in some inexplicable way to assume control the minute she stepped into the hall.

Dan was never a man to meddle with household matters—an absent-minded fellow, inclined to be easily pleased with his menu—but one morning, frustrated in an effort to effect an entrance into a blackened round of toast, an awakening to the fact that the cooking had been atrocious for the last few days, he cried out rather sharply to Poppy: "What is the matter with the cook?"

"The housemaid is cooking this week," said Poppy sweetly. "I dismissed Hannah."

"Dismissed Hannah," echoed Dan, "why, she lived with mother seventeen years—the best girl she ever had!"

"These old servants always get too fine for their places," said Poppy evasively.

"Too fine? She was good nature itself!"

"She changed," said Poppy busily cutting some bread-and-butter, "she was very impertinent to Frances."

"Ah," said Dan grimly, pushing back his chair, and rising as his sister-in-law indolently trailed the wide fan of her peacock-blue tea-gown into the room, giving a scornful little sniff as she caught sight of the scorched breakfast.

"Poppy," he said one day, extending to her one of those slips of paper known and feared by all benedicts, his forefinger indicating a big figure, "how about this?"

Poppy glanced at it with widening eyes. "What a perfect outrage! What thieves these gas companies are!"

"Not at all," answered Dan. "This house is the headlight of a locomotive from sundown to midnight. It's just one of Frances' many impositions," he continued, his long pent-up feeling coming with a rush. "All our bills are about double. I haven't had a decent meal, an hour of peace, a minute to myself, since she entered the house. What with her infernal airs and graces, and goodness knows what—Poppy, look here"—he was alone.

A week passed without any disagreeable allusions to Frances. Dan was apparently enduring matters with gradually growing contentment, even occasionally surprising Poppy by a light or affable word to her sister.

Frances had gone to the theatre one night, and Dan was enjoying the prospect of an evening alone with Poppy. Poppy had often complained of his complete absorption of the evening papers, but had long since, good-naturedly, accepted the situation. She now sat quietly waiting till the papers should be laid aside. To-night, however, instead of continuing to read, Dan let the journal drop slowly into his lap, and, assuming a preoccupied expression, and torturing a far-away look into his eyes, he gazed silently at the open fire. He saw Poppy glance up from her work, regarding him intently. Finally she said:

"What's the matter, Dan? Business? Anything wrong?"

"N-o-o," answered Dan absently, trying to deepen the expression in his eyes.

Poppy sat silent. She had never, she was thankful to think, seen him look that way before.

"Poppy," he said, at last, "your sister Frances is a splendid-looking girl. Bradwell and I met her to-day at Wilson's, and he admired her style immensely."

Poppy's work fell from her hands. She was looking at him, he knew, in amazement, though his eyes were still upon the fire.

"If one wouldn't mind her temper now she's not so bad; after all, her faults, no doubt, are mostly on the surface; men like variety—sweetness cloys."

"My goodness!" cried Poppy at last, with a little gasp, "what's come over you to-night? You've despised the very ground Frances walked on! I am sure you can't be getting to like her, but it's very queer!"

"It is queer," said Dan, in a sort of deep, impressive voice that made Poppy start and cry again: "My goodness, Dan!" "It is queer," he repeated, bringing his feet from the ottoman down upon the floor, by way of emphasis, and rising, moved uneasily to the mantelpiece where he stood for a moment, absently fumbling with a Dresden match box.

"Do you want to smoke, Dan?" asked Poppy, in an odd little voice. "There are no matches in that, you know; you'll find them where they always are—shall I get you some?"

Digitized by Google

"No-o-o," he said, without moving from the mantel. "I don't think I'll smoke to-night, I don't somehow feel like it."

"Not feel like smoking?" queried Poppy at this monstrously improbable assertion.

"The fact is," said Dan, turning at last from the mantelpiece and looking straight at her, while conflicting emotions sent the blood to his face, thus favouring his rôle most admirably, "this house does smell, as Frances says, like a 'beastly bar room,' so I think, after this, I'll confine my smoking to the office, dear, and not bother any of you with it."

"Bother me?" she cried quickly, "you know I adore tobacco smoke! This isn't Frances' house, either," she added with spirit, "and you shall do as you choose!"

"I know, dear, but then as Frances is company, we ought to treat her decently, and if tobacco smoke makes her faint——"

"Nonsense!" interrupted Poppy, "she lets all the men smoke who come to see her—that's ridiculous!"

Dan sat down.

"Do men come to see her?" he asked in a low tone, staring sullenly at a swirl in the big rug.

"You know as well as I do," replied Poppy tartly, "Frances has plenty of beauty, but she is so sarcastic they all seem afraid of her, and I don't much believe she'll ever marry anybody."

"She not marry?" exclaimed Dan, incredulously. "Bah!"

"What?" cried Poppy, her voice almost shrill.

"Oh, she's too attractive to remain much longer unmarried; though not pretty, her figure is elegant, and she's lots of 'go.' I believe I'll run over to the theatre myself a minute and get our seats for to-morrow night."

"Couldn't you buy them in the morning?" she asked, "it's so lonely here without"—she was going to say "Frances," but substituted "anybody."

"I shan't have a minute to-morrow morning," and hardly kissing her, was off.

It was over an hour before Dan returned. Poppy came running to meet him.

"What in the world kept you so long?" she asked.

"The fact is, I went inside the theatre a few minutes. They told me at the door it would pay to see the crowd, so I made my way round to Frances' box, and we all had quite a jolly time. You look tired, Poppy, and had better go to bed. I'll sit up awhile and read. Frances called after me she had forgotten her latch-key, and asked me to let her in."

"Why on earth didn't you give her yours?" asked Poppy, in a most singular tone of voice.

"It is queer I didn't think of it," he stammered, "but it never occurred to me," as indeed it had not.

"It is strange Frances did not ask you for it herself. It is very unreasonable to expect you to sit up two or three hours for her. These box parties always have a supper afterwards. I should think you would rather go back to the theatre now, it's so near, and take her the key."

"No, thanks," replied Dan, dropping lazily into his great chair by the fire. "I have had enough for one night."

"As you like," she answered coldly, and the next thing he heard was the swish of her silk skirts passing up the stairs.

It was after one o'clock when Frances' aggressive ring—have you ever noticed how characteristic people's rings and knocks are?—sounded through the still house. For two good hours Dan had been sleeping soundly in his chair, much more profoundly than his conscience should have permitted, and, aroused by the sound of the bell, it was several moments before he could remember how he came to be there. Another ring, however, recalled the entire situation, and he hastened to open the door. Frances pushed impatiently past him.

Poppy was in bed the next day with one of her sick headaches, so he took Frances to the theatre in the evening. The day after, happening to meet Frances in the city, and inwardly blessing his good luck, he invited her to dine with him at Wilson's, and it was nearly eight o'clock when they strolled up Holborn together. Poppy stood looking out of the door when they appeared. Her eyes widened, and she grew pale.

"You didn't worry, I hope," said Dan lightly. "We stopped at Wilson's for dinner. You know, our cook isn't first-class just now."

It rained hard that evening, and no company. Dan lingered devotedly round Frances in the music-room, turning her pages, and accompanying her or not as she commanded. Poppy, who did not sing, sat watching them. In like fashion, for some time, events favoured him. As for Frances, she accepted the situation as a matter of course. Demanding all, it did not surprise her in the least that she obtained it.

But the daily increasing insolence of her manner towards Poppy so exasperated Dan that he determined to bring matters to a climax. Like Blue Beard, he resolved to go upon a journey. Like him, too, he made before starting a few preparations. Of a less sinister and sanguinary character, however.

He had no difficulty in securing an opera glove and lace kerchief belonging to Frances, as she daily made known her way through the house by just such trifles. These he tied carefully togother with one of her subtly-scented ribbons, and tucking in a dead rose picked up somewhere, he hid the collection under a heap of papers in a corner of his desk. Then locking the door, and cudgelling his brain, he wrote a crazy bit of poetry, dedicating the erotic trash to Frances. This he placed in another corner of the drawer, locked the desk—hanging the key at the side of it, as he often did—and giving Poppy some adequate reason for his journey, kissed her face carelessly, took up his bag and departed.

He was gone five days. It was late at night when he returned. While fumbling on the front steps for his latch-key, the door opened with a rush. There was a dazzle of golden hair and smiles; a flash of white muslin and arm. It was Poppy! She was tamed.

Dan stepped inside.

"Where is she?" he hastily demanded.

Poppy instantly drew back. She grew very pale.

"Who?" she asked coldly.

"Frances."

"She's gone! She's gone! Frances has gone!" cried Poppy grandly. "I sent her away!"

Her face relaxed—her lip twitched—she fell upon his neck.

"Oh, Dan, Dan!" she sobbed, "I found things in your desk."

When she had calmed down, Dan saw that the time had come for an explanation. There was a few minutes of quiet talk, which restored Poppy's piece of mind.

There is no happier couple in the world than Dan and Poppy now. Frances never visits them.

HAROLD FEARLEY.

Digitized by Google

BY M. P. SHIEL.

Author of "The Man-Stealers," "Prince Zaleski," "Shapes in the Fire," "The Rajah's Sapphire," etc.

SUMMARY.

Yen How, a shrewd Chino-Japanese doctor, who has spent a portion of his life in almost every country in Europe studying the various nationalities and customs in all classes of life, falls desperately in love with an English nursemaid. His advances are rudely repulsed, however; but he leaves England with a fixed determination to win the object of his affections in spite of all opposition. The means he employs for this purpose are immeasurably vaster than the end.

Yen How goes first to Japan as a Japanese, where, by reason of his authority upon all matters connected with Europe and his high rank, he soon becomes a member of the Japanese Parliament. He rapidly becomes intimate with the prime minister, Marquis Ito, to whom he proposes a league between the two races of China and Japan, and an immense scheme by which Europe may be reduced to a waste, and China become the Empress of the Earth with scarcely an effort of her own. He then goes to China and becomes virtual ruler of that nation. In the course of a conversation which he has with Li Hung Chang he unfolds his scheme for setting all the European Powers against Great Britain. After the slaughter China will step in and conquer the remnants of the armies. The Halcyon is sent to Malta convoyed by the Majestic. In the Bay of Biscay La Gloire, a French battleship, is encountered, and fights the Majestic, which ultimately rams her opponent and then sinks. The crew is saved by the Halcyon.

CHAPTER V.

How England Took the News.

On the morning of the duel between La Gloire and the Majestic, it was rumoured at an early hour in the neighbourhood of Fleet Street that China had dismissed Sir Robert Hart from the Controllership of the Imperial Maritime Customs, and that a Russian was about to be appointed in his stead.

The announcement appeared in the morning papers, and its almost immediate consequence was a rise of threepence per quartern in the price of bread.

But though there were few who were not by this time in a state of excited expectancy, things on their outside wore much their usual appearance. In London the commonplace 'bus and cab went about the streets, and the occasional cyclist, with noiseless glide, manœuvred among them. Perhaps from Holborn and the Strand to the City the 'buses were rather fuller than ordinary; perhaps the cabs moved at a slight increase of pace. The pavements were rather crowded, as much, perhaps, as on a Christmas Eve night, not nearly so much as on a Lord Mayor's day. In back streets the coalmen cried "Coal!" and their faces were black with the grime of the ordinary work-a-day of life.

Yonder, the sun wore his usual broad-faced benignity. He seemed to have no suspicion that on this particular morning the old earth was in her death throes, and a quite new earth in travail to be born.

It was a bright and sunshiny forenoon, the 16th of March, 1899—nine months and fifteen days before the dawn of the twentieth century.

The Evening News it was which, in a premature twelve o'clock fifth-edition applied the match to the latent mine of excitement which smouldered in the minds of the people. It declared in a little thunderbolt of breathless news, five lines of "pica" type, that the Stock Exchange had been suddenly closed, and that it was rumoured that the Government was appointing private brokers for the transaction of only such business as might be essential.

A step so decisive, as everyone saw, could only have for its object the prevention of a financial panic which might be disastrous in its results. And for this prevention there must be a cause not as yet generally known.

Yet such a step should have been expected; for hardly any, except the peace-at-any-price party, any longer hoped that war could be averted—though with whom the war was to be, and against what odds, it was not so easy to decide.

At any rate, no one could suppose that the cessions of territory by China to the three Powers were voluntary and spontaneous, as they were, in fact. It was shrewdly suspected that they were the results of a secret understanding arrived at between them and China, at the time when the three had combined to save China from the clutches of Japan, just after the Chino-Japanese war. It had, therefore, the look of a deliberate conspiracy to oust England from her lawful share in an empire, four-fifths of whose commerce was then being carried by British ships; and from end to end of the land, the idea that England should submit tamely to such a conspiracy was scouted with contemptuous indignation.

The severance of telegraphic and telephonic communication, too, between the Continent and England, looked uncommonly like an act of war, whoever was responsible for it. It was reported, and then denied, that three army corps of 120,000 were being mobilised toward Brest. It was known that the War Office, the Admiralty, and the Foreign Office were in intensely active communication; that there were frequent and hurried meetings of the Cabinet. But still, with that silence which precedes the storm, with that subdued excitement which a trifle will cause to burst into passion, England waited, still faintly hoping against hope to be allowed to go on her way in peace.

The public were in blissful ignorance of the fact that the Majestic and La Gloire had already been lying four or five hours at the bottom of the Atlantic.

Then came the announcement of the Evening News, and the pent-up emotion broke suddenly out. In the City, even before this, the streets had become a mere sea, with currents and eddies, of thronging heads. Here the facts of the case were sooner known; when the rumour spread westward, London was awake. All pretence at traffic quickly ceased.

Digitized by Google

The general tendency and main current of this weltering human ocean was westward in that part of it which was east of Charing Cross, and eastward in that part of it which was west of Charing Cross. The House of Commons, as in all supreme moments of stress and danger, had become the cynosure and the magnet of the nation. Thither the throng pressed.

What was it all about? No one was certain. Was there war—at last?—in very truth? And with whom? No one knew.

For twenty-six years Europe had been practically at peace. The Græco-Turkish war was not a war—it was the bickering of naughty children. The Franco-German war had been grim enough, but it had long since got to be recognised that the next, when it actually came—at last—would hardly resemble it; for the French and German nations had fought, and each still existed an integral nation, in spite of the squabble; but the struggle that was looked forward to when Europe, in the fulness of time, next brought forth her monstrous offspring of war, would, as men knew, be stupendous, world-wide, and final; the combatants would consist of mankind; the whole future of the world would be determined by it; and in the greatness of that day of darkness, war, the destroyer, would itself be destroyed.

This was the logical outcome of the conditions under which Europe, groaning under her weight of armour, waiting, watching, eager to end her foul disease of hatred, had for many years been living.

He reached a comparatively empty by-street.

And now—at last—she was in travail—pang on pang, and shriek on shriek; and her birth-hour was at hand.

But in the London streets the crowd was worthy of the occasion—a crowd without violence, perfectly self-controlled—the meeting of a nation, not a mob. There was a poor old Chinaman with a sore and swollen foot, on the heel of which he used to limp, begging about the City and Holborn. By some chance he became involved in the crowd just opposite the New Law Courts, where it was very thick; he was soon at a loss what to do with his big, bandaged foot without boot. At that moment the name of China was in disfavour. But the old beggar was no sooner seen to be in difficulties than the press opened before him; he hobbled forward; a murmur spread round him—half jeer, half cheer—and a rain of five or six pennies made him blessed. He hobbled through a lane which instantly closed behind him, thanking the gods for war.

The bells of St. Clement Danes burst out, tolling the notes of a slow hymn-tune.

Eastward, in a window of the Daily News, there was a big, white sheet of paper, written over in large, blue-pencil letters with the words: "War With Russia."

Westward, in the façade of the National Liberal Club, there was a square, white space exhibited to the public inscribed with the words in charcoal: "War with France and Germany."

"I s'y," said a cockney work-girl in the crowd to her lover, "there's a blooming Frenchman a-looking at the placard. Can't you tell by the squint of him?"

"Oh, don't show him to me, or I'll go straight for him," said Bill; "a Frenchman mykes me sick."

But the girl's remark was heard, and as she passed on a score of eyes were directed toward monsieur. He turned white, finding himself at the mercy of the crowd. But no positive harm was done to him; he was only quietly, but persistently, hustled, till he reached a comparatively empty by-street, dripping with the sweats of fear.

The exhibition of gratuitous notices in windows and at doors was the order of the day. Old habits of stoic silence seemed for the moment to have disappeared—for the moment was ecstatic. Europe, it was felt, had drifted, drifted from the old moorings—into what new seas and latitudes? At Gatti's place in the Strand was written up in huge letters: "Italy to the Rescue!" In the shop window of some foreign faddist in Soho appeared these words: "Russia is the Natural Ally of England"; and in Holborn, at the First Avenue Hotel, which was richly decorated with British and American flags, these words: "One Blood, One Race, One Language."

Those writing advertisements of "Bovril" which infest London, resembling, as letter follows letter, the writing of the mysterious hand on the wall of Belshazzar's palace, were to-day at high noon in full operation. But only the two central letters were now permitted to appear. "V.R." wrote the unseen hand, and again "V.R.," "V.R."

A little ragged street-arab in half-an-hour attained to sudden wealth; he was a newspaper boy, and had in his hand a bundle of three Stars, which he found it impossible to sell, since all the news they contained was already ancient history. In a moment of inspiration, Harry Tibble, finding his small body jammed by the crowd against one of the lions in Trafalgar Square, nimbly flung and twisted himself on the pedestal, and solemnly held aloft his bundle of Stars. Thousands of eyes turned upon him. After a minute the urchin slowly took from his pocket a match, which he was keeping to light his next cigarette; he struck it on the side of the lion; then, after dexterously shading it with his other hand, which still held the Stars, he deliberately applied the flame to the papers. Then, pointing to the ascending mass of smoke and flame, he cried aloud in his shrillest Cockney:

"That's the French. So much for them!"

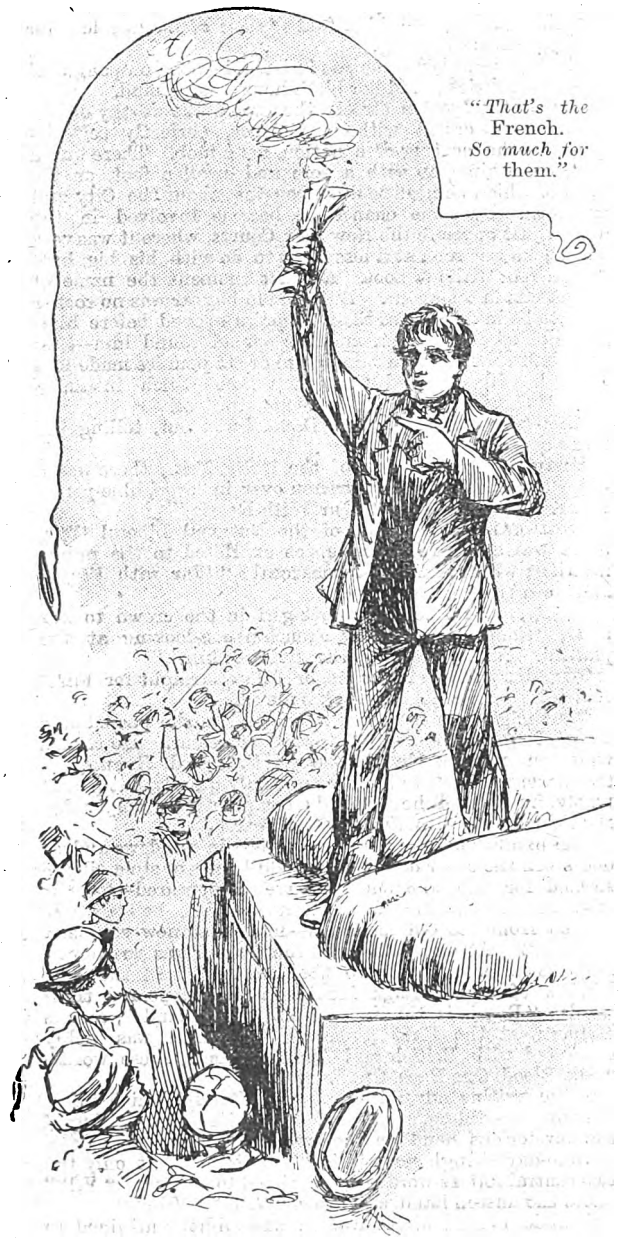
Digitized by Google



Thereupon he turned, and with head thrown back, pointed upward to the statue of Nelson on top of the column. Harry Tibbles had known what it was to be hooted at, and what it was to be pelted; but never till now had he drawn upon himself such a tumult of noise and such a shower of missiles. His meaning was soon explained to those too far off to hear, and a tremendous shout of cheers at once filled the whole Square, while the urchin was bombarded with a continuous hail of sixpences, pennies, shillings, which came clattering upon the bronze around him by hundreds and thousands, till he could no longer gather them up, or find space in his crammed pockets. When he had been lifted down, and coddled, and coaxed by the laughing crowd, an old gentleman got from him his name and address, and promised to remember him, "if——," but at the word "if" he stopped.

Down by St. Stephen's some cheers were making themselves heard. It was three o'clock—a Thursday. The Members were arriving in crawling carriages, one by one.

Mr. T. P. O'Connor stood up, leaning forward in his cab, bowing on each side, like Royalty. One man shouted: "Strike hard, Tay Pay!" And another: "Don't spare them!" Mr. O'Connor drove out his large, clenched fist, and shook it toward the sky.

The round orb of Mr. Chamberlain's eye-glass was all that could be distinctly made out of him, but behind it, his face seemed Rhadamathine in its sternness, ashen in pallor.

A profound silence of respect, resembling awe, fell upon the people as he passed.

Within the House itself the benches were soon crowded, all but the Treasury and Front Opposition benches. Prayers were read. So far there was no sign of impatience or emotion. There were no "Questions," for there was nobody to answer them; but there was a Tramways Bill for somewhere to be reported, and the House calmly proceeded to the business in hand.

It was a place of stately traditions; the exhibition of emotion had always been foreign to it. Even when the elementary passions of humanity broke through, and swept like a whirlwind within its walls, it had generally known how to comport itself with a dignity impossible to any of the other Senates of the world.

No one, observing its outward aspect during that half-hour, could have dreamt that the nation it had led so long from greatness to greatness stood on the very brink of swift and final ruin.

The Speaker put the question whether the Tramways Bill should be reported. Only two Labour members rose to oppose it. The Speaker said presently:

"I think the Ayes have it."

The thing was done. All eyes were casting furtive glances in the direction of the spot behind the Speaker's chair. At that moment the form of Mr. Balfour was seen advancing slowly toward the Ministerial Bench.

Behind him, in a strange topsy-turvydom of party, was Sir William Harcourt talking to Mr. Chamberlain, and Mr. Asquith whispering to Mr. Curzon. Others followed. Then it was seen with a thrill, born of the certainty now of calamity, that the Prince of Wales had just quietly walked into the Peers' Gallery, immediately followed by Lords Salisbury and Rosebery, and the Duke of Devonshire. Peering through the gratings of the Strangers' Gallery were Mr. and Mrs. Gladstone, the Italian and American Ambassadors, the Duchess of York, and others.

Below, in the body of the Chamber, was not a sound, except a faint scratching of the pen of the Clerk to the House, recording the passage of the Tramways Bill. Yonder, in the Press Gallery, the alert pressmen held pencil or pen ready over their notebooks, eager to record for ever every word of the momentous utterance which they suspected to be coming.

In the spirit of the House was deep commotion; on the surface calm.

Mr. Balfour rose to speak.

His face bore evident traces of some sort of suffering, like that of a man who had passed through the agony of a great ordeal. This was partly due to the want of sleep, which the stress of the last few days had occasioned. Under his eyes were the semicircles of care and fatigue. But, apart from this, the face which he now turned absently round the House before he spoke was changed: the dilettante politician, the charming literary amateur, the polished English gentleman, the amiable golfer, the ennuyé lounger—these familiar phases of his personality were no longer in evidence. A great care sat on his faded cheek, a gravity heavy as the weight of the world's destiny.

Sorrow had transformed the dilettante into a great man.

Digitized by Google

He made a half turn toward the Speaker, and as he said "Sir," and paused, his neck stiffened with dignity.

"Sir," he repeated, "I need make no apology at the present time for interrupting the ordinary routine of the business of the House. Some adumbration of what I have to say must have already entered the mind of everyone present. And yet, perhaps, not even the most far-seeing and the most prophetic of us may have been able to forecast the gravity of the announcement which it is now my duty to make to this House, and to the people of Britain.

"The recent course of affairs in China is known to all of us, and to all the world. It has not been suggested, even by our enemies, that our policy in that country, either originally or recently, has been an aggressive one. The enterprise of our citizens, indeed, in the ordinary course of commerce, secured for them the greater part of the foreign trade of the land; but with that strong and large bounty of our race, which resembles nothing so much as the free air of heaven and the breadths of the unfettered ocean, we have left it open to every man on the face of the earth to go and do likewise, by engaging in free competition with ourselves. Later on we secured the appointment of an Englishman to the Controllership of the Imperial Maritime Customs in China; in view of the fact that our trade with China amounted to a sum of ten millions sterling annually, this was a step dictated by ordinary caution; but what has been the consequence to other nations? This: that our nominee has impartially distributed all subordinate posts in his gift to French, German, Russian, and Englishman alike, regardless of nationality, regardful only of merit. Such has been our action in the past. With regard to recent events, we know, and our enemies know, that the Government of this country has, in its holy passion for the maintenance of the peace of the world, submitted to affronts, to wrongs, to insults even, which would, weeks ago, have driven any of the less restrained Ministries of continental empires into a declaration of war.

"Even on points where, undoubtedly, many an Englishman would have considered that concession was derogatory to honour, we made concessions. We asked only of Germany that Tientsin should be a free port; of France, that Yunnan should be open to British enterprise; of Russia, that the valley of the Yangtse river should remain neutral country. Without threats, with no exhibition of heat, we claimed these rights.

"The reply of France, of Germany, and of Russia has been a declaration of hostilities.

"Two hours ago their respective Ambassadors placed a notice of war in the hands of the Government."

The House received this announcement with a perfect stillness, in which horror contended with indignation. Mr. Balfour continued:

"It is impossible to doubt that this vast combination of power is the result of a wilful and wicked conspiracy, aimed primarily at the British Empire, but, in the end, against the progress and happiness of the human race. It comes upon us, like a bolt from unclouded skies, at an hour when the nations, recovering from centuries of mutual bloodshed, begin to catch glimpses of the dawn of a better day for the democracies of the world, and are looking forward to the yet fairer fruits of the peace which they enjoy. Sir, the declaration of this war is a blasphemy against mankind, and can proceed only from those mysterious powers of evil which seem ever to stand ready to mar the blessedness of the earth. Away now, for many a day, with the fair aspects of our modern life, the quietude of homes, and the untroubled flow of things. With one thought, at least, every Englishman may console himself, as he goes forth to bear his part in this stupendous struggle: 'Britain is not to blame.' Not to blame—and yet, sir, not all-unprepared to comport herself with high valour, as of old, in this, the greatest crisis of her august history. Nor, is it probable that there lives a single Englishman, who, even in this hour of trial, can doubt that that same Providence which has led our race from small beginnings to the empire of half the earth, will, in its dark purposes, conduct it yet further upon its destiny of triumph and glory."

Mr. Balfour sat down in the midst of a ringing cheer, which burst from every member of the House—English, Scotch, Irish, and Welsh—in a very tempest of loyal passion. The assembly leapt to its feet, and volley on volley of enthusiasm filled the chamber with sound. Frenzy, for the moment, took the place of dignity; and there ensued one of those whirlwind "scenes"—the greatest in the annals of the Second Chamber—which have occurred at intervals. Members bounded wildly from their seats across the breadth of the House with eyes wide in excitement; in the midst of a perfect hullabaloo of noise, John Burns was seen at the Treasury Bench, frantically shaking the hand of Mr. Chamberlain; two Irish members were sobbing in a kind of hysteria on each other's bosom; and Mr. Labouchere, forgetting all his Little-Englandism, was shouting to Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, who happened to catch his eye: "Russia must be conquered first, and then France—Russia first!"

In the midst of this row and chaos, Sir William Harcourt rose, seeming to wish to speak. A Labour member, who had been speaking at the Speaker's chair to Mr. Gully, rushed away. "Order! Order!" cried the Speaker, rising to his feet. Almost instantly the House resumed its quiet, and sat once more stern and impressive. In five minutes it had spent its exuberance. Now it was the Parliament of Britain again.

Sir William Harcourt talking to Mr. Chamberlain.

Digitized by Google

It was noticed now, with wonder, that Sir William was at the Treasury Bench instead of on the Opposition side. Mr. Balfour, near him, was leaning his head on his hand in a pose of absolute weariness. Sir William said:

"I am asked, sir, to say a few words by the Leader of the House. It was his intention to add a few brief words to what he has already said to the House; but the mental strain put upon him during the last few days has left him in a state of practical collapse. The hon. gentleman has asked me to supply his place. If it should seem strange to any honourable member that the Leader of the Opposition should be asked to supply the place of the Leader of the House, I can only reply that the Opposition now consists solely of Russia, France, and Germany; in this country there is no longer an Opposition. (Loud cheers.) I believe it to be a fact, sir, that if the rulers of the Continental empires had had any kind of conception of the real temper of the nation which they have wantonly and cruelly attacked, they would have paused—they would have hesitated. It is a country hard to conquer, sir—a race hard to quell. At least, it will be a united race and country. Liberal and Radical and Tory shall henceforth lose their titles in the common appellation of Soldier; there shall be no more Orangeman, and no more Parnellite, and no more Healeyite; all these shall merge their names in the common name of Patriot. The moment is great; but Britain is great, too, and equal to the moment. (Prolonged cheering.) I have risen to announce, sir, that the chiefs of the former Opposition have this hour come from a meeting in Downing Street, which we were requested to attend by the Leader of the House with a view to the formation, between us, of a Permanent Committee of Public Safety. I wish also to state that an immediate reduction of the interest on Consols and Government Stock from three to one and a half per cent. is proposed; that a tax on non-professional incomes exceeding £1,000, considerably in excess of the present rate, has been agreed upon; and that the House will be asked to read three times and report to-day—for it is possible that hostilities have already commenced—a Bill granting to the Government a sum of seventy-five million sterling for war expenses."

Some further speeches followed, marked chiefly by a duel between Mr. Labouchere and Mr. John Redmond, as to which should show himself possessed of the most loyally-warlike spirit; and, later on, by a question of Sir Wilfred Lawson, which convulsed the House with laughter, as to whether any additional grog would be served out to the bluejackets on the eve of the first naval engagement. Then, with perfectly business-like calm and grasp of details, the House proceeded to the matter in hand, getting through a mass of work with a celerity which astonished itself. Near six it rose.

Meanwhile, the news had gone like wild-fire through the country; and everywhere it met with the same indignation, scorn, and hard-headed pride. It was not, as Sir William Harcourt had shrewdly said, a particularly easy task which the nations of Europe had undertaken.

England might break; but it was already clear that she was not built of the kind of steel which could be made to bend.

CHAPTER VI.

The Lion Prepares to Spring.

"Invasion" was the word which more frequently than any other rose to the lips of Englishmen.

The muster of French, Russian, and German ships in the Northern seas was eagerly criticised. It was found that their weight of metal was over-poweringly great compared with the small muster of the Channel Squadron. Away out in the China Seas the British fleet had been greatly strengthened; it was cruising in large force in the Mediterranean; it was at the Cape, at Australia, at North America, at the West Indies, in the Pacific; it was not in the English Channel.

Under these conditions the war-like activity in Britain itself went on with feverish intensity. Even before the declarations of war, the Adjutant-General had issued telegraphic orders all over the country for the calling out of the first-class army reserve, and the mobilisation of the militia and volunteers. With wonderous celerity commercial England turned herself into military England. What conscription did for foreign countries, that the manliheod of the race did for us. The women of England, especially, exhibited a spirit as war-like as the peril of their country was immense; and banishing fears, and tears, they put on the sternly proud brows of those heroic old Roman matrons, who laughed with glee when their sons were borne home dead to them with all their wounds in front. "Go along, boy, and give it 'em 'ot this time!" said a Clerkenwell mother, handing his rifle to her son. "And don't be a-sparing o' thot sword o' thoine, Jock," was the admonition of a Lancashire wife as her husband, in premature haste, set out, like many another, to flock to his regimental centre, even before receiving the official intimation that his presence was requisitioned. "And you'll give them a good taste of what Devon men are like, won't you, Steve?" was the exhortation of a Bideford lass.

The little trago-comedy in a West-end drawing-room, when a Royal Naval Artillery Volunteer, who in quiet days was a bank-manager, asked for a kiss of the girl he loved, was repeated in perhaps ten thousand homes.

Till now, so high was the girl above him, he had never dared to ask; but at his request she forgot to blush.

"One kiss," she answered, "for every one of the enemy that you have slain—when you return victorious."

"And if I never return?"

"Then—then—I love you, and I will be proud of you, for my own, and, above all, for England's sake."

This was the mood—heroic, nothing less. Night and day the regimental districts and all military centres were hard at work, calling rolls, drafting troops to their regiments, and making all necessary preparations. A sound of trumpets blown for war re-echoed through the land.

On the night of the announcement in the House of Commons of the declaration of hostilities, at about ten o'clock, suddenly, on the east balcony of Buckingham Palace, the Queen appeared.

It had been supposed that she was still at Windsor, and by what contrivances she had managed to appear here without attracting attention in her passage through London was unknown. It was just as if she had fallen from the sky; and to the crowds with which the streets were packed, thirsting, as they were, for some outward symbol of the might of England to which they could vent their intolerable emotions of love and loyalty, she appeared like a godsend dropped from Heaven.

One involuntary far-reaching shout of joy and triumph, spreading by contagion far up Piccadilly, far along Pall Mall, and re-echoed in thousand-fold acclamations, even by those who could not see her, burst instantly forth. A strong limelight or electric-light arrangement had been hurriedly contrived, which focussed a powerful beam of white concentrated luminosity around her, and shot out in shimmering rays far out and down through the starlit night. Grouped around her was a party of the Royal family. On the right, the Prince of Wales; on her left, Lord Salisbury. In her hand she held aloft an object, the significence of which the crowd for a moment or two failed to grasp. When it did, the enthusiasm intensified beyond all bounds. It was one of the faded and ragged old flags, brought that afternoon from St. Paul's, which had served as ensigns in Wellington's Peninsular campaign, and at Waterloo.

Digitized by Google

A scene similarly striking was witnessed at Portsmouth four hours previously, where some seven thousand blue-jackets, and the marines from Gosport, were on parade, and were being reviewed by the Princess May. Hither she had hurried after witnessing the scene in the House, and by the side of her sailor-husband, and Sir Michael Culme-Seymour, rode from end to end of the improvised ranks. Prince George addressed the men with a message of confidence from the Queen, and hinted at the awful odds which they would probably soon be called upon to face. He, and everyone, in fact, were conscious that he was talking to doomed men—that he was saluting the dying.

Then the Princess dismounted. She had in her hand a basket, which she opened, and from it took a strip of blue ribbon. A high flush of ardour mantled on her face as she attached it to the bosom of a staff-captain near her. A touch of pathos and tenderness was added to the ceremony through which she now deftly went by the fact that she had only just recovered from a severe attack of fever, and was looking terribly pale and thin. To every officer, from fleet-captain and commodore to sub-lieutenant and cadet, she attached the little symbol of affection. So sadly solemn was the ceremony that even the on-looking crowd was silent. Many wept. It was her salute to the dying.

But even during the progress of this scene, one of a number of picket-boats which had been sent out from Portsmouth during the day was steaming into the harbour, big with news.

She and two companions (smart little steam-pinnaces which flitted through water like fish) had, earlier in the day, spied a fleet of cuirassés, canonnières, croiseurs, and bâtiments de transport about S. by E. from Newhaven, forty miles out. They were mostly French, but there were some German also.

The three look-out boats, at intervals of a few minutes, came panting into Portsmouth harbour, like fluttered birds, with the news. Each contained five men, and the fifteen, almost at the same time, stood grouped round the Commander-in-Chief near the Quay.

"Could you make out what ships they were?" he asked.

"We were rather too far off for that, sir," answered a sub. near him.

Then there was silence for half a minute.

It was broken by a voice which said:

"The Amiral Baudin is among them, sir, the Sadowa, the Jean Bart, the Kaiserhof and the Deutschland."

Sir Michael Culme-Seymour turned and looked at the speaker, his eyebrows lifting a little. He did not know him.

Then, after a minute's deliberation, the Admiral said:

"How many ships all told?"

"There are about seventeen battleships, sir," answered a middy eagerly, "about twenty to twenty-three cruisers, and a large fleet of liners—Messageries Maritimes, and Norddeutscher Lloyd—with an indefinite number of gun and torpedo boats, tenders, and nondescript small craft.

"Don't be a-sparing o' that sword o' thoine, Jock."

They are making for Bognor, Littlehampton, or perhaps Worthing in a quadruple line of a good twenty or thirty cables interval."

"There can hardly be seventeen battleships," said the Admiral musingly. "Do you confirm that?"

He turned suddenly as he asked to the unknown person who had addressed him before—a mere stripling with a face highly flushed with excitement.

"Well—not quite, sir," the young man replied; "I decided that there were fourteen battleships, twenty-four cruisers, thirty-eight troopships and liners, and a flotilla of 104 small fry."

"You seem pretty certain of your figures?" the Admiral said with a smile.

"Middlingly certain, sir."

Digitized by Google

"May I ask—who are you?"

"My name is John Hardy, sir."

"And your ship?"

"The Powerful, sir."

"Then, what on earth are you doing here?"

The Powerful at that moment was away out in the Yellow Sea, whither she had been sent since the beginning of the previous year.

"Looking about, sir," replied the young man, dropping his light-blue eyes.

"But why are you not in China?"

"I fell very ill just as my ship was going to sail, sir," and as he said it, he gave one of those peculiar half-secret coughs, so indicative of the consumptive chest.

"I see. Well—but how came you to be in the Jupiter's picket-boat?"

"I was on the Jupiter as a middy before joining the Powerful, sir. Captain MacLeod knows me, and has been kindly pleased to notice me. I am a bird without a roost. I came down from London, hoping for some of the fun down here. Captain MacLeod allowed me to take ——"

"Ah, that explains it then. Well, he seems to have done well."

The Commander-in-Chief bestowed upon him a smile of passing approval and patronage, and turned away. In a moment he had forgotten the young seaman; but when a few minutes later, he was reading a telegram from the Chief Coastguardsman at Worthing, giving the sighted ships of the enemy, number for number, as Hardy had given them, then he thought once more of John Hardy.

"Extraordinary genius for facts," he murmured.

The Admiral knew that the picket-boats must, in order to avoid being blown out of the water, have reconnoitred the advancing fleet at such a distance as to be themselves invisible, or nearly so, to the enemy. There could be no doubt that John Hardy's girlish-looking, azure-blue eyes, with the long lashes, possessed the faculty of seeing.

It often happened that people who came into contact with this young sailor thought of him again at unexpected moments, as the Admiral now did.

In a previous chapter we said that Dr. Yen How, sitting in a London 'bus on a certain night, was perhaps the most important person in the world. We should have stated the fact absolutely, without using the word "perhaps," if it were not that we were thinking of this particular sub-lieutenant, John Hardy.

They two—the little Chinese doctor and this consumptive English lad—held in their hands the destinies of the world.

Each had his own idea of the shape which the future of the human race should take; each was determined that it should take the shape which he chose, and no other; and each was immensely strong.

It was fated that these two should meet—soon—and more than once.

It was now six o'clock, and the bluejackets had already passed in a swarm of hurrying boats to their respective ships. As the telegrams arrived from the coastguardsman on the south-east coast, the information they contained was transmitted by semaphore to the fleet. The Magnificent under Rear-Admiral John Fellowes, was the flagship of the second in command of the Channel Squadron, and now, in the absence of the Majestic, became the flagship of the fleet.

At the Horse Guards, meanwhile, Lord Wolseley was receiving and sending message after message, both telephonic and telegraphic, relating to the dispatch of troops from Aldershot, Victoria, London Bridge, and Clapham Junction to the South. Every ten minutes a Brighton and South Coast train, packed with over a thousand regulars and volunteers carrying a day's cooked rations, dashed forth under forced pressure from each of these stations. Away in hasty flight swept the long strings of bristling carriages, the throttle-valves shrieking the dragon-cry of defiance and challenge which England sent out in answer to her overweening foes.

By seven o'clock fifteen thousand men were massed upon Brighton, and an unaccustomed rattle of some ninety limbers sent thrills of very unusual dismay through the ordinarily placid bourgeoisie of London-by-the-Sea. War, so long a word and a myth, had suddenly become a thing, real enough, near enough.

Long files of private carriages, taking away mostly women and children, wended northward upon the Brighton road, while a great crowd filled the steep street leading up to the station, to watch the ever-new batch of arrivals which detrained at all the platforms, up and down alike, and at sidings, the empties being returned along the up and down lines according to convenience. By eight o'clock thirty thousand troops with one hundred and ten guns, under Sir Evelyn Wood, were concentrated, and waiting for the enemy; and all through the night the number was being rapidly increased.

But they waited in vain.

England had been several times invaded previously. The last occasion was in the year 1066, and that occasion Providence intended to be the last for ever. England had since then nursed and reared a race as proud and firm as the foot with which she spurred the breakers raving round her inviolate shores.

At one bell in the second dog-watch the signal was given from the flag-ship—the Channel Squadron, in a double line, at intervals of six cables, and under forced draught, was to steam down Spithead for the Channel, the Magnificent, like the bell-wether of a flock, leading one line, the Prince George the other.

At that moment John Hardy had just skipped up from the look-out pinnace, which he had been permitted to command, on to the deck of the Jupiter.

His heart misgave him, he shrunk within himself, he slunk guiltily. He knew that he had only to be noticed to be turned peremptorily away. He was merely a visitor, a guest—a privileged one, it is true, but still an outsider. That he should dream of taking part in the coming fight was preposterous, the more so as every man knew beforehand that all were going to certain death. And he had no shadow of status in any ship present.

But he wanted desperately to see the row; and his mind was one of those dominant ones not very subject to considerations of routine. Once, when a "chief-captain" of cadets on the Britannia, with no further temptation to dissoluteness than his weekly two-and-sixpence of pocket-money, he had been reported to the Admiralty for "unsatisfactory conduct"; another such report, and he would have bidden farewell to the British Navy for ever. It was that same gipsy attitude of mind, that sort of devil-may-care lawlessness characteristic of him, which was working in him now, as he stood sulkily there, abaft the after funnel. He felt like being shut out and banished—and he wanted to see the row. He thought of skedaddling and hiding till the ship was well out from land.

But there seemed a suspicion of meanness in this contrivance; and even while he hesitated, Captain Angus MacLeod sighted him.

The Captain had been an intimate friend of Hardy's father, and was an executor of the very large real and personal fortune of which the boy was the heir. Hardy now, at the age of nearly nineteen, was an orphan. The family was Hampshire. The country-house in which he had chiefly passed his earlier boyhood lies fifteen miles south of Andover.

The Captain beckoned. John Hardy ran and stood before him on the hurricane-deck with downcast eyes, and cheeks blushing like a girl's. By nature he was extremely bashful, shyer than an Alpine kid.

"You here?" said the Captain with a deep seriousness in his tone.

Digitized by Google

"As you see, sir," answered John with a faint attempt at a smile, and a nervous shifting of a leg.

"You know as well as I do, John," said the Captain sternly, "that this is only a piece of insolence on your part."

"If it strikes you in that light, sir—of course—but I should take it very kindly of you, if you could see your way to let me be in for the trouble."

"In for the trouble? This is a most unprecedented piece of cheek, John Hardy! Be good enough to get ashore, sir. Do you imagine that I am going to have your blood on my hands, then?"

"Whose blood, sir?"

"Your blood, sir!"

"My blood is all right, sir," said John sulkily.

"Come, come, are you sane? Can't you see that we are all going to pretty certain death, boy?"

"I can't think that, sir."

"Not? Aren't French and German cannon as good as English, then?"

"They may be on land, sir; but hardly, I think, on Her Majesty's seas."

At these words, "Her Majesty's seas," back went the Captain's head in one sudden cry of gleeful laughter. Her Majesty's seas! Perhaps there was not one living man English enough, and audacious enough, to invent that phrase, except this particular sub-lieutenant standing bashfully there.

But he, on his part, saw nothing extraordinary in the phrase—it slipped from him quite simply and naturally, an offspring of his quietly supercilious habit of mind.

The Captain's face settled soon again to gravity. This was no laughing matter.

"But we are wasting time, John Hardy," he said severely. "Will you be good enough, now, to leave my ship?"

"In what, sir?"

"In—in—what did you come in?"

"In the picket-boat, sir."

The Captain turned his face from side to side, puzzled and irritated. John, seeing entreaty useless, was adopting tactics.

"You shan't stay here, sir—that is certain," cried the Captain. "Somehow or other—you go! Get the dinghy."

"Shall I scull her ashore, sir?"

"Yes."

"And who will bring her back, sir?"

"I don't care! Take two blue-jackets, then."

"Isn't it rather late, sir?"

"How?"

"I fancy the ship is already moving rapidly through the water, sir."

The Captain started.

"Boy, boy," he muttered under his breath. He loved the lad, and had loved his father.

But the Captain was just now extremely busy. He tossed his head and walked rapidly away. The strength and tenacity of John Hardy's will sometimes produced results which had the look of fate and inevitableness.

And so it happened that he was with the Channel Squadron, borne in the Jupiter, when it steamed at thirteen knots past Selsey Bill to meet the fleet of the Allies.

(To be continued.)

Steaming into the harbour, big with news.

Digitized by Google

Holding Up the Winnemucca Stage-Coach.

Owyhoe Joe had been a daring driver of the coach in the old days of the "West" before the great Pacific Railway stretched out its long arms and absorbed the sage brush plains of Idaho, the pine forests of Oregon, and even the lava beds of Northern California. He was now employed as hall-porter at one of the buildings in London. Many thrilling stories he had to tell of his drives on the coach, laden with the golden dust, the mails, and "prospectuses," and I used to be glad when he dropped into my office—provided I was not very busy—and told me the story of some adventure.

One day, when he was talking disjointedly about the old times, I interrupted him with this remark:

"And how about the time when you were relieved of your bags without even an 'if you please'?"

A shade of annoyance and chagrin passed over his bronze face and he shifted uneasily in his chair.

"It was a hotter day nor this out there on the Mesa when that young chap stepped out from behind a little clump of grease-wood and as'd me perlite enuf ter throw up my hands. No argument in the face of that there shootin' iron. He took over four thousand clean dust and made for Salt Lake on the back of the best leader. Never heard tell how we caught him? No?" I shook my head.

"Well, ye see I took my wheel-hoss and made for Boise. Found Bill McConnell, Colonel Robbins, Jim Agnew, an' Hank Fisher. We made a bee line 'cross country to head him off. Changed hosses three times. We struck his trail, found that his hoss had broke down an' he'd stolen another. That stolen hoss meant a necktie party.

"In twenty-four hours we came in sight of him. Hoss played out. Game up. Nothin' but sand and sage brush fur miles except one lone tree. Kinder placed there by providence, McConnell said. Thar thet young fellow set—one leg over the horn of his saddle. Fine looker. Stood six in his stockings. I knew him the minute I set eyes on him. He knew me but never twigged. Bill McConnell war ahead, an' he opened the meetin' without singin'.'

"'Good mornin' stranger.'

"'Good mornin'.'

"'Seen anything of a man about your size straddle of a sorrel mare lookin' a heap like the one you ride?'

"'No. I haven't.'

"'That's a purty good mare o' yourn.'

"'Yes, she was worth a cool 500dol. but she's a little winded now; say, mister, I'll give you 500dol. clear for that one o' yourn and stop the deal.' He was making a good bluff. Hoss stealin' in them days war death on the spot. He knew we war on to him. His offer would well pay for the broken down hoss, an' he war thinkin' that his money would pull him through, but yer see he didn't know McConnell. Mac had been Cap'n of the Vigilants back in '63 up in the Basin and had a name to keep good. He just smiled at the man's innocence.

"'That's a straight blind o' yourn, but we're thar an' hold you over. You look a leetle mite played out as well as yer mare. If you'll jest get down an' jine our little party it'll stretch yer legs, and mebbe ye need stretchin' all over.'

"He got a little white, but slid down without a word. We followed suit, and Agnew threw over his head a noose, an' passin' the other end over a limb of that lone old tree, nodded that things war ready.

"That young fellow war game ter the last. Never moved a muscle. Seemed kinder like a big shame. McConnell went up to him and said:

"'Now, pard, is everything all right?'

"'All right.'

"'Have ye anything to say why this 'er little picnic shouldn't proceed?'

Digitized by Google

"'Nothin'.'

"'Have ye got any word ter leave to yer friends? If ye have make it short, fur we're goin' to break camp inside er ten minutes.'

"That young feller took his eyes off a bit of sage brush fur the first time and looked us straight in the eyes. His eyes war blue. I took notice of that, and his face war clean and kind of pure lookin.' He did not seem to be takin' much intere t in what war goin' on round him. Kinder had a far away, talkin'-ter-the-angels look. Made me feel as though I didn't count no-how. Kept thinkin' of some things I learnt in Sunday school in Missouri when I warn't bigger nor that basket o' papers. Then he came to, and drawin' a crumpled letter from his pocket spoke with a kinder tremble in his voice.

"'Perhaps you are a better scholar nor I be. If you'll jest read that an' be kind enuf to answer it. I'll tell yer what ter say.'

"McConnell had already passed the coil of rope to Jim Agnew and he had drawn it taut. He took the letter, an' as we hung round kinder curious like, he opened it and ready out loud:

"Etowah, Ga., Jan 18, 1874.

"My Dear Son James,—For long weary months I have waited for news from you since your last dear letter to your old mother. God bless you, James, and answer my prayers that this letter may reach you, thanking you for your ever thoughtful care of me in my old age. But once more to look into your dear face and feel that my baby boy was near me would cheer my old heart more than to possess all the gold in the Idaho. When are you coming home? You promised me that in the spring you would come back to me. May the good God watch over and prosper you and return my dear boy to my old arms before I die.—From your loving "Mother."

Owyhoe Joe paused and looked vacantly up at the ceiling. I waited in silence.

"That letter did the business.

"McConnell had had a good edication, and he commenced in a clear, strong voice, but afore the closing words war out, it war all we could do ter hear his voice. Yes, sir, an' my eyes got weaker nor a sick child's. Fact! The rope slackened until it fell from the hands of Jim Agnew, and as the breath of the mornin' came a' rushin' through the leaves of that old tree, and long shafts o' sunlight kinder prospected down through the opening boughs, someway, my old throat caved in like, an' I went ter thinkin' o' long sunny days on the banks of the Missouri, of my old dorg, an' uv a little sister with eyes jest like this young fellar's, an' of my old mammy, an' how she taught me to pray.

"Couldn't help it, but borrowin' a hoss an' robbin' a stage didn't seem a big enough thing to string that boy up fer, an' break his old mother's heart. Guess McConnell war thinkin' o' the same way, fer he kind of reverently liked folded up that soiled bit o' paper and handed it to his owner, an' without a word slipped the noose from his neck, an' then, in tones as gentle as a mother's, asked:

"'War ye goin' home, stranger?'

"'Yes!'

"'Good-bye!'

"The boy didn't dare trust his voice in thanks. I knew how he felt, but he drew from his belt a small bag of notes an' offered it to Mac.

"'Hoss!'

"'No, take her an' good-bye.'

"He mounted the mare, while we sat an' watched him out o' sight, an' then, like a pack o' starved coyotes, turned and silently sneaked fer Boise.

"Court was adjourned, verdic' sat aside," he concluded, while I leant back, my mind filled with the dramatic rehearsal.

We sat thus for a few seconds; then Joe rose slowly, said "good-day" in a quiet voice, and left me alone with my thoughts.

Oswald Bremen.

SHALL WE MAKE A MINIATURE FOR YOU?

With the enterprise born of repeated success, Pearson's Weekly makes an extraordinary offer to the whole of its readers for a limited time only. We will send a beautiful little miniature (about 2¼-inches by 1⅞-inches) in exquisite colouring, and completely framed in a dainty gold-plated oval frame, of any single portrait readers like to forward.

All you have to do is to send your photograph, together with the coupon, and seven shillings and sixpence. The miniatures may be also had in chased gold ornamental frames, the total cost being 10s. 6d.

Of course, the better the photograph you send, the better will be the reproduction.

Write your name and address on the back of the photograph, and mark your envelope "Miniature."

Specimens of the Miniatures can be seen at:

Manchester—Messrs. Abel Heywood, Oldham Street; and Mr. John Heywood, Deansgate.
Liverpool—F. A. Latarche, 63, Lime Street; and M. Partington, 9, Renshaw Street.
Edinburgh—H. Robinson, 111 and 115, Leith Street; and David Crawford, 75, South Clerk Street.
Glasgow—W. Love, 221, Argyle Street; and Mr. Barr, 88, Sauchiehall St.
Dundee—Mrs. Littlejohn, The Pillars.
Bradford—W. H. Clough, 28, Forster Square.
Bristol—T. Thatcher, 44, College Green.
Newcastle—Messrs. E. J. Porteus and Co., 19, Grainger Street West.
Leeds.—Mr. H. Walker, 37, Briggate, Leeds.
West Bromwich.—H. N. Ellison, 3 and 3a, Bull Street.
London—PEARSON'S WEEKLY Offices.

Name.....
Address.....
.....
Colour of eyes.....
„ „ hair.....
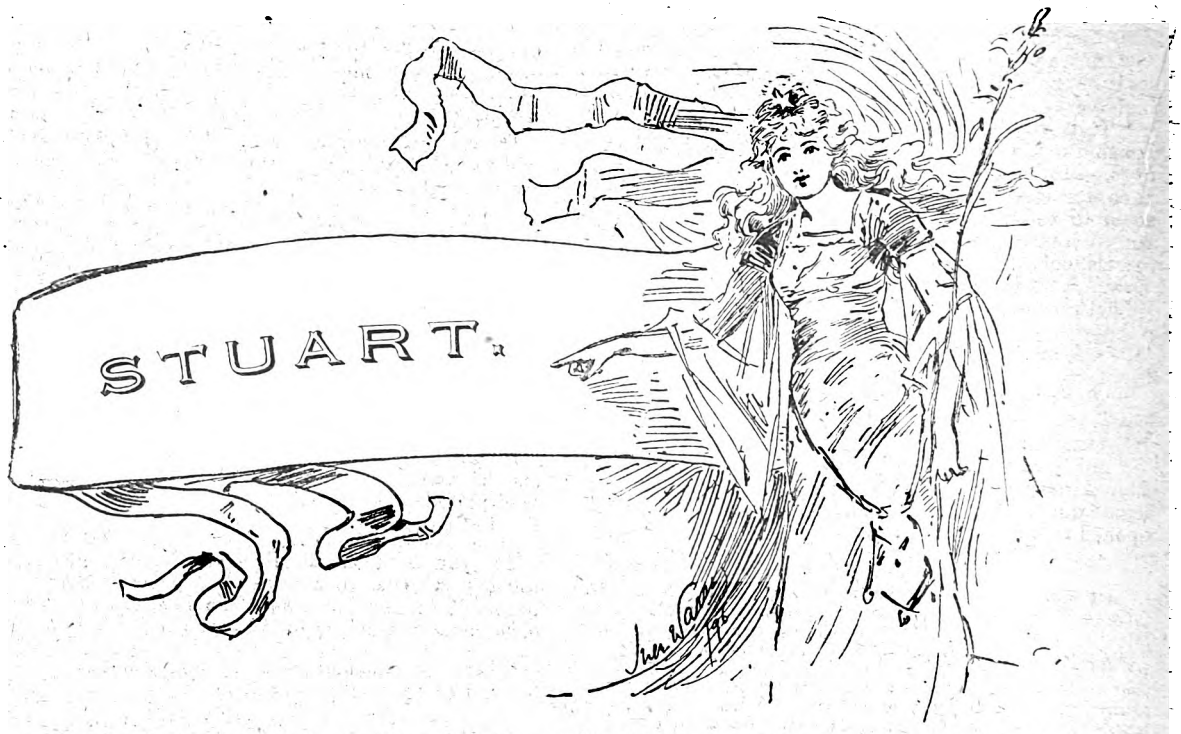
Complexion.....
Description of dress.....
.....

£ s. d.

Please send..... @ 7s. 6d.
„ „ ..... @ 10s. 6d.

Amount of Postal Orders inclosed... £ s. d.

Digitized by Google



There is a time in the affairs of every literary hack when the world doesn't seem so full of that promise his day dreams once pictured it; when the sun itself seems to shed its rays on every wight but him, and the eye of every man to look at him askew as one who has failed to find his footing on the lowly rung which leads up the ladder of success.

My inevitable hour had come, and I was passing through its experimental phases; knew, for instance, what it was to feel an appetite which had no earthly business to recur at forbidden hours, and had become familiar with the dark looks of a suspicious landlady, whose bills were wont to appear with solar regularity. These are days when the fickle Muse withholds that modicum of her patronage which keeps the literary soul and body from divorce, and the quill is only too willing for its work, were the ideas not too prone to tarry in their coming. I was paying my debt to experience, and trying to drive home the hard reasoning of its arguments to a mind that was none too wise.

The artist who toils by noontide, and the literary man who trims the midnight lamp, generally set up their household gods in Chelsea, and are the owls of its embankment. They come out to walk by starlight, an Indian file of lonely peripatetics, or smoke a peace-pipe on its benches. So used I, and have built many an artistic, if impossible, fabric in the air by the Chelsea Thames.

Here, one keen November night, I met young Stuart. By some good fortune, I wore an overcoat, and by some fortuitious acceptance of copy, my 'baccy pouch was full and fat, and I was smoking as bravely as though I had rescued from a watery grave the genius of the tobacco shop I used, and, in return, possessed a life-claim upon the treasures of his stock.

Seated on a bench, I became idly conscious of a youth who was scribbling by the light of the lamp at our back in the relic of a decent note-book sadly worn and shoddy. It was a dry cold night with a sharp bite of frost nipping the flesh, but, all unconscious of it, with an acute, interesting face bent upon the script, the boy went on putting his thoughts ascroll.

I had seen him before—this spare-clad, ill-shod bit of mystery, and was moved to a great curiosity. So when he put his book away and looking up caught my look of interest with a half smile, I ventured to ask if it were not cold writing.

"Cold?" he replied with a quick smile, "it is cold enough, but I do not mind the cold now."

He turned a pair of luminous eyes upon me whose dark circles told their history of a hard lot, and the thought pained me to the quick.

"Tell me, what were you writing?"

"Writing? Well——" He paused and looked at his boots which were broken-laced and worn, "well, I sometimes put my thoughts on paper, and am sometimes paid for them, but oftener not."

"You live by writing, then?"

"No, hardly live;" and he put his hands in his pocket and shivered ever so slightly.

I told him that I, too, was by way of being a votary of the uncertain goddess, and this put us on good terms with one another. We were brothers of a trade.

"Tell me," I said, "how old are you?"

"Seventeen;" he hardly looked fifteen; "and you?"

"I am much older—I am twenty-five. And what is your name, may I ask?"

"My name is Stuart—Charles Stuart."

"An historic one; mine is Fraser. Let us be friends, shall we?"

"Yes, I should much like to. I have no friend."

Then I asked him why he wrote outside and in the cold. He paused in some confusion before replying.

"But why," he said suddenly, "should I be ashamed to tell you? The truth is I had no light to write by in my room and came out here, as I often do. Sad, is it not?" and he laughed.

Digitized by Google

I swallowed an ugly lump in my throat, but the effort brought tears to my eyes.

And then he told me with unaffected candour that his was a bitter struggle, and that he didn't by any means make ends meet. His father had held a commission in the Guards. An accident with the Pytchely Hounds had put an end to his career, or a provision might have been made for him. From his infancy he had been entrusted to a lady, of whom he spoke warmly and affectionately as his governess. She died when he was eleven, and to get rid of him, he supposed, they sent him to a boys' home. This he ran away from as they wanted to send him soldiering, and his tastes and education were much above it, for his governess was very clever.

And his mother?

Even by lamplight I could see the lad flush. His mother was alive, he thought. She came to see him once when he was a child, but took no interest in him. He used to dream of her as a boy, and thought her very lovely but very cold. There was the shade of a sinister doubt somewhere.

"But, surely," I said, "your mother ——"

"My mother was on the stage, I think," he interrupted quietly.

And then it occurred to me that the world was very heartless and very cruel.

* * * * *

We met regularly after that.

He was always dressed in the same clothes, which even gaslight would tell, were very shabby and fast running to shine, and wore the same old boots, which somehow loved to show their ugly scars and easy frailty.

The companionship, however, had brought a little colour and warmth to his life, and he seemed less careworn. But then the hard, ruthless snow came and spoilt it all. Still he would always appear at the same hour, and vowed the snow was paradise to being alone.

"But," I said, "you will catch cold—you are not strong."

"Cold? Never!" he would reply, with his happy smile. "I am used to being cold. You won't let that keep you from coming out, will you? I feel so terribly miserable and lonely by myself." And he extracted the promise.

Then we would talk of anything and everything. We might discuss a dozen subjects, and on every one of them he had some new idea or novel theory that surprised and puzzled me. Of his own work he never spoke.

But one night he had an ugly cough, and though he did not seem to mind it, I did, and reviled my ill-luck for not being able to do something for him.

The next night he wore a thin, shabby little woollen scarf for the first time—the cough became violent and convulsive, a harsh cough, with a keen whoop in its hollow note. It was more than I could bear, and though I knew him to be sensitive in these things, I brought him to a standstill under the light of a lamp.

"Look here, Stuart, my dear fellow, you must know I would not offend you for worlds. Well, I've got another overcoat at home I wish you would wear, and then you must get a pair of boots. Look here, I got a cheque to-day for some work, and can easily spare it. Your cough will kill you, Stuart. Do let me ask you to take the coat; it's as comfortable as a horse rug. You're not offended, are you?"

He flushed up, as was his wont when affected. "You are very good to think of me like this, Fraser. No, I am not offended, and will take the coat if you like, as this cough cuts me like a knife. But, I say, I don't want the boots—these are not so bad. Poor old boots!"

"Well, come along first; I got a fire made to-night, and intended to ask you to sit by it. Come on."

Well, we got home, and I took the old coat from the peg on the door. It wasn't half a bad one, this old Irish frieze, and had done me yeoman service many a time when my other one was—seconded for special service. It was well worn, but still without a hole, and not at all bad to look at, and as comfortable as a foiling-glove. Stuart put it on, and it covered him as generously as a Lifeguardsman's cloak.

Then I made up my little pile and found it worked out beautifully.

"Stuart, you'll have to get the boots; there's heaps of money."

He didn't seem to hear, and I looked round at him as he sat dreamy and unconscious, gazing into the fire, the slightest flush on the cheeks, which were unkindly hollowing, and the circles of his eyes deep and tell-tale.

Digitized by Google

"Stuart, listen! You must get the boots. But come, let us go and get some supper at a quiet place I know."

I had to enforce the invitation, which, though it was strange enough to the poor boy, he wanted to decline. But in the end he consented, putting on the coat with a shy laugh, and we went out together.

At supper he chatted as gaily as a schoolboy on his holiday, and, sanguine as his seventeen years, discussed the golden future and all the happy things to come. How he must—oh, yes!—get on and make a name, and with it money. How he would travel and see everything, and every place, and everybody. How I, too, was to make my name and life would be like summer roses for us two together. And so on in a host of foolish, happy dreams, and then he grew thoughtful and silent, and his eyes large and bright, the lips parted, and a bright, hectic flush coloured round the cheek-bones and made him look like something spiritual. Hectic! And the horrid word would cross and cross my mind again; for I had come to love this lonely waif boy as a father loves his child.

* * * * *

The next day was a "city day" for me—days on which I submitted copy to my editorial patrons. I was detained in town till late in the night, but got an unexpected cheque for work, and vowed that Stuart should stay with me and we would face the wolf together.

On the next evening I went out.

It was snowing, and the dull, muffled sound of the Old Church bells tolled out nine strokes as I passed under the quaint, squat tower.

Smoking and philosophising in my own untutored way, I passed along the Pensioners' Hospital, up to Victoria Bridge, down by the Foot Guards', and back again. But young Stuart hadn't come, and I turned towards his house. As I got to Cheyne Walk I saw a slight figure in the frieze coat come slowly along. But it wasn't he, and I was surprised to find I could have made the mistake.

At his house the light was burning brightly in the little window, and I thought better of disturbing him.

On the the morrow-noon I called again. The landlady opened the door, and I could see through the narrow hall into her kitchen. A golden-haired tot with curls about her face was sitting on the floor tying a bunch of violets with thread, her pretty little head bent low upon her work.

"Is Mr. Charles Stuart at home?" I inquired of the unhappy-faced old creature. She looked at me stupidly, and was silent; but, recollecting herself, turned in a manner half-dazed to the side-room and showed me in.

There was a long plain deal box resting on two kitchen chairs with a stool between. In it lay Stuart, marble-cold, with a stony smile upon the lips and his eyes closed upon the world.

Then the little golden-haired maid came in and placed the bunch of violets in his folded hands, and kneeling by the coffin-side, sobbed a childish prayer in sharp anguish.

By the head chair was a pair of boots, new, coarse, cheap, and hard; the old ones, patched and broken, were lying underneath the bed, and the old frieze coat was hanging by the door.

I groped my way out, frozen to the heart, and spent my last few shillings on a wreath, and, together with the child with golden hair, laid it on his pauper grave at Brompton.

James Grant.

On TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 22nd,

AND EVERY TUESDAY AFTERWARDS,

So Long as the Public Wants it and I have Time, I am Going to Let Them Have

DAN LENO'S COMIC JOURNAL.

I do not want to say too much about the merits of my paper here for the simple reason that I do not believe in giving my good things away for nothing.

The choicest products of my brain will be found in "Dan Leno's Comic Journal," every Tuesday, and can be procured by everybody for

A HALFPENNY.

Besides, I have not time this week to write a long notice—it has taken me all my time to get accustomed to being an editor and engaging my staff.

The principal member, by the way, will be Daniel, Junior. He will be my right-hand man, unless he comes to an untimely end.

I left that boy for a few minutes the other day to see the printers, and say a few words to them—nice, quiet, picturesque words about mistakes they had made, and when I got back I found him all mixed up in the new spring poet trap.

He nearly ruined that trap, and I have been put to great expense over it. I do not want to absolutely kill a boy—at least, not one of my own boys—but—well—that boy, Daniel, Junior, is a caution.

What do you think he did the same day? He got two paper bags and tied them over the heads of the family cat and dog. Did you ever see a cat or a dog try to get out of a paper bag tied over its head? It does it backwards.

Now just picture that in your mind's eye. Just think that you had four feet and no hands and a paper bag tied over your head.

You would try to step out of it—backwards. That is what my cat and my dog were doing. And, not having eyes in their tails, they were upsetting everything in the room in their great grief.

I did not know anything about it until the cat walked up the rungs of the chair and then up my back and over my head, backwards all the time, mind you, and then—well, that boy went home to his mother and said his father had been ill-treating him.

It upset me dreadfully for a time because I was just going to press with the first number of the paper. If any errors have crept in or it is not as bright as it might be it must be laid down to this.

No 2 will be perfect, as Daniel, Junior, is at home for a few days, not being able to sit down on the office stool with any degree of comfort.

Digitized by Google

All on a Winter's Night.

I met Dick Wilton in the City the other day, and having what is euphemistically termed a social evening on hand to be arranged for, I thought to capture him then and there. To my intense surprise—for he is a genial sort of chap, and being a bit of a musician and jolly company and in constant request for these functions, which he greatly enjoyed—Dick refused point blank.

"Off colour?" I queried. "You used to be rather great at this sort of thing."

"No; the fact of the matter is, old man, I don't care about any more adventures just now," he replied. "I have just got over the effects of one social evening and I'd like the recollection of that to become a bit blurred before I take on another. If you were in the old 'digs' I wouldn't mind; but you are out in the wilderness, so to speak, and I ain't partial to wildernesses — not suburban wildernesses just now."

My interest and curiosity were aroused, and by a little adroit manœuvring I contrived to get Wilton round to the Club, and over a bit of lunch extracted the following story from him.

* * * * *

WILTON'S STORY.

The week before last old Fripps came round to my place—you know old Fripps?—used to be in Martingale and Cooper's with me? Yes! Well, he had got some friends coming in and he wanted me to run down and help entertain them. He lives out your way —a beast of a place, with six houses set in five-and-twenty square miles of wilderness, dotted with unfinished samples of the jerry-builder's art, and a station. To be brief, I misunderstood him and went a week before the time; and when I got out at Barnhurst Lane somewhere between seven and eight in the evening there was nobody at the station to meet me, and I hadn't the ghost of an idea where Fripps's place was. He had told me that as a matter of fact there wasn't any address beyond the name of the house, which I promptly forgot, but that anyone could direct me. To add to the fun of the thing, it was damp and misty, and with a raw cold air that pierced through your coat as if it were gossamer. However, I had got a thick plaid shawl with me, and I rolled that round my mouth, being a bit weak on the chest, and set out, bag in hand and music case tucked under my arm.

As I got away from the station on to lower ground the mist became denser and denser—a thick white blanket of cold clammy fog that you could have cut up in chunks and heaved at anyone like snowballs. The farther I walked the further I seemed to be getting from civilisation. Not a solitary house could I discern, and when I stepped into a marshy pond with about eighteen inches of water in it, I began to think that I must have gone astray.

I retraced my steps, or I thought I was doing so, and at last had the satisfaction of seeing lights ahead of me. They proceeded, I discovered on drawing nearer, from an open back door of one of those genteel villa residences, and in the garden, in a dressing gown and smoking cap, was old Fripps himself, busily engaged in taking in the family washing. He seemed astonished and embarrassed as I went towards him, and made a bolt for the open doorway. I dodged across to intercept him, and then began a most undignified and disgraceful chase round the back premises of the Fripps's family mansion. The muffler round my head prevented my singing out, and, hampered by my luggage, I couldn't make very good time.

Fripps himself was heavily handicapped by the double armful of clothes that he stoutly clung to; but he knew the lay of the chicken house and the rabbit hutch and dog-kennel, and while I tumbled over these things he was able to dodge round them and thus secure an advantage of me. I anathematised him in my mind for an old fool, and was beginning to think of turning up the hunt when his wife appeared in the doorway.

"Bolt the door, it's the lunatic!" screamed Fripps frantically, and then as I halted in consternation the door was slammed and bolted, and Fripps, clothes and all, made a dive for the side gate and scampered down the road for all he was worth. I scuttled after him; but the few seconds that I had lost in sheer bewilderment at this new and curious idea of a social evening to which I had been invited were fatal, for when I got fairly into the road Fripps was swallowed up in the fog. I had observed the direction he took, and I saw nothing for it but to take my chance and run him down.

"Hang the fat-head!" I reflected savagely. "It is bad enough to bring me down here to roam about for hours in a perishing mist with wet feet and no guidance; but to be called a lunatic and abandoned in this way is too much. The next time that Fripps catches me down at any of his beastly parties he'll have singularly good cause to congratulate himself."

Then I wondered whether I had made a mistake—whether it was Fripps that I was chasing. It looked like him, and the voice belonged to Fripps; but what was he doing with the washing? Fripps was not the sort of man one would ordinarily expect to find engaged in laundry work, least of all on a party night. The whole thing was a mystery, and after a while I began to wonder whether I had gone to Fripps's at all or whether I wasn't at home in bed and dreaming it all. I tumbled in a ditch just then, and concluded that the affair was real enough, and that I was sufficiently awake to know that I was uncomfortable, and sufficiently uncomfortable to know that I was awake.

Digitized by Google

All this time I was sprinting across the country, occasionally giving a loud hullo on the off-chance of Fripps hearing me and putting an end to the silly game he was playing. In my haste and anger I quite forgot the muffler round my mouth, which was calculated (and indeed did) to so change my voice that Fripps entirely failed to recognise it. The bag I was carrying, though it contained merely a change of clothes, began to weigh as though it were packed with pig lead (which I believe is weightier than the ordinary lead which isn't pig), and my arm was aching and my brain was awhirl with vexation and fog.

At last "Oh, hang it," thought I, "I'll go back to the house. If Fripps fancies paper chases at this time of night he can have 'em to himself—I'm not on." So, back I went, and back, had I only known it, came Fripps, washing and all, stalking me Indian fashion, an action that under the circumstances was positively heroic, and would have been admirable if it hadn't been so muddle-headed.

It took me a considerable time to find the house, and I sampled three more ditches (or else it was the same ditch on three separate and distinct occasions) before I finally came within sight and sound of civilisation in the shape of a goat-shed, that I remembered passing just before I struck Fripps's house on the last occassion. There was a light burning in the hall, and I went and hung on the door-bell, and made the welkin ring; but not a response could I elicit. I roamed round the house, alternately knocking, kicking, and yelling at the back door, and ringing at the front. Once or twice I thought I heard a terrified squeak, immediately suppressed, from one of the upper rooms; but I couldn't be sure, and at last, downright angry, I determined to place my bag in the tool-shed under cover, and go out and find Fripps and tell him exactly what I thought of him, and then go straight back to London.

There wasn't a train until eleven, or I would have gone back then and there. As it was, I thought I might as well do something useful with the time I had on hand, and I resolved to utilise it in giving Fripps an idea for another kind of social evening, as original as his own, and more satisfactory to myself.

Fripps's tool-shed was a mucky sort of place, and smelt stably, I discovered when I got inside, and I gripped my bag between my knees, and fumbled in my pockets for a match with a view of taking stock before depositing my goods in temporary security while I attended to the work I had in hand. As I fumbled, the door suddenly banged to, a bolt was shot home, and Fripps voice exclaimed: "Got him!"

Before I could do or say anything, I heard his feet scrunching on the gravel as he retreated to the back door.

"I've got him, Milly," he yelled excitedly. "Caged him up in the tool-shed beautifully. Come and open the door—MILLY, MIL—LEY! Come and open this door! It's all right; I've got him!"

After a few minutes I could hear the door being hesitatingly unfastened, and then it banged to, and I was left in a dirty tool-shed, along with an old wheelbarrow, a broken rake, a spade, about fifty pots of geraniums put there to winter, and the mist.

I kicked a way through the flower-pots, taking a malicious pleasure in smash ng as many as I could put my toe into en route, and, upturning the barrow, seated myself on it and produced a pipe with a view to giving the situation thorough and critical consideration. It wanted it! One thing was absolutely certain, and that was that Fripps had gone clean stark staring mad. And his wife was aiding and abetting him. Perhaps, all things considered, I ought to feel thankful that he hadn't fallen on me unexpectedly, and done me serious injury instead of locking me up in a dirty shed. But I was chilled through, and my feet were soaked, and just then I couldn't feel thankful for anything short of getting out and into the train, on my way back to town.

Then an uneasy thought struck me. Supposing Fripps were contemplating something ghastly! Supposing he had only captured me and locked me up until he could devise some especially atrocious action against me! Madmen, I had always been given to understand, are so beastly ingenious in these matters, and what could I do in defence? Nothing, absolutely nothing, if he operated from the outside, say, with a few kettles of boiling water trickled through the roof or a pan of sulphur shoved under the door. Then I began to drivel. I wondered whether I could sit down on the sulphur and suppress it, and if suppressing sulphur by this means were painful. I speculated on constructing a cave of refuge from the wheelbarrow, into which I might retire should boiling water be hit upon as a nice and likely means of doing me to death.

Or supposing Fripps came back with the wood-axe—he might be even at that moment out in the scullery sharpening it up with a file, and grinding his teeth, and frothing at the mouth in hideous enjoyment over the treat he had got in store.

I remembered as in a dream how, when I was a youngster stopping at Uncle Thomas' farm, we used to gather round the condemned cell of some unfortunate pig or rooster and watch with intense glee the preparation being made for the execution. Supposing those fowls and pigs knew what was in store for them—ugh! I shuddered and almost resolved if I ever got away with my life to consider about turning vegetarian.

Then my pipe went out, and striking a match to relight it with, my eyes fell on the spade. Happy thought! I could defend myself against a personal attack. It would be better than tamely sitting down in a wheelbarrow to be butchered, any way. I went across and balanced the implement in my hand. It was very heavy, half of it making the handle, and half the business end, and extemporising a barricade out of the wheelbarrow, would serve me capitally, and it was odd if I couldn't defeat Fripps even with the strength and cunning his madness gave him in a fair fight. A heavy jump and a few hearty thumps, and I pretty soon had my cudgel ready, a bit jagged and awkward to grip, perhaps; but serviceable.

Barely had I got the wheelbarrow in place and arranged such other defences as I could with the materials at hand, when I heard subdued voices coming down the path, and by and bye two men came to a halt outside my prison and held a consultation. One of them was Fripps—I knew that positively by the voice, and I was rather puzzled. Could it be that he had deceived his neighbours? Or was the whole village in league with him? Or perhaps they were all mad together.

What they were saying I couldn't make out, for I had got to my own side of my barrier by then, and was holding myself in readiness for whatever might transpire. Suddenly the bolt was drawn, the gleam of a lantern shone in the doorway which framed the picture of a hasty struggle between two men. Then a heavy body shot forward and tumbled over my barricade and commenced to yell for mercy, while the door was again slammed to and bolted, and a peculiar grim chuckle of glee came from the other side of it.

Digitized by Google

I was more mystified than ever; and when by my ear alone—for it was pitch dark—I detected that the grovelling object on the floor who was yelling and supplicating for mercy by turns was Fripps, I frankly had to acknowledge that the situation was beyond me. However, the immediate safety of number one was my present concern, and in as stern a voice as I could muster I commanded the deplorably cowardly specimen of criminal lunatic before me to keep on the ground, and not to move an inch on pain of being instantly brained.

Fripps moaned. "Oh the cowardly brute, to shove me in here with a dangerous lunatic!" he stammered incoherently with chattering teeth.

"Eh?" said I, pricking up my ears. "Look, here, Fripps, if you are Fripps—are you mad, or is this some new-fashioned, distant suburban idea of a social evening? You know me—I'm Wilton—or I was when I started out to visit your jovial premises. Just at present I am not a lunatic, though I am decidedly dangerous; and mad or sane, I've a mind to knock your stupid wits out of your head with the remains of your own spade."

"Wilton—what, Dickie Wilton?" queried Fripps in petrified astonishment.

"Yes, Dickie Wilton," I mocked.

"Good heavens," he stammered. "What ever are you doing here?"

"Doing—here!" I ejaculated. "Doing here! What do you mean? I came down to Barnhurst Lane on your invitation to what you humourously termed 'a social evening.' I'm in this filthy shed in company with a lunatic or a fool—I am not quite sure which—well, for reasons that are best known to you, or should be. It isn't for my own personal pleasure or advantage, I can assure you."

"But I asked for you next Thursday," protested Fripps. "If you are really Wilton. Strike a match and let me see you."

"Not much," said I. "If you are really Fripps and are not luny, strike one yourself. I've got a bit of wood here that I've a peculiar fancy for retaining just now."

After some fumbling Fripps produced a match and struck it, and the illumination satisfied him of my identity, and myself of his sanity, though I was even more puzzled than before. White and shaken Fripps was; but he certainly had all his wits about him—what there ever were of them.

"But I don't understand," he protested, breaking down altogether and very near crying outright. "I was gathering clothes when the lunatic came, and he ran me for miles; and then I dodged him and came back and caught him in the tool-shed and locked him in there, and now it's you. And who's the other man?" he concluded suspiciously,

"Which one?" I asked.

"The one outside—the man I found in the garden and asked to come and help me secure the lunatic?"

"I know not," I answered. "All this talk of lunatics and playing at lunatics is getting on my understanding and paralysing it—even as my understandings are paralysed by sampling your rural hospitality, which seems to run in the direction of fog, and ditches, and toolsheds."

We were locked in that toolshed until the thin, grey dawn of morning shone through the chinks and crevices and revealed to us the joyful fact that a little judicious picking with a penknife would have shot that bolt and restored us to liberty whenever we fancied it.

Fripps simply drivelled all the night through, and nothing connected or satisfying could I piece together from his whimperings of lunatics and sudden murder.

As soon as I detected the state of the fastenings of our prison, I picked the bolt and ran my host up to his own back door half dazed with excitement, terror and cold. A white-faced maiden, flanked by an equally white and nervous mistress, came and peeped through the glass at us when I knocked. The latter recognising her husband—I should have been ashamed to own him if I had been her—pushed the scared Abigail aside, and frantically tearing open the door, flung herself into the arms of her silly hero.

Mrs. Fripps was personally unknown to me, so I had to introduce myself.

"I am Mr. Wilton, Mrs. Fripps," I observed, somewhat ungenially, I am afraid. "I've been down for a social evening with Fripps, and I've had it. I find these sort of things rather trying, though, and if you would not mind my joining Fripps in some breakfast and a warm-up, I shall feel ever so much obliged. I am afraid there is not a train I can catch until eight, and your charming little village doesn't seem to boast of much in the way of hotel accommodation."

To do the Frippses justice, they played up boldly now that terror with the night had flown. Fripps pulled himself together and made what amends he could with a hot bath, the loan of some foot-wear, while my own was being dried and cleaned, and a snug breakfast.

During the meal I learnt some details of the affair which considerably enlightened me, and really, I could not altogether blame Fripps for what had transpired. In the first place, I was a week ahead of my engagement, and therefore entirely unexpected.

For the rest, it seems that just about dusk the previous evening, a couple of attendants had arrived on the scene to warn Fripps, along with other of the villagers, that a dangerous lunatic had contrived to effect his escape from the county asylum, which stood about a mile and a half off across the fields.

Naturally enough, the family and domestic were full of the affair, and had got lunatic writ large upon their brains by the time I arrived on the scene. Being washing day, the backyard was full of fluttering garments, which had been neglected in the excitement of the announcement. When they were thought of the girl frankly refused to risk her valuable life by going one step outside the door that night, and Fripps volunteered to do the job for her.

He went—I came—he saw, and the rest of the silly muddle is known to you.

* * * * *

"Thanks, old man, but I'd rather not come. I've had one social evening in the country and I'm going to let that last the season."

"All right," said I. "I'll let you off if you feel that way about it. But who was the other chap—the man who shoved Fripps in the shed?"

"The lunatic—the actual, genuine bonâ fide lunatic," said Wilton with a grin. "Old Fripps picked him up by the gate and pressed him into the service to come and help him secure the lunatic in the shed. They found him next day asleep in the organ loft of the village church, and hauled him back to his mansion. Pretty sharp of him, wasn't it?"

"Lovely," said I. "As good as a play."

"Perhaps," said Wilton dubiously, "if I hadn't been in the cast."

R. Andom.

Digitized by Google

By GEORGE
GRIFFITH.

Author of "Valdar the Oft-Born," "Briton or Boer?" "The Outlaws of the Air," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

The Gold-Ship "Portland."

On the 6th of April, soon after daylight, the Circe was lying under the low and still ice-fringed shore of Uniack Island with a full head of steam on, but only moving slowly to and fro with enough way on her to keep her clear of the shore. Every now and then she ran out a mile or so into the narrow channel which separates the island from the end of the Alaskan peninsula, and when she did this all eyes on deck were turned anxiously northward, looking out over the grey, misty sea.

She had been two days doing this, and as each day had passed expectation had risen higher and impatience grown keener, for this little channel running between the two desolate shores was the water-way to and from the mouth of the Yukon river, the outlet of El Dorado in the North, and the Circe was lying in wait for the Portland, the first steamer of the American Transportation Company's fleet to leave St. Michael with the first consignment of gold from the Klondyke fields—that is to say, the gold which had arrived too late for shipping in the previous autumn. According to the information that had been picked up at Seattle, she was expected to bring about half a million sterling worth of dust and nuggets, and this Lorrain had determined should, if everything went well, be the reward of his first essay in the new piracy.

As for the Portland, she was just then steaming quietly southward some ten miles away, and her captain and crew were thinking of anything rather than the possibility of a nineteenth century pirate lying within a few miles of them, and prepared to go to any length of inhumanity that his predecessors of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries would have gone to get posession of her golden freight, and what was in its way almost as valuable, her coal.

The Circe had thrown off all disguise now, for she had bidden farewell to civilisation until the time came when her raid on the goldships became impossible, and she would vanish to some remote part of the world with her golden cargo and then turn up again in an entirely new character. Her guns were all in position and ready for use at a moment's notice, and her crew, armed to the teeth, were lounging about the decks looking out over the sea, and anxiously waiting the signal to go to quarters.

At length, as she rounded the south-eastern point of the island for the fourth time, there came from the man at the fore cross-trees the welcome, long awaited hail:

"Steamer in sight, sir, to the nor'ard, about six miles away on the——"

"All right. I see her!" said Captain Peters from the bridge. "You can come down. 'Tain't likely to be any other than the one we want."

He turned his glasses on to the cloud of smoke that was mixing with the mist which hung about fifty feet from the sea and saw a small two-masted steamer running leisurely along towards the channel.

"That's her, Seenyor," he said to Lorrain, who had just come up on to the bridge. "That's the argosy of our hopes, as I have heard that a poet says somewhere. There comes two million dollars gold, or thereabouts, and inside an hour or two we'll have it safe under hatches if we get any luck at all."

"Luck!" said Lorrain. "There mustn't be any luck about this sort of thing, my dear skipper. We mustn't leave anything to the Fates. They have a nasty habit of taking you very pleasantly and easily into an ugly place and then turning round and leaving it to you whether you get out or stop there. No, this is going to be good management. We must remember that this yacht is absolutely all we have to depend upon except our guns and our own wits, so we must leave nothing to chance, either for or against us."

"From which I take it, Seenyor," said the skipper looking up quickly at him, "that the merciful persuasion of her ladyship and Mrs. Peters have not altered your mind about what's to happen to the people that we do business with."

"No," said Lorrain. "I'm afraid I can't do it. I don't like to refuse them, but business is business, and the secret of success in this business is mostly wrapped up in that very wise saying of our predecessors in the professions 'Dead men tell no tales.' What we've got to do is to clear out ship after ship as fast as possible until the place gets too hot for us, and then clear out ourselves. If we let one steamer, or even one man, get away after we've shown ourselves as what we are, it simply means that we shall have a squadron up here from San Francisco and Nanaimo, just as fast as the ships can steam, and I don't want that little experience off Samana repeated. We had miraculous luck then, but next time Dame Fortune might be looking the other way. Then we should get a six-inch shell through our boilers. No, I really am afraid that we can't afford to show any mercy. I'm not naturally a cruel man, as you know, but business is business."

"Right, Seenyor!" replied the skipper, with an evil twinkle in his little blue eyes. "That's the sort of talk I like. Makes me real good to hear it. Business first, and all the rest after it—and a darned long way after it, too. That's my motto. Now I guess we'd best get to quarters. You've given your orders, and you can just stand around and watch them executed till you feel like giving some more."

Digitized by Google

Captain Peters put his whistle to his lips and blew a short, sharp call. The men instantly jumped to their places with a smartness which conclusively proved that, if their commander had somewhat original ideas on the subject of drill, he knew all that was worth learning about discipline. As a matter of fact, during the voyage from Seattle, he had pounded two of the biggest men on board into speechless helplessness with his own hands and fatally shot a third over quite minor points of order.

He was a man who never did anything by halves. If he took up a project he threw himself soul and body into it. He would have fought just as desperately for the Cubans under his late owner as he would have done against them if he had been in the employ of Spain, and now that he was the commander of a piratical craft he had fully made up his mind to be a pirate and do everything on the old pirate lines.

He entirely endorsed his employer's pitiless purpose to leave no one to tell tales, and he did this the more readily for the reason that the agreement between Lorrain and himself had been considerably modified after the change of plans. Instead of serving three years before coming into possession of the ship and his three hundred thousand dollars, he was now to have her with his share of the plunder and the Trinidad treasure as soon as Lorrain's share amounted to a million sterling and her ladyship's to half a million, and the sooner this came about the sooner he would be his own master—after which he proposed, to use his own words, "to raise general almighty Cain and make things hum around promiscuous like."

He had in fact, little as it might be expected, a curious crooked vein of romance running through the flinty strata of his nature, and he found not a little pride and glory in his conception of himself as a regular up-to-date nineteenth century pirate, cruising the seas in a vessel of matchless speed, with the beautiful Madame Sybil as his bride and a good assortment of selected desperadoes at his beck and call, and as he gave his first order on that memorable morning he felt that he stood at the beginning of a career which, if he had anything like good fortune, should completely eclipse that of the best—or the worse—of the old buccaneers. He would also have given a very good round sum down for the addition of a couple of inches or so to his stature. But that was a detail.

The captain of the Portland was on the bridge preparing to take his vessel through the channel, and some two or three hundred miners who had braved the terrors of the Klondyke winter and won fortunes from the frozen earth were crowding the fore part of the deck looking at the tongue of land which was the half-way house on their journey back to the civilisation that was waiting to welcome them and their gold with open arms.

In a few days more, they thought, they would be at Seattle, and then San Francisco or New York or London, and those who had spent so many weary days harnessed to sledges like beasts of draught, or staggering under packs through the endless snows, would be lolling in drawing-room cars or feasting in great hotels, the wonder and envy of thousands. The toil was over and the reward was to come, so they dreamt, and it would have come but for that little black shape which came flying round the island and up through the channel towards them at a speed that seemed to them incredible.

Instinctively a vague fear seemed to take possession of some of them, and they began to say among themselves:

"Wonder what that chap's doing here."

"Guess he don't look as if he was up to much good."

"Gosh, how he do steam!"

"He's no regular cruiser."

"By the Lord he's got guns aboard!"

Then suddenly someone spoke the dreaded word "pirate." It flew from mouth to mouth like wildfire. Then there was a stampede along the deck, and men ran to their cabins and berths to get out rifles and revolvers, for they had no notion of giving up the wealth that had cost them so much toil and privation without a fight. There were about a dozen women on board, too, wives of men who had been poor and were now rich. Some of them were rich themselves by their own labour, and they were just so many more reasons for making a fight for it.

But the captain of the Portland saw at a glance that, if the strange craft should turn out to be what wild rumours written up with lurid details in the American press had prophesied might be found this spring in the track of the gold-ships, resistance was entirely out of the question. So, after a brief consultation with his chief officer, he sent down orders that no one was to appear armed on the deck—orders which were, of course, laughed at and disregarded—and the miners soon began to swarm up again, loading their repeating rifles and revolvers as they came.

The Circe, showing no colours, came flying up over the smooth grey water past the Portland at a distance of about a mile, swung round astern of her in a swift, beautiful sweep, and then ran up alongside, slowing down as she came, until she was running abreast of her at exactly the same speed about fifty yards away. There was a little man in a gold-laced peaked cap and a long naval overcoat on the bridge, and beside him was a taller man in a fur cap, fur-lined coat, and long boots.

"Is that the Portland?" came a hail from the little man.

"Yes. Who are you? Why don't you show your colours?"

"Keep your hair on, Captain, and mind your own business," was the reply. "You wouldn't like 'em if you saw 'em. Look here, tell those passengers of yours not to play about with those shooting irons. They might hurt someone. Hurry up now, or someone will get hurt. Ready with those Maxims there forward! Now then, my friend, you have three minutes to get those weapons collected before these pepper boxes get to business. Stand by to fire on the word, boys, and let go if a single gun goes off on board that hooker."

The Captain of the Portland saw at a glance that the little man on the bridge was quite in earnest and that his own ship and passengers were absolutely at his mercy. The taller man was just leaning on the bridge-rail and looking on in the attitude of an amused and interested spectator. A volley from the miners might kill them both and possibly one or two of the crew, but the next instant the four machine guns would be pouring their torrents of bullets across his decks, then the cannon would open fire and a few minutes later the Portland would go to the bottom. The miners themselves saw something of the same sort. They huddled together in groups, discussing the matter with desperate earnestness and considerable luxuriance of language. Then Captain Peter's harsh, high-pitched voice rang across the water saying:

"Now then, Captain, time's up. Are those guns down?"

The captain of the Portland threw up his hands and shouted:

"All right, no one shall shoot. Put those guns down, boys. It's no use, we can't fight."

The words were hardly out of his mouth when one of the miners who had been standing aft by himself fidgeting with a Winchester rifle suddenly brought it up to his shoulder and took point-blank aim at Captain Peters. With a movement so quick that Lorrain's eye could hardly follow it the little man whipped a long-barrelled revolver out of the pocket of his great coat and without apparently troubling to take aim fired and dropped the man just as he was pulling the trigger. The rifle went off and the bullet sang past Lorrain's ear.

Digitized by Google

"Good shot, captain," he said with a nod. "If that's your usual style I shouldn't care for you to shoot at me."

"Waal I don't think you'd find it healthy, Seenyor," he replied, and then, almost in the same breath, he shouted out: "Hold those Maxims a minute. We'll give them another chance. Now you sir, I hope you see we're in earnest, and by the great snake if there's any more fooling I'll clear the decks. You've got a ton or so of gold aboard, and that's what we've come for, so the quicker and the more peaceably you hand it out the quicker and safer you'll get to Seattle. Now what do you say about it?"

"That you're a —— pirate!" shouted the Captain of the Portland in a sudden frenzy of rage and despair. "But you've got the drop on us and I suppose we can't help ourselves."

"Yes, that's about the size of it," said Captain Peters, "only as we have ladies on board this craft perhaps you might say it a bit politer next time. Now what you've got to do's this. Run in under the lee of the land there and drop anchor. While you're doing that collect those arms and drop them overboard so that nobody else can get hurt. You can start that right away. Then you can break out the gold and send it aboard here. I can't spare any of my boats, so you must use your own. Sorry to give you so much trouble, but you can't expect sensible people to go sweating and freezing up to Klondyke when they can have the gold like this for asking. As a sensible man yourself you'll see that."

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

Piracy up-to-date.

The Circe had been gradually drawing nearer to the Portland while this rather one-sided conversation was going on until only about ten yards separated them, and Captain Peters was able to make himself distinctly heard without the trouble of shouting. Meanwhile, too, her ladyship and Mrs Peters had come up on deck, both looking very charming in their splendid furs, and were watching the strange scene on board the American steamer with a keen interest, that was not without apprehension when they saw the crowd of fierce, sullen faces that were turned, angry-eyed, on the Circe.

"Poor fellows, they must feel very savage at having to give up their gold after they've gone through so much to get it!" said her ladyship, with a touch of sympathy in her tone.

"Yes, I'm afraid that's only natural," replied Madame Sybil. "We should feel rather angry ourselves in their place, but as that interesting little husband of mine would say, 'it's business.' Still I do think it's rather too bad not to let them go, after we've taken all they have."

"But that too is business, I'm afraid," said Lorrain who had just come down from the bridge and joined them, "and, you know, consideration for your fellow-creatures is just as dangerous in piracy as it is in any other business; but you will have plenty of time for a constitutional before the unpleasant part of the work begins."

"Then you think we shall be quite safe here on deck?" asked her ladyship.

"Oh yes, there won't be any shooting—at least, not yet, You see they're collecting the arms, and there goes a batch of them overboard. It must be very aggravating to those poor chaps to have to stand being treated like a lot of children, but I expect the real reason for their good behaviour is that they've most of them got rich claims up the Klondyke and think it preferable to lose what they got on board to being obliged to leave their claim-interest to their heir-at-law. I'm really quite sorry to have to disappoint them after all."

"Yes, I'm sure you must be," said Madame Sybil with a touch of undisguised sarcasm. "I'm afraid, Señor Lorrain, that you are much too kind-hearted a man to make a good pirate."

"Possibly," he said with a little bow, "but then you see I am fortunate in possessing an entirely pitiless executive in your excellent husband."

"Yes," said Madame Sybil, colouring slightly, "I've no doubt you'll find him a most valuable help. Good heavens, what a voice the little man has when he shouts!"

The two vessels were getting round under the lee of the peninsula, and Captain Peters was giving his orders in the tone of a man who meant to have them obeyed. The miners had given up their arms with savage reluctance, and were going below in obedience to commands from the Circe. Lorrain had been perfectly correct in his reasoning as to the cause of their submission. All of them were rich—several of them millionaires in dollars if not in pounds—and their claim interest and prospects of floating them on the American and English markets were infinitely more valuable than the gold they had brought away with them. There had been a fierce dispute between the richer and the poorer—the latter of course wanting to fight at all hazards, but the others, backed by the captain and officers, settled the question by taking the arms of the more truculent away by force and then compelling them to go below.

As soon as the Portland's anchor was down, the captain, sad and angry and sick at heart, but still believing that he was doing his duty in saving his ship and the lives of his passengers, unlocked the strong-room and set the crew to work bringing up the boxes of gold. Then two boats were lowered, and load by load nearly a hundred boxes, each containing a hundredweight of gold, were conveyed to the side of the Circe and hoisted on to her deck.

When this was done, Captain Peters sent his chief officer with an escort of half-a-dozen armed men to go through the Portland's papers and make certain that none of the gold consignment had been kept back. When they had satisfied themselves on this point and that there was nothing more in the ship worth taking out except her coal and a quantity of petroleum, the chief officer ordered the captain to open his coal bunkers, as the Circe wanted to borrow some.

"But you're not going to leave us without coal to get home with?" said the captain in new alarm. "It's a bad coast, you know, for fogs and currents, and it would be as much murder as sinking us to send us adrift without coal."

"You needn't trouble about that, Captain," said the chief officer very politely. "Our own bunkers are nearly full, but you'll understand that we want to keep them quite full, and we'll leave you plenty of coal to do all the steaming you'll want to do. We shall have to ask you to keep your passengers below while the coaling's going on, because we'll have to range up alongside, and we don't want anything like a rush, you see, as that would only bring about needless bloodshed. Those Maxim guns are ugly things at close quarters."

"There is no need for you to do any bullying, sir," said the captain angrily. "I know my duty to my owners and passengers, and that duty is to save the ship and take her home. After that the American government can take the thing in hand."

"We shall be most happy to see the American government any time it likes to pay us a visit either in person or by proxy. Those guns of ours don't look very big, but they can hit mighty hard, and its twelve pounds of dynamite every time they do hit. We made a pretty mess of one of Uncle Sam's cruisers off Samana a few weeks ago."

"The —— you did!" cried the captain, stepping back a pace from him. "Then this is that infernal Minnehaha that they're talking about all over States. Darned if I didn't think so when I saw the way you could steam. Well, she's a pretty good craft for the game you've taken up, but it may interest you to know that although you knocked those three ships about pretty well they all got safe to port and started re-fitting, and it strikes me it won't be long after we get back to Seattle that the Pocahontas will be round here looking for you."

"We shall be glad to see her too," said the chief officer

Digitized by Google

imperturbably. "Our boss has got a bit of an account to settle with her. But, talking about her, can you tell me whether anyone on board her got hurt—Mr. Tristam or his wife or any of them?"

"No, sir," said the captain, "you and your boss will be glad to hear that they didn't. I did read that Mr. Tristam got badly wounded with a splinter, but then you know what liars our papers are. The other news I got was official from an officer on the guard-ship at Portland."

"Well, wherever you got it I'm obliged to you for it and I daresay the boss and the skipper will be too. Now I think we'd better see about getting that coal out. We want to be at Juneau in a day or two. We've heard that the Oregon is going to take some of the stuff from there, and we don't want to delay you and your passengers any longer than we can help."

"You're mighty polite, I must say, for a lot of dod-gasted pirates and sea-robbers," growled the captain, "and if I live to see you hanged down Portland way I'll remember it when you're swinging."

"Thanks," said the chief officer. "Hope you'll live till you see it, still there's nothing like being friends over these little matters, is there? You can't think how pleased I am that everything's passed off so pleasantly."

The two ships had been brought together by this time and the coaling started. As it was not very pleasant to be on deck, Lorrain took it into his head to invite the captain of the Portland and those of his millionaire passengers who were married to come on board the yacht with their wives for lunch, and they, being rather taken with the idea, accepted. It was certainly the most expensive lunch that they had ever eaten, and Lorrain and her ladyship as well as Captain Peters and his wife exerted themselves so much to soothe the ruffled feelings of their guests, and altogether made themselves so very charming that, by the time a dozen of excellent champagne had been disposed of, their guests found themselves beginning to wonder whether after all these really were pirates, or whether the whole thing wasn't some huge practical joke which somehow or other would turn out all right in the end.

To a disinterested observer understanding all the circumstances the scene in the cabin of the yacht would have been a very curious one. The annals of the old piracy contain plenty of instances of polite sea-rovers asking their victims to dinner and lavishing every form of hospitality upon them, just as the history of highway robbery relates many shining examples of the courtesy on the part of the knights of the road, but for my own part I have never met with any specimen of crime exhibiting the cold-blooded refinement which Lorrain indulged in on this particular occasion. It was, if anything, rather worse than those old stories of the Borghias pledging their guests, well knowing that the wine they drank was poisoned.

But the illusion was very soon to vanish. When lunch was over Lorrain invited the men into the smoking-room forward for a smoke and a final drink before the two ships parted. They, like men accustomed to gamble with Destiny, entered into the spirit of the thing and went while her ladyship and Madame Sybil entertained the ladies in the cabin. The liquor flowed freely and the guests, with the exception of the captain of the Portland, were fast forgetting their losses under its influence, when the first officer reported to Captain Peters that the coaling was finished and the bunkers as full as they could hold.

The skipper and Lorrain asked their guests to excuse them for a few moments, and left the smoking-room. The next moment the doors were locked, and an armed sentry posted outside each of them. Half an hour later one of the doors was opened, and the captain was asked to come out. He went, wondering what was the matter now. The others were raging and storming in a half drunken fashion at being locked in, but the moment the captain was out on deck the door was forced to again and locked. Then Lorrain said:

"Now Captain, there is your ship. Don't ask any questions, but go on board, get your anchor up and go. These ladies and gentlemen will be our visitors for a little time."

"But, sir, whoever you are, this is something even worse than piracy——"

"My dear Captain, it doesn't much matter what it is. The point is, do you want your ship to sail with or without you? Of course, if you'd rather stop here——"

"Thanks, I think I had better get. It's your turn to-day, but——"

"But it may be yours some other day!" said Lorrain with a wave of his hand towards the gangway. "Certainly, at present, however, it is to-day. Good afternoon. Be good enough to get your anchor up, and be off at once."

There was nothing for it but to obey, and so the captain of the Portland went, the lashings holding the two vessels together were cut the moment he got on board, and the Minnehaha as she was henceforth to be known again sheered off and ran ahead waiting for the Portland's anchor to come up. While this was being done, the smoking-room doors were opened and the male guests brought out one by one and, in spite of their struggles, bound hand and foot and then tied up to the rail on the side opposite the Portland.

As the American steamer got under way again, her ladyship came up on to the promenade deck, flushed and laughing, and whispered something in Lorrain's ear. Presently Madame Sybil came up also and said aloud:

"They're all safe for the present, but we shall have an awful scene when we let them go."

Then what was, perhaps, the blackest tragedy in all the dark story of piracy began. The Portland was about a mile away when the first of the forward dynamite guns was fired. The shell struck her under the upper bridge and seemed to blow it bodily into the sea. The next hit her under the stern and burst about the water-line. She immediately began to droop sternwards, showing that a hole had been torn in her plates.

By this time her deck was swarming with a crowd of gesticulating figures. Some jumped overboard and tried to swim to the land, and then the Minnehaha ran up to within five hundred yards and opened fire with the two forward Maxims, while Captain Peters amused himself with a rifle picking off the swimmers in the water, remarking as he made a good shot that it was an easier death than starving ashore. Two more shells were fired broadside on at the now disabled craft. They struck her together amidships and the next moment she was enveloped in a cloud of steam from her exploding boilers.

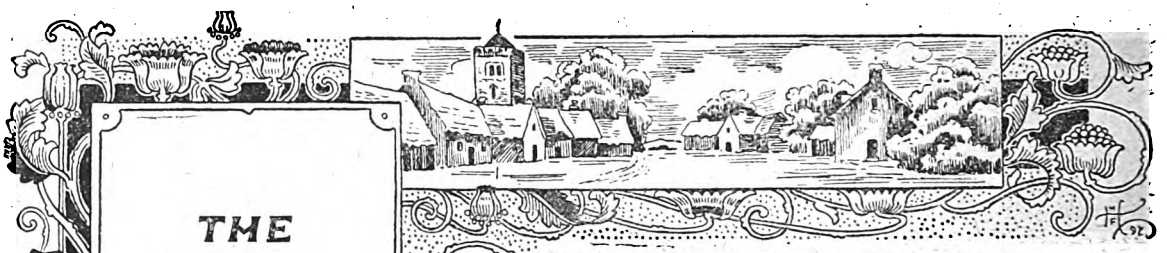
The scene on board her was one that beggared all description, but happily for the wretches who were now at the mercy of those who knew no mercy, it did not last very long, for the Portland began to heel over towards the Minnehaha, almost like a living thing asking for a final blow to put it out of its misery. As the deck came into view two more shells were sent through it. There was a brilliant flash of light, a great black ragged hole gaped across the deck half way between the funnel and the stern, and then her bow heaved itself up out of the water, remained poised in mid-air for a few awful moments, and then with a sliding plunge the doomed craft slipped back into the depths below her and disappeared.

A few of those on board her who had escaped the shells and bullets rose to the surface again, and were seen struggling among the floating wreckage which came back with them, but they had no more chance of life than the others, for they were shot without mercy as they swam or clung to the floating timbers, and when at last the horrible work was over Captain Peters took out his revolver and said to the bound men at the rail:

"Well, gentlemen, I hope what you have seen has hurried you up with your prayers. The ladies will be our guests a little longer. Sorry we can't entertain you any more just now, so if you're ready we'll say good-bye."

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google



THE WATERS OF LETHE.

It is a dangerous thing to tamper with the self-esteem of a woman. If you hurt a man's pride, he will probably go off and sulk for a greater or less time; or, it may be, if the case be very bad, that he will even kill himself. But a woman will have revenge. You may think she has forgotten, you may fancy she is impotent, but there is this much of the Oriental in every woman—that she can wait.

Break her heart and she will still let it lie in the dust for you to trample upon, and she will find the pain pleasant. Yet, beware how you so much as scratch her pride; from the wound will trickle a stream of poison, that may flow slowly, but will reach you in the end.

When James Dudley was very young and just out from the military college, he was sent to a post in the West of Ireland, and there he became engaged to marry the beautiful daughter of Major Gurdon.

At the end of a year Dudley was ordered away. Absence opened his eyes to the fact that beauty alone was not enough to make him happy in his wife. And he wrote to Esther and asked her to release him, and to her parents he sent an explanation of his conduct.

The orderly put both letters into Esther's hands. She read her own first. She was sixteen years old, now, and very proud. She had also grown to care, in a vague sort of way, for the memory of the lover of her childhood. The letter was a cruel blow to her pride, and she hated the man whom she chose to think humbled her. She tore it up, as she did the one to her father, into small pieces.

There was one sentence in the former that she did not understand. The lieutenant had said: "In time you will drink of the waters of Lethe and forget me utterly as I deserve to be forgotten."

A few days later she told her father that she was not going to marry James Dudley.

"Does he know it?" asked the Major.

"Yes."

"What is your reaon?"

"Nothing in particular. I simply don't want to."

"Perhaps that won't satisfy him. However, it is just as well. I never supposed a childish affair of that sort would amount to much. You are old enough to act for yourself now."

In truth Gurdon had ambitions that soared above a mere lieutenant for his daughter. Esther should be thankful to escape so easily.

Presently she asked:

"Papa—what does it mean to drink of the water of L e-t-h-e?"

The Major explained.

"Oh," she said, "I see," and her long eyes narrowed cruelly.

Now, it might have happened in civil life that Dudley and Esther Gurdon would never meet again; but it is often different in the service.

Some years later Lieutenant Dudley walked into a London theatre one night after the curtain had gone up. The house was dark, and he kept his eyes on the stage. At the close of the act he looked about him, and the first thing he saw was a woman whose beauty startled him. And then he realised that she was the one he might have married.

She was in a box with an older woman, whom he knew.

Dudley was seized with a nervous dread of meeting those wonderful dark grey eyes. He would go at once, before he should do so. But as he rose, the older woman saw him, and smiled and beckoned to an empty chair beside her. There was nothing for it now but to go to the box.

He was cold with fear of the low-browed, black-haired, black-gowned girl with the magnificent neck and shoulders.

She smiled when they met with the regally indifferent smile that had been hers even in childhood.

"Oh, I knew Mr. Dudley years ago," she said. "I was a little girl, and was very fond of him, because he used to buy me chocolates and ribbons."

If that were her view of the past, Dudley resented it. A man does not want a beautiful girl to treat him as an old friend of infancy.

"You might suppose, Mrs. Graves," he told the other woman, "that she had been a toddling child, and I a crusty bachelor in whose pockets she felt for sweetmeats."

"I shall suppose nothing at all just at present. Sit down here and talk over those chocolate-and-ribbon days. One of my men disappointed me at the last moment. You can more than take his place, if you will consent. If I had known you were here I should have sent for you. When did you come?"

"At noon. I meant to call on you to-morrow."

Then Esther questioned him in her deep, sweet voice.

"How long shall you stop here?"

"For a fortnight, possibly."

"Where are you stationed now?" She knew well enough.

"At Dover. How does it happen that I find you here?"

Digitized by Google

"We are stationed at Knightsbridge. You must come to see us."

"I will," he answered. He would have done anything those red lips might ask him to do. The receding tide of his love for her had swept back with a mighty force.

"How beautiful you are, Esther," he said after a moment. "But there is more than mere beauty of features now."

"Character, I suppose—which I lacked as a child. It is odd that character, even if it happened to be bad, can so improve a face."

Then she turned her head, and bestowed the light of her countenance on the civilian beside her, whose infatuation was obvious.

"Every man of her circle will hate you with a deadly hatred if Miss Gurdon happens to take a fancy to you for old times' sake," Mrs. Graves warned him.

"Even her fancy would be cheaply purchased at that cost."

"Perhaps. A woman of her beauty is not born into the world once in a cycle, certainly."

And Miss Gurdon was pleased to fancy him. She advertised the fact. She was not one to fear any means that would gain her ends. She threw away her pride, and came at his call. She forgave him the past, and met him more than half way.

But Dudley was too much in love to despise or mistrust her for this. He applied for a two months' leave, and spent every available moment of it with her. Mrs. Graves, in her quality as a school-companion of his mother's and an old friend of himself, warned him.

"Esther has done the same thing before, James. Take care. She is as beautiful as Cleopatra, and there are many who say she is as bad—at heart."

Dudley never spoke to Mrs. Graves again. His leave came to an end, and he went back to Dover. He, who had been a light mocker and a philosopher of life, saw the bottom drop out of his universe when he had to go from her. She wrote to him twice a day for a time, then once a day, then once a week and finally the orderly handed him a letter from Esther that was almost a verbatim copy of the one he had sent to her six years before, even to the closing phrase: "In time you will drink of the waters of Lethe, and will forget me as utterly as I deserve to be forgotten."

A light of memory broke, harsh and crude, through the rosy clouds that had enwrapped him. But he said to himself that justice had been meted out to him, stern and untempered. And he made no appeal.

Something more than a twelvemonth later, Esther Gurdon sat at dinner beside the man with whom she was then playing fast and loose, who would not be warned by the fate of the many others.

"You promised, you know," he said to her, "that you would answer my question to-night."

"What question?"

"Don't banter, please. I am in earnest."

"You appear to be. And everybody can see it, too. Go on and eat, and look as though you were discussing the Maxim gun or something."

"I will do whatever you choose if you will tell me if you will marry me."

"Oh! is that what you mean? I couldn't remember whether it was you or Mr. Clayton who had asked me. Perhaps it was both of you. But I can't see why you should bother about that sort of thing at dinner. Why don't you wait until the dance. It would be so much better form. Fancy saying 'No' to a man, and then putting a piece of a harmless little lamb in one's mouth."

"Are you going to say 'No'?"

"Gracious! you are insistent! How should I know what I am going to say? Go on and eat, and stop hanging on my words, or I won't answer you at all. It is so fearfully conspicuous."

Even in his suspense the man could not but return. "Whence this new-found dislike to being conspicuous?"

Miss Gurdon smiled slowly, and began to answer, but a voice from across the table stopped her.

"What is it, Captain Lawrence?" she asked.

"Have you heard of Lieutenant Dudley's death?"

"No. Is he dead?"

"He died at Dover, a week ago."

"I'm so sorry; but, frankly, I don't think a dinner-table the place for funeral notices," she rebuked him.

He disliked her, and she saw the purpose of his announcement. Her dead-white skin could turn no whiter, and her smiling red lips were painted.

"Cold-hearted devil," the captain murmured as he turned back to the man at her side.

"So you want me to marry you? I will. But I want you to understand why. It is because I have just been told that the only man I have ever loved or ever will love is dead. Do you want me—knowing that?"

"Even knowing that—yes."

"Very well."

She spoke across the table again.

"Captain Lawrence, do you happen to know how Mr. Dudley died? We might as well have the coroner's verdict, since you have given us the other notices."

"He died of drink," he told her mercilessly.

"I never knew that he drank."

"He never did until he went back from here a year ago. He took to it furiously after that, and would have been dismissed if he had not died, probably. Can you account for it?"

Miss Gurdon smiled.

"Perhaps he fancied he was quaffing the waters of Lethe," she said. ARCHIBALD MANNING.

PEARSON'S EDITION OF THE BRITISH ALMANAC for 1898.

Price One Shilling.

HERE ARE SOME OF THE CONTENTS:

Astronomical Information by Mr. EDWARD ROBERTS, F.R.A.S., F.S.S.

Art Section contains lists of the various Art Schools, Galleries and Museums, with regulations and lists of Officials, Heraldic Colouring, Notes on Engravings, etc.

Ecclesiastical and Educational Section by the Rev. CANON BURNSIDE.

Military and Naval Section. Illustrations of Army Uniforms and principal Ships of recent construction. Lists of Officials, Military and Naval Schools, etc.

Medical Section by Dr. E. P. PHILPOTT. Glossary of Medical Terms, Sick-room Notes, Anatomy, Emergency Notes, etc.

Household Section contains illustrated notes on recent and other dances by Mr. EDWARD SCOTT; Fashions by Mrs. RIVERS TURNBULL; Poultry Keeping and Diseases of Domestic Animals, by Mr. W. B. TEGETMEIER; Pigeons, by Rev. W. F. LUMLEY; Horses and Dogs, by Mr. VERO SHAW; Monthly Dinner Menus, and various useful tables, etc.

Each copy of the Almanac includes:

Coupon entitling to Free Photo of Self.
Coupon entitling to a tablet of Cook's "Riviera" Soap.
Percentage Coupons entitling to discounts off tradesmen's accounts not otherwise obtainable, whereby at least £5 per annum may be saved.

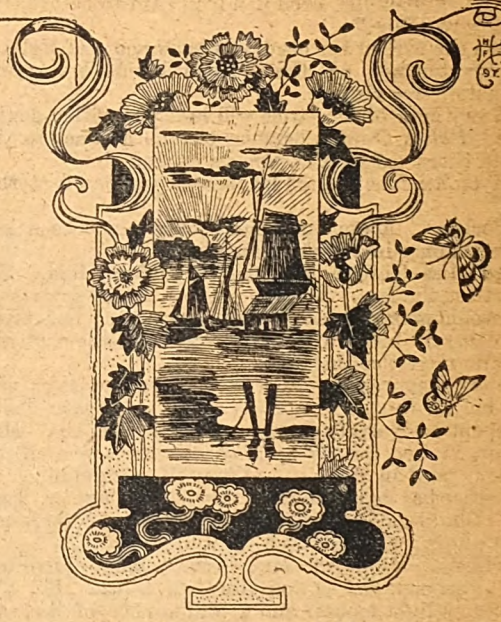
Insurance against Railway Accident for Twelve Months in the sum of £500.

BE SURE TO ASK FOR PEARSON'S EDITION

Digitized by Google

FOR A WOMAN'S KISS.

A STORY OF WEST AFRICA.



I.

The Governor's "At Home" was nearly over, and most of the guests were being conveyed in their hammocks down the streets of Freetown, the principal place in the colony of Sierra Leone.

The few remaining on the lawn in the front of Government House were mostly young Englishmen, and, judging from the merriment, they were in excellent spirits, despite the usually depressing effect of the West African climate.

Lady Mainwaring, the Governor's wife, was in their midst, and seemed to be enjoying their humours as much as any; indeed, she was largely responsible for much of the fun, and seemed loth to let them go. But at last the final farewell was said, and the young fellows departed in groups of three and four to their various quarters.

"You're not going home, surely?" exclaimed one man of the last group in surprise when, as they reached the road, two of their number were about to turn aside.

"I think we'd better," said a quiet-looking man, and the elder of the two, "I don't want to be late."

"Rot!" ejaculated the first speaker, Captain Tardrew by name. "Come round to my 'digs' for a cocktail first. It won't get dark for quite two hours yet. You'll come, won't you, Watts?" addressing Pacey's companion.

"Yes; come on," replied Watts. "I don't want to go back yet," and he linked his arms through Pacey's and drew him back.

A few minutes later they all four mounted the steps of the bungalow, where Captain Tardrew and Lieutenant Roberts lived, and commenced a second jollification on their own account.

Cocktails were handed round, and the afternoon discussed, and then Roberts got out his banjo.

In the middle of his song, the head of a pineapple suddenly fell among them, followed by a second, which hit Tardrew on the head.

"If you fellows don't mind what you're up to," he shouted through the window, after carefully concealing himself, "we'll have you in and make you drink three cocktails apiece, without stopping."

Meanwhile Roberts stepped out on the veranda with one of the pineapple heads, and with a carefully-aimed shot, hit a white sun helmet lurking behind some shrubs, full on the crown.

This was the signal for a general stampede, and in the end the two offenders were dragged forcibly into the bungalow, and after being well pummeled, made to join the fun. Of course the others had to have a second cocktail to keep them company, and then followed more songs, and it was only after a full hour and a half that Pacey succeeded in dragging Watts away.

They were living together at some little distance from the town, and were at work on the government railway. Pacey was sectional engineer, and Watts his colleague, and, when they could, they were glad to put in a little time in Freetown, for it was dull enough up the country.

At the same time, it was inadvisable to stay late, as they had a difficult journey to make over an almost impassable road, and Pacey was anxious to start.

But when Watts was once wound up, there was no holding him, and nothing would do but he must throw something at Rackham's windows, in whose quarters music and merriment were also the order of the hour.

Pacey groaned inwardly, for he knew what this meant, but like everyone else, he was very fond of careless, happy-go-lucky Watts, and only begged him good-naturedly not to keep him up all night.

When Rackham and his friends discovered who it was outside, they instantly hailed them with delight, for no one could beat Watts at a comic song, and his company was always sought at jovial gatherings. Meanwhile, two of the most energetic ran down the steps and succeeded in dragging both men back with them.

"Good old Watts!"

"Bravo, Watty!" and "Come on, you chaps," sounded from all sides, and then everybody had to have another cocktail, and after singing, Watts had to mimic the Governor for them, which he did, eliciting roars of laughter.

But at last Pacey got him away and they made for their hammocks, accompanied by three or four others, also going homewards.

The start had yet to be accomplished, however, and it took considerably longer than it need have done, for

Digitized by Google

Watts experienced a good deal of difficulty in getting into his hammock, and his four black bearers seemed in no way disposed to help him. To begin with, he made a violent plunge and went head first out the other side. The second attempt found him clinging underneath, and in struggling to right himself, he caught hold of Pacey's hammock.

Pacey being unprepared, this resulted in precipitating him unexpectedly to the ground, and Watts on the top of him, to the infinite amusement of their companions and the bearers, and it was full fifteen minutes before the actual start was made.

Then followed a rough journey over a dreary road, and a sigh of thanksgiving from both men when the bungalow was reached without further mishap. They found letters awaiting them and each settled himself cosily to peruse the home news.

Suddenly Pacey sprang up with an exclamation of delight, and Watts gazed at him in blank astonishment, for any suggestion of excitement was unusual in his quiet, steady-going friend.

"What's up? Got a fortune?" he asked with his lazy good-natured smile.

"Not quite," replied Pacey, smiling to himself as he continued eagerly to peruse his letter.

Watts watched him a few moments, then remarked:

"Well, are you going to tell me? You're a nice chap to get a fellow worked up to bursting point and then offer no explanation."

Pacey laughed, for his friend's attitude alone, to say nothing of his drawl, suggested anything but a state of excitement.

Then he sat on the table, drew a long whiff at his pipe, and remarked: "My wife's coming."

"Coming here?" queried Watts, now genuinely roused.

"Yes. She's coming out for a short stay and we are to go back together."

"By jove!" muttered Watts. "She's pretty plucky."

"Yes, rather," answered Pacey, with a light in his eye that his friend had never seen before. "She's not afraid of anything. She's got a little money of her own you know, and she says she's tired of England.

"She says it's deadly dull, and she wants a little adventure, so she's coming out here by the next boat.

"By jove! she'll be here in a week if she has a good passage," and he seemed as if he found the news too good to be true.

"I guess we shall have to tidy up a bit," remarked Watts, looking ruefully round at the chaos which reigned supreme in their quarters. There was the faintest suspicion of a shadow on his handsome face, and he rested his long legs on the table somewhat disconsolately. "I don't know how to do it, do you?"

"Oh! you needn't bother about that," replied Pacey. "Maizie won't mind. She doesn't mind anything so long as she gets a fair amount of fun. She's very lively and witty, and all that you know," he added, with unconscious pride. "She'll make the place ring if she only keeps well."

"I think I'll move back to the farm," said Watts. "You'll like to have the place to yourselves; it will be like a honeymoon."

"Nonsense, man. Maizie and I are not a soft spoony couple at all. She'd much rather you stayed; she's so fond of company."

Watts looked slightly dubious.

He didn't know much about girls, but he always considered them a bit in the way. As a matter of fact, his irrepressible spirits and careless temperament had more than once got him into difficulties with the fair sex, upon which occasions he always vowed and declared it had not been his fault at all, and that he was only having a bit of fun. At the same time it was rather trying, and so he made solemn vows to avoid their society, and have his larks with his own sex.

"I think I'll go," he said, after a pause, "there isn't much room here. I'll come in to dinner in the evenings. It'll be rather fine, won't it? You're a lucky chap."

"Yes," assented Pacey, his plain, manly face, still glowing with suppressed delight. He did not show well beside his handsome, broad-shouldered companion, who was everybody's favourite, but the weak, almost girlish mouth of the latter, and the firm, strong lips of the former, told clearly where the worth lay.

"She's a grand little girl, all laughter and sunshine and fun, and as pretty as they are made. What on earth she married a dull chap like me for, I don't know!"

"Rot!" ejaculated Watts. "She was a wise woman, and knew a good fellow when she saw one. I'm going to turn in now. Here, Que!" and he shouted to a small black boy, who was half asleep in the kitchen. "Come and take my boots off."

Meanwhile the good ship Angola breasted the waves and made a quick passage towards the West Coast. She had not many passengers, but among them was a lady, and that was not usual for a West African ship. The passengers generally consisted of from four to twelve men, who got very sick of the monotony and sometimes of each other and everything else.

But this journey the Angola was in luck's way, for besides her male passengers she carried a lady who was a host in herself. It was impossible to be dull for long with Maizie Pacey on board, for she was not only never still herself, but never let anyone else be still if she could help it. She organised cricket and rounders in the mornings, flirtations and round games in the afternoons, music and more flirtations in the evenings. She corrupted the captain and the first mate with her winsome ways, and did practically whatever she liked with everybody and everything.

But this was nothing new, for Maizie always had done whatever she liked, and it took a heart of iron to resist her coaxing moods.

Moreover, to thwart her invariably meant redoubling her determination, and that was partly why she was plain, quiet, Tom Pacey's wife.

She was attracted to him because they told her he never took any notice of girls, and someone remarked it would take a clever woman to make an impression on him. Maizie said nothing, but she took it into her head to be that woman. When she had got him practically at her feet she would have been content to well-nigh break the poor fellow's heart and let him go, which in the end would have been much better for him; but, unfortunately, opposition was raised, and because she would have her own way Maizie married Tom Pacey.

Not that she had no love for him; but the danger lay in his kind heart. He forgave and overlooked too easily.

It was no craving for his society that brought her out now to the West Coast. It was just a freak in search of adventure. It was her first sea voyage, and after a few days she began to enjoy herself thoroughly, blissfully indifferent to everything except the pleasure of the hour.

At Canary she had been so busy amusing herself that she kept the ship waiting for her, and then stepped aboard with a merry little laugh, remarking she was so hungry she didn't know what to do with herself. When they reached the Kru Coast she was so delighted with the Kru canoes that came out to the ship that she wanted to go for a trip in one of them, while they waited for her.

Digitized by Google

The canoes clustered by the vessel, and the boys took charge of them, while their fathers or brothers made bargains with the outward bound Englishmen for their services, and it needed all the captain's persuasive powers to prevent her "buying a boy," as she called it, and taking him on to Sierra Leone.

In the evening, when her husband and his friend read their letters, she was a good deal nearer than they supposed, and already the passengers were beginning to deplore her fast-approaching departure. Maizie professed to be sorry too, but when there was a cry of "Land ahoy!" she was the first to rush forward, exclaiming: "Where? Where?"

The captain lent her his telescope, and she looked up into the sky and declared they were mistaken.

Then she turned it to the water, ran it over the whole face of the ocean and heavens, and emphatically persisted that everyone was wrong.

When, after a long time, she was made to see the narrow strip of coast-line, she remarked: "What a fuss to make about a scrap like that!" and went back to her guitar, which she had hastily thrown down.

The next morning the Angola reached Freetown, and when she hove in sight Philip Watts stood alone on the quay, looking across the sea.

He was lounging against a wall, with his hands in his pockets, in his usual fashion, but there was a shade of anxiety in his face. He had left Tom Pacey behind, down with fever, and come to meet his wife for him, and he did not relish the undertaking at all.

"I wonder if she'll faint or go into hysterics," he mused. "She's pretty sure to think he's dying, or some rot like that, and what on earth am I to do with her if she does?"

When the steamer drew near, he went out in one of small boats, in which the passengers are landed, to meet it, and his spirits did not improve. Maizie was leaning over the side, laughing delightedly at the niggers, and throwing biscuits into their boats, and when she saw Watts she remarked to her companion: "What a good-looking man;" then added, "I wonder where Tom is, and how he thinks I'm going to get to land if he doesn't fetch me?" Then she aimed a biscuit at a nigger, and clapped her hands because it hit him in the face.

When Watts asked for her she was still amusing herself, and he could not help smiling when he saw her occupation.

"Her husband's down with fever; I've come to meet her for him," he told the captain.

"That good-looking man who just rowed up?" said Maizie in reply to the captain a moment later. "How considerate of Tom to choose such a nice escort," and she went forward with a bright smile.

"He isn't very bad," stammered Watts, after the first formalities. He had made up a hundred carefully worded sentences in which to calm her anxious fears, but, as is generally the case, forgot them all at the supreme moment.

"Poor old fellow, I've no doubt he'll soon be all right," she said brightly. "You're always having fever out here, aren't you? I don't suppose you think anything of it at all. Am I to get my luggage into that little boat or did you think of drawing it behind in the water?"

Watts laughed with a huge sense of relief, and in ten minutes they were the best friends in the world.

"Shall we get overturned in the surf?" she asked as they approached the land.

Watts reassured her, saying there was no danger.

"I'm rather sorry," she replied, "because I have come out here for adventure, and it's a pity to waste any time. I've got on an old frock purposely," and she laughed merrily.

When they were finally landed, he had the greatest difficulty to make her see that her luggage was selected right, because she had discovered two little fat niggers behind a boat, and was busily engaged in making friendly overtures to them with biscuits.

Then, as they walked to the hammocks, she would stand still and gaze at everything that took her fancy, and Watts, already under the spell of her beauty, was nothing loth to spin out the journey.

One nigger they saw, wearing a white linen shirt as an outer garment and a tall hat, and another, with an old umbrella cover round his neck in the form of a cape, sent her into convulsions, and she was most anxious to go and look for further curiosities in the town. But at last they started off, and presently reached the little bungalow, with its dense background of foliage, and in two minutes Maizie was flying up the steps.

Philip watched her through the open window, and he saw her husband raise himself and hold out his arms: then Maizie tripped prettily up to him, and let him fold her to his heart, and Philip turned away with something of a lonely feeling to see after her luggage. He supposed they would not want him any more, and was about to set off to the farm where he had moved his quarters, when he heard light footsteps behind him and saw a flutter of white muslin.

"I've been looking everywhere for you," she exclaimed. "I want to explore dreadfully, and I'm afraid to go alone. But these niggers don't eat people, do they?" and she raised a bewitching pair of laughing blue eyes to his face.

A few minutes later, they were scrambling over waterfalls and banks, and were generally enjoying themselves like two children.

"What a perfect spot!" she exclaimed delightedly, as she stood and gazed at the mountain stream, which sped on its way through the garden. "I'm sure I shall never want to go home again. I call this a heavenly place. Are there any monkeys? Do find one for me, I'm so fond of them! I shall get them to come and eat biscuits."

"They won't take much persuasion," laughed Watts; "but what with niggers and monkeys, I doubt if you have any biscuits left to-morrow. Both, as a rule, help themselves to anything they happen to fancy."

Then he gave her his hand and helped her to spring across a ditch, in order to get a nearer view of a native hut, where some little black babies were playing about while their mothers squatted and gossiped.

Later on, after making him play and sing to her and her husband, she walked to the gate with him, and as they went, they chaffed each other and laughed gaily. The sick man heard them from his bed, and smiled softly to himself.

"I'm glad Watts is here," he said. "She won't be likely to get dull with him to amuse her, and I want her to enjoy herself."

Digitized by Google

II.

Three weeks later the governor gave another "At Home" as a farewell before going away on leave. Nearly every European in the colony was present, and among them Maizie with her usual little band of followers.

She had been fêted right and left, and made a veritable little queen of during those three weeks, in spite of the fact that her husband had not been well enough to go about with her.

Maizie was not conventional in London, so she was hardly likely to be in Freetown, and the consequence was her husband had to content himself with her company in the mornings, and rarely at any other time.

He was too kind to object, and only said he didn't mind so long as she enjoyed herself, and listened with tenderness and pleasure when she came home and gave a spirited account of her adventures.

From what she told him, and from the amount of callers, it was easy to see how much she was admired, and he was glad and proud of it.

And Maizie thought of nothing at all, but what a good time she was having. She wanted to go everywhere and see everything, and the climax of her delights was a journey along the new railway, when Philip let her drive the engine, and when they stayed out together for hours, and picnicked by a mountain torrent.

Afterwards she let him lie with his head in her lap, and they chatted about many things, and were very happy together; while the sick man at home sat on the veranda and tried to get back his strength, that he might go out with her and see her triumph.

And meanwhile a cloud, no bigger than a man's hand, which had come upon the horizon of three lives, loomed larger and heavier.

The morning of the Governor's "At Home" Tom Pacey got up early and walked about to show them how strong he was, for he had set his heart on going. Maizie said little, but Philip encouraged him, and at last half-lifted him into a hammock.

But the journey proved too great a strain, and after a short distance he was obliged to turn back and go home.

Maizie kissed him, and he looked at her wistfully. She looked so lovely in her dainty white frock, with white shoes and stockings and a large white sun hat, he would have given anything to take her.

"Don't stay very late," he said longingly, "and you'll look after her, Watts, old fellow."

Watts was tying up his shoe-lace with a white face and set lips, and he answered without looking up. Maizie glanced from one to the other, and went a little pale herself, but she only laughed lightly and clambered back into her hammock.

At the Government House her friends quickly gathered round her, and she chatted as gaily as usual, but the colour did not come back to her cheeks, and she knew that Philip Watts never left her side for a moment, and was glad.

The Governor made pretty speeches to her, and Lady Mainwaring congratulated her on having so successfully baffled the deadly climate, and Maizie answered in her pretty way, and kept her cavaliers busy waiting upon her. But to Philip Watts she uttered no commands; she seemed scarcely to speak to him at all; yet there was that in her manner when she did address him, and in his attitude when he replied, which told that the seeming carelessness was not the result of indifference.

Afterwards they stood together in the shade of some palm trees and watched the moonlight on the sea.

In all the quarters near they could hear the laughter and music which generally followed a reception, but they paid no heed to it, standing there hand in hand under the palm trees.

Once Maizie shivered, and then her companion folded her wrap more closely round her, and afterwards he let his arm rest across her shoulders.

"Are you really going the day after to-morrow?" she asked at last.

"Yes," he replied, and her eyes fell before his.

She moved a little nearer.

"I don't know whatever I shall do," she said. "Tom won't be well enough to take me about, and I can't go alone. Are you obliged to go?"

"Only because of you."

"Because of me?" she asked; "but I want you to stay."

"If I did I should shoot myself," he answered in a low voice, with a little hard laugh.

She laughed, too, a hollow, mirthless laugh, and her teeth began to chatter nervously.

"It's been so jolly!" she breathed at last.

"Too jolly," he replied bitterly. "How do you suppose I can just go away and be without you, and know that I can never see you again? When I think of it, I feel as if I should go crazy. It is because of it I must go on Friday. I daren't stay."

She looked up again into his face and pressed a little closer, and this time her eyes did not fall, but drank in the love from his.

And Philip Watts went down like a reed in his hour of temptation, and folded her to his heart.

Like many another, circumstances proved too strong for his fatal weakness of character, and he bartered honour, self-respect, and the sacred claims of friendship for the sake of a woman's kiss.

"I can't leave you, Maizie—I can't!" he murmured, and a suspicious glisten shone in his eyes.

"I don't want you to," she answered firmly, and rested her curly head on his breast.

When they got home Tom was waiting up for them, but Maizie came in alone.

"You are very late," he said gently.

She glanced at the clock with an air of unconcern, and appeared surprised at the hour.

"We could not get away," she said. "Everyone wanted us to go in for just a few minutes, and, of course, that meant nearly half-an-hour. I'm sorry you sat up."

"Oh, it doesn't matter," he replied a little drearily.

"You are dull?" she asked.

"I'm so wretched at not being able to go about with you," he said, with a break in his voice. "It's the worst piece of ill-luck I ever had in my life, getting this confounded fever just now."

"It is hard lines," she replied, and then complained that she was too tired to tell him about the function that night.

Two days later the Cabenda took up two passengers from Freetown; the one a tall, good-looking man, and the other a slight girlish form, wearing a thick white veil, and apparently without any luggage.

Those who saw her embark in the boat from the shore, expected her to return with it, and in the bustle and confusion at the start, it was not at first noticed that she had not done so.

It was not until the ship was a black speck in the distance that it dawned upon certain minds in Freetown that Maizie Pacey had gone to England with Philip Watts.

Digitized by Google

* * * * *

Who was to tell her husband?

This was the question that burnt in the brains of those men in Freetown who were particularly his friends. Each shrank from it instinctively, and it was only pressure of circumstances that at last induced Captain Tardrew to go out to the little bungalow at Clinetown.

He found the invalid on a wicker couch by the door, eagerly watching the little garden path.

"I thought you were Maizie," he said, looking crest-fallen, as the captain came up. "She went to start Watts this morning, and I thought she would have been back hours ago. I suppose she's gone to see Colonel and Mrs. Horn—she goes there so much."

Something in his friend's manner seemed to strike him, for he added quickly: "I don't mind her going at all; I want her to get all the enjoyment she can here. Of course, its beastly awkward, having me laid me up like this, but it can't be helped, and Watts has been awfully good to her."

After inquiring after his health, Captain Tardrew sat down and commenced to draw a pattern on the floor with his stick, utterly at a loss how to proceed with his news.

"Is anything the matter?" asked Tom suddenly, and his thin hands clutched at the arms of the lounge. His whole manner expressed intense self-restraint. It seemed almost as if he were inwardly harassed with a dread that had been in his mind for some time, but determined to defend her to the end.

"I've got rather bad news," began the Captain lamely. The big fellow was at his wits' end to know how to put it, and would a thousand times rather have faced the cannon's mouth.

"What is it?" asked Tom in a strained, hollow voice. "I dare say it won't improve with keeping."

The look in his eyes frightened Captain Tardrew, and he exclaimed:

"Don't take it too much to heart, old fellow. She isn't worth it."

"Perhaps," he replied with unnatural calmness; "but you haven't told me yet what has happened," and he hid his eyes with his hand while the Captain told his story.

When he looked up at last, his face was ashy white, and his eyes stern with anguish.

"I think I'll go in," he said, and tried to raise himself.

The Captain helped him, saying almost tenderly: "You must come back to my quarters with me. I can't leave you here alone."

"You are very good, but I would rather stay," was the quiet answer; then he dropped down in a dead faint at his friend's feet.

Tardrew sent at once for the doctor, and meanwhile tended him with the gentleness of a woman.

After a long time, they brought him round, but when they spoke to him, he only turned his face to the wall in silence.

"He's in for a bad relapse," the doctor said, shaking his head gravely. "The fever was still on him, and the shock has affected the whole nervous system. We must get a nurse from Freetown a once."

"I'll stay until she comes," replied Tardrew. "It's impossible to get anyone out here to-night. Tell me what to do for him, and I'll sit up."

"If he keeps quiet like this, you needn't; but you must sleep in the room with him. I'm afraid of his getting delirious; send for me if he does."

"All right," answered the Captain, and took his seat by the bedside.

For nearly two hours he sat and watched, and all the time the stricken man lay still and quiet, seeming to be peacefully asleep.

At last, worn out by fatigue, the watcher stretched himself on the floor, and went to sleep.

A report awoke him.

The short, sharp crack of a pistol, followed by a deathly stillness.

With a nameless horror, Captain Tardrew groped for matches and struck one, and in the dim light he saw the form of his friend lying across the bed, with the pistol still grasped in his hand. Gertrude Page.

HOW TO GET ANY BOOK YOU WANT.

We are constantly receiving complaints from readers that we do not devise competitions in which everybody can enter.

It is difficult to do this—to give everybody an equal chance of success.

However, we think we have hit upon something this time.

Every week we shall give away half-a-dozen books.

All a competitor has to do is to send us one Book Coupon cut from The Sunday Reader, one from the Athletic Record, and one from Short Stories.

Send these to us in one envelope together with a request for any single book in the whole world of literature.

From the applications we receive we shall each week pick out six and send the books asked for.

If you are not successful one week, keep on trying, you are bound to be successful some week.

All applications to be addressed to "BOOKS," Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please let me have: S. S.

Book.....

Price.....

Name.....

Address.....

.....

Result for Week Ending Jan. 29th.

Mr. D. O'Connell, 68, Norfolk Street, Swansea: "More Tramps Abroad," by Mark Twain. (6s.)

Mrs. Molloy, K.O.S. Borderers, Aldershot: "The Christian," by Hall Caine. (4s. 6d.)

Mrs. Foulkas, 29, Sandy Road, Seaforth, near Liverpool: "The World's Religions." (7s. 6d.)

Rev. C. F. Hubbard, Polesworth, near Tamworth, Warwickshire: "The Ideal Life." (6s.)

Mrs. Emma Cartledge, 120, Blandford Street, Ashton-under-Lyne: "Trilby," by Geo. du Maurier. (6s.)

Mr. A. Sillito, Annington, Tamworth, Staffs.: "Wright's Book of Poultry." (10s. 6d.)

Digitized by Google

No Beauty Without White Teeth.

DR. EMY'S
ALBAZENE.

THE PUREST AND MOST ELEGANT DENTIFRICE IN THE WORLD.

TO KEEP YOUR TEETH SOUND KEEP THEM CLEAN.

Absolutely Uninjurious.

In boxes, 1s., of all Chemists, or Post Free from THE ALBAZENE COMPANY, 276 STRAND.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

SALE NOW OVER SIX MILLIONS YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

MAKE FRUIT WINES AT HOME.

Ask for MASON'S.

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. THE VERY BEST.

MASON'S GINGER WINE ESSENCE.

A Sixpenny Bottle will, in six minutes, make sixty glasses of Delicious, Non-Alcoholic Wine.

Agents Wanted.

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

MASON'S (NOTTINGHAM) COFFEE ESSENCE (THE BEST MADE)

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

MASON'S WINE ESSENCES

are made in all Fruit Flavours, Ginger, Lemon, Orange, Blackberry, etc.

YOU WON'T BE DISAPPOINTED.

Digitized by Google

IN FRIENDLY CONVERSE.

A considerable amount of excitement has been created by the publication of the first instalment of "The Empress of the Earth." Several readers have written to congratulate me upon its excellence. I can only assure them that the early chapters are really tame compared with what I have in hand. It is unquestionably one of the finest war stories ever published in this or any other country. The summary this week will enable you to start at once, and a word from you to your friends on the subject will evoke their gratitude.

H. L. M. T.—Nearly 60,000 acres have been reclaimed in Ireland during the past year from bog and marsh lands.

Goody.—The very sweetest orange is the black or rusty-coated fruit. Pick out the dingiest oranges in the box, and you will get the best. Another way to choose oranges is by weight. The heaviest are the best, because they have the thinnest skin and more weight of juice.

C. H. D. asks if I can tell him what margarine is made of, and if it is anything but "a vile substitute for butter."————It is nothing of the kind. Dutchmen, who make it, consider it very good stuff. It is butter made in a different way to pure Devonshire; it is, in fact, distilled kidney fat of the ox and cow, flavoured with the oil extracted from the Arachides nut, which comes from South America, and the Dutch people think so well of it that they frequently mix it with their best butter.

Ivan.—The words printed in italics in the Bible have been added by the translators to make clearer the meanings of the passages in which they occur.

I. J. R.—It is calculated that the consumption of lobsters in this country amounts to from sixty to seventy thousand a day. Most of these come from Norway.

J. M. F.—I have made inquiries, and find that many daggers are sold to women by jewellers. They are not ornaments, but serious weapons. They are just large enough to slip easily inside a woman's bodice. Some women have these made to order, when they are lavishly adorned and incrusted with precious stones. They are frequently carried in travelling, when they are intended as weapons of defence.

Housewife.—The Chinese preserve eggs by coating them with mud.

Alps.—It is an explicable fact that men buried in an avalanche of snow hear distinctly every word uttered by those who are seeking for them, while their strenuous shouts fail to penetrate even a few feet of the snow.

Benedict.—An unmarried lady in Holland always takes the right arm of her escort, while the married one selects the left side of her husband. So deeply has this custom entered into the life of Hollanders that at a church wedding the bride enters the edifice on the right side of the groom, the young wife returning on the left side of her husband when the ceremony has been performed.

Leonard.—Members of the Society of Friends are more numerous in Cheshire and Lancashire than anywhere else in the United Kingdom.

Agnes.—The Gold Spider's Room is not at the Kremlin but in the palace of Potsdam. An interesting tradition attaches to this piece of work. It commemorates an incident in the life of Frederick William, the grand uncle of the present Emperor of Germany. An attempt had been made to poison him in a cup of chocolate. By chance a spider fell into the cup, and for this reason the beverage was given to a dog, who immediately upon taking it died. The cook was afterwards hanged, and the golden spider in the Potsdam palace immortalises the incident.

L. F. asks: "In what part of the United Kingdom are the most curious proper names to be found?"————Probably in the Isle of Man, where we have come across the following among others: Kewish, Quirk, Greagle, Cubbon, and Qualtrough.

W. M.—The life of a London hansom cab horse is seldom longer than two years. After that they begin to "fall off" and get lame, and end their existence in the "growler" trade, standing dejectedly for hours on a rank, with an occasional whip-up to their best pace as a fare comes along.

M.P.—In the Belgium Parliament, when a member is making a long speech, he may be supplied with brandy-and-water at the expense of the Government.

Absent-minded left his umbrella in the train the other day, and upon applying to the company's lost property office for the recovery of the same, was exceedingly astonished by the enormous number of articles stored there, which the official in charge assured him had all been left in the company's carriages in the course of a week.————Absent-mindedness does, indeed, seem to be on the increase, especially amongst railway passengers. The annual auction of unclaimed goods in the Great Eastern Railway Company is a wholesale example of the extent of the disease. Two thousand umbrellas, half that number of walking sticks, six hundred hats, bicycles, perambulators, and even feather beds were unintentionally abandoned by their owners during the past twelve months.

Grant.—Yes, the complete shilling novel and the coloured plate will be given away absolutely free with every number of Home Notes, commencing with that published on February 19th.

Gippy.—A good Arabian horse can canter in the desert for twenty-four hours in summer and forty-eight hours in winter without drinking.

H. M. F. wishes to be informed what weight of food a man lifts to his mouth during his lifetime.————It would need a strong arm to lift at the same time all solid and liquid food that a man of, say, seventy has consumed, for the total weight of this amounts to at least sixty tons.

Mann.—In East Indian schools mental arithmetic is a vastly more serious matter than it is in the schools of this country. Catch questions are numerous in the Orient, and the multiplication table is swollen into a mountain of difficulty by native teachers. Pupils of ten years are taught to carry the multiplication table up to forty times forty, and in order to still more complicate matters fractional parts are introduced.

Z.—Sweden is the healthiest country in Europe, and next to it in this respect comes the United Kingdom.

R. R.—Your child is plainly overworked. There is no greater mistake in the bringing up of children than keeping them at their lessons too long, and beginning to teach them too soon. Depend upon it, a child is only the worse for lessons before it is six or seven years old. It is learning something all the while, and its brain is becoming more fitted for the reception of knowledge. A young child should not be kept at work for more than three or four hours a day. It will learn just as much in that time as in seven or eight hours. When the brain is wearied it cannot assimilate knowledge satisfactorily.

G. H.—The most remarkable book in the world, so far as its appearance is concerned, is neither written nor printed. It is in the Imperial Library of Paris, and the letters are cut out of tissue paper with a pair of scissors. A sheet of blue tissue, in which the letters are cut, is placed between two pages of white, and so the matter is read.

POSTAL RATES.

Short Stories will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

WHY INDUCE HEART DISEASE TO CURE YOUR HEAD

When you can get a real safe remedy like KAPUTINE?

Dr. Thurston, Licentiate, of the Royal College of Physicians, writes November 16th: "Knowing the formula from which KAPUTINE is compounded, I unhesitatingly recommend its use in preference to crude Antifibrin and other synthetic drugs which, unfortunately for sufferers, are so commonly used for Headache, and which have undoubtedly injurious effects on the Heart, Brain, and Vescicle tissues generally."

NOTHING LIKE KAPUTINE. NOTHING SIMILAR. NOTHING AS GOOD.

All leading Chemists sell it. Packets of 18 doses 1s. Sample 1d.

After 13 Years' Suffering, Cured for 1s.

The Rev. T. TAYLOR, Vicar of St. Bredward, Cornwall, writes: "Owing to a severe accident while riding, my wife has for the past thirteen years been subject to violent attacks of neuralgia. The relief she has experienced from KAPUTINE has been speedy and effectual. KAPUTINE, while it is efficacious in its use, is attended with none of the disagreeable after effects which she has experienced in the case of other drugs."

After 10 Weeks' Suffering, Cured for 1d.

From Rev. J. H. BURN. DEER RECTORY, MINTLAW, ABERDEEN, NOVEMBER 8TH, 1897.

"My own cure with one dose of KAPUTINE was marvellous after ten weeks incessant neuralgia.

Used also by Her Grace the Countess of Cavan, Lady Dashwood, The Countess of Munster, Surgeon Lieut.-Col. Baker, etc., etc.

Nothing Similar. Nothing as Good. KAPUTINE CURES HEADACHE IN 10 MINUTES.

If you enclose stamped envelope to A. M. Kaputine Ltd., Huddersfield, you will get free samples by return.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

NO DECEPTION HERE!!

During our ANNUAL CLEARANCE SALE (which is now taking place) we shall give Two Cash Prizes of £15 each and Thirty Prizes of 20/- each.

Send a Post-card for Sale Price List and Full Particulars without delay.

Price Lists and Patterns post free, and need not be returned.

GENUINE BARGAINS

are being offered in Dress Materials, Mantlings, Suitings, Flannels, Flannelettes, Blankets, Sheets, Quilts, Underclothing, Curtains, Carpets, Towels, etc., etc.

STOCK MUST BE CLEARED.

NOTE FOLLOWING EXTRA SPECIAL LINES.

Black Cashmere, 2/6 quality for 1/9. Ladies' Stockings, 1/-. Flannelettes, 4d. Bleached Calico, 3d. Curtains, 2/9. Sheets, 3/3. Blouse Flannelette, 4½d. Towels, 1/3.
All Parcels Carriage Paid.

FIRST ORDER OPENED EVERY WEDNESDAY FREE.

You will honestly save yourself 5/- in the pound by purchasing now from

LUTAS LEATHLEY & CO.,
Dept. 41, ARMLEY, LEEDS.

A NEW SERIES OF ORIGINAL NOVELS at 2s. 6d. each.

'LATTER-DAY' STORIES.

These Volumes are well printed on good paper, and tastefully bound in cloth. Each contains a Portrait of the Author.

VOLUME I. NOW READY.

MISS BETTY.

By BRAM STOKER, Author of "Dracula."

VOL. II. READY MARCH 4th.

VAN WAGENER'S WAYS.

By W. L. ALDEN, Author of "His Daughter," etc.

Small crown 8vo, cloth, with Portrait of the Author. Price 2s. 6d. each.

Complete Catalogue will be sent on receipt of post-card to "Book Department,"

C. ARTHUR PEARSON LIMITED,
HENRIETTA STREET, W.C.

THE WRITER APOLOGISES.

It is a comparison I may have used before; still, it comes in handy now. We cannot always command new illustrations just because we happen to want them, can we? No. As we are obliged to wear our old clothes so long as they are at all presentable, so it is with our old forms and modes of thought. They will pop up in the mind, and, do what you will, you must employ them, or go about a sort of verbal beggar. That's the way it is with me to-night.

All of which is a sort of apology on my part for likening the human brain and stomach to the two balls or ends of a dumb-bell. Only that instead of being connected by a handle, the brain and stomach are brought into intimate association by a system of nerves. The bowels are merely a prolongation of the stomach; and they also are in close communication with the brain by a similar arrangement.

Thus we perceive how either is unpleasantly affected when anything goes wrong with the other. That explains why Mrs. A. E. Spencer felt "faint and light in the head" at the time she was having a miserable experience with her stomach. "For many years," she goes on to say, "I suffered from indigestion and weakness. I had no appetite for food, and, no matter how light my diet was, I had great pain after eating. I had a gnawing pain at the stomach and a feeling of cold, as if I were starving.

"I was often sick, and felt faint and light in the head. I got extremely weak, the food I took doing me little or no good. Now better, now worse, I continued to suffer for over twenty years. I took different medicines, but nothing gave me more than temporary relief. I then heard customers in the shop speak of Mother Seigel's Syrup. I got a bottle, and found much relief from taking it. I continued taking it, and gradually I got stronger, and could take my meals without pain. By taking an occasional dose when needed I keep in good health. You can make what use you like of this statement. (Signed) (Mrs.) A. E. Spencer (wife of Mr. Spencer, grocer), Broughton, Brigg, Lincolnshire, November 6th, 1896."

As to the feeling of "cold," to which Mrs. Spencer alludes, her own explanation is the right one. She was starved—not to death, of course—but to a disagreeable if not an immediately dangerous extent. Life is heat, and heat in the human body is the product of digested food. We all know how, when we feel chill and shivery from hunger, a good meal warms us. Lacking enough food for years, this woman's blood had grown thin and her body cold. In her physical house the fire had died down. How important to her were the chance words she heard her customers utter in the shop!

"For many years," writes another, "I always felt low, tired, and weak, and had no desire for anything. My ailment was indigestion. I had a poor appetite, and what little food I ate gave me pain at the stomach and chest. No kind of food agreed with me, and I dreaded the sight of it. I was afraid to eat. I often sat down to the table and could scarcely eat a mouthful. I did not sleep well at night, and felt worse tired in the morning than when I went to bed. I got so weak I could barely go about the house. None of the medicines I tried did much to relieve me.

"In October, 1894, I received by post a small book in which I read about Mother Seigel's Syrup, and what it had done for others. I got a bottle from Mr. Soulsby, grocer, Newfield, and after taking it improved very much. I could eat, my food agreed with me, and I rested better. After having taken the Syrup a short time, I became strong and all pain left me. Since then, by taking an occasional dose, I keep in good health and can eat anything. You can publish this statement as you like. (Signed) (Mrs.) Harriet Wright, 12, Challies Street, Newfield, Willington, near Durham, Oct. 30th, 1896."

These cases, and others like them, tend to throw light upon many of the head and brain complaints people are troubled with. Stomach wrong, head wrong; that's the rule. So, in addition to the pain and distress in the digestive organs themselves, we have pain and trouble in the head, through what the medical men call "reflex nervous action." Now, when Mother Seigel's Syrup is appealed to for help in conditions of this sort, it doesn't bother itself with the ailments above the shoulders. It goes straight down into the diseased stomach, and soon has both ends of the dumb-bell in first-class working order.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 478. FOR WEEK ENDING FEBRUARY 26TH, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

BOVRIL

Contains in a highly concentrated and easily digestible form the direct nourishment of prime Ox Beef, and fortifies the system against but if, unfortunately, this disease holds us in its "grip,"

INFLUENZA;

BOVRIL

is prescribed by all leading Physicians to hasten

RECOVERY.

BOVRIL LIMITED, Food Specialists & Hospital Purveyors, LONDON.

Contractors to Her Majesty's and Foreign Governments.

Chairman—THE RIGHT HON. LORD PLAYFAIR, G.C.B., LL.D.

Digitized by Google

"Its food value is double that of Bread made from ordinary wheaten flour."—Lancet.

HOVIS BREAD

will not only help to improve your digestion and consequently your health, but will also bring back that energetic and happy feeling of good health. Man does not live a natural life, so a good portion of a natural food, in the shape of HOVIS, at each meal will largely counteract the bad influence that modern life has upon the health and digestive organs. This is not an idle remark, but a proved statement, daily being verified.

HOVIS is baked and sold by all good class Bakers. No loaf genuine unless stamped HOVIS. 6d. and 1/- samples of Bread and Biscuits sent on receipt of stamps by

S. FITTON & SON, Millers, Macclesfield.

Every Economical Housewife

uses

Tower Tea.

Tower Coffee.

Tower Cocoa.

IN PACKETS AND TINS ONLY.

SOLD EVERYWHERE.

WHOLESALE:

TOWER TEA LTD.,

5, JEWRY STREET, LONDON, E.C.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

SALE NOW OVER SIX MILLIONS YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

MAKE FRUIT WINES AT HOME.

Ask for MASON'S.

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. THE VERY BEST.

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

MASON'S GINGER WINE ESSENCE.

A Sixpenny Bottle will, in six minutes, make sixty glasses of Delicious Non-Alcoholic Wine. Agents Wanted.

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

MASON'S (NOTTINGHAM) COFFEE ESSENCE (THE BEST MADE)

MASON'S WINE ESSENCES

are made in all Fruit Flavours, Ginger Lemon, Orange, Blackberry etc.

YOU WON'T BE DISAPPOINTED.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 478. ONE PENNY.

For the Week ending Feb. 26th, 1898.

Panther Eyes.

A MAN and a woman—Nature had done the grouping—sat on a rustic seat in the later afternoon.

The man was middle-aged, slender, swarthy, with the expression of a poet and the complexion of a pirate—a man at whom one would look again.

The woman was young, blond, and graceful, with something in her figure and movements suggesting the word "lithe." She was dressed in a grey gown with odd brown marking in the texture. She may have been beautiful. One could not readily say, for her eyes denied attention to all else. They were grey-green, long and narrow, with an expression defying analysis. One could only know that they were disquieting.

The man and the woman talked.

"Yes," said the woman, "I love you, Heaven knows. But marry you, no! I cannot—will not!"

"Irene, you have said that many times, yet always have denied me a reason. I've a right to know; to prove my fortitude if I have it. Give me a reason."

"For loving you?"

"A reason for not marrying me—I've a right to know. I will know!"

He had risen and was standing before her with clenched hands, on his face a scowl. He looked as if he might attempt to learn by strangling her. She sat looking up into his face with a fixed, set expression that was utterly without emotion or sentiment. Yet it had something in it that tamed his resentment and made him shiver.

"You are determined to have my reason?" she asked in a tone that was entirely mechanical.

"If you please—if I'm not asking too much."

"Very well, you shall know. I am insane!"

Then she told him her story:

Edited By C. Arthur Pearson

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

In a little log house containing a single room sparely and rudely furnished, crouching on the floor against one of the walls, lived Charles Marlowe, his wife and child.

Marlowe was of the now extinct class of Canadian pioneersmen who found their most acceptable surroundings in sylvan solitudes. With Charles Marlowe in the wilderness, sharing the dangers, hardships, and privations of that strange life, were his wife and child, to whom he was passionately attached. The woman was still young enough to be comely, new enough to the awful isolation of her lot to be cheerful. By withholding the large capacity for happiness which the simple satisfactions of the forest life could not have filled, Providence had dealt well with her. In her light household tasks, her child, her husband, and a few books, she found abundant provision for her needs.

One morning in midsummer, Marlowe took down his rifle from the wooden hooks on the wall and signified his intention of getting game.

"We've meat enough," said the wife. "Please don't go out to-day. I dreamt last night, oh, such a dreadful thing! I cannot recollect it, but I'm almost sure that it will come to pass if you go hunting."

Marlowe laughed.

"Try to remember," he said. "Perhaps you dreamt that baby had lost the power of speech."

The woman yielded. Lacking the gift of humour, she could not hold out against his kindly badinage. So, with a kiss for the mother and a kiss for the child, he left the house and closed the door upon his happiness for ever.

At nightfall he had not returned. The woman prepared supper and waited. Then she put baby to bed and sang softly to her until she slept. By this time the fire on the hearth had burnt out, and the room was lighted by a single candle. This she afterwards placed in the open window as a sign and welcome to the hunter if he should approach from that side.

As the night wore on she became not less anxious, but more drowsy, and at last rested her arms upon the bed by the child and her head upon the arms. The candle in the window burnt down to the socket, sputtered and flared a moment, and went out unobserved, for the woman slept, and sleeping she dreamt.

Her dreams were of trouble and disaster, and she awoke with a start and a cry of fear. As a sense of her actual surroundings came slowly back to her, she felt for the child and assured herself by its breathing that all was well with it. Then, moved by some impulse for which she probably could not have accounted, she rose and took the sleeping babe in her arms holding it close against her breast.

The head of the child's cot was against the wall to which the woman now turned her back as she stood.

Lifting her eyes, she saw two bright objects starring the darkness with a reddish-green glow. She took them to be two coals on the hearth, but with her returning sense of direction, came the disquieting consciousness that they were not in that quarter of the room, moreover were too high, being nearly at the level of her eyes. She looked fixedly at the objects and shivered. They were the eyes of a panther.

The beast was at the open window directly opposite and not five paces away. Nothing but those terrible eyes were visible, but in the dreadful tumult of her feelings as the situation disclosed itself to her understanding she somehow knew that the animal was standing on its hind feet, supporting itself with its paws on the window-ledge.

Her knees failed her, and by degrees, instinctively striving to avoid a sudden movement that might bring the beast upon her, she sank to the floor, crouched against the wall, and tried to shield the babe with her trembling body without withdrawing her gaze from the luminous orbs that were killing her.

No thought of her husband came to her in her agony, no hope or suggestion to rescue or escape. She could think of nothing but the danger to her babe.

Motionless now and in absolute silence, she waited her doom, the moments growing to hours, to years, and still those devilish eyes maintained their watch.

Returning to his cabin late at night with a deer on his shoulder Charles Marlowe tried the door. It did not yield. He knocked. There was no answer. He laid down his deer and went round to the window. As he turned the angle of the building he fancied he heard a sound as of stealthy footfalls and a rustling in the undergrowth of the forest, but they were too slight for certainty even to his practised ear.

Approaching the window, and, to his surprise, finding it open, he threw his leg over the sill and entered. All was darkness and silence! He groped his way to the fireplace, struck a match and lit a candle. Then he looked about.

Cowering on the floor against a wall was his wife, clasping his child. As he sprang towards her she broke into laughter, long, loud, and mechanical, devoid of gladness and devoid of sense—the laughter that is not out of keeping with the clanking of a chain. Hardly knowing what he did, he extended his arms. She laid the babe in them. It was dead—passed to death in its mother's embrace. That is what occurred during a night in a forest, but not all of it did Irene Marlowe relate to Jenner Brading; not all of it was known to her. When she had concluded, the sun was below the horizon, and the long summer twilight had begun to deepen in the hollows of the land. For some moments Brading was silent, expecting the narrative to be carried forward to some definite connection with the conversation introducing it, but the narrator was as silent as he, her face averted, her hands clasping and unclasping themselves, as they lay in her lap.

"It is a sad, a terrible story," said Brading at last, "but I do not understand. You call Charles Marlowe, father; that I know. That he is old before his time, broken by some sorrow, I have seen, But, pardon me, you said that you—that you——"

"That I am insane," said the girl, without a movement of head or body.

"But, Irene, you say—please, dear, do not look away from me—you say that the child was dead, not demented."

"Yes, that one. I am the second. I was born three months after that night."

Brading was again silent. He was a trifle dazed and could not at once think of the right thing to say. Her face was still turned away. In his embarrassment he reached impulsively towards the hands that lay closing and unclosing in her lap, but something—he could not have said what—restrained him. He then remembered vaguely that he had never altogether cared to take her hand.

"Is it likely," she resumed, "under such circumstances that I could be quite—sane!"

Brading did not reply. He was preoccupied with a new thought that was taking shape in his mind—a theory. It might throw a light, albeit a lurid one, upon such doubt of her sanity as her own assertion had not dispelled.

Digitized by Google

In a country which was still new and sparsely populated, many stories of animals were current, and he suddenly remembered one that had caused its little excitement, but to which he had paid no attention at the time. Its likeness to the story to which he had just listened now impressed him as perhaps more than accidental. For it was of a panther which had glared through the window of a house; was it not possible that the one story had in some way suggested the other?

Brading recalled certain circumstances of the girl's history and disposition of which, with love's simplicity, he had hitherto been heedless, such as her solitary life with her father, and her strange fear of the night. Surely in such a mind imagination once kindled might burn with a lawless flame, penetrating and enveloping the entire structure. That she was mad, he could no longer doubt. She had only mistaken an effect of her mental disorder for its cause, bringing into imaginary relation with her own personality the vagaries of the local mythmakers.

With some vague intention of testing his new "theory," and no very definite notion of how to set about it, he said gravely, but with hesitation:

"Irene, dear, tell me—I beg you will not take offence, but tell me."

"I have told you," she interrupted, speaking with a passionate earnestness that he had not known her to show. "I have already told you that we cannot marry. Is anything else worth saying?"

Before he could stop her she had sprung from her seat and without another word was gliding away among the trees towards her father's house.

He stood watching her in silence until she had vanished in the gloom. Suddenly he started as if he had been shot. His face took on an expression of amazement and alarm. In one of the black shadows into which she had disappeared he had caught a quick, brief glimpse of gleaming eyes! For an instant he was dazed and irresolute, then pulling a pistol from his pocket he dashed into the wood after her shouting: "Irene, Irene, look out! The panther, the panther!"

In a moment he had passed through the fringe of forest into open ground, and saw the girl's grey skirt vanishing into her father's door. No panther was visible.

* * * * *

Jenner Brading, attorney-at-law, lived in a cottage at the edge of the town. Directly behind the dwelling was the forest.

Brading's bedroom was at the rear of the house with a single window facing the forest. One night he was awakened by a noise at the window. He could hardly have said what it was like. With a little shrill of the nerves he sat up in bed and laid hold of the revolver which he had put under his pillow. The room was in absolute darkness, but he knew where to direct his eyes, and there he held them, awaiting in silence what further might occur.

He could now dimly discern the aperture in the window a square of lighter black. Suddenly there appeared at its lower edge two gleaming eyes that turned with a malignant lustre, inexpressibly horrible. Brading's heart gave a great jump, then seemed to stand still. A chill passed along his spine and through his hair. He felt the blood forsake his cheeks. He could not have cried out, but being a man of courage he would not have done so if he could.

Slowly the glowing eyes rose with a steady motion that seemed an approach, and slowly rose Brading's right hand holding the pistol! He fired!

Blinded by the flash and stunned by the report, Brading nevertheless heard, or fancied that he heard, the wild, high scream of the panther, so human in sound. Leaping from the bed, he hastily dressed himself, and, pistol in hand, sprang from the door, meeting two or three men who came running up from the road.

A brief explanation was followed by a cautious search at the rear of the house. The grass was wet with dew. Beneath the window it had been trodden and partly levelled for a wide space, from which a devious trail, visible in the light of a lantern, led away into the bushes.

While they were proceeding, Brading stumbled and fell upon his hands, which as he rose and rubbed them together were wet and sticky. On examination they were seen to be red with blood.

An encounter unarmed with a wounded panther was not agreeable to their taste. All but Brading turned back. He, with lantern and pistol, pushed courageously forward into the wood. Passing through a difficult undergrowth, he came into a small opening, and there his courage had its reward, for there he found the body of his victim.

But it was not a panther. What it was is told, even to this day, upon a weather-stained headstone in the village churchyard and for many years was attested daily at the graveside by the bent figure and sorrow-seamed face of old Marlowe, to whose soul and to the soul of his strange, unhappy child, be peace—peace and reparation.

MARTIN SERFUS.

Digitized by Google

THE EMPRESS OF THE EARTH

The Tale of the Yellow War.

BY M. P. SHIEL.

Author of "The Man-Stealers," "Prince Zaleski," "Shapes in the Fire," "The Rajah's Sapphire," etc.

SUMMARY.

Yen How, a shrewd Chino-Japanese doctor, who has spent a portion of his life in almost every country in Europe studying the various nationalities and customs in all classes of life, falls desperately in love with an English nursemaid. His advances are rudely repulsed, however; but he leaves England with a fixed determination to win the object of his affections in spite of all opposition. The means he employs for this purpose are immeasurably vaster than the end.

Yen How goes first to Japan as a Japanese, where, by reason of his authority upon all matters connected with Europe and his high rank, he soon becomes a member of the Japanese Parliament. He rapidly becomes intimate with the prime minister, Marquis Ito, to whom he proposes a league between the two races of China and Japan, and an immense scheme by which Europe may be reduced to a waste, and China become the Empress of the Earth with scarcely an effort of her own. He then goes to China and becomes virtual ruler of that nation. In the course of a conversation which he has with Li Hung Chang he unfolds his scheme for setting all the European Powers against Great Britain. After the slaughter China will step in and conquer the remnants of the armies. The Halcyon is sent to Malta convoyed by the Majestic. In the Bay of Biscay La Gloire, a French battleship, is encountered, and fights the Majestic, which ultimately runs her opponent and then sinks. The crew is saved by the Halcyon.

Great Britain now prepares for war. A picket boat in the Channel sights a foreign fleet convoying transports, and John Hardy, a consumptive midshipman home on sick leave, brings the news to Portsmouth. Immediately troops are concentrated at Brighton under the command of Sir Evelyn Wood, and the Channel fleet sails from Spithead to face the foe. John Hardy gets on board the Jupiter, and, solely by his strength of purpose, is permitted to remain.

CHAPTER VII.

In the Channel.

Dr. Yen How had his Idea; and John Hardy had his. Nothing in the world is of such supreme importance as an Idea.

Dr. Yen How's Idea was: that the cupidity and blind greed of the white races could be used by the yellow man as a means to the yellow man's triumph; the white races could be made to exterminate each other preparatory to the sweep, in hundreds of millions, of the yellow man over an exhausted and decimated Europe. Hence the grants by China of territories to Russia, Germany, and France—and the consequent war.

John Hardy's Idea was: that the New Naval Warfare admitted of every bit as much delicate skill and shrewd sea-tactics as the Old; that the sailor-hero was still possible—the new Drake, the new Richard Grenville, the new Nelson; that it was not (as everyone believed) a mere question of weight of metal, or superiority of gun-fire now any more than it ever was; that a man born with the sea in his soul, and the sea-breeze in his hair, like the old sailor-souls, would still do the trick.

This was his Idea; and he had also this other, subsidiary to that first one—had it more vitally than any other modern Briton: that nothing in the world was of the least importance, except England, and the march of England, and the glory of England.

Perhaps the lad was utterly unconscious that he had these ideas—but he had them; they were there in him, radically and profoundly; and if he was unconscious of them, as he was of his kidneys, or his liver, that was an added proof of their radicalness and profoundity.

His nature was as elementary, and simple, and strong, as the nature of Dr. Yen How.

Just as the captain of the Jupiter flung his hand irritably and turned away from him, John Hardy caught the sleeve of a middy who was hurrying past, and said eagerly:

"I have got permission to see the row, after all!"

"Good biz," the middy nodded, as he passed on. "I wish you joy!"

And presently he was at the sleeve of a sub., saying:

"Here I am, you see. I have got permission to look on at the row, after all!"

"It is like your ubiquitous luck, Hardy," the other said, and hurried by.

John Hardy was usually more taciturn and retiring than this; the fact that he went about in this way volunteering the news about himself showed that he was more or less excited, out of himself. He was going to see a fight—a real one this time. Up to this moment he had no idea what a naval battle was actually like. Summer Manœuvres were quite a different affair.

His coldly practical nature was illustrated by the fact that the grudging quality of the captain's permission did not at all lessen his satisfaction; he had got it—that was enough. He looked only at results.

The object of the enemy was to effect a landing at Shoreham, or near it—a quiet spot, less conspicuous than Brighton or Worthing. They hoped by their prompt and sudden arrival, so soon after the declaration of war, to catch the British Fleet napping—as, in fact, they partially did—and so to be able to land three Corps d'Armée—consisting of 120,000 men, 360 guns, 30,000 horses, and a fairly adequate commissariat and field-transport matériel, without the inconvenience of first of all undergoing a naval engagement.

Digitized by Google

Their sudden presence on the shores of Britain proved that war must have been secretly premeditated and prepared for by them some time before the declaration of hostilities—another indication of that suspicion of treachery which, all through, characterised the action of the Allies in this war. But the excellent telescopes of the coast-guards, and the brisk scouts of the British fleet, served to give a warning which, though late, was not hopelessly so. The enemy, moreover, in their over-confidence, had committed an error in tactics in approaching too near the coast while there was still a little twilight.

Off Bognor the captains and commanders of all ships in the Channel Squadron were assembled in the large ward-room of the Magnificent. Rear-Admiral John Fellowes had signalled half-speed, and summoned them to a conference.

The officers sat round him, hanging eagerly on his words, as the Rear-Admiral began to speak.

"Of course, gentlemen," he said, "it has been a matter of anxious consideration to me in what formation we are to approach the enemy. What makes our arrangements rather difficult is the fact that we know little at the moment of their present disposition. But it seems to me that one thing should be certain—namely, that their troopships and liners will be stationed well in the rear, while the whole weight of metal of their ships of war will be put forward to protect their land-forces on the liners. They will naturally assume that our first care and trouble will be to destroy their land-forces in our panic at the idea of invasion, and their whole effort will be bent upon protecting them, and frustrating us.

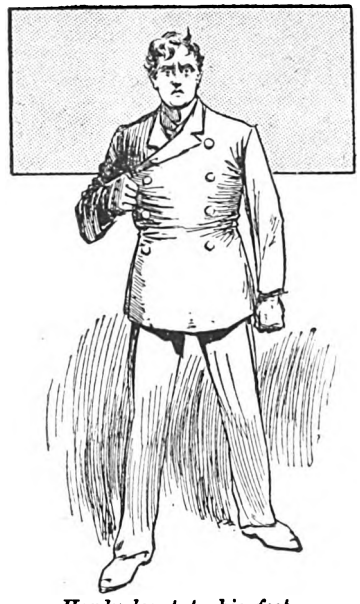
"Of course, in thus guessing our objects they are right enough. We wish, naturally, to baulk the present attempt at invasion; but I must point out to you that our object, to be wise, must be two-fold, and that our secondary object is more important than our first. I mean, that from the reports we have received of the number of transports, it is impossible that the enemy can have with them a land-force of more than 120,000 to 160,000 men, and that, even supposing these effect a landing, the land forces at present in Britain are possibly quite capable of dealing with them, provided the enemy be not reinforced by fresh increments of invading army-corps in the very near future.

"It must, then, be our business to make such fresh invasions impracticable for some little time by shattering, as far as we can, the enemy's powers of convoy, that is, their battleships. For I need not point out to you that the combined countries of France, Russia, and Germany may place several millions of armed men in England, practically as fast as they choose, if only they have ships to bring them over, and a convoy to protect them from the battleships and coast defence ironclads lying at British stations. And against such forces the land force of Britain would, of course, be impotent.

"This, then, is my point of view. We must send back our invaders with such a rip in their clattered metal that these particular battleships shall have had enough of invasion for some little time.

"In the effort we shall all probably perish, but that, I take it, is not with any of us a matter of salient importance.

"What I propose is this: That we approach to within five miles of the enemy in our present formation; if they approach us in line, or in a semi-circle convex or concave, then we echelon right and left respectively, each battleship fastening on the nearest antagonist as fortune may decide, while gunboats, torpedo-boats, and fast third-class cruisers like the Pelorus, will deploy right and left in an attempt to get behind the enemy, where they will do all the damage they can, special attention being given to the destruction of rudders and screws, so as to obviate their ramming-power.



Hardy leapt to his feet.

"If, on the other hand, they confront us in file, then we retain our formation, the first ship attacking the first, the second the second, and so on.

"My instructions at present cannot, of course, but be general, and much, in any case, must be left to individual initiative — happily so, I think, in the case of British commanders. Further orders will, if necessary, be sent out by trumpet-call, and passed from ship to ship in both files."

A bow of acquiescence went all round the table. The policy was felt to be bad for the immediate present, but wise for the immediate future.

At that moment the flag-lieutenant of the Rear-Admiral entered the room.

"The enemy's fleet is reported in sight, sir," he said.

"Ah! what is the hour?"

"Nearly three bells, sir—second dog-watch."

"What has been made out?"

"Only three electric search-lights in a line—probably they are fifteen miles off."

"Are preparations well advanced on board?"

"Yes, sir."

"And the same, I presume, in all your ships, gentlemen?"

They all expressed assent.

"Well, then, gentlemen, here you see, we are in for it—'it' meaning the first great naval battle of modern times. I dare say that we shall conduct ourselves with credit, fighting as we do in the name of justice and our country. In half-an-hour, say, we shall be face to face with these people. I recommend that an extra ration of grog be served out to all blue-jackets, meantime, and that all final preparations be pushed forward. My flag-lieutenant will at once send up as my signal for a general engagement, the words: 'For England.' I think that is all I need say now, except to wish you a very hearty good-bye, and a fine fight, and the aid and blessing of Almighty God."

The officers, having saluted, some of them pressed the hand of the Rear-Admiral, and trooping hurriedly forth with mutual adieux, and half-satiric, half-sad morituri salutamuses, went away through the gloom, each to his own ship.

The snouts of the ponderous bulks of metal were ploughing and forging leisurely through the sea.

Yonder, brilliantly lit by flash-light on the starboard flagship, fluttered the battle-word of the coming combat: "For England."

But the night now had darkened. A wind freshened from the sou'-west, and drove sombre expeditions of slow cloud over the blurred face of the scurrying and struggling moon. She seemed affrighted at the pregnant silence of this gliding navy—a silence pregnant with a thousand thunders. But the sea was fairly calm, crisped only with short, low fringes of foam driven by the wind.

Digitized by Google

The Jupiter was the second ship in the port file—that is to say, on the side nearest the coast as the fleet forged eastwards.

Her captain had been so pre-occupied with affairs during the bustle of the afternoon, that he had eaten nothing for hours. Almost immediately on reaching his own ship after leaving the Rear-Admiral's, he hurriedly descended to his own quarters, and sat down to swallow some cold mouthfuls.

Happening to lift his eyes as he ate, he saw, sitting on a couch in the apartment, and quietly watching him, his guest, John Hardy. He had forgotten John.

"Well, John," he said, across a gag of mutton, "so you have dared, after all. In spite of my orders, eh, sir? Well, I suppose I must make the best of you, as you are here. But you are a foolish lad, you know."

"It can't be of any consequence, sir," said John. "I wanted to see a fight. It is always experience."

"Yes, yes. But a young man like you. Have you no care for your life, sir?"

"It can't be of any consequence, sir."

"'A day less or more,
On sea, or on shore,
We die—does it matter when?'

"Is that the sort of sentiment, eh, John?"

"Something of that sort, sir."

"Well, you might do worse, perhaps. But what is the matter with you? The sweat is rolling down your face."

"They have been allowing me to help a little about the ship, sir."

"What, with your own hands, sir?"

"Yes, sir."

"Well, John Hardy—I shall never have another chance of telling you, so let me tell you now, boy—I must say that I regard you as a most worthy specimen of the Navy. Your school and cadet careers were not very brilliant, were they? Rather—ahem—well—we will say nothing of that. But in other respects—you know what I would say, perhaps—I give you my Certificate—that sort of thing. Certainly, you are as bold as a fly, modest, gentle, thoroughly English—a little—er—original, perhaps, eh, sir? Like your father, eh, sir? But with the makings of a great sailor in you, John Hardy. Pity you should be throwing yourself away like this."

John was blushing.

"You are very kind, sir," he just muttered.

"Do not mention it. The circumstances excuse one, you know, in being quite frank."

"Quite so, sir."

John, all the time, was burning to ask a question. Suddenly he said:

"Might I ask, sir, what are the proposed tactics for the battle?"

"Well, John, there's going to be plenty of fun, apparently, for you to see. The idea is to concentrate all our efforts upon the battleships and cruisers, so as to render it out of the question, if possible, for this particular fleet ever again to act as convoy to an invading force."

"And the liners and transports, sir?"

"They are to be left severely alone this time."

"To land their troops on British soil, sir?"

"Yes, boy—yes—this time."

Suddenly John Hardy leapt to his feet, his hands clenched, his face inflamed.

"Oh, sir!" he cried.

The Captain looked at him in surprise, saying:

"Well, what's the matter?"

"Captain MacLeod, England will never bear such an indignity!"

"Well, my boy, but War, you understand, is not fun and heroics—it is dead earnest. England will have to bear it, I'm afraid."

"She shan't, by God!" cried John Hardy, striking out his right fist, suddenly riven and smitten by the Call of Heaven within him.

Then immediately he fell back upon the couch, sobbing bitterly into his two hands.

The Captain stood over him, patting his shoulder, murmuring:

"Poor John! poor John!"

CHAPTER VIII.

The Battle.

The fleets drew nearer, vaguely revealed to each other by means of electric search-lights.

That morning, as early as five o'clock, the French, Russian, and German national anthems had been played on board the fleet of the Allies at Brest, and the colours saluted. Immediately afterwards the ships steamed out of harbour. The land-troops were already massed on board the transports.

To prevent their movements being watched and reported, they had proceeded at a high rate of speed under forced draught, never very far from the French coast, till they reached the longitude of Fécamp; then, striking directly northward for Beachy Head, had slackened speed about five o'clock, forty miles from the coast; then, as the twilight gathered, they had deflected their course to about West by North, making leisurely for the neighbourhood of Shoreham. When they first became aware of the approach of the British fleet, they were moving almost directly westward, as the British vessels were moving directly eastward.

The formation of the enemy was in a quadruple line. In the front were fourteen battleships at twelve cables' interval; in the second, cruisers of the three classes; in the third, gun-boats, torpedo-boats, and composite gun-vessels; in the fourth the array of liners and troopships bearing the land forces.

The British Rear-Admiral had rightly surmised what would be the first action of the French Contre-Amiral; his primary thought was for the troopships. Out from the flagship went a trumpet-call, repeated far over the ocean in a long line of sonorous and brazen-lunged iteration. Down the files of ships it went braying, a voice that died and instantly rose in vibrant outcry again, commanding all troopers and liners to go pacing backwards twelve miles to westward, and there maintain a hollow square till further notice.

Through the wide region of black smoke which poured forth now over the Channel from the entire Allied fleet, in their effort to get up steam, flocked the captains of ships to a hurried conference with Contre-Amiral des Vismes de Monthier on the Amiral Baudin.

His recommendation was, that the Allied battleships should deploy in two double lines, converging inwards toward the British ships, just as the British ships (as could be already surmised) were diverging outward toward the Allies. He said: "We have fourteen battleships—they, I take it, eight." (In reality, the British battleships only numbered seven, for the Majestic was gone.) "I propose, then, that the four battleships of our present line now furthest to starboard will form the outer converging line of starboard attack, and the next four the inner converging line, parallel to the outer; thus, toward the coast, two starboard lines of eight Allied battleships will have between their broadsides a line of four British battleships—and the contest, I think, should be short.

"In the same way with our port battleships; the three furthest to port will form the outer converging line, the next three the inner—thus two port lines of six Allied battleships will have between their broadsides a line of four British battleships—eight to four, and six to four: the contest should not be long, messieurs. I even suggest, as a good point of tactics, that, in view of our enormous preponderance in weight, we should make our victory almost instantaneous by placing a very short interval indeed between combatant ships—say, half-a-mile at the most; for, of course, the shorter the conflict the less our damage—a point of immeasureable importance to us at present, considering the rôle we have to fill in acting as convoy to more invading land-forces in the near future. I need not point out, too, that an enemy's ship, hemmed in between two hostile ships, will be the more hampered as to her power of ramming, the closer the quarters. But we have little time for talk; cruisers, gunboats, and composite vessels will find their work cut out according to the dispositions of the enemy's less important flotilla. I can only hope that these recommendations meet with your approval, as I know they do with that of my colleague, Vice-Admiral von Grüdenau. Adieu, then, messieurs! This temporary interruption to our progress will, in less than a quarter of an hour, be overcome. Vive la France! Vivent—vivent—les Alliés!"

Digitized by Google

He was gone.

"Vive la France—vivent les Alliés!" repeated the Allied commanders all round the table, as they raised to their lips glasses of wine poured from the carafes; then, saluting, they hurried to their gigs.

And none too soon. They had hardly reached their ships, and turned them to the performance of the prescribed evolutions, when the fleet of England was upon them.

The Contre-Amiral of the Allied fleet had made a small error in guessing the formation which the British fleet of battleships would assume in making the attack. He had naturally assumed that, their number being so small, they would meet the Allied fleet in two divergent single lines of ships; but the British Rear-Admiral, hoping for some small, hypothetical advantage, had, as we have seen, decided to advance in two divergent echelons, or step-shape formations. The error was of little importance, for, as soon as the fleets approached sufficiently, the Allies would detect the formation of the British, and slightly modify their plan accordingly.

Unfortunately for them, however, the eyes of John Hardy, with their faculty of sight and insight, were abroad over the sea that night.

He had burst into sobs in the Captain's-quarters of the Jupiter. The Captain stood over him, patting his shoulder compassionately, wondering at the intensity of the lad's pride and patriotism.

But it was not pride, nor patriotism, which was then rending the frail frame of John Hardy with sobs—it was something far more.

To hear irresistibly within you the Heavenly Call to be up and save the world, and then, at once, to be overwhelmed with the bitter sense of the strong Commonplace, and with the feeling of sheer impotence in the face of it—this is the tragedy of genius.

John sobbed. There had risen in him a sublime strength, an immoderate arrogance, and with it the tingling consciousness that, were he that night the Admiral of the Fleet, he would and could somehow save England from the shame of an invading foot; then, all at once, he remembered that he was by no means the Admiral of the Fleet. So he sobbed.

But his sobs were lucky just at that moment, as many things which he did had a trick of being. They softened and touched the Captain, just at the right instant.

"Well, John, I must be going," he said.

John lifted up his hot face.

"Where shall I take my place, sir?" he asked.

"Your place? I should stay here if I were you."

"May I, sir, if it is not asking too much ——"

"What?"

"Come with you, sir."

"Where to?"

"The conning-tower, sir."

"My good fellow!"

"If it is not asking too much, sir. One must see the fight from somewhere, as one happens to be here."

"Well—but—the conning-tower!"

"I shall make myself small, sir. You won't talk to me, nor I, of course, to you. A guest chooses his lodging in a case of doubt, you know, sir."

He was smiling now, and when he smiled his face was wonderfully winning.

The Captain hesitated, and was lost. He said:

"Well, you are an original, John, that's all I can say—like your poor father before you, boy. Come along, then—come along!"

They ran briskly up.

Suddenly the still night was a-sound. The two fleets were about to mingle.

At that moment, so great was the disparity of weight, that the wildest hope of patriotism could not have predicted anything but swift destruction to the British fleet; nor was the object of the British captains victory, but only the disablement, as far as might be, of the enemy.

To explain the appalling ruin and havoc which one pair of seeing sailor-eyes brought upon the entire Allied squadron, we must employ diagrams.

The following is the formation in which the seven British battleships approached the enemy, with an interval of about a knot, or nautical mile, between each pair of ships, A being the Rear-Admiral's ship, the Magnificent, A′ the Prince George leading the starboard echelon, and B′ the Jupiter, bearing John Hardy.

The following is the formation in which, by the direction of the Contre-Amiral, the allied fleet of battle-ships advanced, about the same interval being preserved among ship-pairs as among the British ship-pairs, counting a kilomètre as approximately equal to three-thirds of a mile.

Digitized by Google

The fleets had no sooner commenced to intermingle, than Hardy, standing now with Captain MacLeod in the conning-tower of the Jupiter, was in full possession of their method of advance; and he was no sooner in full possession of it, than he started, his eyes widened, and words burst from him.

"Sir, sir," he cried, "the enemy are advancing in two double files. It seems clear to me that they suppose us to be advancing in two single files."

"Yes, that is so," said the Captain unconcernedly, proceeding to give the order in which John had interrupted him.

"But, sir, sir," persisted John.

"Well, John, well," said the Captain, a little irritably at the second interruption.

"It seems to me, sir—really—that if the Jupiter and the Victorious both put out all external lights and lie low, the enemy will continue to think that we are in single file instead of in echelon, and then——"

Up leapt the Captain's arms.

"By gad, you are right, boy!" he cried, staring hard at John, his head struck into a sudden sideward suspension of silent meditation.

Then, in a flash, he saw it all—the whole inwardness of the boy's suggestion—the long vista of results—the whole huge drama of the enemy's disaster.

"Sir—Captain MacLeod——" said John, all eagerness.

"But to warn the Victorious in time?" mused the Captain.

"Send me, sir! Water from the engines—the picket-boat! The Victorious is only two miles off; I shall be there in three or four minutes."

"Well—I say yes. You understand, of course, that you will never come back."

"Thank you, Captain—good-bye—they are done for, Captain, by the Lord——!"

He was gone, rushing.

On board Her Majesty's ships of war things are done with a certain celerity; everything is oiled and easy, and goes off with the gliding smoothness of lightning. The Jupiter was carrying at her mast-head the bright white steam-light, on her starboard bow the usual green, and on her port bow the usual red, light; by the time these were out, and the whole ship plunged into darkness, the little picket-boat, under forced draught, was driving her head through two combs of foam, herself in darkness, with John Hardy and two bluejackets, in a direction nearly south.

She passed before the ram of the Repulse (C'), and in less than two minutes afterwards, Hardy was at the conning-tower of the Victorious (B).

Suddenly the Victorious, too, vanished into darkness.

The night was now very gloomy.

There remained a third ship, the Mars (D), whose presence it was desirable to conceal for the time being; the concealment was not so necessary, as she was more remote from the advancing fleet of the enemy, and by the time the significance of her presence in her then position was understood, the mischief intended might be done.

But John Hardy would leave nothing to chance. It was quite out of the question now, that if he attempted to reach the Mars, the little picket could live in the shattered sea-surface, into which, surely, in a minute's time all that area of water would be torn by shot and shell. Yet he dared. The little boat, in a very passion of haste, throbbing as though she would throb her little heart out, went panting north-westward toward the Mars.

Was he too late? There was a sudden shock and roar from the east, and in the night a dull glare, red and wrathful. He sat with the tiller-ropes in one hand, the other holding a double-glass to his eyes. A gust of wind had blown away his light straw hat, and the breeze was a-play in his hair.

A British first-class gunboat rushed sounding past him, hasting wrathfully to battle, washed in spray from stem to stern. Close by his starboard bow she dashed like an angry darting fish, leaving the little picket nodding and dipping in a choppy sea which almost swamped her in her hurried embassy. The next moment a shrapnel-shell burst into light a hundred yards before him. The fight had commenced—Bellona was abroad.

Was he too late? He knew now that to reach the Mars he must perish. Certainly, he could never return to the Jupiter. But he held on his way. He was in his element. Now he knew for what he was born; it was for this—the mixed and multitudinous roar of cannon sounding over the sea—England's sea—his sea! Something in his heart, in his life's blood, and in his very soul's soul, answered to it, was akin to it. He had never been really happy till this night. He held on his rash and desperate way.

His eyes were alight with battle.

Suddenly he said under his breath: "Bravo!"

The lights of the Mars had gone out into darkness.

Her captain—Captain Henderson—had noted, first, the extinguishing of the lights of the Jupiter, and had been puzzled; then the going out into darkness of the Victorious. He had stood with knit brows for nearly two minutes, and then had understood. A few seconds later the Mars, too, was invisible.

At once John Hardy put his helm to starboard, running about north-east, to regain the Jupiter. He was now hurrying into the very region of the starboard limb of the enemy's fleet, and by the time he neared the Repulse, that ship was already engaged with two of the enemy. In another half-minute the sea around these three was a white tempest of thrashed and spurting spray, as when thronging hail flogs furiously upon a lake, and the sky about them was a vague domed cavern of coppery flame. Never did sailor, in so small a craft, run the gauntlet of a more ticklish peril, passing through a sea crowded with torpedoes, and cracking shells, and balls of fire. But the picket boat never once so much as swerved; straight onward she throbbed, through the region of lurid half-light, carrying at her stern-post the Union Jack; then once more into darkness. In another minute John Hardy sprung up the side of the dark Jupiter, and ran to the conning-tower.

Digitized by Google

"You have done it, then, John?" said Captain MacLeod; "I congratulate you from my soul."

"Thank you, sir. Now, perhaps, I think we may see these fellows banged a little——"

Blood covered his face, and the breeze in his hair gave him the look of wildness and dismay.

"We may, John, we may—thanks to you, boy. Wait, wait—let us see."

It did not take long to see.

In a very few minutes the condition of the battle was this: Two French ships, one on each side of her, were battering the Magnificent into shambles; two more, one on each side of her, were making a wreck of the Prince George; two more were tackling the Repulse; the Jupiter was not fighting, the Victorious was not fighting, the Mars was not fighting—the Allies being unconscious at the moment of their presence in their then unsuspected positions; one German ship was in collision with a French on the starboard side of the Resolution (C); one French ship was ramming another French ship between the Resolution and the Mars; another French ship was blowing a German ship out of the water at a point a long way to the west of the British fleet; and two German ships were cruising about in the same longitude, searching in vain for two enemies which should have been there, and were not.

Digitized by Google

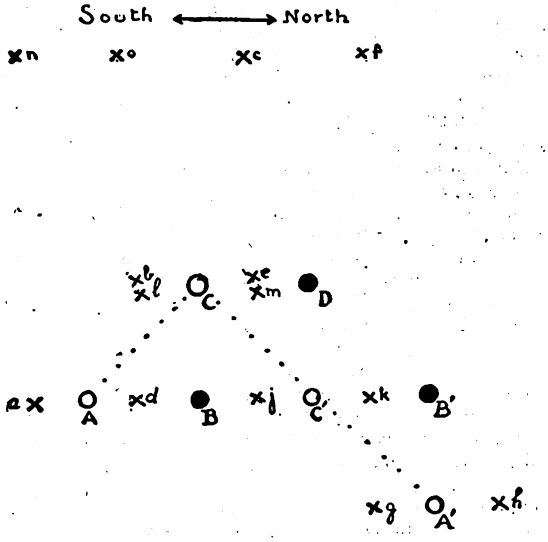
Thus, of the fourteen Allied battleships, six only were engaged in actual conflict with three British vessels, while a fourth British vessel was pouring a tempest of barbette quick-firing, and machine gun-shot into the two ships in collision on her starboard side, and watching the sinking of a French ship rammed by a French on her port side. How this complexity of tragedy overwhelmed the enemy will be readily seen by the following plan of the battle, published in every London newspaper the next morning. Crosses and small letters stand for Allied ships, circles and capitals stand for British, the three British ships which put out their lights being printed in black:



It will be seen from the plan that, the lights of the three ships being extinguished, the starboard limb of the Allied squadron saw a straight line of British ships—namely, C, C', A'—consisting of the Resolution, the Repulse, and the Prince George. This made them certain of their conjecture that the British were advancing in two single lines, and they accordingly proceeded to port and starboard of these three, in order to attack on both broadsides; but expecting not three, but four, British vessels in each limb, the Allied ships n and o went on south-westward to seek them.

Meanwhile, on their port side also, the Allied ships saw a straight line of British ships, namely, A, C, consisting of the Magnificent and—once again—the Resolution. Believing that this limb consisted also of four distinct ships, two of which were further on, and not appreciating the fact that the same Resolution (C) was about to be attacked by two of their starboard fleet, they steamed forward. Two of their ships, c and f, reached the stations indicated on the plan, surprised to find no enemy; while two others, b and e, came into contact with two of their own ships of the starboard limb, l and m. Before she could discover her error, or stop her speed, m had hopelessly rammed e, and the Resolution was pouring in a murderous hail on both b and l, which had similarly collided, b at this time being an inert mass floating helplessly with rudder and screws shattered by l; while, yonder to the West, c and o, both searching for the missing enemy, made a sudden discovery, and began to batter each other with barbette and shrapnel, before even guessing at the hopeless error, and the blind delusion, and the harum-scarum of disaster, in which they had been involved by the simple expedient of a sailor lad.

At this moment—simultaneously—the three darkened ships opened fire; and peaceful merchantmen, heading with slow industry on their diverse ways, heard far and wide over the Channel, the shock and rumour of that complex clamour.

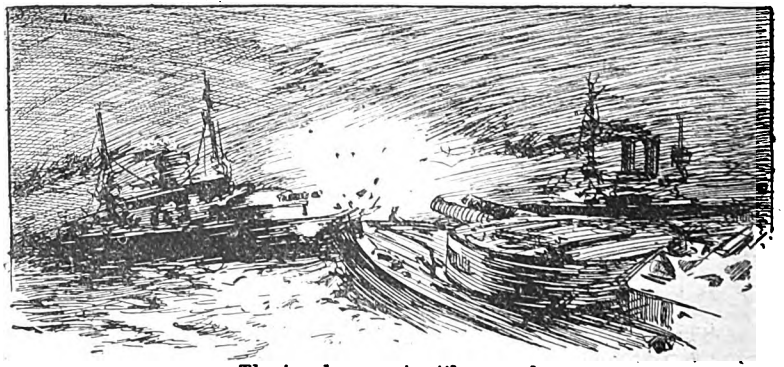
It was a fearful battle. Nearly all the Allied ships which were in actual combat with British ships, and which had taken up their positions in the hope of pouring in a double broadside on a British ship, one from each side, now suddenly found themselves in the same predicament which they had planned for the British; for, without warning, a dark, unsuspected ship opened fire upon them, placing between two fires those who had planned two fires for others.

A glance at the diagram will show how this came about. Thus, the ship k was between the fires of the Jupiter and the Repulse, the ship y between the fires of the Repulse and the Victorious, and the ship d between the fires of the Victorious and the Magnificent.

As yet, no colours had been struck, but the Deutschland (b), whose rudder had been shattered by the Sadowa (l), was a barely-floating ruin sinking fast, with only one water-tight compartment uninvaded by the inswirling waters; the Prince George (A) was just plunging—with screws high in air, and a shriek from her burst and hissing engines that reached to heaven—to her last resting place; the Majestueuse (e), with a strange fatal suddenness, had sunk on being rammed by the Formidable (m) and almost immediately afterwards, the Formidable herself cracked in twain amid-ships, struck by a torpedo intended for the Majestueuse which had been lanced by a second-class torpedo boat, lowered in the dark by the Mars; while the Mars herself, having not yet relighted her lamps, was rammed at her central armours-belt by a second-class British cruiser, the Charybdis, the smaller ship shearing away with broken bows to go down by the head three miles away amid a crowd of allied cruisers.

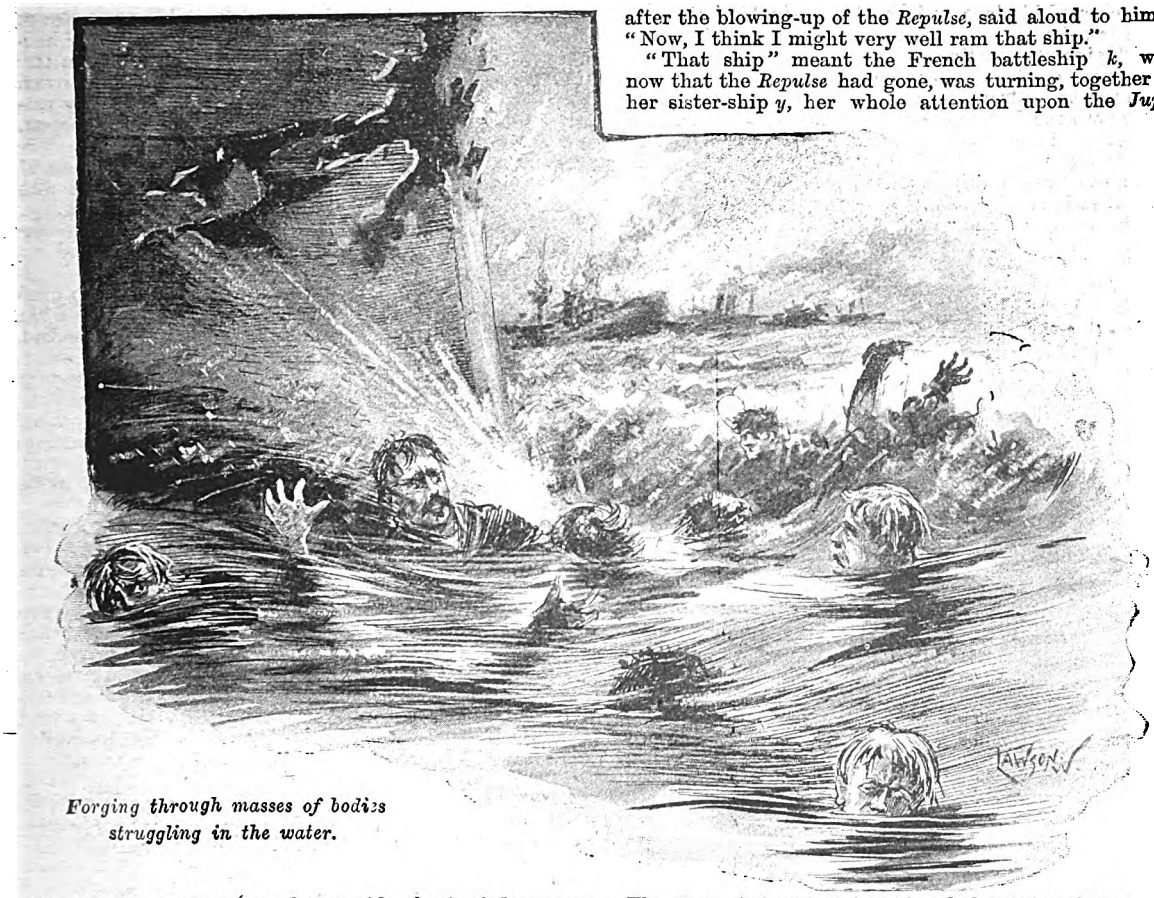
Yonder to westward of the thickest region of battle, the Amiral Baudin (c), with a single twelve-inch shell, had annihilated both funnels of the Kaiserhof, while the Kaiserhof, before she could detect the ruse by which she was made to destroy her own flagship, had rattled the ribs of the Amiral Baudin with a rain of thousands of rounds of machine and quick-firing six and three-pounder shot, and had sent a barbette shell shrieking through her fore-armoured tube into the bowels of the French ship, where it ripped up her armoured deck, and in a nightmare of hellish fury, rent the whole central interior of the vessel into débris.

It was very shortly after this that even the ear-splitting din of that wide and various warfare received, as it were,



The two bows met with a crash.

Digitized by Google



Forging through masses of bodies struggling in the water.

an added shock of horror, when a wide sheet of flame was seen to rise and ride in quivering glare toward the sky, and the next moment a bang of thunder where the Repulse had been shook the universal sea. A fire had run through her entire length between decks, and ignited at nearly the same moment every atom of explosive within her into one splendid detonation. She did not burst—she crumbled to fragments. At the same time, at the other end of that line of ships, the Magnificent was quietly going down by her poop, where a French submarine boat had affixed a Whitehead.

In a very few minutes after the actual commencement of hostilities, four of the seven British battleships had disappeared, and nine of the Allied fourteen.

Of the intricate and incalculable warfare that was darting about in furious wrath in every direction in the shape of the less massive armatures, little was sufficiently salient to be recorded.

The enemy was very preponderant in number, but deficient in weight of first-class cruisers. The mutual havoc went on rapidly with complex disaster and success. Ships about to disappear rose again, blown high by torpedoes; men on the point of going down in the wheeling suction of some great sinking vessel were arrested in their descent to be mangled by distracted shrapnel, or scalded by some flight of stinging steam; crafts were destroyed, and destroyed again, and ten times destroyed again, before they sank in scattered shreds. It was an anarchy and blindness of rage, which rent the already rent, and mutilated the already murdered.

The Jupiter, by some favour of her position, was still partially seaworthy, when Captain MacLeod, about a minute after the blowing-up of the Repulse, said aloud to himself, "Now, I think I might very well ram that ship."

"That ship" meant the French battleship k, which, now that the Repulse had gone, was turning, together with her sister-ship y, her whole attention upon the Jupiter. The Jupiter's fore-deck had already been ripped up, and one of her fore-barbette guns unshipped.

At once she went wheeling in a sixteen-point curve to starboard, pouring at the same time a broadside upon the enemy. But it was at once seen that the most delicate seamanship would now be required, for not only was the Jupiter's move detected, but the French ship k began to manœuvre to anticipate the attack by herself delivering the ram, and the chase was promptly joined by j, which had just succeeded in lodging a finishing shell in the Victorious (B).

All the three vessels, though one of them was sinking slowly, and all were more or less ruined, were intact in engines and funnels, and went careering in swift flight on evolutionary curves whose outcome only the nicest commanding skill could determine. To destroy a funnel of one or both—this was Captain MacLeod's hope. He started a rattle of quick-firing shot as the three vessels wheeled nearer. But there was a racket on board the Jupiter—a bursting shell—a clatter of broken plate—a stream of blood poured down John Hardy's face—Captain MacLeod fell limp and senseless at his feet.

At that moment from the conning-towers of both the French ships, there went forth the command: "Prepare to ram." The Jupiter was between them; and her captain was laid low.

But a born sailor was now in command of the Jupiter.

John Hardy coolly gave the order to slacken speed. With his eyes on both the hurrying, impending ships, he waited thirty, thirty-five seconds; and at the right fraction of a second, he gave the order: "Full steam ahead—quick!"

Digitized by Google

Blood covered his face, and the breeze in his hair gave him rather a look of wildness and disarray; but his pulses beat with absolute steadiness.

As the poop of the Jupiter slipped elusively away from between the two advancing rams, there arose a fearful outcry from both the French ships. But it was too late. No celerity of hand, no power on earth, could now avert the awful catastrophe. The two bows met, and crashed.

One of the French ships leant to port, as if fainting in despair, then languidly sank.

Was he really in command? Captain MacLeod lay at his feet. Who knew? Would not his, John Hardy's, commands be obeyed tacitly, if he tacitly assumed the command? And he, at least, was under no orders from the Rear-Admiral. He ordered the helm to be put three points to starboard, and full speed ahead. The Jupiter went hasting at once directly northward.

John was running from the fight.

The first clear necessity seemed to him now to get out of the battle, while the Jupiter's engines were still intact.

He suspected, indeed, that she was already slowly sinking. But there was still hope. She went ploughing northward. Her position on the outskirts of the battle favoured him.

Of what particular crime was it that he was guilty? He knew well that it was a crime. Was it treason, or piracy, or mutiny, or felony? The place which he now occupied should have been filled by the Commander of the Jupiter, now that her Captain was senseless. John Hardy knew that; but then he remembered that her commander was under flag-orders. He was not.

Three miles to the north of her former position he turned the ship's bow from north to north-east; three more miles, and he turned it from north-east to east. Now he breathed freely; the Jupiter was well beyond effective range of the battling ships yonder.

Her lights had long since been again put out. On she went through the darkness, east by south now, battered and broken in her upper works, but tolerably sound below—and with funnels still whole! and with a ram ploughing through the water at twenty miles an hour! and absolutely safe now from shot!

John Hardy stood in her conning-tower with the wind in his light hair, and the blood on his face, and a slight frown on his brow. And on through the darkness drove the silent battleship.

In little more than half-an-hour she was upon that hollow square of troopers and liners, which were here just gently forging through the water till the conclusion of the fight. There were thirty-eight of them, and they contained over 120,000 men.

Suddenly, out of the darkness, the Jupiter pounced upon them.

Has the reader ever seen a thoroughbred, long-snouted rat-terrier, the prize-winner perhaps at a dog-show, let loose in a small room among a hundred hoarded rats? With a gleeful, sudden spring he is among them as they scamper into a huddled heap in one corner, seeking to hide from the very sight of their little, leering eyes that countenance of wrath. He, for his part, gives one, and only one, swift crack at the bones of the neck, and then disdainfully drops the limp vermin, to go on to the next.

It was something in this way that the Jupiter dealt with these thirty-eight troopships and liners. One after another they cracked like tea-pots, they snapped like rotten twigs, they sank at a touch. Hardy rammed one on one side of the square, and went straight on and rammed another opposite; but in the rapid passage from opposite to opposite, he had sunk five with barbette and broadsides of quick-firing guns. The Jupiter rushed about among them like a fury, dashing through a multitude of complex evolutionary curves, and heaping havoc all around. It was a scene of unparalleled carnage. In a short time the ram of the Jupiter was forging through masses of bodies struggling in the water; what was left of the four sides of the square was shooting forth flames; and the Jupiter herself was being now swept by tempests of bullets from the land forces still afloat. Without visible result, however. Three only of the transports, which were sufficiently uninjured by the time they could get under speed, escaped. The rest went down.

It was now a question with John Hardy whether he could save the Jupiter from sinking by beaching her. She was already low by the stern, and the coast was miles away. The moment his awful work was ended, he gave the order to turn her bow directly northward.

He only just failed.

A quarter of a mile out from Brighton, he bent over Captain MacLeod, looked close into his eyes, and put his hand over his heart. The heart beat, but a splinter had gashed all the chest.

"Sir, sir," said John, "can you not——"

He shook the Captain. A moan came from the prostrate man; his eyes opened.

"Try to understand," said John; "you will have to swim, or be lost. Can you understand?"

The Captain stared stupidly, but nodded, and John stripped him hurriedly, then himself.

The next moment he gave the order:

"Hands to leap overboard and make for shore!"

There was nothing resembling a boat any longer left on board the Jupiter.

In two minutes three hundred bluejackets were in the water, and the Jupiter, left alone, took in a cascade of sea over her poop.

A bluejacket on one side of Captain MacLeod, and John on the other, were making slow progress forward. Toward ten o'clock they felt bottom beneath their feet; they dragged themselves forward, and fell fainting on Brighton beach.

(To be continued.)

HOW TO GET ANY BOOK YOU WANT.

Every week we shall give away half-a-dozen books.

All a competitor has to do is to send us one Book Coupon cut from The Sunday Reader, one from the Athletic Record, and one from Short Stories.

Send these to us in one envelope together with a request for any single book in the whole world of literature.

From the applications we receive we shall each week pick out six and send the books asked for.

All applications to be addressed to "BOOKS," Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please let me have: S. S.

Book.....

Price.....

Name.....

Address.....

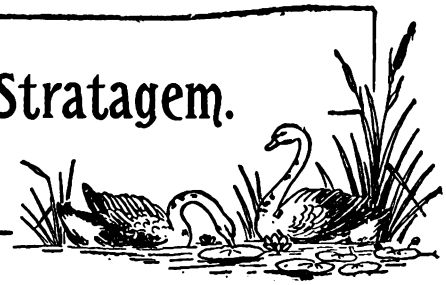
.....

RESULT FOR LAST WEEK.

John E. Long, Inland Revenue, Watlington, Tetsworth. "Walker's Political Economy." 12s. 6d. Mr. J. Begrie, 172, Causewayside, Edinburgh. "Bible Dictionary." 3s. 6d. Mr. S. Cottle, Clandowns Broadway, near Bath. "Strength." By Sandow." 2s. 6d. Mis, Blanche Roels, 12, Castle Square, Swansea. "Thelma." By Marie Corelli. 6s. P. Geraght, 13, Hauteville, Guernsey. "Murray's Logic Inductive and Deductive." By W. Minto. 4s. 6d. Thomas Ainsworth, 10, Raglan Street, Barrow-in-Furness. "Rome." By Emile Zola. (In English). 4s.

Digitized by Google

Love's Stratagem.



"I'M afraid," she said reflectively, "it can't be done."

"But why?" I urged. "There are a hundred reasons why it should be done, and not a single one for the negative side."

She looked at me gravely from under the fringe of her long dark lashes, but made no further reply; then began rocking herself slowly to and fro in the hammock. Now I, who had known her all her sweet, short life, knew that was a certain sign of mental disturbance, for usually she was as calmly, placidly reposeful and self-possessed as it is possible for an up-to-date 19th century girl to be; and I determined to push my advantage.

"Now see here, Mollie," I said, "it is not the fact that he is my friend that makes me beset you in this way" (it was not, indeed, but I saw no reason just then to state my inner motive), "but look at the matter reasonably, from this point of view. Where could one find a better fellow than dear old Tom? Clever, jolly, good-looking, rich and absolutely devoted to you. Knowing all this, can you look me in the face and say you are not ashamed of the way you are treating him?"

She did not look me in the face; she did worse—she laughed.

I went on severely: "Mollie, I am surprised that a girl of your sense and capabilities should descend to the level you have" (Mollie, I am glad to say, here cast upon me one startled look; at last I had succeeded in rousing her) "to the level of an unprincipled coquette."

The little rogue, instead of being impressed by my eloquence, looked immensely relieved as I concluded; still she vouchsafed no reply.

"Now, won't you promise me to think seriously of it, my dear girl?" I said persuasively.

She sat bolt upright now and looked me squarely in the eye, and as I looked I quailed, for there I saw no sign of yielding, only firm determination, and I shuddered as I thought how much I had at stake.

"Jim," she said, "you entirely overlook my avowed principles," with an air as if there could be nothing further in the matter to discuss. I, however, thought differently.

"And do you so dignify your absurd fancies?" I inquired, adopting as a last hope my most sarcastic tone of superiority.

"My absurd fancies!" she echoed, the light of battle flaming up in her lovely eyes and a scorn of all mankind curving her Cupid's bow of a mouth. Even as I trembled before her gaze I thought to myself that I had never seen her look prettier.

"And that is what you men call the striving of woman after something higher, nobler, better than what has been; that is how you look upon us when you no longer find us pliant to your tyrannical will—when we feel we must use the gifts God gave us for the good of the world, and not settle down into a fireside nonentity; And yet you ask me to marry one of these very men. Never, I tell you, never!"

She had got in all the points beautifully, but I groaned mentally, and inwardly reviled myself for my stupid blunder; but the little witch was provoking. By fair means or foul I must mollify her. I must win her to do as I wished. So I answered penitently:

"Forgive me, Mollie, my words were ill-chosen, and far be it from me to speak slightingly of a noble effort to uplift humanity on the part of anyone." (Humanity be hanged! My thought was only of a small, but very precious part of it). "Yet let me ask you if it is beneath the dignity of a beautiful girl like yourself"—Mollie's dimples showed for one fleeting second, but the embryo smile was sternly suppressed—"to cheer, uplift, and help a man who needs you infinitely more than struggling humanity as a whole, and is pitifully at a loss without you."

"That does sound sensible," she admitted reflectively. "Why didn't you talk to me like that before?"

"It is what I meant all the time," I answered. It was a lucky inspiration, yet, Heaven help me, I could not scruple at trifles at this critical point. "Surely you did not think I wanted you to give up your" (high-flown notions had almost escaped me, but I managed to change it in time to) "life mission; only to select for it some worthy object."

"In the shape of Tom?" she inquired, laughing. "Well," here she leaned towards me confidentially, "I don't mind telling you, Jim, for you've known me always, that I am rather fond of Tom, and I would be half inclined to give him what he wants if it were not for Kate. You know all about our plans together—how five of our class pledged ourselves, after we had graduated, to be true to our higher selves, to let nothing interfere with the faithful performance of our mission, and matrimony especially was not to be thought of till some real work was un fait accompli. Two of our little circle have basely gone over to the enemy, and poor Louise is dead, so that Kate and I are the only ones left. I'm terribly afraid I am not quite so much in earnest as I have been, but Kate is. Why, only yesterday she was speaking so seriously of all we must do and be to uphold our ideas. I simply do not dare to give up."

My heart was beating with a most joyous hope long before she had finished, but I traitorously hid it under a solemn countenance, and only said:

Digitized by Google

"But, Mollie, can you not explain to Kate's perfect satisfaction that your mission is making Tom so thoroughly happy and contented in his own home, and in so inspiring him by your sweet presence that he will put that bright mind of his to better work than devising means of winning you, as he has hitherto done, and so, in this way, do your work for humanity by proxy?"

"How well you put it, Jim, and how logical it sounds: And—yes, I'll just do it."

As she announced to me this altogether desirable news she settled herself once more comfortably in her hammock, only to jump up hastily the next moment and demand curiously:

"But why under the sun do you take such an immense amount of interest in the matter?"

I had been expecting this question, and was somewhat prepared, so I answered slowly:

"I suppose I'd better make a clean breast of it. You see, Kate felt much the same as you did, and I simply had to get you to give in before I see her to-night, for, as things have turned out now—well, we are to be married in June."

Reginald Horsley.

THE STORM—AND AFTER.

A PRAIRIE IDYL.

The prairies were growing dark. The moon had not risen, and the twilight had withdrawn till in the far west it stretched along the horizon a mere saffron glow. Off to the north lay a dense blackness. Few stars were visible. The night was sultry. It would rain before morning.

So thought Rack Todd, as he rose from his milking stool, and felt the darkness press down upon him. His thoughts had absorbed him, and he had not done the work well. The cows were all going dry. He knew from its weight that the pail in his hand was not half full.

"Even the dumb beasts go back on me!" he muttered, and thought bitterly of his blighted crops, his garden rank with weeds, his home bereft.

Had he been told that all this was due to a lack of the vigorous labour and sound judgment which in former years had made his fields and herds yield swiftly and abundantly, he would have answered truly that he had worked harder than now—toiling in the field from early morning till long after the sun had sunk. Alas, the corn had fallen with the weeds that day, while he had been staring straight ahead, trying to think of nothing, but only succeeding in going over and over his plots for bitter retribution.

The cows were but showing the effect of unskilful milkings. Rosie moved away as though she resented it. With a sudden spasm of rage, he flung the milk over her.

"Durn ye!" he roared, "a half loaf ain't better'n no bread! If I can't have all, I won't have none!"

"Daddy, daddy, I wants my milk!"

"All right!" groaned Rack. "Shet up! I'm gettin' your milk."

But she was not to be appeased. He had startled her from her nestling dreams by a fence-post, and covered with the soft moisture of slumber, the night struck her chill. She commenced crying in a whining, exasperating fashion, and he saw the faint glow of her light dress approaching. She held up her little tin cup saying over and over again: "I wants my milk! Daddy, I wants my milk!" ending in a wail.

Rack picked her up and shook her.

"Shet up, I tell ye! I'm a-gettin' your milk. Stop that hollerin', now nobody's hurtin' ye. There, there! Daddy never meant to! Ye ain't skeered of Daddy, air ye? Be a good girl, now, an' he'll get your milk right off."

"I wants my milk!" she wailed.

Rack put her down despairingly, and went to another cow. There were times when that sweet, whining baby voice threatened his reason.

The child pattered along till she found a steer drowsing comfortably over his cud. She hit him sharply on the back with her little tin cud. "Det up!" she commanded, and when he arose, she cuddled down in the warm place. She was a wise young woman, so far as her opportunites went, and not unlike her mother. She did not sleep again, but lay close, crooning something that was half wail, half song.

Rack found her there, and filled her cup again and again. She was very hungry. When she had finished, he put her over the fence and faced her towards the house.

"Get on Daddy's bed, and he'll undress ye when he comes in. Don't ye go and be skeered. There ain't nothin' to touch ye."

It was quite dark now; he could barely follow the gleam of her dress, but her sleepy, crooning voice came back to him.

"Heavens! whatever am I goin' to do!" he groaned, as he went back to his milking. A puff of air passed him. It would rain before midnight.

Soon the moon rose and battled with the angry clouds which slowly rolled about her. Since that one premonitory puff of air they had come on apace, sending no second warning. Now they covered all the heavens, save in that low corner in the East where the moon still held her own. Of the force which drove them, naught was heard or felt. Only where the East revealed it could the slow boiling and churning of their advance be seen. All else was tense with stillness. The storm might yet be an hour—half-hour distant.

Rack roused himself. He did not know how long he had sat there, his head bent forward, his hands idle.

"Thar's more wind than rain in them clouds—jest to spite me!" he said bitterly, thinking of his thirsty crops.

Digitized by Google

He had been late that spring with the planting, and his corn was in poor condition to stand the summer drought. Yet though he complained, it was to him of little moment whether the corn lived or died. His interest in it was purely fictitious, assumed because of the opportunity it gave him to voice his grudge against fate.

Yet in the past he had been a careful husbandman. To plant and reap, and play his small domestic part, had been the sum of his desires. To this end he had slaved and hoarded till the farm was his own. To this end his rustic wooing had prospered, and he had married "the prettiest girl on the Kaw."

His satisfaction had been complete. He had not dreamed that the vanities and frailties of his kind could touch him. He hardly knew that such things were, till he suddenly found himself chief actor in a tragedy, a rôle for which he was but poorly fitted. His impulse had been that of a savage—to strike out, to tear, to crush. But each effort, returning upon himself, numbed him with the knowledge of his own impotency, and he fell to reviling the weather, the crops, the door against which he stumbled, in fact, everything. For the woman who had forsaken him he had only a large contempt that forbade her all part in his scheme for vengeance.

"Such a useless, triflin' critter," as she had proved herself to be! He did not want to see or hear of her again. But for him.

"O Lord, give me my chance! give me my chance!" he cried.

His prayer brought him to his feet. With a cry he started backward, for she stood so close beside him that he had almost touched her.

The moonlight rested on her, and showed her tall and slim, yet lowly, as she bent before him.

"Get out o' this yard! Get off o' my place!" he panted.

"O, Rack, I ain't got nowhere to go!"

Her voice held the same sweet, irresponsible, complaining note as did the voice of the child. For the moment it strangled him, and his hand clutched his throat.

"Don't ye try to come that game on me! Don't ye!" he threatened. "Why don't ye go back?"

Then he saw that she was sobbing. A snarl of laughter tore his lips.

"He ain't got tired of ye already, has he? I'm a dummy, a greenhorn, a hayseed! He was more your kind. Told ye to go home to the ole man, an' your leetle girl, an' if she wa'n't dead yet fur want of a mother's care, to do your duty by her! Set her a good example. Whar's all the fine things he promised you?"

The moonbeams fell pitilessly upon her, revealing all her want and woe.

"You're a pretty picture! Get out o' my sight afore I kill ye."

Yet when he realised that she was going, he sprang after her: "Whar is he?"

"He's dead."

Her sobbing commenced afresh.

"I ain't eat nothin' to-day, an' I've come afar!" she wailed.

It was as if the woman had struck him, and he could not strike back. Ah, it was hard to be thus early cut off from every hope of the vengeance for which he had spent sleepless nights and fevered days, for which he had neglected his crops, for which the cows had gone dry! He did not want the interference of Death. How many times he had said that "killin' was too good for him!"

And now he was beyond the reach even of that!

"I'm hungry and I've come far!"

"Ye can't get nothin' hyar! Ye can't knock my plans on the head in that way. I'm a greenhorn, but I ain't quite so green as that!"

She leant against the fence and cried softly. She looked frail and weak. Rack stalked away. Then he whirled round.

"Thar's cold potatoes an' milk in the safe. Ye can help yeself."

When he reached the house, she was close behind him. The moon gave way then, and the clouds close over.

Rack paid no more attention to her. She hesitated a moment on the threshold while he struck a light, but seeing that he did not—would not—notice her that she had received all the invitation she was likely to get, she went timidly to the safe and opened it. Then she forgot everything, and ate ravenously.

Rack watched her furtively. She had been a dainty eater. Somehow this rapid, indiscriminate eating went farther than penitence towards atoning for her sin.

And in the yellow lamplight how pitiful a figure! Her dress was torn to tatters; her shoes were worn through; her hair was all dishevelled, an ugly scar, already healed, branded her forehead; there were hollows in her face where once there had been curves. Soiled lines streaked her cheeks, for she had wept many times that day. And in spite of all, she was a pretty woman. Almost was her beauty sufficient excuse for her being.

She noticed after a time that Rack was undressing the baby. How awkward, how helpless he was. The child was asleep, and lay, pink and moist, a dead weight on his lap. Its head and arms slipped and fell limply, yet how tender his touch. With a fawning motion, the wife crept to him.

"Let me do it," she said.

"If ye've et all ye want, ye'd better be movin'. There's going to be a storm."

"O, Rack, let me touch her. I jest wan' to tech her an' I'll go willin'."

"Naw. I don't want no foolishness. It's time fer ye to go. Ye can't stay hyar."

She went meekly. That was one of her virtues—meekness.

The storm was fast approaching. Gusts of wind shook the house, and were followed by ominous silence. Through the open door Rack saw the clouds lurid with dun and amber, whirling forward. The air was full of an electric glow, though there had been no flash.

Against that ghastly splendour, her physical form towered as black and tragic as her spiritual one. The clouds surged downward to embrace, engulf her. Another step, and she would be as one with them.

He forgot aught but the perilous moment. "Come back! Come!" he shouted, springing after her. With one hand he pulled her in, and with the other closed the door, against which, in another moment, the storm hurled itself.

The wind lulled towards morning. Rack, huddled against the window, listened to the regular breathing of the child and its mother. From without came the crackling of the young, growing corn, and he knew there would be harvest, and planting, and harvest again, for the rain fell steadily, plenteously.

B. Bridgman.

Digitized by Google

THE TOWER-KEEPER'S DAUGHTER.

The evening shadows were gathering in the narrow streets of a small town near Schaffhausen, when a young man, dressed as a peasant, and bearing the traces of travel and exposure upon him, limped wearily into one of the taverns in a side street. His right arm was in a roughly improvised sling, and his whole appearance was that of a man who was suffering both in mind and body.

He ordered some food and shrank back into the darkest corner of the smoky parlour, without taking any notice of the two or three other men who were drinking and smoking round the hearth.

The inn-keeper's daughter, a bright, healthy girl of eighteen, soon brought the simple meal he had asked for, and setting a candle on the table before him, stood prepared to see him enjoy it.

"Take that away," he said, pointing to the light. "It hurts my eyes, I've been ill."

Instead of obeying this peremptory command she lifted the candle so as to be better able to see the face of her guest, and, after a careful examination, she said saucily:

"Your face doesn't match your clothes. Unless I'm very much mistaken, you're no peasant."

Her delicate flattery was quite lost upon him, and without more ado he jumped up and blew out the offending light. The girl turned away laughing merrily, and the surly stranger continued his supper.

A few moments later he noticed that the men at the other end of the room were taking an evident interest in him and that one of them was talking to the girl in a low tone, accompanied by looks and gestures that certainly pointed to his being the subject of the conversation. Then he caught the words:

"Rather suspicious, eh? Perhaps he's one of the insurgents, and if so we might make a nice little sum by handing him over to the authorities."

With these words the speaker rose and took a step towards the young man, who instantly sprang to his feet and made a dash for the door. Before the others had recovered from their surprise he had disappeared in the darkness, and only the sound of his retreating footsteps gave them any clue as to the way he had gone.

A hue-and-cry was raised, and in an incredibly short time a crowd of men, women, and children were chasing wildly through the usually quiet streets, some carrying torches, others brandishing the first weapon they could lay their hands on, and all shouting at the tops of their voices.

Meanwhile, the victim was hurrying down a narrow alley under cover of a high wall, and his strength was fast failing him.

He paused an instant to gain breath, and as he did so, a dark form came towards him, and a hand was laid on his arm.

"Are you an insurgent? Are they after you?" asked a woman's voice quickly.

"Let me go!" he muttered, and twisted himself from her grasp. But she was not to be daunted, and seizing him firmly again, she whispered:

"Come with me, I can save you."

He felt himself drawn on a few paces, and through a low door in the wall into a quiet grass-grown inclosure. They were only just in time, for as the heavy little door closed behind him, locking itself as it did so, he heard the trampling of feet, and the discord of many voices as his pursuers turned into the lane he had just left. One or two of them tried the door, behind which crouched the young man and his unknown deliverer, but it resisted their efforts, and they passed on. One man said as he did so:

"The gate is fast, and the wall's too high to climb, so he can't have got in there; but I could have sworn he came this way."

Digitized by Google

When the sound of voices had died away the girl rose to her feet, and, taking her companion by the hand, said:

"I dare not light my lantern, but I can lead you to a safe place for the present. Come; we have no time to lose."

He went with her, feeling dazed and bewildered, with hardly strength to realise the sudden change in his position. They crossed the grass, and reached another door which stood at the base of a tall, massive building, which loomed far above them in the semi-darkness. Then they mounted a winding stone staircase, the girl going before, and the man painfully making the ascent some little distance behind her. At last they reached the top, and he saw the light shine out from an open door, and the figure of an old man stand out against it.

"Well, Linda, I was wondering what had kept you," said a kindly voice.

"Yes, father, I know I'm late; but I'll tell you all about it when you've let us in and shut the door behind us," she answered mysteriously.

Half-an-hour later, the three were sitting round the supper-table in the quaint octagon room that had been the home of Hans Toralt and his daughter Gerlind ever since the latter had seen the light of day. The old man was custodian of the ancient belfry, and, having lost his wife soon after their child's birth, he had preferred to live on in the eyrie-like dwelling to which he had brought his bride. The stranger, now rested and refreshed, explained to his deliverers how he came to be in such a plight. It was the summer of 1849, when Germany was rent by civil factions, and a fierce struggle for political reforms was going on. Alban Hartland, a student and a patriot, had embraced the cause of independence; and, taking up the sword instead of the pen, had been left for dead on the field after one of the engagements, which terminated disastrously for his cause.

Through the kindness of the peasants in the Black Forest, he had been nursed back to something like health, and enabled to make his way without detection thus far in the direction of the Swiss frontier. The events which led to his meeting with Gerlind were soon told, and he threw himself upon the mercy of his host.

"Though I am too old to take an active part in the contest," said Toralt, "my whole sympathies go with you, and I am proud to think my little girl should have been of service to one who has been wounded in the cause of freedom."

"The little girl" was in reality a tall, fair damsel of seventeen, with a fresh, young face, and merry, honest blue eyes, which looked with no common admiration at the hero she had befriended.

It was decided that Hartland should be allowed a few hours sleep, and then be concealed till the search should be over, and they could mature plans for getting him across the frontier.

Toralt looked out of the window before going to bed, and saw that there were guards bearing torches stationed at intervals round the church below, and he felt sure that in the morning his premises would be subjected to examination. The government had set a price on the heads of the insurgents, and the strictest watch was being kept upon all the frontiers to prevent the escape of the rebels. It was a dangerous position, both for the fugitive and his benefactors, but the old man was resolved to risk all, if needs be, for the safety of his guest.

After a few hours of restful sleep Alban was awakened by Gerlind's voice telling him it was four o'clock, and time to get up.

He had thrown himself down the previous night just as he was, too crippled and exhausted to remove his clothes; so, with a feeble attempt to rearrange his disordered garments, he was soon ready for the simple, but tempting breakfast which he found waiting for him. When and where Gerlind herself had slept was a mystery to him, for she had given up her own room to him, and the accommodation in the tower was distinctly limited. The girl only laughed when he asked how she had fared, and bade him waste no time, but eat all he could, as it was doubtful when he would get anything more.

"Now, follow me," she said, when she thought he had done sufficient justice to the repast. "Father is waiting for you."

She drew back a panel which disclosed a steep spiral staircase, and began to mount it with all the assurance of long familiarity. At the top stood Toralt with a light in his hand, and Alban found himself among the cobwebs and ghostly shadows of the belfry itself. The great, deep-voiced bells hung from massive beams beneath him, and the faint rays of the growing dawn struggled through the narrow slits in the masonry, revealing the dark abyss which seemed ready to engulf them.

The old man led the way across one of the beams, carrying with him a short ladder.

At first Alban hesitated to trust himself on such a perilous path, but the sight of Gerlind walking over an even narrower beam shamed him, and as he started off, rather uncertainly it is true, she shouted out kind, encouraging injunctions to him to walk as if he were in the middle of the road and then he would be all right.

They reached the other side safely, and then Toralt pointed to a dark recess above their heads, against which he had placed the ladder, saying:

"There is just room enough for a man there, but you must curl your legs up and not make a sound when they come to look for you, as I know they will. As soon as it is safe I will fetch you down and get a doctor to dress your wound."

With some difficulty Alban Hartland did as he was told, and if his heart sank when the ladder was withdrawn, his spirits were soon revived by Gerlind's cheery promise to come and see him as soon as she dare. With a smile, she raised the light and took a last look at him in his dusky hiding-place before following her father down to their rooms.

For some time he sat there, thinking over the chain of events that had led him into this situation, and through all the scenes of the past few months, the blue eyes of his latest benefactress seemed to drive into the back-ground even the high aims of his patriotic dreams. After vainly endeavouring to chase away this sentimental fancy, of which he was half ashamed in his own mind, for hitherto his life had been devoted to the pursuit of learning rather than that of pleasure, and the frolics of his fellow students had possessed no attraction for him, an ominous sound from the tower below brought back the sense of danger and fear of discovery.

Men's voices and the rattling of swords were distinctly audible to his keen ear, and in a few moments he heard heavy steps ascending the staircase leading to the belfry. He dare not look, he dare hardly breathe; but he heard them say as they reached the top:

"Well, he doesn't seem to be here, unless he's hanging on inside one of the bells, and he won't stop there long."

Digitized by Google

"Perhaps there's a hole on the other side there," said another voice, "shall I go over and see?"

Hartland nearly bit his lips through to prevent his teeth from chattering as he heard this suggestion, but to his infinite relief the prompt answer came:

"No, man, what are you thinking of? If you want to put an end to yourself, kindly do it when you're off duty."

They went down grumbling at the disappearance of the man who had so mysteriously escaped from their grasp, and in a few minutes all was quiet again.

In the middle of the day Hartland had a long visit from Gerlind, who brought him some food tied to the end of a pole which she put up within his reach, and while he ate his dinner she sat on the beam and chatted to him as if she had known him all her life. He told her of his own lonely life, that he was an orphan without brothers or sisters, and how he should have to live in exile probably for the rest of his life. Her voice softened, and he fancied there must be tears in her eyes as she tried to comfort him, and asked how his arm had been hurt and whether he was suffering much pain.

"There is a bullet in it, and if I lose the use of my right arm my whole career will be spoilt, unless I can learn to write with my left hand," he answered sadly.

He then went on to tell her of his ambition to become a great writer and, if possible, to effect with his pen what he had failed to further with his sword.

That evening, when he had been released from his hiding-place, Toralt fetched a doctor whom he knew to be friendly to the patriotic cause, and he examined the wound.

He pronounced it to be the work of a spent bullet, which had not penetrated far and could easily be extracted.

Dr. Reichardt was a brisk, practical little man, and while Gerlind was getting the necessary things for the operation he was discussing with the two men plans for Hartland's escape from the town, promising to lend what assistance he could in the matter.

The ball was soon extracted, and Gerlind proved a very capable nurse in the matter of holding and bathing the injured arm, and her sympathetic touch seemed to lessen the pain by awakening counter sensations in the region of the patient's heart.

"Let me see the cause of my misery," said Alban as she was clearing away the traces of the operation.

Gerlind made him no answer, and when he repeated his request she said carelessly:

"Oh, I should think you have had enough of that horrid thing," and passed out of the room without another word.

That evening it was arranged that Hartland should be dressed up as a peasant woman in some of the late Frau Toralt's clothes, happily she had been a tall woman, and on the following night he was to go with Gerlind to the frontier under pretence of carrying a basket of clean linen to the next village.

They had a good laugh over the vain attempts Hartland made to fathom the mysteries of female attire, and more than once Gerlind had to come to the rescue to save her mother's garments from being torn to shreds in his struggles. Some alterations were found to be necessary, so Gerlind set herself to work the next morning to make the dress look presentable. They were chatting pleasantly together, for the old man had gone out to make arrangements for their meeting the doctor that night, when the girl's quick ear caught the sound of footsteps coming up the tower steps.

With one bound she opened the bedroom door, motioned Hartland into the tiny room, and locked him in just as a knock was heard outside. She went and held a whispered conversation with the visitor, who seemed somewhat unwilling to go, till at last Alban heard her say:

"If you want me to go out with you to-morrow, you must let me do my sewing to-day, or I shall have nothing to wear."

This fearful threat appeared to take effect and the visitor departed. Hartland knew it was a man, and the words he had heard sent a chill through his heart. He looked keenly at the girl's flushed face as she came to let him out.

"That was a narrow shave," she panted.

"Why, who was it?"

"Oh, one of the guards—a very old friend of ours," she added with a touch of embarrassment. "I knew he would stay till father came back if I let him in, and he might have heard you."

A look of wistful fear passed over her face as she said this, and Alban was at a loss whether to connect her change of manner with anxiety for himself or annoyance with the would-be intruder. Seeing that she did not seem inclined to talk he offered to read aloud, and looked through her small stock of books, full of wonder and pity at the mental starvation in which she must have been brought up. At last he selected a volume of poems and began reading. They were not such as to appeal to him, being of the sentimental kind affected by young girls and love-lorn spinsters, but he read well, and when he paused to look at his listener he felt sorry he had put so much expression into his voice.

Gerlind had dropped her work and was looking out of the window at the distant snow-clad mountains with all her young soul in her eyes. It was the look of a bird that has just learnt the use of its wings and finds the bars of a cage interposed between it and the freedom it craves.

He turned over the pages and looked for something more cheerful, but as he read on, the disquieting thought forced itself upon him that he would not leave this bright, sunny girl as happy as he had found her. Was it only pity in her heart for him, or had he unwittingly aroused some deeper feeling? He could not take her with him even if he wished to do so, and he was not at all sure that his gratitude carried him so far as to contemplate an alliance with an uneducated girl. It was with a sense of relief that he heard her father's voice calling to her from without.

The night was dark and stormy, rain fell at intervals, and the wind raged round the old tower more like an autumn gale than a summer storm. All was ready for Alban's departure, and he was saying a few last words to his host when the latter remarked:

"I'm sorry we could not keep you longer, but we dare not, for to-morrow is a holiday, and Gerlind's future husband always spends it with us. He is in the guards, and is one of those who was looking for you that night. We have known him a long time, and he's very fond of my Linda, so I want to see them married before I die."

Now the whole thing was clear to Hartland's mind. This explained Gerlind's agitation in the morning, and also threw a painful light on the passionate yearning in her eyes after he had read the love poem to her. She did not love this man, he felt sure, and yet his lips were sealed, he could not speak to her now; as with the contrariness of human nature he felt he should like to do.

Digitized by Google

He took leave of the old man and started off with Gerlind carrying the basket between them. They went through the principal street to avoid exciting suspicion, and passed on till they came within sight of the low wooden house that stood at the toll-gate.

"We'll wait here for the doctor," said Gerlind quietly, and her voice sounded strained and unlike her usual merry tone. They had not spoken to each other, except when necessary, since they had left the tower. In fact neither had the heart for it, and Alban had his face muffled up in a scarf.

The officer in charge of the gate wished them good-night, and invited Gerlind to come in and rest, but she refused, saying they were only waiting for her cousin to take breath before they went on again.

To her intense relief the doctor drove up at that minute and thus diverted the man's attention from them.

"Good evening, doctor, you've a nasty night for your drive."

"Yes, Herr Inspecktor, I have, and I'm in a hurry. A bad case is waiting for me."

The gate was thrown open, and Gerlind, making a sign to Alban, prepared to pass through beside the carriage; but the man stopped them and again asked their business. While she was explaining that her cousin had the toothache and was in a hurry to get home, the doctor, who had fixed a thorn on the end of his whip, touched up his horse, and the animal began plunging violently. The inspector went to the horse's head and tried to quiet him; but he only kicked and struggled more than ever, so that both life and property seemed in danger. Under cover of this exciting episode, Alban and Gerlind were able to pass the boundary unnoticed by the breathless official.

"Now you're safe," panted Gerlind when they had run some distance, "and I must go," she added, with a little sigh.

She helped him out of his dress, and took the silk handkerchief he had worn round his neck with her; the rest she threw over a hedge.

"Good-bye," she added quickly; "you'll find shelter in the village," and before he had time to answer she was gone.

She next moment she was at his side again, and he felt her arms clasped round his neck and her lips pressed to his own. He tried to hold her in his arms; but she was too quick for him, and this time she did not return.

After this Fortune favoured Alban Hartland. He made many friends during his exile, and was able to prosecute his studies under most advantageous circumstances; but he never forgot Gerlind, and when, a few years later, he was permitted to return to his own country, the first place he visited was the old frontier town.

He went to the church and heard from the new custodian that both Toralt and his daughter were dead. They showed him her grave, and from its simple inscription he learnt that she had only lived a year after that memorable night, and that she died unmarried.

He sought out the old woman who had nursed her, and found her very willing to talk about her foster-child:

"Ah, poor Gerlind! She was never strong, and one night she got wet through and was never the same again. It was consumption, like her mother. And the poor child's mind was quite queer before she died. She made me promise to bury her near the little gate, and to put a book of verses and a leaden bullet in her coffin. She never let those two things out of her hands for months before she died. Her old father just broke his heart after her. Poor Linda! She was like my own child."

MARY FERMOR.

JOHN JONAS WILKINSON is a respectable citizen. He has a charming home, a lovable wife, and the cleverest and best baby in town. He has put aside forever all dissipations of his bachelor days—the friendly drink, the other drink, and the eventual cab ride when the frost is beginning to appear on the pavements in the early morning light. He has but one fault, and that one came near his undoing a short time ago. He contracted the Kodak habit, and was unable to break himself of it. Shortly after marriage Wilkinson took his wife to visit a friend who was an enthusiastic amateur photographer. The friend Thomas has four Kodaks, and his bathroom had been converted into a dark room for developing films and plates. His mantelpieces and tables were decorated with Kodak pictures of himself and wife and his baby, his friends and his dog, his house and his bicycles, and other things that Wilkinson never dreamt could be learnt, and before the evening was over he took Wilkinson over into the dark room and initiated him into the mysteries of developing a Kodak film.

Digitized by Google

That settled it with Wilkinson. On the way home he confided to his wife that he intended getting a Kodak and seeing what he could do with it. Two days later he had a big Kodak in the parlour and was striving to make a snap shot of the squirming baby. The fever raged violently as the weeks rolled on, and he began to get results from the experiment. He, too, rigged up a dark room and tried to develop films, but he did not get the go of the thing just right, and was obliged to send most of his work to a city photographer to be finished. The expense was considerable, but when the house began to blossom with pictures that he had taken himself, Wilkinson felt amply repaid. Wilkinson has a friend, a worldly young man, who has thus far escaped the matrimonial meshes, and therefore travels the pace a trifle faster than that of the respectable Wilkinson.

Wilkinson always liked Burrows, though, and has been inclined to condone his numerous offences and escapades for the memory of the good times they once had together. He looks with a mildly reproving eye upon the company Burrows keeps, and never tells his wife about it, but he likes his old chum as well as ever. Two weeks ago Burrows dropped into Wilkinson's office, and, after a chat, observed that he would like to borrow a camera.

"There's a few of us going to have a little luncheon," said Burrows. "Some of the best fellows you ever knew, John, and they are going to bring the girls along, you know, and I thought it would be a good scheme to take a few snap shots at the table and that sort of thing, you know just as a memento."

"Still at the same old game are you?" said Wilkinson laughingly. "Burrows, you ought to settle down, you know, and drop that sort of thing. Really, my boy, you are getting along in years and you ought to be settled in life."

"Never mind that now—let me have the camera," said Burrows. "I'll settle down as soon as I am able to settle up."

"All right," said Wilkinson, "there it is. When you get through I will have the pictures developed for you."

That was how the thing started. Two days later Burrows sent the camera over by a messenger boy, and Wilkinson took it home that night, when it was laid away and forgotten for awhile. One bright Sunday morning Wilkinson had nothing in particular to do and chanced to observe a picturesque pose of the baby.

"That would make a grand picture," he whispered to his wife. "See if you keep him that way while I get the camera."

In a minute or two he had the black box levelled at the baby and had pressed the button. Mrs. Wilkinson changed the pose slightly and adjusted things so she could be in the picture, and again the shutter flashed and there was another photograph in the box. Two more followed, and then the roll was exhausted, and Wilkinson turned to a Sunday paper.

The next day, on his way to business, he stopped at the office of the photographer who did his developing work, and left the roll with the orders that four reprints be made of everything that came out well in development, and for weeks he thought nothing more of it. Then came his Waterloo.

One fatal morning when he was in a hurry to get away, his wife asked about the baby's portraits that he had taken.

"Oh, yes, I had forgotten them," he said. "They must be finished by this time. Suppose you drop in while you are shopping to-day and get them. Have them charged to me."

That afternoon Mrs. Wilkinson hurried into the establishment of the photographer and asked for the photographs.

"Ah, that roll Mr. Wilkinson left. Here it is—some good results too."

He had proceeded thus far with his compliments of the amateur's skill when a shriek from Mrs. Wilkinson startled him. She was holding at arm's length a photograph of a girl leaning on the back of the chair, with a cigarette on her smiling lips.

"This is not my husband's roll, is it?" she demanded.

"Oh yes, ma'am! there can be no mistake," said the photographer in alarm. "See, here is the name Wilkinson on the envelope. There were just twelve pictures, and they are all here."

Mrs. Wilkinson's eyes flashed as she picked up the portrait of another girl holding aloft a glass of champagne and sitting before a well-stocked table. There were other pictures of strange young men with their arms round the willing necks of strange young women, and in amongst them were the innocent little pictures of the baby on the floor of the Wilkinsons' home.

"Nothing wrong, I hope?" asked the photographer, with much concern.

"Oh, no—nothing at all," said Mrs Wilkinson, with icy calmness, and a queer pretence at a laugh. "I'll just take these, and you may charge them to my husband."

When John Jonas Wilkinson reached home that evening and walked briskly in, he found his wife sitting on a trunk in the parlour. Near her was a packed handbag. She was pale and calm.

"What on earth is the matter?" he asked, gazing at these preparations for a journey. "Is your mother ill?"

"Mr. Wilkinson," said his wife, in firm, hard tones, "I am about to leave your house for ever. Before I go, I wish to tell you why I am going, and what I think of you. I would not run away while you were absent. I wish to let you know all about it."

While this astounding speech was being made, Wilkinson fell back against the door and feebly gasped for breath. His first thought was that his poor wife had gone mad.

"What on earth are you talking about?" he demanded.

"You know all about it," said Mrs. Wilkinson, "you and your wine-bibbing, cigarette-smoking friends! I don't care to discuss that question, but I wanted to inform you that I am going to my mother, and I am going to take baby. Any personal letters which come to me I trust you will be gentleman enough to forward, although I am beginning to doubt whether you have a spark of manliness left in you."

That almost finished Wilkinson. He gasped a few times and finally induced his indignant wife to explain. She showed him the Kodak pictures with a weary smile, observing that they admitted of no argument, they spoke for themselves.

And before he could induce her to unpack her trunk and handbag he was obliged to telegraph for Burrows and have that hopeless rake come to the house and swear to everything about the borrowed Kodak, the wine supper and entire innocence of Wilkinson. Now there is light in the dark room. James Unit.

Digitized by Google

THE GOLD MAGNET.

By GEORGE GRIFFITH.

Author of "Valdar the Oft-Born," "Briton or Boer?" "The Outlaws of the Air," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

An Interlude at Home.

About four months had passed since, as everyone concerned in the action off Samana Bay firmly believed, the Minnehaha, with all the marvellous possibilities that she had carried, had sunk in fragments to the bottom of the Atlantic. The Pocahontas had reached Kingston in a somewhat battered condition as to her masts, funnels, and upper works and with six dead and fourteen wounded on board of her. Two of her lighter guns, and three of her machine-guns were put out of action and three of her boats had been torn to splinters by the accurate fire of the dynamite guns, but happily her hull and her splendid engines were intact and, but for some bad rents in her funnels, her steaming power was as good as ever.

From Jamaica, after she had been refitted as far as possible, she steamed to the Cay on which the first scene of this narrative opened, and there, after a thorough search, aided by the chart which Tristam had obtained from Arthur Pendril, the old Spanish treasure ship was located and dug out. The treasure proved to be even more valuable than was anticipated. It consisted mainly of gold bars and a considerable quantity of ancient gold vessels and ornaments of unmistakable Inca origin, and nearly four pounds weight of magnificent emeralds, rubies, sapphires, turquoises and diamonds, some roughly cut and polished, but the majority of them as they came from the mine. Altogether the Pocahontas, including her cargo, was worth nearly four hundred thousand pounds more when she steamed away from the little island than she had been when she first sighted it.

The British Government, in consideration of the great service which, as was believed, had been performed in ridding the seas of the formidable Minnehaha, waived such claim as it might have had on the treasure-trove, and a considerable portion of the gold ware was equally divided between the British Museum and the United States Archæological Museum at Washington. The wounded men and the families of those who had been killed were splendidly provided for by the generosity of Tristam and Courtland, who, by-the-way, nearly quarrelled seriously over the sharing of the spoils.

Tristam and his wife wanted to insist on an equal division of what remained after the crew had received their promised shares—to which Courtland replied that he had got all he wanted in the fun and the glory, and that anyhow a few hundred thousand dollars didn't matter to a man who had already more millions than he knew how to spend. The dispute, however, was at length happily settled to the satisfaction of all concerned by a conversation of a strictly private nature which took place between Courtland and Miss Gwynneth Harley a few days after their return to England, and in a subsequent conversation with Tristam and his wife it was arranged that Courtland's share should be handed over to Miss Harley on her wedding-day.

The Pocahontas had been sent round to Elswick for a thorough refit, and on the evening of the day on which the compromise had been affected a very jolly little party of four was sitting over the remnants of a comfortable little family dinner in the room in the old house in Gower Street in which the tragedy of the Gold Magnet had begun. Their travels and adventures in the West were still fresh enough to form a very pleasant subject of conversation amidst the quiet and solid comfort of the English home to which Muriel Tristam had so gladly returned. It was not the first time that they had talked them over, and it would probably not be the last, but the subject was none the less interesting on that account.

"Well, as I have said before," said Muriel putting down her coffee-cup, "I think it was after all very fortunate that we did not get the Gold Magnet back. It was not the sort of thing that any ordinary human being ought to have possessed, and I suppose that is why I was superstitious enough to think there was some curse attached to it. Just look what a story it had the little time it was in the world! No one touched it or even saw it without committing some crime or coming to some miserable end. I wonder what really happened to poor Langton and that unhappy boy?"

"I'm afraid it can't have been anything very choice, seeing what hands they fell into; but it's all over now and it's no good thinking about that, anyhow," said Courtland with a glance across the table at Gwynneth, who was looking down at her dessert plate in rather ominous silence. "There's no fun in opening up accounts like that again, but I'm afraid, Mrs. Tristam, I can hardly agree with you about not getting that Gold Magnet back. If I didn't think it was at the bottom of the Atlantic, I'd hunt the world over for it."

"But," said Gwynneth, looking up, "what good would it be to you when you confessed, as you did the other day, to having more millions than you know what to do with. I really can't see why a man who is as disgracefully rich as you are can want to go wasting his time treasure-hunting."

"Except as a means of varying the monotony of the average honeymoon," laughed Tristam with a glance at his wife. "What's your opinion, dear? Don't you think that on the whole we had what our friend Courtland here would call quite a royal time of it?"

"No, I don't," she said with a not very successful attempt at severity. "In fact I consider that, to a certain extent, you married me under false pretences. You know I objected even to the treasure-hunt, but if I had known there was to be pirate chasing and a naval battle thrown in I should certainly have declined with thanks."

"I don't believe it!" said Gwynneth decisively. "Besides,

Digitized by Google

Leigh didn't know anything about the fighting, and you know you wouldn't stop behind when you had the chance to."

"Of course not," laughed Muriel. "A nice sort of adventurer's wife I should have made if I had done. But come now, Mr. Courtland, what would you do with the Magnet if you had it?"

"Well, I don't know that I could tell you right away," he replied. "I suppose I should start out and get the biggest accumulation of gold together that ever was seen in one place. Then I guess I should sit down beside it and think what I was going to do with it. Why, a man who could do that, you know, might have the commerce of the world at his mercy, if he only knew how to run the thing properly."

"There spoke the true American!" said Tristam. "I suppose you wouldn't have any objection to corner the whole gold-supply of the world if you could?"

"That's so," observed Courtland, as though the proposition were quite an ordinary one. "I'd corner the force of gravitation if I could. In fact, I wouldn't mind getting an option on the light and heat of the sun and then renting them out to the planets. I just glory in business on a big scale, you know, not for the dollars, but for the pure fun of the game."

"But I suppose," said Gwynneth, "you would begin in a quiet way by satisfying our curiosity about old Don Christoval's treasure-chest. I wonder if poor little Jessie and that scoundrel Lorrain really found it. D'you know I can't help wishing that she hadn't been on board that horrible little ship when she went down. I'm sure it was that wretch of a Spaniard who made her as bad as she was. Doesn't it seem extraordinary when one remembers her going about her work so demurely and quietly as she did, and then having such wonderful adventures and coming to such an end all within a few weeks as it were! I dare say if we had taken her prisoner or something of that sort she might have repented and given us the Magnet back, and then I should have liked to go and find that treasure-chest."

"My dear Gwyn," said Courtland, "if you have any fancy for Santo Domingo as a place to spend a honeymoon in I shall have great pleasure in buying the river Ozama and having it dug up from the source to the sea, and then making you a wedding-present of the chest when we find it, though personally I think we should get more fun out of another sort of treasure-hunt along Bond Street or Regent Street to-morrow."

"Yes," said Tristam, "I think that's more like it under the circumstances. Let's go and see how Streeter's getting on with the setting of those gems and indulge in the luxury of a little glittering extravagance. We can do that with some satisfaction now, and there's certainly this in it, that if we had got the Gold Magnet back we should all have become such bloated Croesuses that Bond Street wouldn't have been anything more to us than the Lowther Arcade."

"I think that will do for the present," said Gwynneth, with a sparkle of pleasurable anticipation in her eyes. "What do you think, Muriel?"

"I think it's a very good idea indeed," she said. "I'm simply dying to spend some money. You'd better come upstairs with me, Gwyn, and we'll talk over our respective wants."

When the two girls had gone, Courtland and Tristam drew their chairs to the fire and got out their cigars. When he had got his fairly alight, Courtland said:

"Well now, old man, as Gwynneth and I have fixed that little matter up satisfactorily, suppose you give me that bit of family history that you promised me some time ago. Of course it isn't going to make any difference to me, as I'm not going to marry any of Gwyn's ancestry to speak of, but a man naturally likes to hear something about the family that he proposes to perpetuate along with his own."

"Very naturally," said Tristam, "and of course you ought to know it. You'll certainly find this peculiarity in it, that while the men have been a remarkably hard lot, just as old Sir Arthur himself was, the women have been everything that English gentlewomen should be. In fact, as far as I know, the only serious fault that can be laid to the charge of any of them, is the mésalliance into which her present ladyship managed to stumble. Poor old girl, I wonder what she's thinking about the end of that precious daughter of hers. There's one thing, Miss Jessie represented the one strain of base blood in the family, and I suppose there's not much fear now of her transmitting it to posterity."

"I can't honestly say that I'm sorry," said the other. "Even if she escaped hanging or imprisonment she'd hardly have been the sort of relation a man would have cared to take round very extensively among his friends, although there are some people in the States who'd go clean mad over her. I don't suppose there's a paper in New York that wouldn't give her a hundred thousand dollars for her life, if she was alive to write it. It would be about the finest bit of copy they had had since the time that they filled columns with telling what size collar young Lord Craven wore, what sort of ink he marked his linen with, and how much of the bottoms of his trousers he turned up. Well, go ahead."

For the next half hour or so Tristam went on giving him the history of the Pendril family as far as he knew it, and that was pretty fully; but there were one or two details that he left out, and he ended his story with the death of Sir Arthur and the re-instatement of the present Lady Jessica Pendril in the old home which would now be Gwynneth's when she died.

"Well, yes," said Courtland after a little pause when he had finished, "the men do seem to have been a pretty tough-laid lot; but after all I don't see that they were any worse people to have as ancestors than a good many of our kings and bosses over the other side would be; but somehow when they did go wrong they always seemed to have done it in a gentlemanly sort of fashion. I suppose that comes of having grandfathers instead of just progenitors, as a man says when he doesn't know or doesn't care to say what stock he comes of. But look here, Tristam, there's one thing you've left out. Of course, you needn't tell me unless you like, and I don't want to pry into any family secrets, but I should very much like to know what old Sir Arthur meant when he said that this little lad could never be his lawful heir, although he was the son of his own son."

Tristam smoked for a few moments in meditative silence, and Courtland helped himself to some whisky and soda. Then Tristam knocked the ash off his cigar and said a little awkwardly:

"Yes, I left that out, not because I think it would have been any breach of confidence to tell you, or that, now you are going to marry into the family, you haven't a perfect right to know the truth. It is simply because that is the blackest part of the whole story, so black indeed, that, however the poor little fellow died, his death was a mercy to him, and so was his mother's too, though of course she wasn't fit to live under any circumstances. If she had lived and brought him back to England and claimed the estates, the whole of the shocking story must of course have come out, for I had given Sir Arthur my word of honour to put his confession, for that's what it amounted to, into his lawyers' hands for them to use as they thought fit, but I hope there is no danger of that now, so when you know it you and I will be the only people in the secret, and you, I know, will keep it as close as I have done."

Courtland nodded and said briefly: "You bet!" and Tristam went on:

"It's a pitiful, miserable story, so bad and black that I hardly like to tell it even to you, so I'll cut it as short as I can. Will it satisfy you for the present if I tell you that in consequence of a liason, which Sir Arthur got into a good many years ago in Simla, and which resulted in a decree nisi, the laws of consanguinity made a legal marriage between his son and Sybil Viney an impossibility? Of course, I don't suppose for a moment that either of them had a suspicion of the truth."

Digitized by Google

"Good Heavens!" said Courtland, turning a trifle pale. "How horrible! Thanks, I think that will be enough for me. I can guess the rest. 'The sins of the fathers upon the children, unto the third and fourth generation.' If a lesson like that wouldn't keep a man straight, I don't know what would. Let's go upstairs and get into a clean atmosphere."

CHAPTER XL.

News from the West.

The next morning's shopping was quite as distinguished a success as, under the circumstances, it might have been expected to be. The great Bond Street jeweller wanted very badly either to buy some of the gems from the treasure ship or to exchange them for modern jewellery, but neither Courtland nor Tristam would hear of this, as it had already been decided that the whole of this part of the treasure was to be equally divided between the two brides, and become in due course the heirlooms of the new Tristam and Courtland families.

When the shopping was over and the respective bank balances of the two friends had been reduced by some thousands of pounds, Courtland excused himself for half-an-hour in order to drive to his agents in Cockspur Street to get his mail. When he rejoined them later on at the Princes' Restaurant for lunch it struck them that he was looking a good deal graver then when he went away, and his share in the conversation did not come quite so spontaneously as it was wont to do, but he kept his counsel not only through lunch but through the whole afternoon, which was mainly devoted to a matinée at the Haymarket.

They dined at home as usual, and during dinner Courtland's fits of silence became more noticeable, and at last Tristam said:

"You don't seem to have been quite yourself this afternoon, Courtland. I hope you haven't had any bad news from home among your letters?"

"Well, not exactly that perhaps," he replied, "but it's a fact that I've had some pretty serious news. I kept it until to-night because I didn't want to spoil sport this afternoon."

"You dear, good, considerate creature!" said Gwynneth with a rewarding smile. "You let us enjoy our shopping and our theatre unsuspectingly, and saved up your news for to-night, when I suppose you were bursting to tell it all the time. Now, that's a thing that no woman could have done."

"Speak for yourself, miss, please!" said Muriel more soberly. "And how do you know that we are going to be told at all? The news may be private, and I don't suppose Mr. Courtland tells you everything yet."

"It isn't private at all," said Courtland. "In fact, it concerns everybody here just as much as it does me, and a few days ago it would have concerned you more. I kept it until now because I thought it would go better told altogether, and there's a good bit of it.

"It's this way," he went on with characteristic directness. "An uncle of mine is Senator for Washington State—not Washington City you know, but the State out west on the Pacific coast, near the Canadian boundary. I've had a long letter from him, which quite confirms those reports we saw in the paper the other day about the steamers bringing the gold from the Klondyke not turning up to time. It seems that the Portland, which sailed from St. Michaels six weeks ago, and the City of Seattle, which left Juneau a few days later, are both missing. They are supposed to have had between two and three millionsworth of gold on board, and they've vanished utterly. The Charlston has been sent out from San Francisco, and a British cruiser from Victoria, to look for them, and nothing more has been heard of them.

"Of course, there's a lot of excitement about it, as the cables in the papers told us; but what the cables didn't tell us is that a mysterious yacht has been traced all up the Pacific coast from Valpariso to Seattle and Victoria, and that she, too, supposed to be bound for St. Michaels and up the Yukon, has also vanished."

"Surely," said Muriel and Gwynneth almost in the same breath, "you can't mean that she's the Minnehaha?"

"Well, that wasn't her name. This one was called the Circe, and she had only one funnel instead of two, and her papers were all right, though, of course, that doesn't go for very much. I have no doubt that little blackguard Peters would be quite smart enough to carry a duplicate set, or my cousin Van Suyler may have done so when he started out fillibustering. The funnel's a greater difficulty, but I suppose they could have had that altered. What seems most important to me is that although no one saw the mysterious craft steam any faster than ordinary, when they came to trace her up the coast they found that she must have steamed at a tremendous speed when she got out of sight of land in order to make the ports in the time she did. Another thing, she engaged extra men at Valparaiso and Callao, though she never seemed to have more than an average crew on board. Lastly, they found in Seattle after she'd gone that her owner and captain tallied almost exactly with the description we gave of Lorraine and Peters, and, further, that there were two ladies on board——"

"Jessie and Sybil Viney, of course!" cried Gwynneth who had been listening with open-eyed amazement. "Then we didn't sink that horrible little yacht after all. Leigh, what do you think of that!"

Tristam was looking something like Muriel remembered him on a former occasion in her own sitting-room, upstairs, but he said very quietly:

"Well, if it is so, and of course it's quite possible, because we are not absolutely certain that we did sink her, the only thing to do will be to go and hunt her up again, and either capture her or sink her in good earnest this time, that is, of course, if Courtland is willing, for the Pocahontas is the only thing afloat that has any chance with her as regards speed."

"Oh, I'm there," said Courtland. "You needn't be afraid of that. This is a personal matter with me now. I don't take a thing up and drop it again before I'm through, just because I find it a bit hot to hold. The ocean's pretty big, but there isn't room on it for the Pocahontas and the Minnehaha, as long as she's got her present owner and skipper on board. No, we'll hurry up the refitting and start as soon as can be. We'll have to get a sort of commission this time, I suppose, either from your Government or Uncle Sam, and do the thing in regular form, but do it somehow we must and will."

"That's good hearing!" said Tristam. "I don't think there'll be much difficulty about that. We've proved our good faith already, and they know that if the Circe is the Minnehaha, yours is the only boat that has a chance of catching her."

"We'll call that settled then," said Courtland, "and now I suppose the first thing to do is to get the Pocahontas afloat again. I propose we go up to Elswick to-morrow and hurry them up about it."

Fortunately the Elswick people did not need much hurrying, as the repairs of the Pocahontas were already practically finished. Then came interviews at the Foreign Office and the Admiralty, the result of which was that the British Government, without committing itself to any official responsibility, allowed the owner of the vessel to lay in ample stores of ammunition and to ship a dozen experienced gunners at his own expense. He was also given an official recommendation to the Admiral on the Pacific station which set forth the object of the cruise and stated his willingness to receive a responsible officer on board at Victoria before proceeding in search of the pirate. The Admiral was also requested to give Courtland and Tristam every assistance in his power on the condition that the Pocahontas flew the White Ensign while she was in charge of a British naval officer, but that she should also work in harmony with the American squadron that was patrolling the coasts in search of the Minnehaha. Lastly, as it had been decided to make the run to the eastward so as to avoid the bad weather round Cape Horn and in the South Atlantic, she was to carry an order from the Admiralty enabling her to coal at any of the naval stations on the way, so that, so far as weather permitted, she would be able to make the whole journey at nearly full speed.

Digitized by Google

There was naturally a somewhat lively discussion as to whether Muriel and Gwynneth should accompany the expedition or not, but the ladies as usual had their way and went, at any rate as far as Victoria. Courtland, however, saw an opportunity in this discussion which he took advantage of with characteristic quickness. He absolutely refused to extend the hospitality of the Pocahontas to Gwynneth save on one condition—and this in the end she had to yield to, and the consequence was that when the cruiser-yacht at length cleared the Needles and steamed away at a good round twenty-five knots down Channel, she was once more being used for the purposes of a sea going honeymoon as well as for the sterner business of pirate-hunting.

CHAPTER XLI.

The "Minnehaha's" Last Victim.

The short northern summer was slipping fast away, and the mystery which involved the fate of the gold-ships homeward-bound from St. Michael's and Juneau was still unsolved, save for the conviction held by Tristam and his friends that their disappearance could only be due to the work of the Minnehaha. Ship after ship had left the northern ports loaded with gold, fresh-won from the inexhaustible treasure-house of the Arctic El Dorado, and carrying, as the ill-fated Portland had done, men and women, whom a few months of hard toil and privation had made rich, and therefore happy and hopeful. Ship after ship had steamed out over the grey northern sea never to be seen or heard of again, and meanwhile the treasure in the Minnehaha's hold had gone on growing until now nearly fifty tons of gold, in bars and nuggets and dust, awaited division among those who had eclipsed all the crimes of the old piracy to obtain it.

Three gun-boats, one American and two British, had been sent northward to patrol the coast and make inquiries as to the fate of the missing vessels, and the weeks had passed by bringing no tidings until these, too, had been numbered among the missing.

This was the state of affairs when the Pocahontas, having fallen in with the Canadian-Pacific mail-steamer Empress of China about two hundred miles westward of Cape Flattery, on her voyage from Hong-Kong, convoyed her to Victoria. At Victoria a joint British and United States squadron was lying off in the Straits waiting for her, ready to steam up the coast, and, if necessary, sweep it from end to end in the effort to discover this new scourge of the sea, whose work was done so thoroughly that it left no trace behind it, and either to compel the pirate to disgorge her colossal gains or send her to the bottom with them. Instructions had been sent up to all the ports from which gold could be shipped southward that all treasure must either be kept in the country or forwarded overland until further notice. This had been sent over the newly-constructed land telegraph lines, for all sea communication had absolutely stopped, and from Queen Charlotte Sound to Behring Straits the North Pacific was as silent and mysterious as it had been in the days of its first discovery.

But all this while the Minnehaha had been at sea under a full head of steam day and night, ready either to attack or run away, and coal and oil would soon become even more precious than gold unless another capture could be made. Some of the gold-ships had come back very scantily supplied with fuel. Their captains had sold it at enormous prices in the North, and had only kept just enough to steam home with. Consequently they had yielded very little to their captor and destroyer, and the fuel question was becoming a very serious one indeed. In addition to this, the necessity of constantly keeping the sea in waters teaming with animal life had so fouled the yacht's bottom that her speed was materially diminished, and although she was of course still able to steam round the slow-going ocean tramps, both Captain Peters and Lorrain had very serious misgivings as to her being able to hold her own against the torpedo-boat destroyers that might be sent out from Victoria to look for her, to say nothing of the Pocahontas, should she return to the chase when the news of the missing gold-ships reached Europe.

There were two courses to be taken, and both of them had been earnestly debated in the Minnehaha's cabin. One was to stand out across the Pacific and lie in wait for one of the Empress steamers from Yokohama, treat her as they had treated the gold-ships, and then go on to some conveniently secluded spot, where the treasure could be divided and the yacht handed over to Captain Peters, while Lorrain and her ladyship betook themselves with their millions and the Gold Magnet to some part of South America, there to lose their identity and enjoy themselves quietly until the fame of their exploits had been dimmed by carefully circulated reports of the loss of the Minnehaha and all hands.

The other course was to stand into the coast and watch for the steamer State of Oregon, which, according to the information received at Seattle, would be sailing from Juneau in three or four days' time. In the end this second course was decided upon, partly because, even with the colossal treasure they had on board, neither Lorrain nor Captain Peters could resist the chance of one more coup, but mainly because, after a careful examination, the skipper came to the conclusion that it would not be safe to enter upon a four or five thousand-mile run without a considerable addition to the fast-dwindling stock of fuel. Had the other alternative been taken the probability is that the Minnehaha would have fallen in, not only with the Empress of China, but with the Pocahontas as well, in which case the final scene in the tragedy of the Gold Magnet would have been played out in mid-Pacific, the fifty tons of stolen gold would have now been lying buried under several thousand fathoms of water, and the Gold Magnet itself would have been lost to the world for ever.

It so happened that the State of Oregon was the last ship to sail with treasure from St. Michael's before the prohibition just mentioned came into force, and it also came to pass that, just at nightfall on the day on which the Minnehaha made the land of Graham Island, which with Moresby Island and a multitude of islets makes up the Queen Charlotte group, Her Majesty's Destroyer Mallard, on scout duty at the mouth of Dixon's Entrance, saw her smoke and sped away southward to rejoin her consorts, which were her sister-destroyer the Quail and the Pocahontas herself.

She managed to join them unseen, and as soon as she had given her welcome news the Quail sent off full speed to carry it to the Admiral in command of the joint squadron, and ask him to bring his ships as rapidly as possible up Hecate Strait, which runs between the islands and the mainland, so as to cut off the pirate's escape to the southward, if the Pocahontas and her consorts succeeded in shutting her into the narrow waters—after which the Quail returned to take her share in the sport.

The State of Oregon had left Juneau the previous day, and had steamed southward through the intricate channels between the Alexander Archipelago and the coast. This was rightly considered to be a much safer course than the open sea route, as it was very unlikely that the pirates would venture so close into the land, or run the risk of getting entangled in the narrow waterways among the islands. This was perfectly correct, and if the gold-ship had been a few hours earlier or later, she would have escaped the fate which awaited her, and had the honour of being the only vessel to get her precious cargo safely into port.

Digitized by Google

The Minnehaha, all unconscious of the little black craft that was flying away to the southward, bearing the fatal news, steamed boldly into Dixon's Entrance under cover of a slight mist and the deepening twilight. Boldness and rapidity of action were now her safest tactics, for it was absolutely essential that she should replenish her bunkers as speedily as possible. If she could not do that she would not be able to keep the sea for another week, and then sooner or later she must fall a prey to one of the war-ships, which were so diligently seeking her. In short, a few tons of coal and a few barrels of petroleum would make all the difference now between escape and prosperity, or capture and death.

Tristam and Courtland and the naval commander who had been taken on board at Victoria had very little difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the vessel reported by the Mallard could not well be any other than the Minnehaha, She could not be a gold-ship from St. Michael's. In the first place, none was due to leave until after the prohibition would have reached the Yukon, and, in the second place, all the St. Michael's ships would make a direct course across the Gulf of Alaska and would not touch the islands at all. Then, again, they easily guessed that the pirates would be in difficulties about fuel, and would have to come in sooner or later on the chance of picking up either the State of Oregon or some other coasting-steamer and taking her coal out of her.

They knew that Lorrain had got accurate information as to the sailing of the gold-ships, and so, taking everything into consideration, they felt justified in concluding that the steamer from Juneau was the bait that was attracting the Minnehaha into the trap they were laying for her.

"I hope that hooker won't be much behind time, Seenyor," said Captain Peters to Lorrain as they went slipping along close under the north coast of Graham's Island. "We can't spare the fuel to wait for him very long, and I'd just hate to be caught in here among these islands by any of them cruisers that'll be looking for us by this time. We mightn't get away with her as easy as we did with the gun-boats, but coal we must have. We didn't get more than forty tons out of that last one and, excepting that fifty that I'm keeping for a last rush in case of accidents, we haven't got enough for a full day's steaming."

"Oh, there's no doubt about that!" replied Lorrain shortly. "Coal we want and coal we must have, whatever it costs, even if we have to fight for it. I reckoned on getting a hundred tons apiece at least out of those other ships. Who the deuce would have thought that they would only have just enough to carry them home! It only shows how the smartest of us can make the simplest mistakes. Ah, look out yonder over the port bow! Do you see a light? There, almost dead ahead! I'm certain I did just then. Quicken her up and let us go and see what it is. I shouldn't wonder if we've caught her in the very nick of time."

Captain Peters snatched up his glass out of the case hanging on the bridge-rail in front of him and took a long, silent, anxious look in the direction that Lorrain was pointing.

Then the mist lifted a little from the water and he caught the distant glimmer of a green light.

"Bully for you, Seenyor! That's her, or maybe something else that has coals aboard. I guess our luck hasn't petred out yet. If we can get another hundred and fifty tons out of her we'll skip southward, hold up one or two tramps, fill from them, and make tracks. This part of the world's getting unhealthier for us every day, and we want to be well out of the way before your friend Tristam brings that hooker of his out looking for us. We couldn't race her for shucks now. I reckon thirty's about the outside we could do now, and that would take an almighty lot of coal."

As he spoke he rang for full speed, and the Minnehaha sprang forward with an added ten knots. The green light seemed to run towards them, and a few minutes later the black hull of a large steamer loomed out through the grey mist.

The Minnehaha carried no lights and had run alongside the State of Oregon almost before she was sighted Then came the usual hail and order to lie to, followed by the usual panic when it became plain to those on board the gold-ship that the wicked-looking little craft could be none other than the mysterious and much-dreaded pirate whose unknown deeds were already the wonder and the speculation of the whole coast.

But the captain of the State of Oregon was made of sterner stuff than the captain of the Portland, for instance, had been, and he answered the summons to surrender with a flat refusal couched in anything but drawing-room language.

If he had to be sunk, as the others no doubt had been, he would go down with his gold and his coal on board, for he was fully determined that the pirates should get no steaming power out of his ship. Added to this, he felt pretty certain that there must be war-ships somewhere about the Strait and possibly within sound of guns. To surrender meant to be sunk after his ship had been rifled, and so his one hope of safety lay in a rescue. Consequently he sent orders to keep the engines working at their utmost power whatever happened, and passed the word for the crew and male passengers to get up their arms and prepare to make a running fight of it. The order was obeyed both below and on deck in a grim silence, and rifles and revolvers and ammunition were got out with a readiness which promised not a little blood-letting before the pirates got their way with the treasure-ship State of Oregon.

The point-blank refusal to surrender not only infuriated Lorrain and Captain Peters, but it put them into a very awkward dilemma. The very last thing they wanted to do was to open fire. They knew very well that the noise of the cannonade might easily attract the notice of some prowling warship, and in addition to that they might just as well, or even better, let the gold-ship alone than send her to the bottom, for in that case the priceless coal would go with her, so, after a hurried consultation, Captain Peters ran up closer and offered to allow the treasure-ship to proceed unmolested in consideration of a hundred tons of coal, to which the captain of the State of Oregon replied tersely:

"I'll see you where coals ain't wanted first. All you get from me you'll have to take. I ain't fitting out any pirates this trip. There's a squadron of warships down the Straits, and the sooner you start shooting the quicker they'll come up, so blaze away and be darned to you!"

Now, whether this was true or not, it made the situation a very awkward one. Still neither Captain Peters nor his owner was the man to let the precious coal go without a struggle. They offered fifty pounds and then a hundred pounds a ton for it, paid down in gold, but all the answer they got was a warning to sheer off or stand the chances of a volley. At this Captain Peters lost the last remnants of his temper and his prudence, and gave orders for two of the Maxims to prepare to open fire.

"There's nothing else to be done, Seenyor," he whispered. "They've got a lot of rifles on deck there, and if we let them shoot first some of us may get hurt. It isn't going to be no Sunday-school treat, this isn't."

Then he pulled out his own revolver and opened the ball by sending a bullet into the chest of the brave captain of the State of Oregon. The next instant the harsh thudding roar of the Maxims crashed out, the two streams of bullets swept the decks of the treasure-ship from end to end, strewing them instantly with scores of dead and dying.

(To be concluded next week.)

Digitized by Google

All about the King of Funny Papers, Edited by the King of Funny Men.

It will be hot from the Press and ready for you on

One Halfpenny.] TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 22nd. [One Halfpenny.

Previous notices in [illegible] of my Comic Journal have doubtless aroused your curiosity, which I am now able to satisfy fully. Hosts of my friends have besieged me personally and through the post in the hopes of learning before the right time what Dan Leno's Comic Journal is going to be like. But up till this moment they have not been satisfied. When the news of my Comic Journal leaked out I was pestered by all sorts of folks begging me to grant various requests of a more or less expensive nature—mostly more. The suggestions I received from my friends and acquaintances would last me for half a century, and furnish material for seventeen papers of extraordinary size.

Three people sent me minute instructions of how it was to be run, two gratuitously. A gentleman in the North of England sent me 2lb. of poetry written by his daughter, and implored me to give the dear girl a start by printing a few ounces of it in the first number; while a lady residing in Kent said she and four of her friends thought what a capital idea it would be to print an insurance coupon every week insuring babies against juvenile ailments. Her letter ended: "N.B.—I have six children."

Circulars came pouring in every morning reminding me that Green's Patent Braces and Jinks' Cough Syrup were unrivalled, and that if I cared to say so in my Comic Journal I might have a few samples and test them. But all such kind and generous appeals I have had to disregard, for my paper has to be run on strictly business lines, and not as an advertising medium or a charity affair.

My first care will be to carry out the idea in the title of my new journal and make it really comic. There will be nothing in it that the most sensitive of us can take offence at. It will be crammed with humourous pictures, side-splitting jokes, and good stories. Never before will such a collection of first-class pictures and good literature have been sold for so small a sum.

But you must get a copy on Tuesday and use your own judgment. You will say I am right.

Every week I shall chat, and talk, and joke with my readers. All my funniest experiences will be confessed in the columns of "Daniel's Diary." Nor will the comic element monopolise everything. The opening chapters of a magnificent serial, will appear in the first number. "The Mark of Mystery" has been written specially for Dan Leno's Comic Journal by one of the best known authors of the day. You will read every word of it and long for more.

"THE MARK OF MYSTERY,"

It is the story of a triple crime, a story of stirring incident, mystery, true pathos, and genuine humour.

Don't miss this wonderful story, and don't forget that it begins on Tuesday in Dan Leno's Comic Journal.

Everyone likes a good short story, but good short stories are difficult to obtain. If you will turn to page 3 of Dan Leno's Comic Journal you will find one of the best.

Each week Dan Leno's Comic Journal will contain a short, complete story of entrancing interest—in fact, the finest stories that money can buy and authors write.

If you want a good laugh—not a mere half-hearted chuckle, but a hearty, honest laugh—buy Dan Leno's Comic Journal; if you would like to try for a big prize, be at your newsagent's early on Tuesday.

Dan Leno's Comic Journal is the most colossal collection of good things ever sold for the price in the history of journalism.

Remember, it will be published every Tuesday; it will consist of the cleverest work of all our best authors and artists; it will cost only One Halfpenny.

The first number will be on sale everywhere on Tuesday, February 22nd.

There will be hundreds of funny pictures, hundreds of side-splitting jokes, one of the finest serials ever penned, short stories, mirthful anecdotes, and a whole host of other fascinating reading.

Everything in it will be fresh and racy—it will not contain a dry line or a stale joke.

Order your copy at once.

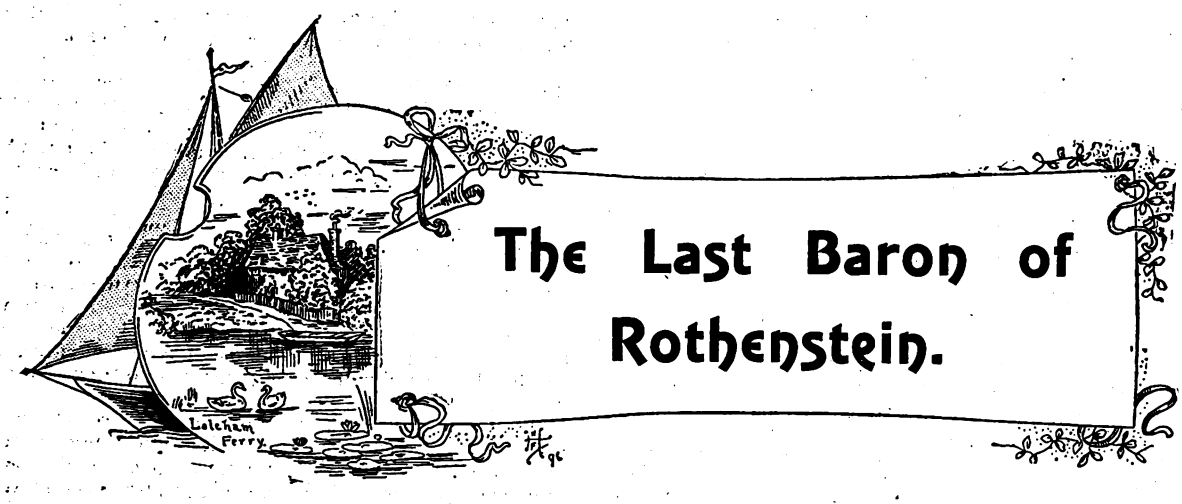
I hope to meet you all again on Tuesday. Until then,

I remain,

Yours sweetly,

Dan Leno

Digitized by Google



The Last Baron of Rothenstein.

In many parts of Germany, especially along the borders of that great tract of wooded mountains and valleys called the Thuringian Forest, a mountain top without its castle would be an anomaly strange enough to call forth a wondering question. Some of these edifices are mere ruins, but others are still in good condition, and inhabited by the descendants of those who built them.

Rothenstein, overlooking the little village of Egersdorf—these are fictitious names on account of the story that follows—is one of the ancient German castles which are still habitable. Like all its companions in the German Empire, the castle is full of legendary matter; every room, every corridor, has some story attached to it, and most of these legends are gruesome enough.

At the present time, the only occupants of Rothenstein are an old caretaker and his wife. Visitors are permitted to inspect the castle, but there is one portion of it to which only specially-privileged persons are admitted. That is the picture gallery. If you ask why it is always kept closed, you will be told simply that the Baron was found dead in the gallery.

Last autumn, while spending my holiday in the Thuringian Forest, I secured the privilege of inspecting the castle, including the picture gallery. It was an uncanny place, that gallery of portraits; even I felt a creeping sensation in the small of my back, and I could hardly be surprised that the caretaker did not venture across the threshold. I glanced at a few of these pictures of knights of old, and was about to retrace my steps when my eyes fell upon a portrait that compelled my attention.

It hung in the most prominent place in the room—for it was a room, not a gallery—over the fireplace opposite the door; it was so remarkable than I cannot imagine how it happened that it did not strike me as soon as I entered. It was a life-sized figure of a cavalier of the seventeenth century, in doublet and hose, with his hand upon the hilt of the rapier at his side. The face was that of a man about fifty, and so real was the representation of the countenance that it seemed to stand out from the canvas as if it were flesh and blood; the eyes were cold and determined, and the mouth was shut close and hard, as if with unalterable purpose. It was a stern face, though one hesitated to call it a cruel one; yet it betokened a will that would brook no opposition, and a heart that knew no forgiveness. I discovered afterwards that he fell in the battle of Lutzen.

Before leaving the castle I tried to obtain from the old man some particulars concerning the death of the Baron, and the reason for keeping that room closed. I felt that the portrait was mixed up in the story; but all I could get from him was that old Marie knew. She lived in the village, and had been his nurse. It did not take long to find the old woman, but I had to pay several visits before I could persuade her to tell me what she knew. At length I succeeded.

I cannot give it exactly in her own words, for it was broken, and there was much that I had to elicit by judicious questions; but the following is the narrative in coherent form:

"Hugo von Rothenstein, over two hundred years ago, rebuilt the castle that had always belonged to his family, and left it as it stands to-day, for the buildings themselves have never since been changed, though there are now gardens where there used to be walls and ditches. He lived much in foreign parts—now in this country and now in that—and sometimes years would go by before he returned. Only a part of the castle at that time could be lived in; the rest was old, and had gradually become almost a ruin. One spring, after a long absence, he appeared unexpectedly, and soon after, a great many men were at work tearing down and replacing the oldest parts and adding new ones. A year after this time, when the south wing had been completed, he brought back a beautiful young Englishwoman as his bride. For a number of years they lived up at the Rothenstein in peace and happiness, while the one son that had been given to them was growing up, and by-and-bye he, too, in his turn went away, as his father had done before him, to see the world outside. I do not know just where it was, but in another part of Germany he fell in love with a girl of his own rank, and came back and announced his intention of making her his wife. To his surprise and consternation, the father, who, it seems, had designs for him in a wholly different direction, absolutely refused to countenance it; and not only that, he set himself like flint against it, and forbade him passionately to have anything further to do in the matter.

"The son was, however, made of just as determined stuff as his father, and without more ado, as soon as he could get to her, married the girl out of hand. What he ought not to have done, in hope of forgiveness from one who did not know how to forgive either in this life or after it"; and the old woman paused with a look on her as if she, too, had been an actor in this drama two centuries ago.

Digitized by Google

"Before many months had passed the son brought his young wife to the Rothenstein. In spite of the prayers and supplications of the mother, who threw herself on her knees before him, old Baron Hugo did not even allow his son to enter the castle, but reviled him outside like a dog, and not only him, but his descendants to the remotest generations. The son never returned again in his father's lifetime. The mother soon after died, it is said, of a broken heart, and the old Baron himself went abroad and finally was killed at Lutzen. A year or two after he was dead, the great picture of him that now hangs at the head of the picture gallery, over the fireplace, was sent from abroad—some say from Spain—where it was painted by one of their greatest artists; but mark my word," she added impressively, "no human artist painted that picture that has blighted the whole house for all these years, and nobody suspected it until I saw it with my own eyes."

Her vehemence had exhausted her, and it was some time before she went on.

"After his father's death, the son came back with his wife and a boy, their only child. The picture gallery at that time had not been completed, as I have heard, and the portrait of old Hugo hung in the long corridor. There, early one morning, they found the knight of the Rothenstein dead, pierced to the heart, they said, by the sword that he even then held tight in his hand.

"It is a gloomy story that follows," old Marie added wearily. "Old Baron Hugo's grandson finally completed the picture-gallery, and the portrait was hung where it is to-day, but where it would not be if I had my way. The Baron was only a man of forty, as you may still see on the stone in the chapel, when one day he was found dead, and, like his father, evidently by his own sword that lay beside him. This time, however, the deed had been done in the picture-gallery. Neither in his own case nor in that of his father was there any apparent reason for such an act. They had both lived peaceful lives, without harassment or care.

"For six generations the story I have told you has been the same. My Hugo's great-grandfather, his grandfather, his father, and finally he himself, have all gone the same way—all have died alone from a sword thrust in the heart. A bane, everybody said, had fallen on the family, that impels them all to take their lives—old Baron Hugo's curse when he drove his son away—but they never thought of the thing that I knew was the real cause of all this misery.

"My Hugo," continued the old woman, "was as fine and frank a lad as the old castle had ever seen. He always had a happy life, but sometimes I could not bear to watch him, for I knew how certain was the fate that hung over him. But he never suspected it, and grew up and went away, and then came back a man, full grown, and handsomer than his father or his grandfather, whom I remember to have seen as a child. And by-the-bye he brought a wife to the Rothenstein, and they were very happy together, and two children were born. They are all away now, and have never been back since he died."

It was a long time before she resumed her story, "Ten years ago this very day was his thirtieth birthday, They were all so happy The Baroness and the children had surprised him with their gifts, and we had all congratulated him, I first of all. There was no invited company, but it was a holiday at the castle, and the flags were flying, and flowers had been placed everywhere, and there were to be lanterns out under the trees in the evening, but they were never lighted. Late in the afternoon," her voice trembled almost to a whisper, "I was going alone along the corridor, past the door of the picture gallery. The long passage itself was empty, but when I was exactly opposite the door I heard the quick stamp of a foot, and then the click of steel striking against steel. At first, I could not believe my ears, and I stopped still and listened. All at once it came upon me what it meant. O Heaven! I thought, to-day! to-day! and though I could scarcely move, I trembled so, I threw myself against the door and burst it open.

"There, in the middle of the room—Heavens! that I should ever have lived to see it!—stood my Hugo, his sword drawn in defence; and opposite him his cold eye fixed upon him, and his rapier just ready to thrust, was the old Hugo of the picture there in the flesh again. And while I was looking, in an instant the thrust had been given, and my Hugo threw up his arms and fell, and, even as he reeled, the old man coolly wiped his sword, and put it back in the scabbard at his side. Only then I shrieked at the horror of the thing, and fell fainting across the threshold.

"It was dark when I came to myself again, and some time before I could realise what had happened and give the alarm. It was too late; my Hugo was dead. Again, they whispered, the curse had fallen, and the Baron of the Rothenstein has taken his life. They would not listen to my story when I told them how he had fought for his life, where no human arm could prevail, and how foully he had been murdered under my very eyes. But, as God is my witness, I saw him fall, and old Hugo von Rothenstein struck the blow!"

This was old Marie's story, and, though we questioned her more minutely as to some of its points, nothing could cause her to vary its details, or could shake her belief in its truth.

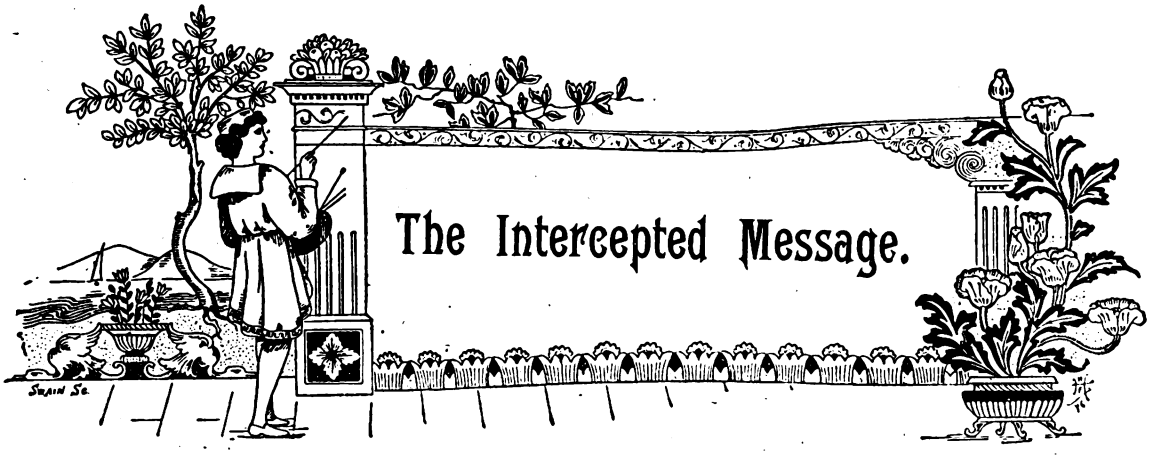
We met the physician of the district once at Marie's cottage, and afterwards took occasion to question him about her story, which we found he had heard. He had been called, it appeared, to the castle, as soon as the body of the Baron had been discovered, and it was true that Marie had first come upon it in the picture gallery, where it lay on the floor. There was nothing to show, he said, that he had not committed suicide, and the sword, an old French rapier that had been taken down from among the weapons in the room, lay a short distance from him, where he had flung it as he fell. "There was no blood on the blade," he added thoughtfully, "as I remarked at the time, but that may be accounted for by purely natural causes, for, like many others in the collection, it had been oiled to keep off the rust."

Marie's story had made a profound impression upon us, and once more we questioned her about its incidents, but she shook her head, and said she should never tell it again. Later in the summer her health failed fast, and one day, on our way to her cottage, our friend, the physician, met us and told us she was dead. "And her story, doctor," we asked, "did you believe it?"

"She certainly believed it," he said, "and who shall say that it may not have been true?"

W. H. Carpenter.

Digitized by Google



The Intercepted Message.

Sitting in a Birmingham hotel one November evening, carelessly running over the headings of a newspaper, I had my eyes and wandering thoughts arrested by a paragraph that stirred some pleasant memories. Stepping to the table near at hand I was clipping the item of news when a handsome, athletic young fellow approached from the opposite side, knife and paper in hand. A moment later each noticed that the other was preserving the same information. Our eyes met, his brown and laughing, mine blue and aggressive.

"Beg pardon," he began with a smile that lighted up his dark face and showed his strong white teeth to advantage, "odd coincidence, isn't it?"

"I don't know," with some constraint. "Up to a short time ago my experience was so entirely along one pleasant line that my thoughts never went outside it. Of late, surprises have come so rapidly that they cease to surprise. Do you know her?"

"I'm inclined to think it my privilege to do the interrogating in this instance, but you have already satisfied my chief curiosity in the matter. If you were not acquainted with Margie Morell you would scarcely be putting that flattering criticism away into your pocket-book."

"You speak familiarly of her;" and despite my efforts to imitate his easy manner there was a challenge in my voice.

"Naturally enough;" and his smile was the more aggravating because the more genial. "I have known her for years. Used to carry her books, haul her on her little cart, walk with her, ride with her, encourage her when success in music seemed so far off, and all that. Held her on my knee a thousand times."

Now there was no effort at self-control on my part.

"You are a scoundrel and a blackguard!" I whispered, as I leant over the table. "If I ever hear of your repeating such language I'll find a way to punish you without involving the name of the young lady you have been coward enough to slander."

No change in his smile, but a little more blood in his face, as he said:

"Rather quick-tempered, it seems to me."

"Yes; but a man who tries to retain the virtues of chivalry without its faults. I wish to say nothing more to you."

"But I like you; I insist on pursuing the acquaintance. It makes me happy to chance upon so stout a champion of Margie."

I was on the point of saying or doing something violent, when he continued:

"Hold on a minute, my bold chevalier;" and this time he laughed outright. "I'm Fred Morell, Margie's brother. In fact, I'm the responsible head of the family. Have you any special right to fight the battles of my sister?"

"Only the right of a gentleman who holds her in the highest respect," I replied, somewhat taken aback. "I met her abroad with her mother. I was completing my education in medicine, and Miss Morell was cultivating her wonderful voice. In the midst of an acquaintance so delightful to me I received news of my father's sudden death, and with it the startling information that disastrous speculation had wiped out the large fortune that I had always been led to expect. I hastened home, spent six months in settling up the affairs of the estate, and have just come here to see what I can make of talents that have never yet been called upon to earn anything."

"It might have been worse. You are Dr. Tom Curran. I've heard them speak of you frequently. Why not take a run out with me and renew the acquaintance?"

It was a temptation, and we are prone to compromise with temptation. I could not go then because I was to spend a couple of weeks with my one relative, Uncle Bruff Curran, who lived a mile or two out of Birmingham. But when Fred and I parted it had been arranged that I should spend a week with the Morell household.

At Uncle Bruff's I was having a glorious time, though he was a bachelor of sixty, and cynical as he was rich. My strange experience there began one afternoon when I was out shooting.

The sport was fast and furious, and I was banging away without any precautions, for the game was in a desolate preserve, and the thought of danger to anyone else never entered my mind. But my confidence in the fact of my complete isolation was brought up with a short turn. I had just let go with both barrels at a flying bunch of quail, when I heard a shout of terror and witnessed a laughable sight.

It was a man literally dropping down a telegraph pole, his eyes big with fright, and a false beard shifted to the side of his face. The fine shot had peppered him harmlessly, but he thought that he had been fired upon, and was beginning to plead for mercy when I approached him. A ringing laugh reassured him, and he managed to tell me in a quiet, natural manner that he was along the line making some repairs.

Digitized by Google

In my amusement I quite forgot the false beard, and that fact slipped from my memory till long afterwards.

When I went in I found a new guest at the house. He was manager of the then leading bank in Birmingham, of which uncle was a director and large shareholder. After dinner we smoked together, and the two old men told me what had brought the manager there.

A short time before two smart and distinguished-looking gentlemen had flashed upon the most exclusive social circle of the city. They dressed just within the extreme of fashion, spent money with princely prodigality, and one of them had placed £4,000 in their bank just to meet the expenses of the brief visit. He had been introduced to the manager's family, and made such an inroad upon the daughter's affections that their engagement was currently reported. This depositor had unexceptional letters, and each one guaranteed him entitled to unlimited credit.

One afternoon he rushed hurriedly into the bank. He just had had a letter from one of his best and wealthiest friends in Liverpool. He was to have met a Birmingham lawyer that very day to pay a balance on £15,000 on an important concession abroad. Business involving an enormous sum kept this Liverpool financier at home, and, despite his wealth, he did not have the ready money to meet the engagement. Would his old friend, known in Birmingham as Lawrence Bochart, draw on his own funds and look after the matter. There was an assured profit of several thousands, and they would share it.

"Is it all right?" asked the manager, who was dazzled with Bochart and his apparently fabulous riches.

"I would like to help my friend, for it is my disposition. But let me insist that you first telegraph my bank in London, to see whether it will honour a draft for the amount required. For your kindness in the matter I want you to accept half the gain which my friend will make through the deal."

"I cannot think of it," replied the manager.

"Then, sir, let me make it a wedding present to your daughter. I have not asked her hand, but, with your permission, I will do so."

"I sent the telegram at once," said the manager to my uncle and myself. In half-an-hour I had an answer, signed by the manager, informing me that Mr. Bochart's account was far more than equal to the demand made upon it. I may have been blinded somewhat by the impression the young man had made upon me, and the prospect of having him for a son-in-law, but I took the usual precautions, though the largeness of the amount at stake might have demanded more.

We went to the hotel and paid the lawyer in cash, as stipulated by the terms of the contract. He said that he would have preferred it in a draft, as less risky to carry about, but he would be round before the close of banking hours to deposit the sum with us. I had no sooner returned to the bank than I received a telegram from the London bank, saying that Lawrence Bochart had no account there, and never had. Then it came upon me with the force of a terrible blow that the wire must have been tapped, that we were swindled, and that the bank was crippled beyond hope of recovery. For myself, I was ruined.

"Of course," continued the manager, "the rascal who cut such a dash in Society did not distribute his photographs, but my daughter is something of an artist, and she sketched the fellow from memory. Here he is, and we'd gladly give a large reward to recover the amount of the robbery."

The two older gentlemen took a look at the picture and then passed it to me. An exclamation of surprise had almost passed my lips, but I was a fortune seeker myself, and here was an unexpected opening. The picture was that of Fred Morell. Why should I not win the reward offered for the recovery of the stolen money? I had seen the wire-tapper, and I knew the man who had so successfully played his part in Birmingham.

Two days later I was on my way to visit the Morells. I had no idea that Fred would be there to receive me, but then he was not the chief attraction! I had said nothing to the two old gentlemen of what I knew, or what I had in mind! But I had decided to play the novel part of a detective, and lay the foundation for some such fortune as I had always expected to inherit.

Fred Morell met me at the door of his house, and a welcome could not have been more hearty. His mother was one of the most gracious of the old school ladies, and her daughter was even more fascinating in her wondrous beauty that when she had won my love beyond the ocean. I could not enjoy such hospitality and then bring a sorrow worse than death upon those who offered it. I asked a private talk with Fred, and frankly told him what I had learnt, and how I had started out to recover the stolen money. There was mingled anger and contempt in his face as he answered me.

"You have taken me for a scoundrel again," he said; "but I must admit the force of the evidence. Cousin Bob has broken loose once more. Seen apart, we have always been taken one for the other. He is a wonderful man, and his talents, properly directed, would win him almost any position. But his inclination is to go wrong, and he does not restrain it. Your mission is to bring him to book. If you like, I will go this far with you. He is rich through inheritance and fraud. Together we will run him down and secure a return of the money lost by the bank. We will make him leave the country for good, but without such an arrangement I will lend you no assistance. He is the first to bring disgrace on the family name, and I care more for it than for his punishment."

A load was lifted from my heart, and never was there a more delightful Christmas spent than in that old homestead. There I was convinced that Margie's hand was mine when I should claim it, and time justifies the blissful confidence.

In London we found the man whom I had surprised in hunting. Through fear he was induced to discover the whereabouts of "Cousin Bob." With the sauvity of a diplomat and a running fire of wit, he accepted our terms. He assured us with unblushing raillery, that the manager's daughter had pierced his heart, that he had voluntarily decided upon a residence abroad, and that it afforded him inexpressible pleasure to comply with our wishes.

I put the bank on its feet again, made the old manager the happiest man in the country, tickled Uncle Bruff, so that he named me his sole heir, and made Margie Morell my wife. I'll say nothing of myself, but Mrs. Dr. Tom Curran's receptions are the most popular and most sought after in one of the greatest cities of the country.

Horace Ray.

Digitized by Google

One of the
GREATEST DISCOVERIES OF THE AGE.
The Secret found at last!

GOLD DUST

is without doubt the finest preparation ever discovered for whitening, preserving, and beautifying the teeth. There is nothing like it; nothing to equal it. Scientists have been trying for years to get such a thing, as it is a well-known fact our teeth do not last as long as they used, because hitherto we have been unable to preserve them. GOLD DUST not only preserves the teeth from decay, but removes all dark stains, making them as pure and white as the driven snow. In order to make it widely known the proprietors and discoverers have decided to make

MAKES YOUR TEETH BRIGHT AND WHITE AS SNOW.

A WONDERFUL OFFER to all who send a Postal Order for 2/6 and 3 Penny Stamps for postage will receive a large box of GOLD DUST containing nearly one pound (16 ounces), which if bought from any chemist or store would cost the purchaser 8/- (eight shillings). To all those sending within 18 days we give free a 1/- box of Gold Dust Instantaneous Complexion Beautifier. In addition to this we give you private information that will enable any one to get £80 to £150 A YEAR.

If you don't send for the 2/6 Box of GOLD DUST, send 6 stamps for a 6d. packet, and TEST ITS MERITS, or order from your chemist or store.

Mention SHORT STORIES when writing.

A CHANCE OF A LIFETIME. DON'T MISS IT.
SEND TO-DAY.

EVERY WOMAN should send. Apart from this offer she should know how to add to her charms by getting lovely pearly-white teeth.

EVERY MAN should send, even if he isn't in want of money; he or his wife or friends may some time be glad to know where to get it.

The Value of Gold Dust is beyond Dispute.

Sir HENRY IRVING and many others have praised it. LADIES OF RANK AND FASHION USE IT.

Write plainly and address—

THE GOLD DUST TOILET CO.,
21 ARTHUR STREET,
NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

THE John Noble

HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES

Highest Value for Money the World has ever known.

Are supplied in the following two good cloths:

I. John Noble Costume Coating, and in II. John Noble Cheviot Serge.

PATTERNS and New Illustrated Ladies' and Children's Fashion Volume sent post Free to all who name Short Stories.

Model 644.

Well-made Norfolk Tailor skirt, Safely 10/6 Price complete packed and carriage paid 6d. extra. Skirt alone, 5/6. Carriage, 5d.

JOHN NOBLE KNOCKABOUT FROCKS.

Thoroughly well made, with saddle top, long full sleeves and pocket. Lengths and Prices.

21	24	27	30 in.
1/6	2/-	2/6	3/-
33	36	39	42 in.
3/6	4/-	4/6	5/-

Postage 4d. extra.

'Brewer' Caps (all shades), as sketched, 1/-

COLOURS of all Costumes: Black, Navy, Electric, Brown, Ruby, Myrtle, Cinnamon, Fawn, Grey, Moss, Sage Green, Reseda, and Purple. SIZES IN STOCK are 34, 36, and 38 in. round bust (under arms). Skirts being 38, 40, and 42 in. long in front. Larger or special sizes made to measure, 1/6 extra. Mourning Orders executed and despatched within twelve hours.

Please mention SHORT STORIES when ordering. Bankers: London & Midland Bank.

JOHN NOBLE LTD., BROOK STREET MILLS, MANCHESTER.

NOSE MACHINE.

This is a contrivance by which the short cartilage of the nose is pressed into shape by wearing the instrument an hour daily for a short time. Price 10/6, sent free for stamps. ALEX ROSS, 62, Theobald's Road, London, opposite Bedford Row. Est. 1850. Parcel free from observation.

THE 'ENGLISH' ORGANETTE.

EASY PAYMENTS.

With expression Stop. ONLY 4/- MONTHLY.

Plays Hymns, Popular Airs, Quadrilles, Polkas, Waltzes, Hornpipes, &c.; any tune can be played with artistic effect by anyone. A mere child can play it. Most Marvellous Musical Instrument in the World.

Price 30/- Terms: 4/- deposit and 4/- monthly.

Organette delivered when first 4/- is paid.

Write for list of music and full particulars.
(Mention this paper.)

J. M. DRAPER, Organette Works, BLACKBURN.

£20

Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.

Tobacconists Commencing. See Illd. Guide (259 pages) 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000 Tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

HOME SEWING.

Plain easy work; £1 weekly earned by persons anywhere; patterns and instruction book, six stamps; genuine.—W. WILLIAMSON, 84 Pearson Street, Stockton, Durham.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO.,
188B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.
63 Seven Sisters Road, N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn

A. A sum of from 10/- to 20/- per week offered for spare time to either sex everywhere. Work can be done evenings. Send addressed envelope to Box 60, Eclipse Works, 89, Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

MR. CLAUDE CARTER, of Thorn House, Johnstone, N.B., says: "Your Tablets much reduced my weight and I have been waiting to see if it was permanent, and so it has proved."

MR. CANHAM, 87, Alexandra Road, Norwich, says: "Tablets cured my wife two years ago of extreme stoutness. It has never returned.

MARION TAYLOR, of Church Farm, St. James, Halesworth, says: "Have lost quite two stone."

A. PEEL, of Darley Hydro, Matlock, writes: "They have reduced and benefited me a good deal."

MR. BUTLER, Surgeon, Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient lost more than one stone."

MR. G. LOVE, 4, Kirk Street, Peterhead. "I think them wonderful not only to reduce fat but as a medicine."

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

DR. MACKENZIE'S ARSENICAL SOAP.

Prepared with Arsenic, Zinc, and other ingredients.

6D. & 1S. PER TABLET.

Deliciously and expensively perfumed, the most luxurious Soap in the World. Produces a most lovely complexion, eradicates spots, pimples, and all imperfections, makes the skin exquisitely clear, and produces the healthy bloom so much desired. It is absolutely harmless, and each tablet is accompanied by a medical certificate.

This Soap prevents the growth of superfluous hairs, removes wrinkles, feeds the skin. You can get it at all the Stores and first-class Chemists. The Family Doctor says it is the most economical beautifier known to Modern Dermatology. It clears away all pimples, spots, redness, or roughness, makes the skin smooth and clear as a baby's, and cures shiny and greasy skins. Use it in the bath and for all Toilet purposes; it is most delicious. For Irritable or sensitive skins it is matchless and delightfully soothing.

MADAME PATTI sends her best thanks for Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap, which she finds most excellent—Craig-y-nos Castle, South Wales.

USE ALSO DR. MACKENZIE'S FAC · LOTION.

Beware of many Imitations. Have Dr. MACKENZIE'S or none.

Digitized by Google

I'VE FOUND IT AT LAST.

EVERY reader of Short Stories should make a point of securing a copy of Home Notes, now on sale. With every number will in future be given away a complete novel and a coloured plate.

HARPER T.—Yes, dogs are very great pets among the ladies of fashion in Paris, and a special industry has been created in consequence. Several shops are tenanted exclusively by outfitters for the canine race. Blankets, hats, coats, shoe-gloves, and lace handkerchiefs of the most luxurious kind are purchased by women for the sole use of their pampered pets.

R. V.—The "sinking fund" is composed of that money put aside by the Government for the liquidation of the National Debt. As the bonds purchased are subsequently withdrawn from circulation, they are said to be "sunk."

RESULT of "Empress" Competition will appear next week.

W. D. D.—There is no difference whatever between the words Tsar and Czar. The Russian alphabet contains many letters for which the English has no equivalent; consequently, various spellings of the same Russian word have been adopted by different authorities in the endeavour to convey the true Russian pronounciation.

LAMP.—The most curious city in the world is situated on Saginaw Bay, an arm of Lake Huron. It is without a name, has a population of about 500, and consists of modern huts on wheels, to the number of 150, which, when the fishing season arrives, are rolled on to the ice in the bay.

C. S. L.—The word "Parliament" first appeared in the laws of England in 1272. Previous to that the law-making community was called the "Witanagemot."

COLLET.—Certainly your experiment proves that the sustaining powers of chocolate are not over-estimated. Two or three years ago a very much greater test was made by a Frenchwoman, who for sixty days took no other form of food. At the end of that time she had only lost fifteen pounds in weight.

JABEZ.—The custom of which you speak obtains among the daughters of the House of Hapsburg, whose bridal trains, on finishing an honourable career in the ballroom, are bestowed, after the ceremony, on the church whose sacred floor they have swept. During the centenary celebration at Rennweg the altar floor was covered with a sheen of satin and silver that had once formed part of Marie Antoinette's wedding-dress.

WORKMAN.—You are certainly better off than the Italian labourer. He may be worthy of his hire, but he receives wretched pay nevertheless. One franc twenty-five centimes (one shilling), sometimes even eighty-five centimes (eightpence halfpenny), for a day's work of thirteen hours, with cooked herbs and black bread for food — this is the usual rate of pay.

A. N.—Windsor Castle was first used as a Royal residence 788 years ago.

PUZZLED inquires: "Is it usual for a lady to pass in the street a gentleman with whom she danced a few nights before, without bowing?"——Introductions at a dance are generally acknowledged to be a mere formality to be gone through before two people can dance together; but they do not justify a continuance of the acquaintance, unless it is the wish of both persons concerned

V. C.—The reason decaying wood looks luminous in the dark is because it is really undergoing a slow combustion.

W. S. asks: "How is it that as a rule deaf people can hear what is said to them better in the midst of a din than when all is quiet around them?"——Because the increased noise helps to make up the volume of sound necessary to reach their impaired organs. An amusing illustration of this fact was afforded by a very deaf old gentleman, who lived quite alone. On the very rare occasion when he had a visitor, he used to keep poking the fire and causing the ashes to rattle on to the grate, so that by the help of the additional noise he might catch what his caller had to say.

M. P.—An "embargo" is an order from the Government, usually issued in time of war, or threatening hostilities, prohibiting the departure of ships or goods from some or all parts of the country.

M. L.—The cross mark still used occasionally instead of a signature did not originate in ignorance. In mediæval times, it was always appended to a signature as an attestation of good faith.

A. H. asks: "Is the Mastership of the Mint a political office?"——It is, and it isn't. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is the ex officio Master of the Mint, and the Parliamentary representative of that department, but the executive duties are discharged by a Deputy Master, whose office has nothing whatever to do with politics.

G. G.—A certificate of birth, death or marriage, costs 3s. 7d.—1s. for the search, and 2s. 7d. for the certificate.

H. N.—The Stars and Stripes of the American flag were in all probability borrowed from the family arms of George Washington, which consisted of three stars in the upper portion and three bars across the escutcheon.

L. G. L.—Like many other people, you are confusing marriage by special license and marriage by ordinary license. It is the former that is rare, such a license being granted only in very exceptional cases, and costing nearly £50. On the other hand, an ordinary license can be obtained for about as many shillings, and is frequently used instead of marriage by banns.

CITIZEN wants to know if the Mansion House plate is private or civic property.——The plate belongs to the Mansion House, for use at banquets during successive mayoralties. For many years it has been the custom for the outgoing Lord Mayor to add to it by the presentation of a suitably engraved gold, silver-gilt, or silver "loving-cup," or other article of the kind.

A. B. C.—There are several different parts of the earth that enjoy perpetual sunshine. On the coast of Peru, for instance, where, although it may be misty sometimes, the blue sky is always visible through the whitish veil during the day. In the Sahara, when the sun is above the horizon, the high lands of Iran, various parts of Turkestan and China, and also in Australia between the southern colonies and the Gulf of Carpentaria, the sun is always to be seen.

N. S.—The reason lightning travels in a zigzag course is because it passes through different strata of air, and on being resisted in its passage, turns from side to side to find the easiest course.

GERTRUDE.—If your rubies are of the true pigeon-blood colour, they are undoubtedly of great value; in fact, a ruby of this description is, broadly speaking, worth ten times its weight in diamonds.

C. N. wants to know whether the marines should be considered as sailors or soldiers.——It would seem more natural to class them with the naval service, for although on the one hand their uniform is military, as are also their duties, especially in the infantry, yet, on the other hand, their name has to be taken into consideration and also the fact that the force is raised and paid by the Admiralty. Their duties, too, are performed mainly on board ship.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

A CHANCE OF A LIFETIME.

GIGANTIC CLEARANCE SALE.

£50,000 worth of Goods Offered at Half Price.

THE ENORMOUS STOCK OF CARPETS, CURTAINS, SHEETS, BLANKETS, QUILTS, &C., MUST BE CLEARED WITHOUT RECARD TO COST, OWING TO THE L.C.C. REQUIRING PRESENT PREMISES FOR STREET IMPROVEMENTS.

New Premises having to be acquired by us, this Sale is held in order to Clear Out Heavy Stocks previous to the removal. NEW GOODS have to be sacrificed, together with all Regular Stocks, as it would be almost impossible to remove the Valuable and Heavy Stocks to New Premises without great risk and loss by damage to the Goods in transit, and this renders AN ABSOLUTE CLEARANCE IMPERATIVE. The magnificent opportunity is therefore afforded the readers of Short Stories of buying the NEW SEASON'S GOODS that are just coming in fresh from the looms at prices lower than the cost of production; and in many cases the Goods are being offered at less than HALF PRICE.

This Offer Will Not be Repeated.

ALL GOODS WARRANTED ABSOLUTELY PERFECT IN EVERY WAY. Money Willingly Returned if not Approved

Lot 1.—4s. Lace Curtains for 1s. 11d. These beautiful Lace Curtains, containing about 6 yards in the pair, 45in. wide, shaded ground, taped edges, with handsome double borders. Undoubtedly the cheapest ever offered. Special Offer: 3 pairs for 5s. 6d. Satisfaction guaranteed. — 4s. Lace Curtains for 1s. 11d.

Lot 2.—7s. Lace Curtains for 3s. 11d. per pair, measuring 3½yd. long, by 52in. wide, shaded ground, taped edges and handsome double borders; wash easily. 3 pairs for 11s. 3d. Money returned if not approved. — 7s. Lace Curtains for 3s. 11d.

Lot 3.—Specially handsome Drawing-room Design, entirely new and most successful. In white or cream, with scolloped and taped edges, made from thoroughly sound cotton yarns; warranted to wear well. Sale price, 5s. 11d. per pair. Each Curtain measures 3½yd. long by 60in. wide. Special Offer: 3 pairs for 17s. Money returned if not approved. — 10s. 6d. Lace Curtains for 5s. 11d.

Lot 7.—10,000 Special Extra Quality, Heavy Loom Kitchen Table Cloths, made from the heaviest and strongest Linen Yarns. Numerous artistic patterns. Specially recommended for hard wear. Warranted to give the best possible satisfaction, being very neat, inexpensive, and durable.
Size 34in. by 45in., price 1s. 2d. each, or 3 for 3s. 3d.
Size 56in. by 56in., price 1s. 5d. each, or 3 for 4s. 0d.
Size 62in. by 62in., price 1s. 11d. each, or 3 for 5s. 3d.
Size 68in. by 62in., price 2s. 2d. each, or 3 for 5s. 11d.

Lot 22.—10s. 6d. White Scotch Blankets for 5s. 9d. per pair, measuring about 56in. by 76in.; light, warm, and durable. Admittedly the cheapest blankets ever offered. Special Offer: 3 pairs for 15s. 6d. Satisfaction guaranteed or money returned. — 10s. 6d. White Scotch Blankets for 5s. 6d.

25s. Special Heavy Blankets for 14s. 9d. — Lot 23.—25s. Special Heavy Witney Yorkshire Blankets for 14s. 9d., measuring 75in. by 96in. Manufactured entirely of pure long staple wool, bleached by the sun and beautifully white. Give endless wear, and are easily washed. For perfection of finish, durability, and economy, they are unequalled. Special Offer: 3 pairs for 42s. Money returned if not approved.

WITNEY BLANKETS.

EXCEPTIONAL VALUE.

Lot 24.—800 pairs of best quality Witney Blankets, with fancy borders, very soft, warm, of great durability. Made from the best wool, and warranted to give every satisfaction. Prices given below are little more than half the original cost.

Size	Weight.	Price per Pair.	3 Pairs for
53in. by 70in.	4lb.	6s. 3d.	18s.
60in. by 80in.	6lb.	7s. 9d.	22s.
70in. by 90in.	8 lb.	11s. 6d.	33s.
75in. by 96in.	9lb.	13s. 0s.	37s.
80in. by 99in.	10 lb.	15s. 3d.	43s.
86in. by 104in.	11lb.	16s. 9d.	48s.

Lot 30.—9s. Bleached Twill Sheets for 4s. 11d., measuring 64in. by 84in. Made from the best cotton yarns, thoroughly shrunk, soft finish, and hemmed ready for use. Special Offer: 3 pairs for 14s. 3d. Satisfaction guaranteed. — 9s. Twilled Sheets for 4s. 11d.

15s. 6d. Sheets for 7s. 11d. — Lot 31.—15s. 6d. Bleached Twill Sheets for 7s. 11d., measuring 90in. by 100in. Made from the best cotton yarns, thoroughly shrunk, soft, finish, and hemmed ready for use. Special Offer: 3 pairs for 22s. Money returned if not approved.

Lot 39.—1,500 yards of Best Quality Kidderminster Carpeting, 36 inches wide, at 1s. 11d. per yard; usual price 3s. 6d. per yard. Can be supplied in numerous handsome and effective designs and rich colourings to harmonise with all requirements. Impossible to repeat this offer. Money returned if not approved. — 3s. 6d. Best Quality Kidderminster Carpeting for 1s. 11d.

3s. Best Brussels Stair Carpet for 1s. 9d. — Lot 48.—3s. Brussels Carpeting for 1s. 9d. per yard, 22 inches wide. Handsomely bordered, superior quality, light and dark shades, magnificent design and colourings. Satisfaction guaranteed or money returned.

10,000 RUGS

GIVEN AWAY.

GUARANTEED GENUINE BARGAINS.

Lot 50.—THIS PHENOMENAL OFFER is made to the readers of Short Stories only. On receipt of Postal Order for 6s., or 74 stamps, we will forward DIRECT FROM OUR LOOMS to your address, one of our 10/6 genuine SEAMLESS, WOVEN, REVERSIBLE CARPETS, suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bedroom, etc., handsomely bordered and woven in 30 different patterns and art colourings to suit all requirements, and large enough to cover any ordinary sized room. These Carpets will be sold as an advertisement for the goods of the British Carpet Weaving Company BELOW THE ACTUAL COST OF PRODUCTION. They are made of material equal to wool, and, being a speciality of our own, can only be obtained Direct from our Looms, thus saving the Purchasers all Middle Profits.

GIVEN AWAY.—WITH EVERY CARPET WE SHALL ABSOLUTELY GIVE AWAY A VERY HANDSOME RUG TO MATCH; OR WE WILL SEND TWO CARPETS AND TWO RUGS FOR 10/6.

MONEY WILLINGLY RETURNED IF NOT APPROVED.

THOUSANDS of REPEAT ORDERS & UNSOLICITED TESTIMONIALS RECEIVED.

BRUSSELETTE CARPETS.

ADMITTEDLY THE CHEAPEST IN THE WORLD.

Seamless, Woven, and Reversible, Rich Turkey Patterns and Colourings, Superior Quality, with Handsome Border to match; a Marvel of Excellence and Beauty.

Lot 60. SIZES and PRICES. No.	ft.	in.	ft.	in.	Sale Price.	Former Price.
1	9	0 by	6	0	5/6	9/0
2	9	0 by	7	6	7/0	11/9
3	9	0 by	9	0	8/6	13/6
4	10	6 by	7	6	8/9	13/9
5	10	6 by	9	0	10/0	15/6
6	12	0 by	9	0	11/6	18/0

Lot 60. SIZES and PRICES. No.	ft.	in.	ft.	in.	Sale Price.	Former Price.
7	12	0 by	10	6	13/6	20/6
8	13	6 by	10	6	15/3	24/0
9	12	0 by	12	0	15/3	24/0
10	13	6 by	12	0	17/0	27/0
11	15	0 by	12	0	19/0	32/0
12	18	0 by	12	0	22/9	36/0

These Carpets are splendid imitations of real Brussels Carpets, the designs having been carefully copied from the originals, both as regards colourings and patterns, so that when in use it is almost impossible, except by close scrutiny, to detect the difference. All designs are registered, and deservedly considered works of art. We can confidently recommend them for use in the dining and drawing rooms, or any rooms and landings where hard wear is a necessity.

GIVEN AWAY.

As an advertisement for the introduction of these goods to all readers of Short Stories we have decided to give away to every purchaser a very handsomely-woven Hearthrug, 6 feet long and 3 feet wide, to match carpets in colours, etc.

THOUSANDS of REPEAT ORDERS & UNSOLICITED TESTIMONIALS RECEIVED.

DEAR SIR,— 9 Bedford Row, High Wycombe, Bucks.

I have seen some of the Carpets and rugs sent by your firm, and think they are really a marvel. Please forward goods as follows, etc.—Yours faithfully, Rev. F. H. MAY.

"SHORT STORIES" COUPON.
On receipt of this Coupon and P.O.O. for amount we guarantee to send any goods as above.
THE BRITISH CARPET WEAVING CO.

SATISFACTION GUARANTEED OR MONEY WILLINGLY REFUNDED.

All Orders despatched same day as received. Cheques and Postal Orders should be made payable to J. HARGREAVES, and crossed UNION BANK. ADDRESS:

THE BRITISH CARPET WEAVING COMPANY, Sale Dept., 31 OLD STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

"GOLDEN SHRED"

A DELIGHTFUL APPETIZER

NO BREAKFAST OR TEA TABLE COMPLETE WITHOUT IT

MARMALADE

Unrivalled piquant stimulant for the delicate.

PREPARED BY JAMES ROBERTSON Paisley.

FREE SAMPLE ON RECEIPT OF 2D FOR POSTAGE.

NUCOLINE

A PURE VEGETABLE BUTTER.

FOR BAKED & BOILED PASTRY, FRYING, etc.

A PERFECT COOKING BUTTER.

NUTRITIVE, DIGESTIVE, ECONOMICAL. FIVE PRIZE MEDALS AWARDED.

Stocked by all London Stores, etc.

A SAMPLE TIN SENT POST FREE FOR THREE STAMPS. Write

NUCOLINE LTD., SILVERTOWN, LONDON, E.

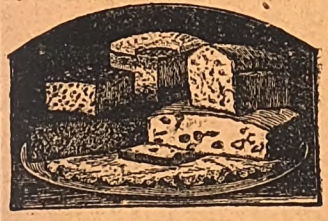
LYLE'S GOLDEN SYRUP

LONGEST ESTABLISHED, PUREST & BEST.

PURE WHOLESOME FOOD.

JOHN HILL & SON'S

RICH CAKES.



Sold by Grocers and Stores

REFUSE IMITATIONS.

Tudno Cake Factory

Ashton-under-Lyne.

RECKITT'S BLUE.

ASK FOR IT AND SEE THAT YOU GET IT.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY G. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

NO. 479. FOR WEEK ENDING MARCH 5TH, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

BEECHAM'S PASTIME PARCEL!

THE PRIZE COMPETITION FOR £100.

All competitors are now informed that the correct solutions of the "Oracles" were as follows

A.....	Burnt Mill.	C.....	Sparkford.	E.....	Lightship.
B.....	Ash Green.	D.....	Fire-eater.	F.....	The Lost Chord.

Six Competitors only were successful in giving the proper answer to each of the six puzzles, and the £100 has been equally divided, a cheque for £16 13s. 4d. being sent to each on February 11th.

The names and addresses of the fortunate six are: Miss Beatrice A. Plummer, 14 Calverley Park, Tunbridge Wells; Miss Edith May Adams, Fernleigh, Heeley Road, Selly Oak, Birmingham; Mrs. F. E. Bickerton, 101, Evershot Road, Tollington Park, London, N.; Mr. Thomas Shepherd, 9 Hall Street, Spring Bank, Hull; Mr. W. Lonnon, 9 Queensgate Terrace, Freedom, Plymouth; Sergeant James Cochrane, 2nd Battalion Cameron Highlanders, Fort George, N.B.

Readers of this paper who did not send for a Beecham's Pastime Parcel, but who may now be curious to see what this unique Competition really was, can obtain a parcel, which is, irrespective of the Competition, big value for ONE SHILLING, by enclosing P.O. or stamps for this amount to

THE PROPRIETOR OF BEECHAM'S PILLS, ST. HELENS, LANCASHIRE.

NOTE.*—To those few correspondents who sent for BEECHAM'S PASTIME PARCELS, and have for some reason or other not received them, in some cases either the name or postal address has been omitted, PLEASE WRITE AGAIN.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

For all Bilious and Nervous Disorders, such as

Sick Headache, Constipation,

Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,

Disordered Liver and Female Ailments.

Prepared only by the Proprietor, THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere, in Boxes, 1/1½ & 2/9 each, with full Directions.

THE 1s. 1½d. BOX CONTAINS FIFTY-SIX PILLS.

The Sale now EXCEEDS SIX MILLION BOXES per Annum.

Digitized by Google

"Its food value is double that of Bread made from ordinary wheaten flour."—Lancet.

HOVIS BREAD

will not only help to improve your digestion and consequently your health, but will also bring back that energetic and happy feeling of good health. Man does not live a natural life, so a good portion of a natural food, in the shape of HOVIS, at each meal will largely counteract the bad influence that modern life has upon the health and digestive organs. This is not an idle remark, but a proved statement, daily being verified.

HOVIS is baked and sold by all good class Bakers. No loaf genuine unless stamped HOVIS. 6d. and 1/- samples of Bread and Biscuits sent on receipt of stamps by

S. FITTON & SON, Millers, Macclesfield.

MAKE FRUIT WINES AT HOME.

Ask for MASON'S.

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. THE VERY BEST.

MASON'S GINGER WINE ESSENCE.

A Sixpenny Bottle will, in six minutes, make sixty glasses of Delicious, Non-Alcoholic Wine. Agents Wanted.

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

MASON'S (NOTTINGHAM) COFFEE ESSENCE (THE BEST MADE)

MASON'S WINE ESSENCES are made in all Fruit Flavours, Ginger Lemon, Orange, Blackberry etc.

YOU WON'T BE DISAPPOINTED.

MAKERS OF MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS. BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

The Best Hair Dye

in the World for Lashes, Eyebrows, and Hair on the Head, with Moustache and Beard. For Ladies' Hair and for all Colours. Had at 3s. 6d., post 3s. 9d., of ALEX. ROSS, 62 Theobald's Road, High Holborn, London, W.C. Spanish Cantharides for fallen hair, 3s. 6d. 5s. 6d. & 10s. 6d.

NOSE MACHINE.

This is a contrivance by which the short cartilage of the nose is pressed into shape by wearing the instrument an hour daily for a short time. Price 10/6, sent free for stamps. ALEX ROSS, 62, Theobald's Road, London, opposite Bedford Row. Est. 1850. Parcel free from observation.

£20

Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.

Tobacconists Commencing. See Illd. Guide (250 pages) 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000 Tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers

A sum of from 10/- to 20/- per week offered for spare time to either sex everywhere. Work can be done evenings. Send addressed envelope to Box 60, Eclipse Works, 89, Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 183B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W. 63 Seven Sisters Road, N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

NOSE

A RADICAL PERMANENT CURE Medically approved for Red Noses, 3/9, post free, under cover. Pamphlet, "Red Noses, Cause and Prevention," 1/-; Machines for Ugly Noses, particulars for stamp. LEES RAY. Specialist. Wavertree, Liverpool.

ORGANETTE 4/ MONTHLY

Plays Hymns, Popular Airs, Quadrilles, Waltzes, Hornpipes, &c. A mere child can play it. Cash or easy payments. List of tunes and full particulars free.

DRAPER, ORGANETTE WORKS, BLACKBURN.

SILVER QUEEN CYCLES!

Best Value on Earth. Immense stock of Ladies' and Gents' machines. New and Secondhand. Wonderful bargains. Carriage paid. Easy payments from 10s. monthly, or large cash discount. 1 year's guarantee Illus. price lists post free on application. Old cycles exchanged The SILVER QUEEN CYCLE Co Ltd., 221 Tottenham Court Road, London.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

WADE'S WONDERFUL OFFER

A SOLID SILVER WATCH GIVEN AWAY.

SEND NO MONEY.

In order to introduce my name into every household in the Kingdom, I undertake and guarantee to give away one of my "World-Famed £2 Silver Watches," list price, Ladies' or Gentlemen's, to every reader who sends me the correct reading of the Rebus printed below. I am preparing to send out immediately 2,000 of these watches. This is a perfectly genuine competition, and the only thing you have to do is carry out the conditions, and if you succeed in guessing correctly you have the advantage of our truly wonderful offer.

These pictures represent three well-known English Wild Flowers. The conditions of the Competition are that you find out what these flowers are, and if you are correct you undertake to purchase one of my inexpensive Solid Silver Chains. These chains are the best made, are marvellous value. Money returned if dissatisfied. Send at once, enclosing stamped and addressed envelope, so that I may inform you if correct.

W. W. WADE,

WATCH MANUFACTURER,

Dept. 35, GOLD EXCHANGE,

Hammersmith, London, W.

DR. MACKENZIE'S ARSENICAL SOAP.

Prepared with Arsenic, Zinc, and other Ingredients.

Deliciously and expensively perfumed, the most luxurious Soap in the World. Produces a most lovely complexion, eradicates spots, pimples, and all imperfections, makes the skin exquisitely clear, and produces the healthy bloom so much desired. It is absolutely harmless, and each tablet is accompanied by a medical certificate.

6D. & 1S. PER TABLET.

This Soap prevents the growth of superfluous hairs, removes wrinkles, feeds the skin. You can get it at all the Stores and first-class Chemists. The Family Doctor says it is the most economical beautifier known to Modern Dermatology. It clears away all pimples, spots, redness, or roughness, makes the skin smooth and clear as a baby's, and cures shiny and greasy skins. Use it in the bath and for all Toilet purposes; it is most delicious. For irritable or sensitive skins it is matchless and delightfully soothing.

MADAME PATTI sends her best thanks for Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap, which she finds most excellent—Craigy-nos Castle, South Wales.

USE ALSO DR. MACKENZIE'S FACE LOTION.

Beware of many Imitations. Have Dr. MACKENZIE'S or none.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

No. 479.] [One Penny.

For the Week ending March 5th, 1898.

THE POST-MORTEM AUTOPSY.

I was always very fond of him, poor fellow! Philip was one of those gentle, sympathetic, almost feminine natures, that appealed to the feelings of an elderly and childless woman like myself by their very feebleness. It was well that he was not left to make his way in the world.

Old James Forrester, his father, left him a comfortable income, with the principal strictly tied up, so that he could not make away with it. He ought to have led a fairly comfortable life of it, with his artistic tastes, pleasant manners, and agreeable exterior. He was always popular, and had hosts of friends, until a bitter love disappointment rendered him morbid and misanthropic.

It was cruel of Beatrice Raymond to treat him as she did. Not that I blame her for not marrying him. A man with hereditary consumption in the background as an inheritance to bestow upon his children, is not fitted to enter into the bonds of matrimony with any woman, and I am the last one to blame any woman for maintaining that opinion. Only she ought not to have Edited By G. Arthur Pearson.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

lured him on to love her. She was beautiful, brilliant, and fascinating, and she certainly flirted with him desperately, in a way that probably would have only proved pleasant pastime to a good many men. But to Philip it did serious harm. He never was the same man afterwards.

I shall never forget the day that he came to see me and told me the whole story. I was always like an old maiden aunt to him, for he had no mother—my poor Philip!—and so he made me his confidante in all important matters.

"And what do you mean to do now, Philip?" I asked him, after he had told me the whole story of his wooing Miss Raymond, and of the positive way in which she had refused him.

"I do not know, Miss Anson," he answered in a dreary way. "Sometimes I think of going to Paris to study art."

"The very best thing you could do!" I answered briskly, interrupting him mercilessly.

"But to what end? My life is a desolate one. I have no incentive to work."

"Work for work's sake—for art's sake, my boy. You are still so young," he was then just twenty-eight, "that you may shape for yourself a very noble career."

"What! with my fragile health—my shattered hopes? It is not very likely."

"Try—only try."

And I had at least the satisfaction of seeing a gleam of reviving interest in life shining in his eyes before he left me.

He did go on to the Continent, and took up the study of art, but he lacked strength of character and steadiness of purpose to enable him to achieve any distinction as a painter.

He lacked, too, the spur of necessity. His daily bread was not depending upon his efforts, so he relaxed those efforts whenever he felt ill or depressed.

He studied awhile in Paris, and then he went to Munich. Finally I heard of him in Rome, always doing something with his pencils and palette, but nothing that ever amounted to much. He went on several long journeys, and a tour that he took through Austria and Hungary seemed to interest him very much.

He wrote to me regularly, but he had not the gift of penning very interesting letters, so that he gave me merely a list of the places he visited, and added but little concerning himself and his own impressions and occupations.

After a year or two his letter slackened, and at last they ceased entirely. Sometimes I would meet persons who had seen him abroad, and the accounts they gave of him were far from satisfactory. He had grown more morbid and cynical than ever, and, moreover, his health was in a most precarious condition. He had caught a series of severe colds during his Austrian journey, and, though partially restored by a new course of treatment prescribed by a young and highly-gifted Hungarian physician, there was no doubt but that his lungs were seriously affected.

"He talks now," said my informant, "of going to the United States, and of settling down next winter in Florida to give his new doctor's system a full and patient trial. He has, too, an idea of painting some pictures of negro life, and from what he said I think he has an idea of combining the two; that is, of taking a studio somewhere, and of working and trying the new remedies at one and the same time."

"Do you know anything about this new course of treatment?" I asked.

"Nothing—except that it consists in gradually increasing doses of some virulent poison. This much I got Forrester to tell me; but he is a reserved, unsociable fellow, and does not care to talk much about himself or his ailments."

Reserved—unsociable! How he had changed. Alas! my poor Philip!

It was only a few weeks later that I was astonished by the arrival of Philip himself at my little home.

"Only to say 'How are you?' and then 'Good-bye,' Miss Anson," he declared. "I could not pass through London without coming to take a look at you. I start for New Orleans to-morrow." And then he sat down and talked for more than an hour concerning his plans for the future.

I found him terribly changed, with all the signs of advanced consumption visible in his countenance, and in his wasted form. But he spoke cheerfully respecting his own health, and also expressed the utmost faith in the new cure invented and prescribed by his Hungarian physician.

On that subject, however, he seemed unwilling to talk, and soon diverged into an account of his plans for the coming winter, and of his projected picture. I had never seen him so eager and so interested in anything relating to himself since his love affair with Miss Raymond, and I feel encouraged respecting him, despite the unsatisfactory condition of his health.

He took a very affectionate farewell of me, and went away; and the next tidings I had of him came in the shape of a letter that he addressed to me from New Orleans.

He wrote hopefully, and in good spirits. He had found just the residence that he required, namely, a furnished villa in the suburbs of the city. He had also found a most admirable model for his projected picture in the shape of an old negress who kept a fruit stall in the square, opposite the cathedral.

"She is the most curious and picturesque old creature imaginable," he wrote. "There is a tradition current among the coloured people here that she is over a hundred years old, and certainly she looks it. She is a native-born African, and claims to have been a priestess, or a princess, or a witch, in her own land—perhaps all three.

"Old Yana, as she is called, might pose for a picture of 'She,' after that bewitching heroine's death, with all her thousands of years of life accumulated on her head. Her face shows the most extraordinary agglomeration possible of wrinkles, and her short, curly wool is as white as snow. I have engaged this venerable personage to act as my cook and housekeeper and general factotum, and she will sit to me in her hours of leisure. So you may expect me back in the spring, and a picture that shall be a masterpiece, if a remarkable model and painstaking execution can make it so.

"As to my health, I find that it is rapidly improving. I will venture now to confess to you what the nature really was of the treatment that I have been following. It consisted of minute doses of arsenic, to be gradually increased as my system became capable of enduring larger quantities of the poison. I have derived the utmost benefit from it, especially in the matter of relief from oppression of breathing. My respiration has of late become so easy and comfortable that it is a positive pleasure to me to breathe."

Digitized by Google

I received two short letters from him after that, in one of which he enclosed a photograph of the old negress, Yana. I did not like the face that looked up sullenly and scowlingly from the picture. It was the face, so it seemed to me, of a being with unlimited possibilities of cruelty in her nature, and with an element of barbarism underlying the thin veneer of civilisation acquired by long residence in a Christian land.

As I looked upon the wrinkled features, there rose involuntarily before me memories of Ashantee kings and their dreadful "customs," and all sorts of horrid deeds perpetrated by the savage tribes of Africa. Yet I was far enough from suspecting the truth.

I scarcely know how to conclude my story. What remains for me to tell is so inconceivably horrible that I dread to record the incidents as they actually occurred.

Towards the end of January I received a letter from Philip, begging me to come to New Orleans and pay him a visit. He wrote in great depression of spirits. The arsenic treatment seemed to have reached a point with him when to stop it would prove fatal, and when unmistakable symptoms showed that his system had nearly reached a point when no more doses of the poison could be endured.

"Moreover," he wrote, "I think that old Yana is growing dissatisfied with her position with me. She has become sulky of late, and refuses to speak; and sometimes I can see her glaring at me out of those bloodshot eyes of hers, with a ferocious expression that actually chills the blood in my veins. I may be growing fanciful, however. I am ill and lonely, and long to see you, dear Miss Anson. Do come and spend a few weeks with me, and then I will return with you to London. Cable me word if you will come, and also the day of your arrival, and I will meet you in New York."

I decided at once to accept the invitation, and to go and look after the poor fellow in his evil plight. I sent the dispatch as he had directed before I started. But when my long, tiresome journey was at an end, and I at length reached New Orleans, there was no one waiting to meet me at the station; Philip was nowhere to be seen.

Fearing that he was ill I hired a carriage, and was on the point of starting at once for his abode, when it occurred to me that the presence of a physician might be useful in case Philip had suddenly become worse. So I appealed to a young man, Dr. James Lake, who had been a fellow passenger, and who had shown me a good deal of kindness on the way. After hearing my explanation of the circumstances he willingly agreed to accompany me.

We set out without delay, and reached the villa in safety. But, to my astonishment, it seemed utterly deserted. We knocked and rang at the front door for some time in vain. Then Dr. Lake, who was an active and energetic young fellow, proposed trying to gain an entrance by one of the back windows. He went away, and in a very few minutes he unlocked and unbarred the front door from within. But as I was about to enter he waved me back.

"Do not come in, Miss Anson," he whispered, in a hoarse, horror-stricken tone. "Something frightful has been taking place here. Let me search the house thoroughly before you try to enter."

His fresh, young face was white with a ghastly pallor. Hastily scribbling a few lines on a card, he summoned our driver, and sent him off at full gallop to the city with a message of which I caught only one word—"police." Then he went in, and throwing open the windows of the drawing-room, he beckoned to me, after a brief investigation, to enter.

There was nothing at all astonishing to be seen in the room. Philip had evidently used it as a studio. The table was strewn with brushes and colour tubes, and his palette lay conspicuous in the midst.

On an easel was placed the finished picture about which he had so often written to me. It was a full-length figure of the old negress, about half the size of life, and represented her as seated beside her stand of oranges.

It was painted with a breadth and freedom of touch, and a subtle sense of colour, of which I could hardly believe Philip Forrester capable. Sketches and studies, mostly of the same grim personage, leant against the walls or were piled upon the chairs. But Philip—where was he?

I was on the point of leaving the room to go in search of him, when Dr. Lake, who had quitted me abruptly on my entrance, returned, bearing something in his hands, over which he had thrown a large handkerchief. He laid his burden on the table. A faint, horrible odour stole through the room.

"You are a brave woman—a strong woman, Miss Ansom," he said impressively. "Can you stand a terrible shock?"

"I can—I will."

"Then tell me if you recognise these features," he said.

He drew aside the handkerchief, and there before me lay a ghastly severed human head. I shrieked in terror at the sight.

"Compose yourself, Miss Anson. Look again, and tell me if you know who this is."

I forced myself to fix my shuddering gaze on the dreadful object before me. Yes, I knew but too well the livid countenance on which I looked. It was that of Philip Forrester.

"But who has done this deed?" I cried. "Where is the negress Yana?"

"She, too, is dead. Her body is lying on the floor in the kitchen. This," and he touched the poor head as he spoke, "I found hidden behind a pile of wood in the out-house."

It was not till the inquest was held that the riddle of this mystery was fully unravelled. I will not dwell upon the hideous details of the evidence. Suffice it to say that Dr. Lake's medical science enabled him to discover the truth.

Old Yana had undoubtedly belonged in her youth to one of the cannibal tribes of Africa; and, indeed, the testimony was elicited at the trial that she had been in the habit of dilating on her delight in the feasts of human flesh, of which she had partaken as a girl. She had slain her unfortunate master, probably in a sudden and frenzied revival of her old instincts.

Dr. Lake discovered the traces of more than one horrible banquet in which she had indulged after her crime. But that crime had brought with it its own swift and singular punishment. The flesh of the arsenic eater, saturated as it was with the deadly drug, was in itself a poison, and the old cannibal had perished from its effects.

L. H. H.

Digitized by Google

The Seven Years' League.

"You don't look a day older, Tina."

"And you haven't changed a bit, Claire. Of course I have changed considerably. If I hadn't, why should I have come all these miles to keep our seven years' compact?"

"But you look just the same. You are as pretty as ever. Nobody in the world would take you for twenty-three. Are you sure now, Tina, quite sure that you aren't as good as engaged? You remember we promised to tell each other just as soon as we became interested in a man."

"Well, dear, you begin, then."

"I begin? Why, Christine Markham, who said that I was interested in any man?"

"Nobody yet, but I want you to say it. You don't suppose I'm going to do all the confessing, do you?"

"I don't see why I should be the first. You're the elder." Claire flushed a little as she leant forward in her impulsive way and kissed her friend. They had met this morning for the first time in seven years. They had parted last at school, and had agreed to meet seven years from that time. It was an idea of Christine's.

"You know we are said to be a different person physically every seven years," she said.

Christine was a country girl. Claire lived in London, but in spite of the distance between their homes, they had confidently expected to see each other now and then during the interval. But Claire had gone abroad some time after leaving school, and meantime, the correspondence between the two began to flag. Each had her own interests, growing out of her immediate environments, which it was natural should overshadow an intimacy which, in the nature of things, was now but a memory. But as the date for the reunion drew near, each recalled it, and two letters in reference to the event crossed each other. Then the correspondence became brisk, till it was settled that Christine should come to London and visit her friend. And now they had been together just two hours.

"But I'm only a year older, Claire," was Christine's reply to the other's final remark. "And besides, I can see that you have something to tell. Now begin."

Christine's eyes were fastened intently upon her companion's face. She had noted the flush when it first made its appearance. She felt that it betokened something, and hers was a romantic nature, else probably she would not have thought of this seven years' reunion. She was determined now that her friend should make a confidant of her.

"But if one hasn't anything to tell, how can one begin?" Claire had dropped Christine's hand, and was twisting her handkerchief between her fingers nervously. "I'm younger than you. It's more natural that you should have an—affair than that I should. Tell me all about it, Tina, dear, won't you?"

Christine suddenly leant forward, and took her friend in her arms. Pressing her cheek close against that of Claire, she whispered: "Ah, you sly puss—you little diplomatist! You think that I will tell you my secret for the pleasure of hearing yours. Well, I will. Is it a bargain? Come, on the sacred honour of the seven years' league."

Christine straightened herself, and with a solemn expression held one hand raised, pointing to the ceiling.

"Ah, Tina, Tina, are you really in love with someone?"

Claire put her two hands together, and sat looking at her companion with a rapturous expression.

"Swear first," responded the other with mock seriousness. "You will tell me your experience if I tell you mine?"

"Ah, Tina, how ridiculous you are! I said there wasn't anything for me to tell."

Down came Christine's hand into her lap.

"Then, of course, there can be no exchange," she said decisively.

Claire looked disappointed, hurt almost.

"But that isn't fair, Tina," she exclaimed, putting an arm round her friend's waist. "It—isn't my fault I haven't any story to tell."

"Ah, then, is it his?" broke in the other quickly. "Come now, Claire, if I tell you my little romance, there is no reason why you shouldn't return the compliment. You see you can't deceive me. I know you have one. Now then, is it a bargain?"

"Well, if you won't call it a romance, but just want me to say a word or two about—about the way a certain person impresses me, I'll agree. Now, tell me your experience. What is he like?"

Claire had hung her head, and moved her foot uneasily backwards and forwards across the carpet during the first part of this speech. Now she arranged herself more comfortably on the divan, took one of Christine's hands to hold in hers during the recital, and prepared to listen.

Digitized by Google

"Oh, he is tall, and—well, he is neither dark nor fair, but very handsome. I am sure you would think so, too, Claire, if you were to see him. And so smart."

"Where was it that you met him?" Claire went on.

"It was at a dance——"

"But about the man. What did he do? What did you say? Do you write to each other, and when do you expect to see him again? You're not engaged, are you?"

"Oh, dear me, no! I haven't seen him now for—for several weeks."

"And he likes you, does he? But of course he does, or you wouldn't be telling me anything about it."

"Well, he hasn't told me so yet," rejoined Christine. "But now it is your turn, Claire. I'm just dying to hear of your Romeo."

"No, indeed, it isn't my turn yet. There's lots you must tell me first. You—you haven't a photograph of him with you, have you?"

"Why, Claire, of course not."

"Then describe him more minutely. You say he is tall, and neither fair nor dark. What colour is his hair?"

"Brown, a sort of chestnut, you know."

"And does he wear a moustache or a beard?"

"Just a moustache. Don't you remember we used to say we'd never have a lover unless he wore a moustache?"

"Oh, yes; and this is the ideal one. Well, how old is he?"

"About twenty-six or twenty-eight. Of course, I don't know about that for certain."

"And is he rich?"

"He's pretty well off. Naturally he wouldn't be the ideal lover if he wasn't."

"What business is he in?" Claire went on.

Christine did not answer immediately. She sat looking straight at Claire, who was now holding both her friend's hands and gazing at her in a sort of rapt daze. Finally she said: "Business? Oh, yes, he's a lawyer."

"A lawyer?" Claire repeated the words. She drew her hands away with a sudden movement, then looked confused and got up and crossed the room to pull the blind down a few inches, although the sun had not yet begun to send its rays under it.

"Yes. You haven't forgotten that day we counted the buttons on my ulster and it came out 'lawyer' for me? What was it for you, Claire?"

"I—I cannot remember, Tina, it was so long ago. But what is the lawyer's name?" Claire had picked up a fan from the centre table. She held this now so as partially to screen her face as she put the question.

"Haven't I told you enough yet, Claire? Remember every question that I have answered you must answer for me."

"Yes, yes, Tina. But his name, tell me that."

Claire seemed strangely excited. She tapped the fan impatiently against her teeth. Her eyes were dilated; the flush on her cheeks was spreading to her temples, where it seemed to turn to moisture that stood out in little beads unheeded.

"All right, then, my dear. But a name for a name, remember that. Here it is—one that has always been my favourite, though—plain, simple John."

Claire gave a sort of gasp behind the fan. She put out one hand as though to clutch Christine, then drew it quickly back again. Her eyes closed, her body swayed from side to side, and then her friend sprang up and put both arms about her.

"Claire, Claire!" she cried. "What is the matter?"

She placed her gently down on the divan. Then she turned quickly to the dressing-table, looking for some restoratives. She picked up a vinaigrette, and after applying it, had the satisfaction of seeing Claire open her eyes.

"My dear girl, what is it?" whispered Christine, bending over her. "Your hand is as cold as ice. Do you feel faint. Shall I call your mother?"

Claire turned and grasped the other's arm almost fiercely.

"Oh, no, no!" she cried. "Say nothing about it to anyone. It is nothing. I am all right now." She raised herself to a sitting position. "Now tell me where you would like me to take you this afternoon. Shall we go for a drive, or would you prefer a matinée?"

Christine made no reply for the moment. She stood there by the divan looking down upon her friend earnestly, solemnly.

"Claire," she said suddenly, "you must tell me what is the matter with you. It is something that I said; something about that man."

"Don't, oh, Tina, don't!" Claire raised her hands as if to ward off a blow.

"Yes, I will, I must," the other went on. "I have been wicked, brutal, but I didn't know, truly, Claire, I didn't know. It is only a coincidence. It all came of my love of romance."

"Don't speak of it again, Tina. If you do I—" Claire had raised her voice, but it suddenly failed her, and she dropped weakly back among the cushions, covering her face with her hands.

"I must speak of it, Claire. You are all wrong. You have believed every word I said, and there is not one of them true. It is like Marjory Daw. You have read that, Claire? There wasn't any Marjory, you know."

"Well?" Claire had taken her hands from her face. She was looking up at her friend's lips as if her very life hung on the words that should next issue from them.

"I never met any such man as I have just described. I made it all up out of the ideal we had had at school, just to get you to tell me your story."

"And you never knew a lawyer whose first name is John, and who has brown hair?"

"No, dear. I couldn't possibly have told you his last name. It was very wrong of me, and to show you how penitent I am I shall not ask you to tell me your story. Not now, at any rate. Do you forgive me, Claire?"

The other's answer was to reach up, draw her friend's face down to hers, and in this attitude to weep a few tears, in which all that there was of sorrow was not for herself, but for Christine, who did not know her joy.

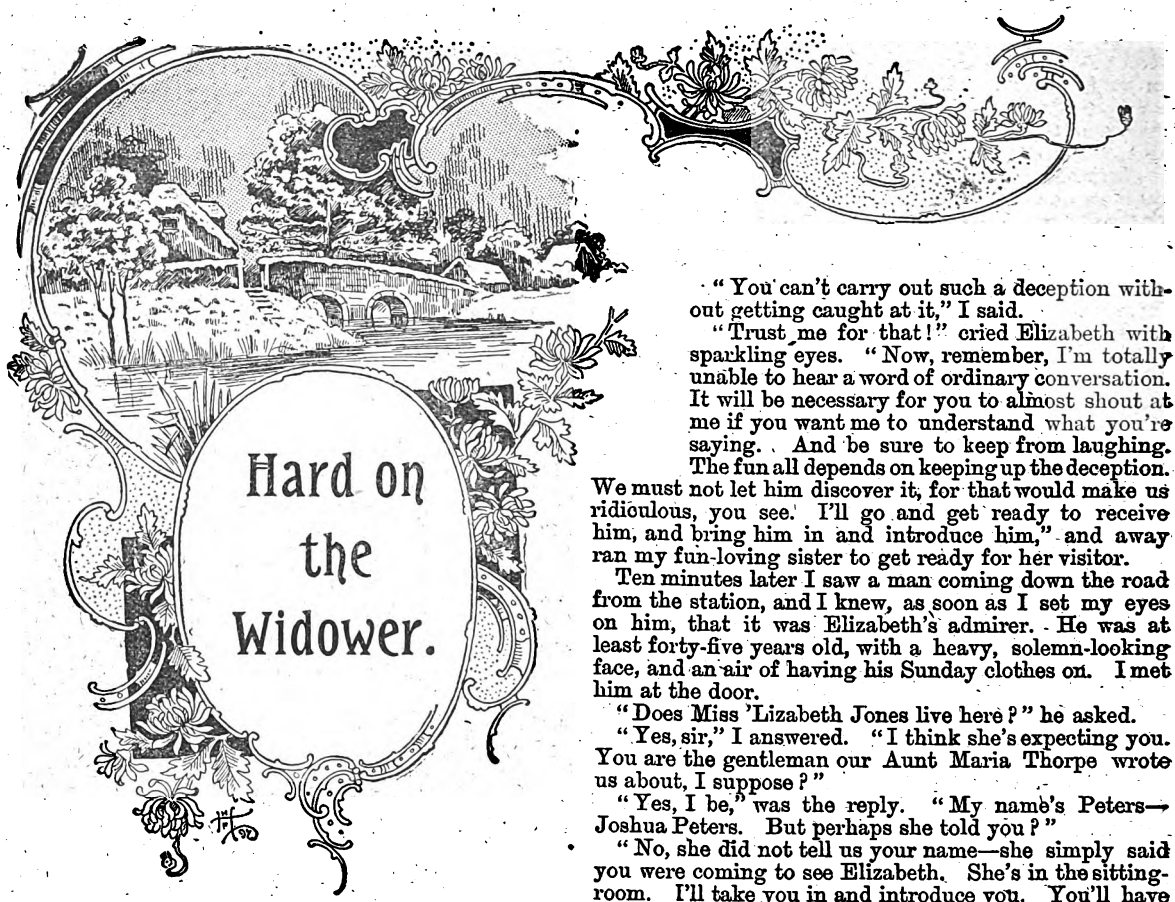
A. L. W.

SIX MORE BURGLARY CLAIMS PAID BY PEARSON'S.

There seems to have been an epidemic of burglaries within the last few weeks. No fewer than six separate claims have recently been paid under the Burglary Insurance scheme in connection with Pearson's Weekly.

Particulars of the scheme appear in the current issue.

Digitized by Google



Hard on the Widower.

"You can't guess what's going to happen," cried my sister Elizabeth one morning as she came running up the path from the gate, where she had been to meet the postman. She had an open letter in her hand.

"Has someone left you a fortune?" I asked.

"Oh, better than that!" was the reply. "I'm going to have a beau. Listen," and she proceeded to read the letter:

DEAR ELIZABETH,—I write to tell you that a friend of mine has fallen in love with your photograph. He is a widower and on the look-out for another wife. He happened to see your photo, and it won his susceptible heart at once. He asked all kinds of questions about you, and when he found out that you were "fancy free," he said he "had a good mind to come an' see you. Perhaps there was the chance he'd been lookin' for." I advised him to come. "You can tell by trying," I said, and he's coming. He will be there on Wednesday. Be kind to the poor man, and—send me an invitation to the wedding. Hastily,

AUNT MARIA.

"That's just like Aunt Maria, isn't it?" cried Elizabeth, half amused and half indignant. "She's bound to have fun at somebody's expense."

"To-day is Wednesday, Elizabeth," I said with a smile. "You can look for your admirer by the next train. The letter ought to have got here yesterday, you see, by its date."

"I'm thoroughly out of patience with Aunt Maria," said Elizabeth. "I know what I'll do. I'll pretend I'm deaf, and I'll have some fun out of it as well as Aunt Maria."

"You can't carry out such a deception without getting caught at it," I said.

"Trust me for that!" cried Elizabeth with sparkling eyes. "Now, remember, I'm totally unable to hear a word of ordinary conversation. It will be necessary for you to almost shout at me if you want me to understand what you're saying. And be sure to keep from laughing. The fun all depends on keeping up the deception. We must not let him discover it, for that would make us ridiculous, you see. I'll go and get ready to receive him, and bring him in and introduce him," and away ran my fun-loving sister to get ready for her visitor.

Ten minutes later I saw a man coming down the road from the station, and I knew, as soon as I set my eyes on him, that it was Elizabeth's admirer. He was at least forty-five years old, with a heavy, solemn-looking face, and an air of having his Sunday clothes on. I met him at the door.

"Does Miss 'Lizabeth Jones live here?" he asked.

"Yes, sir," I answered. "I think she's expecting you. You are the gentleman our Aunt Maria Thorpe wrote us about, I suppose?"

"Yes, I be," was the reply. "My name's Peters—Joshua Peters. But perhaps she told you?"

"No, she did not tell us your name—she simply said you were coming to see Elizabeth. She's in the sitting-room. I'll take you in and introduce you. You'll have to speak rather loud, for Elizabeth's just a trifle hard of hearing."

"That's bad," said Mr. Peters, pulling out a big red handkerchief and wiping his perspiring face. "Awfully warm, ain't it?"

"Quite warm," I responded.

By that time we were at the sitting-room door. Elizabeth sat by the window with her back towards us.

"Elizabeth," I said, raising my voice. No reply.

"She must be dretful deaf not to hear that," said Mr. Peters. "How long's she been so?"

I did not dare trust myself to reply. I went up to Elizabeth and put my hand on her shoulder. She turned and saw us.

"Why didn't you speak when you came in?" she asked, rising.

"She did—she hollered," said Mr. Peters, in a sort of stage aside.

"Elizabeth, this is Mr. Peters, the gentleman Aunt Maria wrote about," I said, close to her ear.

"Oh, yes, I understand," said Elizabeth, her face showing great delight and interest. "I'm happy to meet you, Mr. Peasley. Sit down, please. I hope you're well, Mr. Peasley."

"Peters, not Peasley," corrected her visitor.

"A little louder, please. I didn't quite catch what you said," and Elizabeth bent her head to listen.

"I said my name wasn't Peasley," shouted the other. "It's Peters."

Digitized by Google

"Oh, yes, I understand now," responded Elizabeth. "I'm not so very deaf, still one has to talk rather loud for me to understand all they say."

"Your Aunt M'riar told me about you," said Mr. Peters, sitting down. "I've knowed her quite a long time."

"Aunt Maria dying? You must be mistaken, Mr. Peters. She didn't say anything about it in her letter."

"I said I'd knowed her quite a long time," said Mr. Peters, in a voice like a trumpet.

"Oh, yes; pardon me," said Elizabeth. "When you speak a trifle louder than usual, like that, I have no difficulty in understanding what you say."

"She must be awful deaf if she calls that a trifle louder than usual," said Mr. Peters.

I couldn't have kept my face straight much longer, so I busied myself about getting dinner, but I could hear every word of the conversation in the kitchen. Elizabeth kept him repeating his remarks until I fancied he was getting hoarse.

"I've always fancied I should like living on a farm," said Elizabeth. "Do you think the children would take kindly to a stepmother, Mr. Peters?"

"They'd have to, if I got married again," was his reply. "No trouble about that."

"No. I don't like cats," said Elizabeth. "I'd prefer a dog. Do you keep a dog, Mr. Peters?"

"You didn't catch my remark," he shouted.

"I think just as you do about that," responded Elizabeth. "I don't like to hear them bark. We seem to have quite a similarity of tastes, don't we, Mr. Peters?"

Presently dinner was ready, and they came out together and sat down to the meal. I told Elizabeth that I would wait on them. I knew I could never undergo the ordeal of sitting at table with them.

"I hope you like moonlight walks and boating, Mr. Peters? I do, so much!"

"Well, I can't say as I do," responded Mr. Peters. "Bein' out at night, 'specially on the water, don't agree with me. It makes me roomatick."

"Romantic? There it is again!" cried Elizabeth in delight. "I'm so glad you are, for I'm the most romantic girl you ever saw."

"I didn't say romantic," corrected Mr. Peters in a tone that made the dishes dance; "I said roomatick."

"Oh, pardon me," said Elizabeth; "but occasionally you seem to forget that I am a trifle deaf, and speak so low. But you'd get used to it in time."

"I don't b'leeve I ever would," said Mr. Peters to me. "Don't you s'pose somethin' could be done for her?"

"I don't know, I'm sure," I replied, turning away to hide my face.

All that afternoon my wicked sister kept that poor man shouting at her. By degrees he got hoarser and hoarser. Just before tea was ready he came into the kitchen where I was at work.

"I'm done up; my throat feels rougher 'n a grater. It's harder work to carry on a conversation with her than it is to drive a donkey. It's a pity she can't have somethin' done for her ears. She's smart and good-lookin', an' she seems to take a great likin' to me."

"You'd better talk with her about it," I suggested.

"I can't," said Mr. Peters. "I'm too tired. I think she gets worse to'ards night, for it's harder work to make her understand now than it was in the morning. I'll be goin' now. You can talk with her, an' if she is willin' to have her ears doctored, and it does any good, I'll come down ag'in. I don't see why your aunt didn't tell me about it. But, perhaps, she was afraid your sister'd lose the chance if she let on aforehand."

"I've enjoyed your visit so much, dear Mr. Peters," said Elizabeth, at parting. "Come again, won't you now, and soon?"

"That depends," shouted the poor man. "Your sister'll tell you what I've been sayin' to her, when I'm gone."

"Oh, yes, yes! I shall think of you when you're gone," said Elizabeth. "You'll write, won't you?"

"I'll see," said Mr. Peters.

When the gate closed behind poor Mr. Peters I sat down and laughed till I cried.

"Oh, Jane!" cried Elizabeth, dropping down on the floor, "I never had such fun in all my life; never! He shouted at me till the sound of his voice roared in my ears like thunder. I wouldn't wonder if it really made me deaf. Poor man! It's a great pity for me to lose such a chance."

And then Elizabeth and I laughed and cried together.

EDEN REXFORD.

WHAT IS THE NEXT BOOK WE CAN SEND YOU?

Every week we shall give away half-a-dozen books.

All a competitor has to do is to send us one Book Coupon cut from The Sunday Reader, one from the Athletic Record, and one from Short Stories.

Send these to us in one envelope together with a request for any single book in the whole world of literature.

From the applications we receive we shall each week pick out six and send the books asked for.

All applications to be addressed to "BOOKS," Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please let me have: S. S.

Book.....

Price.....

Name.....

Address.....

.....

RESULT FOR LAST WEEK.

G. S. Knight, 15 Penygraig Road, Mount Pleasant Swansea. "The Book of the Goat." By H. S. Holmes Pelger. 4s. 6d.

Joseph Little, Bank Road, Hoylake, Cheshire. "Ziza." 3s. 6d.

W. Chas. Griffiths, 85 Elliott Street, Tyldesley. "Cotton Spinning." By Nasmith. 6s.

Norman Wood, 24 Park Hill, Ealing, W. "The Young Llaners." By Kingston. 5s.

Mrs. H. A. Green, Bengeo Street, Bengeo, Hertford, Herts. "Thelma." By Marie Corelli. 6s.

T. E. Smith, 28 Ash Street, Bootle, Liverpool. "A Teacher's Bible." 10s. 6d.

Digitized by Google

By M. P. SHIEL.

Author of "The Man-Stealers," "Prince Zaleski," "Shapes in the Fire," "The Rajah's Sapphire," etc.

SUMMARY.

Yen How, a shrewd Chino-Japanese doctor, who has spent a portion of his life in almost every country in Europe studying the various nationalities and customs in all classes of life, falls desperately in love with an English nursemaid. His advances are rudely repulsed, however; but he leaves England with a fixed determination to win the object of his affections in spite of all opposition. The means he employs for this purpose are immeasurably vaster than the end.

Yen How goes first to Japan as a Japanese, where, by reason of his authority upon all matters connected with Europe and his high rank, he soon becomes a member of the Japanese Parliament. He rapidly becomes intimate with the prime minister, Marquis Ito, to whom he proposes a league between the two races of China and Japan, and an immense scheme by which Europe may be reduced to a waste, and China become the Empress of the Earth with scarcely an effort of her own. He then goes to China and becomes virtual ruler of that nation. In the course of a conversation which he has with Li Hung Chang he unfolds his scheme for setting all the European Powers against Great Britain. After the slaughter China will step in and conquer the remnants of the armies. The Halcyon is sent to Malta convoyed by the Majestic. In the Bay of Biscay La Gloire, a French battleship, is encountered, and fights the Majestic, which ultimately rams her opponent and then sinks. The crew is saved by the Halcyon.

Great Britain now prepares for war. A picket boat in the Channel sights a foreign fleet convoying transports, and John Hardy, a consumptive midshipman home on sick leave, brings the news to Portsmouth. Immediately troops are concentrated at Brighton under the command of Sir Evelyn Wood, and the Channel fleet sails from Spithead to meet the foe. John Hardy gets on board the Jupiter, and, solely by his strength of purpose, is permitted to remain. The British fleet meets the Allied ships in Mid-channel and a battle ensues. Although the British vessels are outnumbered by two to one, the superior tactics of the British, and of John Hardy (who escapes on the Jupiter from the fight, and rams all the transports some distance away), results in the destruction of the Allied fleet.

CHAPTER IX.

John Hardy Gives an Order.

John Hardy in a dead faint on Brighton sands—John Hardy waking next morning on a down bed in Cavendish Square—the transition is rapid, but that is what, in fact, occurred.

Captain MacLeod, though gashed all over the chest, woke to consciousness hours before John. John had his wound inside his chest in the shape of phthisis, and gave frequent signs of it in the form of those pathetic clandestine coughs which came from him. The swim through the water had nearly done for John; and he woke next morning with a chest contracted and wheezing with asthma. Besides this, he had a scratch on his brow where a shell-splinter had cut him.

No. 11a Cavendish Square had been the town-residence of John Hardy's race for some generations, and here, in solitary state, the young man lived when in London.

London, lately, had seen a good deal of him, though formerly he had always buried himself in the country when, as rarely happened, he was on shore. This newly-developed attractiveness of London was concentrated for John in a certain mansion in Park Lane.

When he opened his eyes, torn by a cough, they met two others bending low over him—old ones, surrounded by wrinkles; anxious ones, full of solicitude. It was half-past eleven o'clock.

"Well, Bobbie," said John with a smile, and stretched a little.

"I am pleased to see you so much yourself, I am sure, Master John," said Bobbie; "how are you feeling now?"

"I, Bobs? Much the same as usual, I suppose. Where on earth am I?"

"You are in Cavendish Square, sir—in your own chamber."

"Oh, aye—I see that. I remember now, Bobbie. The battle, eh? and the swim, eh? The old Jupiter did not do so badly, after all. Did any of the enemy escape? And Captain MacLeod—how is he, Bobbie?"

"He is said to be doing fairly well, Master John. He has a wound in his chest, which is not serious. He is better off than you, I am thinking. It was he who brought you here, sir."

"When?"

"About four in the morning, sir."

"Ah, I fancy I recollect something of it. Well, that's all right then, Bobbie."

"Ah, Master John, not all right, perhaps! When, when, sir, will you learn to take care of that chest, sir?"

"Oh, bother the chest, Bobs boy. A fellow has got to do his duty, I suppose, Bobbie?"

John Hardy's eyelids lifted as he said this, and he turned upward the pure cerulean azure of his eyes in clear open query upon old "Bobbie," the aged butler of his father and grandfather.

"Well, sir—well—if you put it in that way, of course. But still, there is this to be said: it was not, so to speak, your duty to go through this; you had not, as one might say, any right to be there——"

"No, Bobbie, but I was there, you see. And being there, it was only natural that one should do what little one could for the old country, don't you think——?"

"What little, sir?" cried Bobbie. "Ah, that is like your way of speaking, sir—like your father before you, Master John! This is a proud day for poor old Bobbie, Master John—forgive me for these tears, sir, the tears come quickly when we are old, Master John—a proud day, and the tip-top hour in the life of your father's old servant, Master

Digitized by Google

John, making dying easy to him from this day onwards, sir. It was what I predicted of you, and to-day you have made true your old Bobbie's word before all the world, Master John. England this morning is ringing, sir, with the name of Hardy, aye, and France, too, sir, and Europe and America, and the servants down at the Hall have sent a telegram to poor old Bobbie, sir, all of them in a body, congratulating me on the man you have shown yourself, and it's a proud day, sir—a proud day—for poor old Robert Mason, Master John, is this that you have brought me—— "

Robert's flow of words was choked by sobs. John put out his hand, drew him nearer to the bedside, and laid one arm round the stringy old neck, the boy's soft, affectionate nature overflowing with murmured words of tenderness.

"I am so glad, Bobbie, if I have made you happy," he whispered. "You know I would do anything to do that, wouldn't I? But what is it all about, Bobs? Have I done anything very extraordinary, then? England was bound to beat those mounseer people, anyway, wasn't she?"

Bobbie disengaged himself hurriedly. He had his proofs with him—chapter and verse. He had been poring all the morning over a couple of score of newspapers, weeping over them as he only wept over his old Bible. He had brought them with him. He flaunted them in the face of John.

"Read those, if you want to know what you have done! Well, it's a proud day—a proud day—for poor old Bobbie, that's all I can say——," he cried, in a weak, broken voice, treading woebegone about the chamber, with his face in his hands once more.

John glanced through three or four of the papers, half sitting up in bed, while Bobbie held ever and again to his lips a large glass of warm egg and milk, for which the old butler had rung.

"Well, Bobbie," said John with a smile.

The Times concluded a lengthy article by saying: "Assuming that the account to hand of the battle, derived chiefly from the statement of Captain MacLeod, be correct in all its details, what words of eulogy shall we find in our English tongue to extol and glorify the very young man to whom Britain this day owes her immunity from the shame of an evading foot? In the times of ancient Rome, the people would have been accutely conscious of their inability to invent any Dignity equal to their sense of obligation to such a deliverer. This young man would have been proclaimed Saviour of his Country, and would have been intrusted with the supreme direction of affairs—naval, military, political—with the injunction to see to it ne respublica damnum capiat. How will England adjust herself to this new-found personality, of genius so commanding, in her midst? We wait with keen curiosity—and, we may add, with some anxiety—to see what shall be done by the Government to the man whom the nation delighteth to honour."

The Daily Chronicle lost itself in poetic allusion and far-fetched metaphor on the subject of John Hardy. It said: "What Nelson was to the ship of wood and sails, that, it is already clear, is this young man to the ship of steel and steam. That is to say, he is its genius. He is more still—he is its embodiment. Ralph Waldo Emmerson, in one of his essays, points out that occasionally a man is born who is himself, as it were, the Thing in connection with which his activities are employed; thus, Nasmyth was concentrated Iron, Stephenson was embodied Steel, Edison is himself Electricity, Rudyard was himself a Lighthouse. We may add—John Hardy is himself a modern Battleship."

But it was reserved for the Daily Telegraph to embody in its florid and ornamental style something of that shudder of delight with which England, through all her breadth, learnt, with that morning's sunrise, that she had still a son with a voice loud and hoarse enough to proclaim once more to all the earth her empire of the Sea. No style could have been too florid to express that day the feelings of the nation; for emotion is, in its very nature, florid; and England was in the grip of an emotion.

The Telegraph said: "No one has ever yet accused this journal of an undue tendency to hero-worship; and in speaking as we have spoken of Sub-Lieutenant John Hardy—whom, we confess, we have for the first time in our life heard of half-an-hour ago—it is partly the man whom we laud, but above all, it is the great nation that could have produced him. We have at command some special information about Mr. John Hardy; we know something of the family of sailors of which he is the latest, and greatest, product; and we say with the certainty of knowledge that he is as essentially an English thing as the Cliffs of Dover, or the smuts of the Black Country. No other country in the universe could have given birth to anything at all resembling him. He is doubly the child of England; for he is the child of the sea also. The sea is part of England. The oceans are not her boundary—they are her continuation. If one were to ask Mr. Hardy: 'What is the breadth of England?' he would probably reply: 'Her breadth is the distance between the Poles.' Such, at least, is the account we have received on good authority of the temperament of this latest scion of an old Hampshire family of thoroughgoing 'sea-dogs.'

Digitized by Google

"For the rest, the young gentleman is said to have an ailment of the chest; he has the typical blue eyes of the English tar, and very light wavy hair, which he wears rather long. He is small in stature, and slim. His face is said to be the gravest, saddest, prettiest girl-face in the land; and his disposition in private life is much more than usually mild, yielding, and affectionate. Our informant hints at a supposed weakness for the fair sex, and confesses that at the examination stage of his career, the man who bids fair to become the new national hero proved himself far from brilliant.

"So much we have been able to gather; and this significant fact also: that from his earliest boyhood, Hardy has seemed to all who have known him to be deficient in one of the ordinary instincts of humanity—the instinct of Fear. Nothing, so far, has appeared to have had any tendency toward alarming him; to use our informant's words: 'He would remain cool if the earth were bursting to pieces.' Such is the man who has ranged himself on the side of England, and against the Allied nations of the Continent.

"This is no time of ordinary routines and gradual processes. The moment is ecstatic—the hour is immense with Fate. Let the nation for the nonce fling to the winds its old Shibboleths of Use and Wont, and now—without delay—proceed to garland with its fairest laurels the head which has been its salvation. It is certain that, but for John Hardy, we, writing here, should now have been writing with a boom of hostile cannon in our ears. What guerdon is high enough for the man who has averted such a doom? Fleet-Captain — Vice-Admiral — Admiral — these are the honorary titles that occur to us at the moment, as in no way commensurate with the reward which England owes, and will insist upon paying, to her deliverer.

"Nay, we know little of the English people, if it do not straightway find something so akin to its own secret temper, something so precisely like its own inner self, in John Hardy, and in the cool rashness of John Hardy, and in his contemptuous way, and in his audacious gallantry, and in his homely, Cromwellian grandeur of mind—that a burst of enthusiasm from the entire nation shall at once proclaim him its chosen and darling. England, as Mr. Mathew Arnold has said, is a Nation 'in the grand style'; John Hardy, we do not hesitate to say, is a Man 'in the grand style.' It will not be surprising if these two, having once come across each other, shall, without delay, strike up a friendship perhaps unparalleled in history. The beginning of such a friendship we to-day announce."

So the Telegraph. The Standard, on the other hand, came out with a long essay on Blood, showing how Blood, and Blood alone, had all through been the making of England. "A democracy without an aristocracy," it said, "is like an egg without salt, and is on the road to rottenness and ruin. It was necessary for Sub-Lieutenant Hardy, before he could annihilate the allied navies of Europe, to have behind him a long line of ancestors whose home was the sea. He stands high—but on a pedestal which is not himself. He is the apex of a pyramid, and the rest of the pyramid consists of centuries of the ocean-life and ocean-culture of a race. It is Blood that tells."

The Clarionet, on the contrary, a Socialist organ, insisted upon it that the success of this sub pointed to the necessity of the abolition of all distinctions of rank and class in the Army and Navy, where all should command in turn; while the stiff and stark Morning Post was the only organ bold enough to suggest that, while recognising the unbounded value of John Hardy's services, the country should insist upon the paramount importance of law and order, and see to it that, if only formally, the young lieutenant should be court-martialed for his breach of naval discipline. But the Westminster Gazette, a couple of hours later, came out with a brilliant cartoon, lampooning the Post's idea, with the representation of a court-martial sitting over a blue-jacket for sneezing during cutlass drill on one of Her Majesty's ships; while the Evening News covered itself with fame by saying: "By the Goddess of Victory, Nelson has slain his thousands; but by Jupiter, Hardy has slain his tens of thousands!"

There was hardly a journal in the country which did not join in this chorus of acclammation which rose to greet John Hardy as he woke from sleep on the morning of the 17th of March. He was the only person in England who saw his praises with anything like equanimity.

He glanced through three of the articles, then pushed the whole heap of papers from him.

"Well, Bobbie," he said, "it is nice to see one's name all about in the prints. But what is it all for?"

"There is the opinion of England," said old Robert proudly, "about a son of John Nelson Hardy, sir!"

"Of England, Bobs?" said John; "don't you believe that. These writing fellows are not England. England is silent—great and silent. She means more, Bobs, and says less. She will love me, too, for what I have done, perhaps—but different to this talk—in her own silent way——"

He stopped, coughing.

"Ah, that cough, Master John!" said Robert.

"Bother the cough! it is rather bad this morning though, isn't it? Do you know what I think I shall do, Bobbie?"

"Well, sir?"

"Go to a hot country at once."

"A hot—what, sir?"

"A hot country, Bobs."

Bobs was alarmed. He at once suspected diplomacy—that the cough was being made to serve as an excuse. Master John was whimsical, and wilful. Bobs knew what it meant when those dry rose-lips closed tightly together.

"Which country, Master John?" said the old man tremulously.

He feared horribly that the bird was about to fly from the old cage.

"Which country, sir?" he repeated, before John answered.

"I am thinking of China, Bobbie," said John.

The old man's hands went up, meeting in terror.

"China, Master John? Oh, don't, don't say China, Master John!"

"I believe that China is a hot country—in the summer, Bobbie?" said John with an intonation of innocent query.

"I know nothing about China, Master John. Certainly, it is no fit place for such as you."

"Oh, I don't see that, Bobbie."

"But why China, Master John, if you really think of going anywhere? China, recollect, is at the other end of the world."

"But that's where my ship is, isn't it, Bobbie?"

"Your ship? What, ships again?—and you coughing there like an echo among the Chiltern Hills? Well, well, I suppose it's no use an old man talking, who has served your father before you, and your grandfather before him."

"Yes it is, Bobbie; believe me, it is, Bobs! But still—really—you will try and be good, won't you? I must go, Bobbie."

"Well, that sea!" said Bobbie, with a hand over his mouth, shaking the head of contemplative wonderment. He was thinking of that "sea-fever" which, in the history of the house of Hardy, had more than once resulted in domestic tragedy and disaster.

"Well, that sea!" he said—"those ships!"

"No, it isn't quite that, Bobbie; it isn't the sea," said John. "Don't go blaming the sea. Of course, one is fond of the sea, and all that; but that isn't quite the reason now. I feel that I must go, and I must really."

"Well, but isn't that what I said, Master John?—that it is no use an old man talking? That no one pays any heed to him; no one whom he has watched over, and yearned his heart over, more than any son? Ah——" suddenly the old man fell half over the bed, imploring with tears. "Listen to me, Master Johnnie, do, now—give up these wild thoughts! What good can come of them? So, from a boy, it always was—and did old Bobbie ever lead you wrong? Do, now, don't think of such things—it is the Enemy puts them in your head—drive them away! Here is all England going to make much of you—why not stay with old Bobbie? Don't go, my son! Don't you go! You are not in a fit state, and it is no fit place, among a pack of heathen men, fighting fiends—what good can you do? Stay here with me! Can you suppose that I would tell you wrong? Come, now, comfort old Bobbie's heart—tell me——"

Digitized by Google

Bobs shuffled off.

John Hardy rubbed his pink face against the old man's shrivelled cheek.

"It is so hard to say no to you, Bobbie," he said. "I hardly think it is right of you to urge me in that way. You see, I have made up my mind, and it is hardly—kind, is it? If one's mind is made up in a certain way, it is beyond one's power to change it, is it not? Go I must, you see."

The dry rose leaves were pressed very close together now, and Bobbie should have noticed them; but he went rashly on.

"Only listen to me, Master John," he said. "Hear me out——"

"No—no more," said John. "I bid you be silent now. Pass on a sheet of note-paper and a pencil."

Old Bobbie, mouse-quiet in a moment, hobbled to a desk, and then back with the required materials for writing.

John scribbled a few words, handed them to the old man, and said:

"It is all right, Bobbie. I am not the least cross, you know. But there are times when one must be allowed to go one's own way, aren't there? Have that telegram sent off at once, will you? And bring in a good big tumbler of champagne, will you, Bobs?"

The telegram with which Bobs shuffled off contained these words:

To Selby, Captain of English Bird, lying at Freshwater.
Please have English Bird ready to sail by Sunday night, at latest. Going coast Spain.

John Hardy.

The English Bird was a 74-ton schooner-yacht of John Hardy's own, with an easy speed of twelve knots.

CHAPTER X.

John Hardy Among Women.

John Hardy had a love-trouble. He was extremely "non-intellectual," and his passion had fastened upon a person all intellect.

Had his entry into the Royal Navy depended upon his passing the usual competitive examination as a competitor, he would certainly never have entered it. As it was, he was a "service cadet," and had received a nomination as the son of an officer of the navy who had performed long and distinguished service. Even so, he had had to pass a test examination; and in this very elementary ordeal he had failed in the subject, "French." Once more he received a nomination, and once more he was given a chance in the examination hall of the Commissioners of Cannon Row—his very last. During all that half year he was "swotting" like an elephant at the fatal "French," to the hopeless neglect of "Scripture," which was another of his weak points. During the hot week in June preceding the examination, he was a true slave of the lamp; but his strong Will this time was at work. With his lucky knack, he scraped through. The lowest number of marks which could "pass" him was 660: he got 662.

John Hardy was not a book-man; he had even a secret profound contempt for book-men, and book-learning.

Moreover, as we said before, he got into more trouble later on. While in training on board the Britannia he had been reported to the Admiralty for "unsatisfactory conduct," and had been "warned." The "unsatisfactory conduct" consisted in walking arm-in-arm with a girl of the lowest class through the streets of Dartmouth, both the girl and John being pretty far gone in a state of intoxication.

These, then, were his weak points: That he was far from literary; that he was too fond of drink; that he was too fond of feminine persons.

Up to the time at which we meet him, he still made spelling mistakes in common English words in writing ordinary letters to his friends.

In five or six of the ports of Europe there were more than one young woman who were thinking with regret and longing of the crinkled hair and angel-eyes of John Hardy. He was painfully shy in the presence of women, and he was a very clumsy and heavy lover—but he was also very beautiful and naïf: and one thing made up for the other. On the whole, he "arrived."

He loved every woman in the world; and this love was, in general, returned.

But most of all he loved Bosey Jay; and Bosey, apparently, did not love him. Her love was already taken up by something else—something which she called "Art."

Poor John Hardy had no sort of conception what "Art" was all about. He could admire the sleekness of a 111-ton gun, and give an unerring opinion on the sheer of a ship's beam; but between all that and "Art" there is a biggish interval.

Digitized by Google

Both the girl and John being pretty far gone in a state of intoxication.

He went to see her on the afternoon of the day on which he sent the telegram to Freshwater. A narrow strip of black plaster concealed the scratch on his forehead. He was in the habit, even on visits of ceremony, of wearing a rather rough and heavy pea-jacket, such as pilots wear, with brass buttons, and thus attired, he went out into the streets, a soft felt hat on his head.

Could he have been recognised, he would have been lifted high on the shoulders of the people, and carried to his destination.

A servant ushered him into a very dainty inner room at Park Lane—a kind of luxurious studio-boudoir, in a rather Greek style, with Corinthian pillows, and flimsy saffron hangings. Bosey was an heiress, and lived in a stately solitude. There now she sat before an easel, with brush and mahl stick and palette.

She was a lady of many accomplishments. She sang like a bird; she had written two novels of the "problem" kind; she was a sociologist; she had painted one knows not how many pictures; she was not yet nineteen; and she was rather pretty.

Bosey had a fairly substantial body, with a waist, that struck one as being quite as large as that of Eve or Venus. She wore her red-gold hair in coil upon coil of négligé richness about her head; her eyes were a bright green.

In her large countenance, and the curves of her full lips, there was quick intelligence, and strong self-assurance. The hard bones of her corsets were not more visible through her bodice than the iron which underlay her character, as evidenced in her face.

"Oh, Mr. Hardy, I am glad!" she cried, springing up vivaciously as John entered the studio. "Ah, and I have heard! I have heard!"

"About the battle, and all that?"

"What else, if 'all that' means Mr. John Hardy? Do sit down. How very brave you must be!"

"All Englishmen are brave."

"Are they? A good many of them are detestable cowards, to my certain knowledge. Men do so live in regions of fantasy! Women are more prosaic—and clearer. Did you ever see an average English girl in the sovereign presence of a mouse, Mr. Hardy?"

"Girls are different," said John.

Bosey's lips tightened with pressure. This was precisely the kind of ancient point of view, purely male, to which she had the most touchy antipathy. John was hopelessly "old," she actively "new."

"Oh, different, of course," she said, "in pose of nervous structure, and so on, and so on. But is it not rather cheap to say it? And substitute for the mouse the broker's man, and you get at once a measure of the average Englishman's courage."

"Somebody has been telling you wrong," said John. "All Englishmen are brave. Only foreign people are afraid of things."

She looked at him in absolute pity, for his narrowness, his insularism, his unintelligence.

"But why telling me, Mr. Hardy? Did you say telling me? Can it be that you still think an ordinary educated girl incapable of observing for herself? You have still quite the harem idea I see."

"I? Oh, now you are not kind. Why, if you only knew how much I like girls!"

"Merci! That is so—condescendingly good of you."

"Ah, now you are sarcastic."

"Ha! ha! You are too shrewd, you know."

"I never know whether you are making fun of me, or not."

"Well, what does it matter, Mr. John?" she said, softening. "It could be of no consequence, one way or the other."

"But it is not nice to be made fun of by some one whom you like."

"Really like?"

"You know."

"You are too complimentary."

"Like isn't the word. I think I like you better than anyone in the whole world."

"Now you are spooney—deliberately so."

"I should be as happy as the Queen, if you would only like me back."

"Spooney! Spooney!"

"You are not making fun?"

"Don't be so suspicious. You are too penetrating."

"Well, what do you say?"

"To what?"

"To my liking you so much?"

"I say that it is distinctly and malignantly spooney."

Digitized by Google

"But do you like me back?"

"Oh, I! Well, yes, as you ask me. I like you—back. But in my own fashion, you understand; not in that wickedly and designingly spooney way."

"I do not understand you," said John. "You are not like other girls."

"Then logically you should not like me, since you like other girls so very, very much."

"I do, though. I like you much better than any of the others. You must not go by Logic."

"Ah, but I am nothing, if not logical, Mr. Hardy."

"But facts are facts, aren't they? If logic contradicts a Fact, then you must throw the logic overboard to the sharks. I tell you I like you better than anyone. That is enough."

"Enough for what?—for me?"

"It should be."

"Really? But our human nature is more or less complex, I suppose? Do you mean that the mere fact of your caring for me should be enough to lead me to corresponding actions? That is absurd, you know. I take it that you are a great advocate of the 'free-born Briton' principle, and all that, aren't you? Well, I am, too. Listen, Mr. Hardy: we first met, how long ago?—about five weeks, I think—at Lady Sinclair's, you remember. And since then, how many times?—about six, perhaps. Well, I can see that you are used to easy conquests, you know; and at once I detected that you were laying yourself out to be captured by me, if I chose to take the trouble to capture you. But I did not choose! I have other things—quite other things—to think of, and it will be as much as I can possibly do, supposing I live for eighty years in tolerable health of body, to get through the little all I have in mind. I am not going to say that it is out of the question that some day I may not allow myself to be seduced into marriage by some man or other, but, at the moment, it is a thing as wildly remote from the actual current of my thoughts, that, I assure you, it has quite the look of an impossibility. All the time, mind you, I am vividly alive to the fact that it is very nice to be petted and kissed by charming lips; but it is not, you see, precisely what I have chosen for myself. You know about 'scorning delights and living laborious days,' don't you? Well, that is my way. So I beg, once and for all, that you will be more sensible with respect to me for the future, Mr. John."

As the last words passed her lips, a long sigh escaped from John Hardy, and this sentence, barely whispered, came from him:

"You are the girl for me, by the Lord!"

She heard him, and cried:

"Mr. Hardy!"

At that moment he had first definitely resolved to marry her. His lips were pressed together.

"I am going to China in a day or two," he said. "I should very much like to marry you before I go."

She broke into ripples of evil laughter.

"Not so soon! Not so soon!" she cried.

"When I come back," he said simply.

She looked into his face in unfeigned surprise.

"Have I not told you?" she cried, almost with alarm. "What do you mean? I am a free subject, you know. This is not Turkey; this is not—Peru. Do you mean that because you are to be the national hero, and all that . . .? Oh, but that is in rather bad taste, then!"

"I love you!"

"I don't care!"

"I do!"

"You do not!"

"I shall have you yet!"

"Have me? What do you mean?"

"I shall have you."

"Silly. Go away! This is too absurd!"

She stamped. The dry rose-leaves had brushed her cheek

"Oh, Mr. Hardy, I am so glad."

So far had passion led John Hardy. Then he started backward—to this point he had never dared before, on his own initiative. A shock of shyness gripped him; he blushed a vivid scarlet.

"Ah, now I have presumed," he said, stammering. "Forgive me—I will go——"

"Well, it is of no consequence, Mr. Hardy," she answered, "but perhaps you had better go."

"Well then— But you understand that I am going to China?"

"Perfectly. You are lucky. I should like to go there also. The Chinese are quite charming artists."

"While I am away you will not be marrying anyone else?"

"Not I. You may be confident that I shall remain ab-so-lute-ly self-sufficient. Even the new National Darling, you see, cannot tempt me."

"Good-bye. I am going."

"Then go."

"When I come back from China, I shall have you."

"Well, we won't argue the point now. I am awfully sorry for you, you know, because you look cut up. But you will soon get over it, and it will do you good. You were over confident, you know. Will you say good-bye, now?"

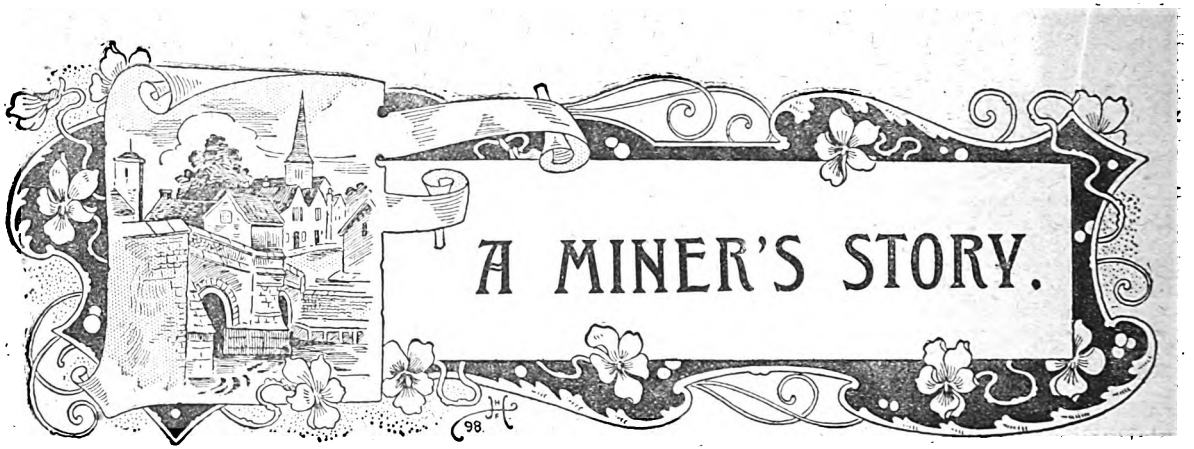
"May I kiss your hand?"

"Yes, if that is any comfort to you."

He kissed her hand with an old-fashioned reverent grace; caught up his hat from the top of a cabinet, and was gone.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google



There were only three in our party. Tom and I had come to Coolgardie together, being old mates, and we came across Bill. He was a queer chap always, but he would work all day like a horse. Why, he seemed as if he worked of nights after he's turned in, did Bill.

When Tom and I first came across him, Bill was down on his luck. This Tusker had just about panned out, and he hadn't got a shilling left to buy water, which, seeing how water was £1 a bucket at Coolgardie just then, was awkward. Yes, we were a godsend to Bill, that's about what we were, Tom and I, when we offered to take him in mates. Not but what it was right enough for us, too. Tom and I had a matter of maybe £30 between us, and we were pretty old hands at the job, but the place was new to us, and Coolgardie, like most fields, had ways of its own. Now, Bill, he'd been here two months, and he knew all there was to know about the place, and so it came about as we went mates with Bill, and just then Bill was mighty glad to be took by anybody as could get a bit of tucker and a bucket of water.

One thing was sure, Bill hadn't always been a digger; he hadn't been at it very long, that was clear.

We stopped at Coolgardie for a month, and it was long enough, too. Gold there was, but it wanted finding, and we didn't find it.

We were getting pretty near tired of it; especially Bill. One day there came news that gold had been struck heavy to the north-west, a matter of twenty miles off or so. Bill was wild to be off, and though we heard that there was no water found yet it stood to reason that somebody would find it, and, anyhow, water carts were sure to go where there was gold. The new field was out beyond the red-sunset range, and we concluded to see what it was like.

When we reached the place we camped in a likely-looking spot all by ourselves. Tom called it Dry-grass Gully, because it was one sheet of some short grass as yellow as gold. There was no time to lose, for, do your best, you had to drink more water than another party to be seen from the ridge of our gully. It looked like a race between luck and thirst, and the thirst was sure while the luck was doubtful. I can't say I liked the look of things, no more did Tom, but Bill was just wild.

Anyhow, we had come and we were bound to give it a trial. For three days we worked in that gully early and late, and every hour the water got lower, and we grew more and more thirsty. Thirst! Never in all my life had I known what it meant before—our throats burnt and ached, our eyes sank in our heads, our hands began to tremble, and, work as hard as we might, our skin got drier and hotter. We had found gold. It was no use trying to dig for it, but we had hunted about over a good part of the gully and there was gold everywhere. But what was the good? That night when we knocked off there was only about a quart and a half of water left in the keg. I looked at Tom and Tom looked at me, and I could see that it was settled.

"It's all up, mate," said Tom, "and a pity, too, for there's gold here, and no mistake."

I looked at Bill, but he said nothing.

"Yes, Tom," I replied, "it's all we'll do to get back on the water that is left, unless we have the luck to fall in with some."

Bill looked from one of us to the other, and at last he broke out:

"Going back, are you? Going back, when here's gold to make us rich, waiting for us?"

"It'll have to wait, then, mate," said Tom. "Gold's good, but it ain't quite good enough."

Bill looked from Tom to me, and his eyes shone in the dusk of the tent.

"You mean it, do you?" he said, in a sort of hoarse whisper.

"Mean it? I should say so, mate!" said Tom, his throat too dry to allow him to say much more.

Bill looked round, first at one and then at the other of us, and then without a word he got up and flung himself out of the tent. I saw him marching down the gully throwing his arms above his head in the moonlight, for it was full moon that night.

"Bill's cranky, Tom," said I.

"Looks like it, mate. Well, he'll come to his bearings by morning."

With that Tom coiled himself on his blanket and went to sleep, and after a minute or two I did the same. It was daylight when I awoke and looked round. There was Tom lying where he dropped overnight, but I saw nothing of Bill.

Digitized by Google

"Hullo," I tried to say, but I couldn't say it rightly, my throat was so dry. "Bill isn't here, Tom," said I.

"No, more he ain't," answered Tom, sitting up; "the more water for you and me, mate."

We scrambled out from under the tent. The sun was just up, but there wasn't a sign of Bill, look where we would.

"The dickens," said Tom suddenly, looking hard at the tent. "He's been here, sure enough, and left this note. Dick, you're a scollard, wot's this wrote on the tent?"

Sure enough, on the flap of the tent, was written, with something that looked like chalk:

"You want to go back to Coolgardie—you can go. I've found what I came for, and it's mine now. Good-bye, Bill."

"He's mad, Tom," said I at last, "and he's gone without a drain of water, poor beggar."

"Mad or not, I expect he's come across a nugget, and he means to keep it. Not if I knows it, mate, not by chalks. Fair dealings atween mates is wot I says."

It was never much good arguing with Tom. He was bent on getting hold of Bill and sharing the nugget. At last I gave in, and we risked it and started. It was easy to see the way Bill had gone, for there were his marks on the soft ground and sand, not clear, but as like as not the first steps that had ever been there since it was first made. "He couldn't have gone far," Tom said, and we took the drop of water that was left and started.

I won't tell you how we struggled on hour after hour, and how we suffered from the heat of the sun and from thirst. But at last the sun went down behind a hill.

Suddenly I found myself in a blinding glare of sunlight once more, and then I knew, though I couldn't see, that I had at last reached the top of a hill. I put my trembling hand over my eyes, and little by little I began to see. At first it was gold, gold, only a great sea of shining, dazzling gold—then it began to grow clear and I saw—oh, heavens, what was it I saw? Water! Yes, glittering, flashing, blazing, it was water! Tom was behind me now, and I tried to shout; but I could only point and wave my arms like a madman.

In another minute Tom had come up. He was, like me, nearly dead, and staggered like a drunkard; but he got there somehow.

But where was Bill? I looked and Tom looked. There was the golden grass, and the low bushes, and the water that flashed and quivered in the low bottom, where the sunlight made a yellow haze round the trees that stood here and there with drooping boughs along the course of the creek; but not a living creature in sight—not a sign of the mate we had risked so much to find.

We stood for a minute, and then Tom whispered hoarsely:

"Look here, mate, wot's the odds about Bill? Here's water, which is better than nuggets."

We staggered rather than walked down the slope with the level sun shining in our faces. We dragged one heavy foot after the other. Doggedly, slowly, feebly, we did it; but somehow we did do it.

Tom had got a few yards ahead, and of a sudden he stopped. As I came up he pointed to one side and whispered:

"Look, mate, Bill's there!"

He was. Parched as we were, we couldn't pass him. The gush and the whisper of the water was in our ears; but we couldn't pass Bill. Could he hear it, too? We crept over to where he lay. He was half sitting, half lying against a boulder, and he was looking the other way, so that we couldn't see his face, but Tom had been right. A big, rough, shapeless lump of almost pure gold was lying on the sand before him—his hands lay beside it on the ground—his fingers somehow looked as if they had been stroking it.

"Bill!" I said as loud as I could. "Bill!"

He never turned his head—he never moved. I went closer—I looked in his face—then I knew. Bill was dead. His hollow eyes stared out straight before him; his head was bent a little forward as if he were listening. With the sound of the water in his ears, with his nugget on the ground at his side—Bill was dead.

We looked at him, but we said nothing. Then we staggered down to the creek—it wasn't fifty yards off from where he lay. There we drank and drank again. Then we let the water run over our hands and dipped our dry faces in the stream. At last we went back to Bill.

We stood and looked at him, Tom and I.

"What's that in his other hand, mate?" Tom said in a whisper.

It was a letter, worn and brown, and frayed along the edge.

"Let's bury it with him, Tom," I said.

"Not us, mate. Fair dealings between mates—that's what I say—maybe it'll tell who it belongs to—read it, mate; it can't hurt no one now."

I read the letter as well as I could. No need to say what it said, but when I had read it both Tom and I looked in Bill's dead face, and then we understood. It wasn't a new story—I had heard it often before—a story of a young, delicate wife and her little children brought to want and disgrace by a thoughtless husband and father, and yet seeming to love him all the more. No wonder Bill was mad to get gold—no wonder he looked anxious and eager.

"What's the address?" Tom asked me, after a bit.

I told him what was on the letter. Tom stooped and lifted the big nugget in both hands.

"Right, mate," he said. "There's enough here to give them a start."

Not another word was said. So Tom gave up his share; so Bill got his nugget after all.

A. H. Parsons.

Result of "Empress" Competition.

A copy of "The Final War" has been forwarded to each of the following competitors, who discovered the greatest number of discrepancies between the text and illustrations in the first instalment of "The Empress of the Earth":

T. E. Gooden, 19 Bark Street, Bolton.
T. W. Rose, 103 Derby Road, Southampton.
G. Batty, 13 Regent Road, Morecambe.
J. E. Sorrel, 196 Lakedale Road, Plumstead.
L. W. Judd, 2 Alfred Villas, Stanton Road, Barnes.
J. Murphy, 36 Clorliffe Road, Dublin.
R. Phipps, 16 Hall Street, Sale, Cheshire.
J. Ferguson, 7 Tullock's Buildings, Inverness.
G. H. Perceval, 17 Warminster Road, South Norwood.
W. Gyde, The Barracks, Warley, Essex.

Digitized by Google

A LOW LIFE IDYL.

Among the dingy and humble streets of the eastern part of a huge, cruel metropolis, a little boy had dwelt for seven years, in the shabbiest street of them all, and had scarcely known a single day when he could move his tiny and wasted body without pangs of the sharpest pain.

He had only his mother for a companion, though often the neighbours were kind, and would come in and sit beside him and say cheering words—women and little girls would chiefly, and sometimes, of an evening men. Boys rarely came, and when they did appear they always had a shy and constrained manner as though their parents had forced them to see the presence of the little sufferer.

Often his mother would be compelled to spend hours away from him, which were passed in solitude, for his mother was very poor and had to go and seek what work she could get; the neighbours were all very poor as well, and sometimes were forced to leave babies in their cradles with only a child, not as old as Willie himself, to watch them.

But while the slow years dragged along, Willie had grown to find a great consolation during these periods of loneliness. Once very long ago, as it now seemed to him, his mother had said, when he was peevish and fretful because of his incessant pain:

"Suppose you can't get up and walk about, and play like other children! There's little Lottie Lynn, just over the way, who's the same age you are, and hasn't spoken a single word. She's deaf and dumb. Now oughtn't you to be thankful that God didn't make you deaf and dumb?"

Willie reflected for a while. Then he said: "Yes; I ought to be thankful, mother." After more musing, he added: "Can't she say a single word?"

"No, not one, Willie. Just think of it! She was born so."

"Wouldn't they let her come over here and see me?" asked Willie, after another pause.

"I'm afraid not," replied Mrs. Gray, pursing her lips rather grimly. "Her mother's a proud sort. She's 'shamed she's got a dumb child, I believe. But there the child is, Willie, over the way! Now you rec'lect about her, and just bless your lucky stars you ain't afflicted like poor Lottie Lynn!"

Willie kept pondering day by day, and week by week, on the wretched fate of the child so near him. It must be so dreadful not to have the power of speech. Many a forlorn moment was soothed for him by the thought that he could tell his mother just where the pain was, and have her give him what help she could.

"Does Lottie Lynn ever feel as ill as I do?" he once asked; and the question startled his mother into a merciful falsehood.

"Oh, yes, Willie, she's very ill sometimes."

"And she can't talk about it," murmured Willie. "She can't tell them how to help her, like I can. That must be very bad, mother, mustn't it?"

"Oh, terrible bad—terrible!" And Mrs. Gray's kiss touched her boy's wan cheek. "Now just think how grateful you should be!"

"Yes, yes!" said Willie. And soon afterwards, during a surcease of distress, he fell asleep with "poor Lottie Lynn" on his lips.

Later he said to his mother: "Lottie Lynn ain't always ill is she?"

"N—no; not always."

"Oh, then, I do wish they would let her come over and see me on one of her well days! Won't you ask 'em? Won't you?"

The idea of meeting Lottie Lynn preyed, through some strange sympathy of misery, upon Willie's mind. "Poor little thing," he would keep saying to himself over and over again, with a compassion pathetically droll, "poor little thing!"

"I declare I'll just go and ask them Lynns if they won't let the child come over here an' set by my boy," Mrs. Gray at length decided.

But her project failed. Mrs. Lynn was a small, fragile woman, who never left her rooms except when forced to leave them. She worked monotonously all day at a sewing-machine, and her young daughters, of whom there were three or four with slight difference between their ages, did all her errands. But Lottie, the little dumb girl, hardly ever left her side.

"Oh, no, Mrs. Gray!" she said, in answer to the request of Willie's mother. "I can't spare Lottie—I really can't!"

And her thin, bluish lips tightened as she looked down at the half-finished garment which lay limp and white below the perpendicular sewing-machine needle, with its steely glitter.

"Very well; just as you say," sniffed her visitor.

She thought her neighbour's reluctance meant pride, but it meant only shame. She hated to have her dumb Lottie go abroad. She dreaded those heedless and cynical comments which might be passed upon the afflicted child. She made more money than Mrs. Gray did, and in a general way got on better with her family of fatherless little girls. It was, doubtless, cruel and ill-judged of Willie's mother to define her motive so harshly. But Mrs. Gray passed from her presence with an angry and gloomy discontent.

For many months afterwards Willie lay in his bed, bearing the burden of his weakness and his intense fits of bodily torment with far more patience than of old. Mrs. Gray knew her darling could never be cured, and never even be permanently eased. Hospital doctors had told her so, and a really great physician had once dropped into her boy's room, and made a thorough examination of his poor twisted little body. He had told her that Willie's case was a very remarkable one, considering how long he had lived, and that it would be a miracle if he should survive his seventh year.

Digitized by Google

And now, in his seventh year, he showed signs that his feeble life was flickering. He would have fainting fits, and these made her fearful of leaving him alone. Still, by the most rigid thrift she had managed to save a little money, and work was not an immediate necessity. While she now kept almost ceaseless vigil at her son's bedside, one or two of the neighbours would slip into the room every day; and so, on a certain afternoon, there came to her the whispered tidings that the little dumb girl across the street had suddenly died.

She was a very humane and sweet-hearted woman, and yet for a while she forgot even to pity Mrs. Lynn. All through his later illness Willie had been murmuring half-broken sentences about "poor little dumb Lottie Lynn," and she had made up her mind that in a day or two if her boy rallied again, she would go over and beg Lottie's mother, even if she had to beg on her knees, that the child might be brought to her son. And now, Lottie was dead.

Towards evening she grew mindful of her own selfishness. A kind-hearted girl who lived on the lower floor —an old friend of Willie's—volunteered to sit by him while she paid a visit of sympathy to Mrs. Lynn. She and her bereaved neighbour became fast friends from that hour.

"You spoke so sweet and nice to me," said the mother of Lottie, a day or two after her child's funeral. "I could see how you felt for me. Nobody was quite like you, somehow. I s'pose it's because of your own poor sick boy. And I wouldn't let Lottie go to him, though you told me he he wanted to see her."

"Never mind that," said Mrs. Gray.

"Oh, yes, I do mind it," returned Mrs. Lynn, as she sat in a chair, weak and white, wrapped in a heavy shawl which Mrs. Gray had lent her, and watched by her silent, wide-eyed little girls, all so like the dead one, and the eldest of them seeming absurdly young by contrast with her sisters. "How's your Willie? Is he any better to-day?"

"No; he's worse, I believe," said Mrs. Gray. "I just ran over to see how you was. I've got to go back at once. Tilly Ratchett—you know Tilly—is minding him. But oh, Mrs. Lynn, he does moan and call so for——"

The speaker paused. The two women stared into each others eyes. Mrs. Lynn understood, and her slim, pale throat quivered.

"I know what you mean," she muttered. "Here's the other girls. Any one of 'em would do. Take Lizzie, there. She and Lottie, except for an inch or so in height, was like as two peas. Lizze'll play off her sister. She'll keep mum—won't you, Liz dear?"

"Oh, yes," cried the child thus addressed. She sprang to her mother's side; she was intelligent, even for her age, which had nearly passed nine years. She met Mrs. Gray's worriedly questioning eyes with a sweet, firm look.

"I understand what you want me to do, Mrs. Gray," she said. She was a comely child, with fluffy, flaxen hair, and fresh, pink lips and beautifully white teeth.

"God bless you!" faltered Mrs. Gray. She caught the little girl to her breast and kissed her. "Come over with me, then, Lizzie. He doesn't dream your sister's dead. I wouldn't let anybody tell him; I didn't dare. And you'll make believe dumb, just like Lottie, won't you?"

"Oh, yes," said Lizzie with great solemnity. "I'll—I'll make believe, Mrs. Gray, all I can."

Willie lay in sore pain when his new guest was brought to him; but he brightened, and even laughed aloud as he heard that Lottie Lynn, the dumb girl, had consented to come and see him at last. He clutched Lizzie's plump and rosy little hand in his own wan and frail one. "Oh, I'm so glad, I'm so glad!" he murmured. "You can't speak, Lottie, can you? It's too bad! But you don't look ill. Mother said you were ill sometimes, but I s'pose you've got quite well now, ain't you?"

He failed to remember, in his happy excitement, that his mother had told him Lottie Lynn was deaf as well as dumb.

"I dunno what I should do, Lottie, if I couldn't talk at all, like you can't. It must be awful hard never to say the least mite of a word to nobody.

"Oh, Lottie," cried the boy's plaintive voice, "I do suffer so! I do suffer so!"

And then Lizzie Lynn forgot the part she was playing. Catching Willie's hand in both her own, she leaned over him and answered: "I am so sorry for you! I am! I am!"

Mrs. Gray, terrified and astonished, hurried to the bed and separated the children's hands. Another fainting fit had fallen upon her son, and when he awoke from it Lizzie Lynn had gone.

But Willie had remembered her words to him. "Lottie Lynn was so sorry for me, mother," he repeatedly said, through all the stillness of the night which followed, "that she forgot she was born dumb, didn't she? And now she won't be dumb any more, will she? Ain't that nice? Ain't it nice?"

And a little after dawn, with these two self-comforting questions on his lips, Willie Gray died.

Will Summers.

DO YOU KNOW ANY SUNDAY-SCHOOL TEACHERS?

IF SO, READ THIS.

The Editor of the Sunday Reader is sending each week to one thousand Sunday-schools a free and carriage paid parcel of current numbers of the Sunday Reader.

The copies are not sent to the same Sunday-schools each week, but a register is kept, and every week one thousand names are selected for free grants of Sunday Readers until the whole register has been dealt with and every school on the list has received a parcel of papers.

The journals sent are not back numbers, but the current week's issue, and are, therefore, worth one penny each. No charge whatever is made to the Sunday-schools participating in this grant, even the postage being paid by the Sunday Reader.

All Superintendents or Teachers who wish their Sunday-schools to benefit by this remarkable offer, should send a post-card to the address below at once, stating the name and address of the school, and also of the Superintendent. Parcels will in all cases be forwarded to the Superintendent. The papers may be used in any way likely to benefit the Sunday-school.

Every Sunday-school in Britain may be put upon the register and the names will be taken in rotation and Sunday Readers sent in due course.

Applications must be only upon post-cards, and should be addressed "Sunday-school," Sunday Reader Office, 17 Henrietta street, London, W.C. The number of scholars in the school should be stated.

This is not an offer to certain Sunday-schools, but every Sunday-school in the country may participate.

Digitized by Google

THE GOOSEHERD.

Yes, there is a difference in the feelings of the refined and the uncultured classes, which makes it impossible for them to live happily together. I had an experience of this in my first love.

Do you know who my first love was? A gooseherd—a real gooseherd. I am not joking. Long after I was a highly respectable young lady, I wept bitter tears over the sorrow he had caused me.

To be sure, at the time when he first set my heart a-fire, I was still in that period of my life when my highest ideal of happiness was to go barefoot. I was eight, he about ten years old; I was the daughter of the lord of the manor, he, the son of our smith.

In the morning, as I was drinking coffee upon the balcony with mamma and my elder brother, he used to go by with his geese and vanish in the direction of the heath. At first he stared at us with naive wonder, without thinking to remove his cap; but after my brother had admonished him that it would be suitable for him to offer a morning greeting to the quality, he would swing his cap in great circles in the air and call up to us, "Good-morning, all," exactly as though he had learnt it by heart.

If my brother happened to be in a good humour I would receive permission to take a roll down to him, as a recognition of his urbanity. This he always snatched out of my hand with a certain greedy anxiety, as though there were danger of my taking it back again.

I can see him now; his sleek, blonde hair hung in a yellow thatch over his sunburnt cheeks; from under it his blue eyes peeped slyly and merrily out; his tattered trousers he had rolled up above his knees, and in his hand he held a slender willow switch, in the green bark of which his skilful hand had cut a spiral row of white rings.

My childish desire first fastened itself upon this switch. I thought it would be charming to hold in my hand such a marvel, so different from all my playthings, and when I had completed the picture by imagining myself driving geese with it and going barefoot, I had reached the pinnacle of earthly bliss.

Naturally, it was this same switch which drew us together. One morning I secretly clapped together the roll spread with honey which I was eating and, hastily excusing myself, ran after him.

When he saw me coming he stopped and looked at me in astonishment, but as soon as he spied the roll in my hand his eye beamed with intelligence.

"Will you give me your switch?" I asked.

"Naw—why?" he returned.

"Because I want it," I replied haughtily, adding more mildly, "and I will give you my roll."

His glance rested longingly upon the dainty morsel, but finally he said: "Naw, I must herd the geese with it; but I'll make you one jus' like it."

"Can you do that yourself?" I asked, filled with admiration.

"Oh, that's nothin' at all," he laughed scornfully. "I c'n make flutes too."

I was so completely carried away by this that I handed him my roll without further ceremony.

That evening brought me the promised switch, which was even more beautiful than my boldest dreams had painted it. What a happy creature I was!

After that we were friends. I divided with him the dainties which were showered from all sides upon me, the darling of the household. In return he dedicated to me the creations of his nimble fingers—flutes, little boxes, houses, dolls' furniture, and above all, his celebrated dancing men, through which I presently became the terror of the entire family.

Digitized by Google

Behind the goose coop we held our nightly rendezvous, and exchanged our gifts.

I looked forward all day with joy to this occasion, my thoughts busied with my young hero. I saw him lying in the grass on the sunny heath playing his flute, while I was being tormented with abominable French verbs, and my desire to share that happiness called goose-herding, grew stronger and stronger.

When I confided my feeling to him, he laughed aloud and said:

"Why don't you come too?"

That was enough; and without further deliberation I replied:

"I will go to-morrow."

"But don't forget to bring something to eat," my friend reminded me.

Fortune favoured me. Mademoiselle had a headache at exactly the right time, and put off our lesson. Half beside myself with joy and fear, I sat at the coffee-table, and waited until he came by. My pockets were stuffed full of all sorts of dainties which I had begged from "Mamselle," and beside me lay the switch, which I thought to-day to brandish in loyal fulfilment of my duty.

There he came marching along. He glanced at me with a sly twinkle in his eye as he roared his "Good-morning, all" at us. As soon as I could escape without being observed, I ran after him.

"What have you brought?" was his first remark.

"Two spice cakes, two pieces of bread-and-butter, with brain sausage, a sardine sandwich, and a piece of gooseberry tart," I said, displaying my riches.

He immediately began to eat, while I, scarcely able to restrain my joy, proudly drove the geese before us.

Away on the heath we played husband and wife. Elsie, the tamest of the geese, was our child. We had almost kissed and thrashed the poor thing to death before it succeeded by unheard-of exertions in freeing itself from our hands. After this I prepared dinner for my husband. I took off my white apron, laid it upon the grass for a tablecloth, and grouped the remainder of our food upon it. He seated himself gravely down before it, and I, for my part, was so happy to see with what dispatch he consumed one thing after another that our little house was almost too small to contain me.

The hours passed as in a dream. The sun mounted higher and higher, until its glowing rays shone straight down upon us. I began to feel tired and stupid. I was also hungry; but my husband had eaten everything up. My mouth was dry, and my lips feverish. To cool them, I picked the damp grasses and pressed them to my mouth.

Suddenly the sound of ringing bells floated from afar across the wood. I knew well what that implied; it was the noon signal calling me to dinner.

I sprang up and ran as though pursued by furies.

The next morning my poor friend appeared in the rôle of kidnapper and abductor before the High Court of Inquisition. He seemed to regard it as a matter of course that he should figure as whipping-boy, made not the slightest attempt to shift any of the blame from his own shoulders, and took the chastisement administered by my brother with the utmost peace of mind.

Pensively smiling, he rubbed his smarting back on the posts of the verandah, and then hastily took his departure, while I rolled on the ground, sobbing bitterly.

After that I loved him. I devised a thousand expedients to meet him secretly. I purloined like a magpie, in order that he might refresh himself upon the fruits of my thefts. I almost overwhelmed him with tenderness in my efforts to undo that dreadful whipping.

He allowed my love to pass quietly over him, and repaid me with touching attachment and a healthy appetite.

Half a year later fate separated us, and it was nine years before I returned to my old home. My return was sadder than I had ever anticipated. A severe nervous fever attacked me, which confined me for many weeks to my bed. Medical skill had, indeed, wrested me from death, but the blooming young maiden had become a pale, weak shadow. My doctor prescribed as a tonic country air and pine-needle baths, so I was bundled into the train and transported to our country estate.

As I lay back in my chair, thinking, I wondered what had become of my old friend.

"What has become of him?" I asked my brother, and received the pleasant information that he had grown into a spruce, clever lad, and was already the efficient assistant of his father, the smith.

I felt how my heart beat. I tried to reason myself out of such foolishness, but was only partially successful. The dear old memories would not be driven away. Finally I fought them no longer, but painted the picture of our meeting with all the gorgeous colouring of fairyland.

A few days after my arrival I was able to take my first drive, that is to say, I was lifted into the carriage and driven to a peaceful little spot in the woods, where I was laid on the soft moss.

I had selected the place with great care. It offered a view of the smithy, where the playfellow of my youth was at work.

My brother wished to remain with me, and I besought him earnestly not to let me interfere with his customary occupations, for the little maid who attended me quite sufficed to protect me from surprise. And what harm could come to me in the peaceful home wood?

So he drove back home, promising to return for me within two hours.

Then I sent my little companion off to pick strawberries, cautioning her, however, to remain near at hand, and away she sprang with a gleeful shout.

I was alone. Thank goodness, now I could dream to my heart's content. The firs rustled above me, and from the smithy the muffled sound of the hammer rang out on the summer air. The fire upon the forge was blazing brightly, and now and again a dark figure passed in front of it. That must be he.

I never tired of following his movements. I admired his strength and trembled for his safety when the glowing sparks flew about him.

The moments slipped by. My brother surprised me in the midst of my dreamy observation.

"Well, has the time seemed long to you?" he asked jokingly.

I shook my head smilingly and tried to raise myself a little, but was obliged to sink back exhausted on my cushions.

"H'm, h'm!" he said meditatively. "I left the coachman at home, because I thought I could lift you into the carriage by myself; but the seat is high, and I fear I shall hardly be able to accomplish it without hurting you. Grete," turning to the little maid, who had quickly put in an appearance upon the return of the carriage, "run to the smith—the young one, you know—and ask him to come and help me."

He threw a copper on the ground, which the little one, beaming with joy, picked up before running away.

Digitized by Google

I felt the blood mount hotly to my cheeks. I should see him again. He would perform the part of a good Samaritan towards me. Pressing my hand to my fluttering heart, I sat and waited until—until——

Yes, that is he! How strong and handsome he has grown! Clustering fair hair waves around his smoke-blackened countenance, and a soft down covers his powerful chin. Thus must young Siegfried have looked when he was apprenticed to the wicked Mime.

He awkwardly lifts the little cap which sits so saucily on the back of his head, but, smilingly, I hold out my hand and ask: "How are you?"

"How should I be? Very well," he answers with an embarrassed laugh, carefully wiping his sooty fingers upon his leathern apron before accepting my proffered hand.

"Help me lift my sister into the carriage," says my brother.

He wipes his hands again and seizes me—not very gently—by the shoulders; my brother lifts my feet, and in a moment I lie safely upon the carriage cushions.

"Thank you! thank you," I cry, nodding at him smilingly.

He stands at the carriage door, turning his cap in his hands in a confused manner, and glancing first at me and then at my brother.

"He has something on his mind," say I to myself. "The sight of me has recalled old memories—he wishes to talk with me of the happy days when we, in childish innocence, herded geese together; but he does not dare in the presence of my brother. I must help him a little."

"Well, of what are you thinking?" I inquire, looking at him in a most friendly and encouraging manner.

My brother, who had been attending to the horses, turns round and glances at him.

"Ah, so you want your pour-boire," he says, reaching in his pocket.

I feel as though I had been struck. "For pity's sake, Max," I stammer, turning hot and cold.

My brother does not hear me, however, and hands him—really, he dare!—and hands him a mark!

I imagine I see the friend of my youth throwing the coin in my brother's face. I struggle up and stretch out my hands to prevent trouble, but what do I see? No, it is not possible, and yet—with my own eyes I see him take the money. He says, "Thank you, kindly." He bows—he is gone.

And I? I stare after him as though he were an evil spirit, and then, with a sigh, sink feebly back upon the cushions.

Thus, my friend, I took leave of my childhood's dream.

I expected my old companion to refuse the proffered coin with dignified indignation, but, to my intense surprise and disappointment, he clutched eagerly at it, and put it into his pocket with glib words of thanks. He turned back to the smithy, and I drove away with my brother.

My hero was a hero no longer. It cost me many a pang for a few days, and then I saw the truth of the remark I made at the beginning. There is a difference in the feelings of the two classes. Malcolm Hawse.

The Knowing Birds Read

THE BIG BUDGET.

When the pie was opened the birds began to sing,
The B.B. is a paper fit to set before a king.

Digitized by Google

Tonio el Matador.

On the cattle farm where live old Don Antonio, his daughter, Dona Ana, with her husband, Juan Moreno, el matador de toros, and their little four-year-old son, Tonio, there is to-day very great rejoicing. To-morrow is the feast day of San Antonio, and there is to be a grand bull fight, at which Juan is to fight two bulls.

Poor Juan had been badly gored over six months ago, and since that time has not been able to do any fighting. He has not been able to make any money. This fact his father-in-law, old Don Antonio, does not let him forget, so Juan is glad that he is to have a chance of stopping the old man's sneers. The old man does not object to looking after his daughter and little Tonio, but he does not care to have Juan about him. And so, when Juan is offered a place in the big fight, he accepts it gladly. As for Dona Ana and Tonio, they are almost out of their heads with delight. Tonio, in his eagerness, betakes himself to the great corral, where he gleefully announces to the assembled peons, and to his own special pet, Diablo, the great black Andalusian bull, who is just his own age, and who loves him devotedly, the great news that to-morrow his own father is to fight two big bulls in the plaza de Toros: that he, Tonio, is to go with mamma, and sit just at the back of the big gate, where he can see it all; that his father is to wear such a lovely costume, all gold and silver and lace, and how glad he is that he is going—how he wishes that he could take all of them, even Diablo!

Poor little Tonio! He does not know, and the peons won't tell him, that El Diablo will be at the bull fight, that he is entered on the bills for the second fight! But not knowing this, Tonio is careful to spend quite a long time with Diablo, giving him sugar, and patting and rubbing his head, appreciating which the great animal affectionately licks the little boy's head and rubs gently against him.

The tremendous bull ring is packed when the three reached it at three o'clock that afternoon. The great patio, or ground floor of the ring, is sanded over, circled all about with the great wooden first barrier. This is where the bulls are fought. And along the top of this high wall are some few seats, where the bull-fighters and their friends and families sit, about twelve or fifteen feet above the ring where the fighting is going on. That is where Dona Ana and little Tonio seat themselves, after kissing their bull-fighter good-bye and wishing him "good-luck." From here they will see everything distinctly, and will not miss a stroke.

And up behind them one tier after another, are the rows of boxes and private seats where the fine people of Mexico sit. Tonio stares at them till his eyes ache.

Now the band begins the first bars of such a lovely swinging Mexican dance that Tonio forgets all about what he will do if the President honours his father, and delightfully watches the bandsmen.

The first bull rushed into the ring—a great brown Atenco beast, with huge curving horns, and hoofs that beat and tear up the ground as he raged on. He has been kept for three days in a dark, close pen, and has been starved all this time so as to make him very furious in the ring. Just as the gate is opened for him to rush through into the ring, a man who is seated above throws down two sharp iron instruments with gay ribbons tied on the ends. The sharp points stick into the bull's flesh and cut him until the blood pours down, so that he roars and bellows with fury, not knowing what it means.

Then Tonio sees his father drop carefully down into the ring, with a red cloth and two "banderillos" (sharp, arrow-like things decorated with ribbons), ready for the bull.

The bull sees Juan, and with his big head lowered until his horns almost sweep the ground, he plunges on. Juan steps forward just a little, and holds out the big red cloak. As he sees it, the bull gives a loud roar that seems to shake the ring, and strikes at the matador with all his might. But Juan steps to one side, and flaps the big cloth right in the animal's face. When the bull, furious and pawing, goes to charge again, he sees that there is another creature with glittering clothes and big red cloth in the ring. So he goes for that, and tries to gore it.

This goes on for some minutes, and then all the cloak men except Juan tumble quickly out of the ring, and two gates open, and three poor bony old horses, blindfolded, are jerked in by their riders, the "picadors." The picadors are bull-fighters who fight on horseback. They have iron on underneath their leather clothes, and carry long wooden lances to worry the bull.

One after the other the bull kills the horses. Tonio hides his head in his mother's lap. The poor caballos! How can the people allow them to be so treated?

Now all the people, their taste for blood satisfied, call loudly with many hand clappings for "Juan! El matador!" meaning that they want the bull killed.

Now follows the usual trial of skill between man and beast, and the latter is killed by a clever lunge. Poor toro! He has fought a good fight.

Juan Moreno's work has been well done, and all the people cry: "Bravo! Bravo, Juan Moreno!" And down into the ring pour all sorts of things—hats, flowers from pretty women, cigars, dollars, and purses. The President leans forward, and throws down, smiling, a heavy purse and some of his own good cigars.

Digitized by Google

And you can imagine how Tonio watches it all, crying from pure joy, with his eyes looking as though they would come out of his head.

Soon the dead bull is dragged out by six gaily decorated mules, and the ring is sanded for the entrance of the second bull.

Everybody is whispering that this is the bull of the day, a fine Andalusian, a beauty! Some wonder if Juan Moreno can handle him. Although the best toreado in all Mexico, Juan has been disabled for a long time, and many people notice that he looks very tired now, as he sits with his wife holding his little son, who has from excitement and joy succumbed to suggestion from the "Land of Nod." Juan climbs down, when the first trumpet blows, to go back to the ring, Dona Ana, vaguely uneasy, takes the little boy in her arms.

Meantime, as Juan Moreno and fully twelve more cloth and banderillo men unsuccessfully cope with the magnificent wild beast that has already gored one man to death, Tonio sleeps peacefully, knowing nothing.

The bull has killed four horses and one man. Every moment his strength, force, and wild fury seem to increase. Bellowing, rushing, pawing and plunging, even the best of the matadors have no chance against him! And this Juan Moreno knows. Worn out and tired from the previous fight, his work gets feebler and feebler; but for his wife and child there, watching him, he would give up and let the bull trample him!

All of a sudden the people who are eagerly, breathlessly watching see the matador stumble. He recovers himself and avoids the bull. But his eyes are failing, and he feels strangely weak. All the blood is rushing to his head. He cannot avoid the bull another time. He sees the raging black charge, and, dropping the sword, tries to say a "Padre Nuestro." A tiny dot of red and gold seems to flash before his eyes, then he sinks helplessly on the ground, amid the roars and screams of 8,000 people. Carelessly he waits for the goring of the bull. It does not come. Then he tries to struggle to his feet. Another wild shout goes up from the many throats. He looks, trying to clear his eyes.

Not ten feet from him is the great bull Diablo, and, reaching up, patting the huge head and horns, and saying many loving Spanish words, is the little son Tonio! Paralysed, helpless, unable to think or breathe, the unhappy bull-fighter stares, unable to take his eyes away. His only little boy, Tonio! But how strangely the wild, mad beast is behaving! Look, actually he is caressing the child's upturned face with his coarse red tongue, all covered with foam as it is! Then poor Juan faints and knows nothing more for many hours!

Tonio has saved his father's life! Waking suddenly, and with no thought of anything but that it was Diablo, his dear playfellow, that men were trying to torture, furious that they should dare to do so, he had leapt down into the ring, and just in time.

You can imagine how the people cheered "the little bull-fighter," as they called him; and not only that, but the President himself sent for and talked to Tonio, and gave him a bill for a hundred dollars, and Mrs. President kissed him, and the audience, not to be outdone, collected among themselves such a sum of money that people say to this day that the biggest fee ever collected in Mexico by a bull-fighter was that given to little Tonio el matador.

W. Sheldon.

The MAgnificent March Number of

PEARSON'S MAGAZINE

IS NOW ON SALE.

PRICE SIXPENCE. PRICE SIXPENCE.

CONTENTS:

ARTISTS AND THEIR WORK. (Illustrated.) Amongst the many charming pictures which are reproduced this month are splendid examples of the work of Mr. Solomon J. Solomon, A.R.A., as well as a most amusing picture by M. Pirez, and many others equally as interesting and as entertaining.

MOUNTAINEERING IN ENGLAND. (Illustrated with Photographs.) By Austin Fryers. The striking photographs which illustrate this article show that it is quite unnecessary to go to Switzerland to break one's neck in mountaineering. The climbing that can be obtained at home is as perilous and as excellent a test for the nerves as the most courageous and hardy mountaineer could desire.

REAL GHOST STORIES. By E. and H. Heron. No. III.—The Story of the Moor Road. (Illustrated by B. E. Minns.) These ghost stories are causing quite a sensation. Their special interest lies in the fact that they are based on actual occurrences. With each story a photograph is given of the actual spot at which the ghost appeared.

THE WEALTH OF THE WORLD. Written and illustrated by J. Holt Schooling. Here we have presented to us in picturesque form, some most interesting facts about the distribution of the wealth of the world. Mr. J. Holt Schooling, the famous statistician, who is responsible for the article, shows us a photograph of a pile of bank-notes, worth fifteen millions sterling, tells us which are the wealthiest countries of the world, and amongst the many picturesque comparisons he makes is this; if the wealth of the world were converted into gold, it would make a road from Westminster Bridge to Dorking (nearly 24 miles), 18ft. wide and 6in. thick

A CORNER IN LIGHTNING. (Illustrated by H. Piffard.) By George Griffith. (A very exciting complete story.)

CHANGING SILVER INTO GOLD. (Illustrated with Photographs.) By Herbert C. Fyfe. This article gives full information about the remarkable discovery which has recently been made by Dr. Emmens. This eminent New York scientist has actually succeeded in converting silver into gold. He is now buying silver which the United States Assay Office has declared to be entirely free from all traces of gold, and this silver he actually converts into a metal which the United States Mint buys from him as gold, and pays him the full gold price for it.

JUST LIKE THE WORLD. (Illustrated by S. Nation.) By Clifton Bingham.

THE DEVIL'S PICTURE-BOOKS. (Illustrated with Examples.) By J. H. Kemmis. Under this title are reproduced a most interesting series of the playing-cards used in different parts of the world. The series includes some very eccentric specimens from India, China, and Japan, as well as the most interesting cards in use in European countries.

THE SACRIFICE OF VENTRIS PERUGINI. (Illustrated by Hana.) By Winifred Graham. (A complete story.)

HOW THE HANDS ARE HELD. (Illustrated with Photographs.) By E. Le Breton-Martin. The author of this article has obtained a very striking series of photographs of the most curious attitudes for carrying the hands, which have come under his observation. Some people, for instance, clench their fists when they are walking, others spread their fingers out fan-shape, and others again have a finger only or a thumb projecting. A whole host of interesting examples are given.

A FAIR CONSPIRATOR. (Illustrated by G. G. Manton.) By James Workman. This is a very charming story of the English civil war.

THE PERSONAL INTERESTS OF MR. GLADSTONE. (Illustrated with Photographs.) By W. Arthur Woodward. This is the most complete account that has ever been published of Mr. Gladstone's recreations throughout his long and varied career. Here Mr. Gladstone is presented to us as a cricketer, an oarsman, a football-player, a pedestrian, a sportsman and a singer, besides in the pursuit of many other pastimes almost too numerous to mention. The excellent photographs which are reproduced form a fitting accompaniment to this interesting article.

DA PIETRA'S WAGER. (Illustrated by A. Kemp Tebby.) By H. Ryall. A story.

A RAINY DAY. By J. J. Bell.

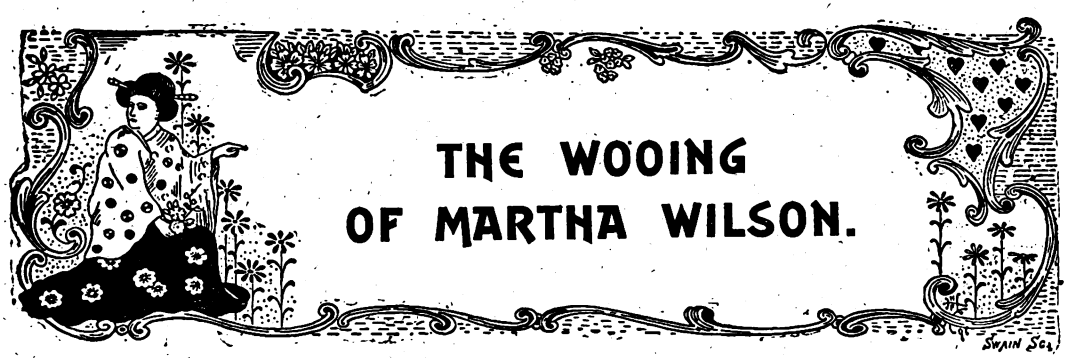
ANIMAL ACROBATS. (Illustrated by H. Piffard.) By J. Malcolm Fraser. In this article a description is given of some of the very clever tricks which dogs and cats have been trained to perform, and illustrations are given of some of the most difficult feats. One dog for instance, has been trained to balance itself on one of its fore feet, two others have been trained to box, and another to preserve its equilibrium on a ball which is balanced on a plank running across the arena.

THE ADVENTURES OF CAPTAIN KETTLE. No. IX.—The Raiding of Donna Clothilde. (Illustrated by Stanley L. Wood.) By Cutcliffe Hyne. (A complete story.)

THE DEVIL-MAN. (Illustrated with Photographs.) By Merriden Howard. An interview with Mr. Douglas Beaufort who was officially dispatched by the British Government to conciliate the Sultan of Morocco. Mr. Beaufort tells his amusing experiences at the Sultan's Court and explains some of his most clever tricks.

LIFE'S LITTLE WORRIES. (Illustrated by A. Popini.) By W. L. Alden. This month Mr. Alden criticises in his most amusing manner, the little worries connected with our postal arrangements, with corks, with spectacles, and eye-glasses, and with professional gardeners.

Digitized by Google



THE WOOING OF MARTHA WILSON.

Anthony Wilson, Esq., of Chester Square, Belgravia, arrived one fine summer afternoon in Relsham, and drove in a specially ordered carriage to the Grand Hotel. He was accompanied by his daughter Martha, and her maid.

Wilson was a retired cattle-dealer, and, unlike many "self-made" men, he was proud of his lowly origin. He had succeeded, by dint of hard work and some timely assistance on the part of Dame Fortune, in accumulating great wealth, and had retired from business to spend it in ease, and to assure for his only daughter the position in society that he coveted for her.

"You won't find that gal's equal anywheres," he would declare earnestly. "She's a perfect daisy, that she is! Ah, if Maria had only lived to see her now she's growed up and able to have the best in the market!"

Martha was certainly an attractive young lady. She possessed a trim, well-rounded figure, really pretty features, a splendid complexion, and an enchanting smile. She had received an excellent education, and moved with ease and grace in such society as her father's money had procured an entrance for her.

Anthony Wilson was a "warm" man, and just a little fond of making the fact known. He had journeyed to Relsham to gratify his daughter's wish to see the flower show, and he was determined to make a stir in the place.

"We'll let things go down 'ere, Pat," he said to his daughter as they drove to the hotel. "We'll make 'em stare, or my name's not Tony!" And he leant back in his seat with a self-satisfied smile.

"I have no doubt we shall pass a very pleasant time, father," answered Martha with a smile. Her father's illiterate style of speech and his ostentatious display of wealth grated upon her finer feelings at times; but he was good to her, he doted upon her, and her affection and gratitude overwhelmed all other sentiments.

There were numerous visitors in Relsham, and Martha Wilson and her father soon became centres of attraction, for different reasons.

It had been dawning upon the retired cattle dealer for some little time that his presence was at times a bar to his daughter's progress, and he determined to keep in the background as much as possible while they were at Relsham.

Martha went for a walk that evening with her maid, a dark-eyed Spanish woman, whom they had engaged during a week's stay at Gibraltar, and Wilson was left to pass the time in the hotel as agreeably as he could. It was his own wish.

There were three persons in the hotel to whom the old man's attention was quickly drawn. He summed them up very quickly, and at once determined to become acquainted with them.

"Them two young fellows over there are aristocrats," he murmured. "Look likely young chaps enough, and just about Pat's age. The tall one suits me best; wonder if he's got a title or likely to have one? I must find out who he is. Then there's that foreigner; he's smart, and I fancied I 'eard the waiter call 'im 'Count.' But," with a shake of the head, "that kind o' cattle are rather awkward to deal in."

Judicious inquiry of a waiter elicited the fact that the Count had been there before, and that he was provided with letters of introduction to some of the magnates of the neighbouring city—in short, he was a real Spanish nobleman.

That settled it. In less than five minutes the retired dealer had accidentally trodden upon the toes of the Count, which led to profuse apologies, and the ordering by Wilson of a bottle of the best wine in the place. The nobleman was most affable, and in a very short space of time the two were talking as though they had known each other for years.

"Yes," said Wilson, "my daughter wanted to come down here to see the show." He spoke loudly, falling into the error so often committed by persons speaking to a foreigner—under the impression that it is necessary to talk in a loud tone in order to be understood. "Clever gal, she is."

"I have noticed the señorita," returned the Spaniard gracefully. "Ah! We have pretty girls in Spain, but your daughter is a—a—Venus, Señor Wilson!"

The old man's face flushed with pleasure and pride.

"Martha is a fine young woman," he stammered, "and she is worth her weight in gold. Takes after her poor mother." Then he added to himself: "He's a perfect gent and mighty civil. I'll fix this up for Pat."

"You will introduce me to her, my good sir?" asked the Count in a persuasive tone.

"She'll be delighted, Count," replied Wilson, turning the title over on his tongue.

The time passed quickly. Wilson did most of the talking, and occasionally succeeded in placing an h in its proper place. The Count, whose eyes took in everything, suddenly espied Martha in the garden at the back of the hotel, and at once mentioned the fact. Wilson jumped up and hurried his companion out of the building to be introduced.

The introduction was soon over. The Count, with his graceful bearing and flowery style, made a great impression on Martha; her eyes dropped as they met the piercing orbs of the Spaniard, and a peculiar look passed over his features.

Digitized by Google

At that moment he turned to make a remark to Wilson and his glance fell upon the maid. The sound died away on his lips, the two stared at one another for a second, then the maid quietly walked along the path.

"You have a foreign maid, Miss Wilson?" he queried pleasantly.

"Yes, sinyor," interposed her father. "She is a countrywoman of yours. We engaged her when we were in Gibraltar."

"I thought she came from my beloved country," replied the noble son of Castile. "Ah! It is long since I heard my native tongue—weeks! I should like to speak with the maid—if I might."

"Of course! Call her, Martha."

Angela was called and came forward slowly. The Count spoke to her, and they exchanged a few sentences rapidly in the Catalan dialect, after which the maid bowed and retired.

That night, when the Count went into his room, he locked the door carefully, opened a drawer in the dressing table, and drew from it an elegant pistol, a toy in appearance, but in reality a deadly weapon. He examined it, and then placed it in his breast pocket with a cynical smile.

"Angela used to have a temper—a very bad temper," he muttered in his own tongue. "I expect it has become even worse lately, and it is well to be prepared."

The next day passed without incident. The old man and his daughter went to the show accompanied by the Count; and on their return to the hotel they dined at the same table, together with the two young men already mentioned. The Count was very attentive to Martha, but he was somewhat chagrined to find that he did not make such progress as he anticipated; the tall young man, whose name was Arthur Merstham, was rapidly ingratiating himself with the cattle dealer's pretty daughter and receiving a fair share of her favour.

It was about ten o'clock when the Spaniard bade his new friends good-night. He sauntered out of the hotel, smoking a cigarette, and strolled lazily along the lane close by until he came to a rough seat. He sat down and made himself as comfortable as he could, evidently with the intention of waiting for someone.

He had not long to wait. A light footfall struck his ear and he arose to find himself confronted by Angela.

"Well?" she asked.

"Let us sit down," he said curtly. "We can talk better."

They sat down and the woman lifted her veil. Her face was very white and set, and her eyes glittered angrily; but it was too dark for the other to see all this.

"After we parted," began the man, "I had a letter from you in which you swore to have revenge. You prayed that I might cross your path and so forth. Well, Angela, fate has favoured you and our paths cross."

"Yes," she said, drawing her breath through her set teeth.

"Well, querida mia, I suppose you wish to denounce me to the opulent cattle dealer and his daughter? I asked you to wait till to-night and have a talk with me before you decided to begin your revenge. Now, what do you intend to do?"

"I shall not consider your feelings, Esteban."

"I do not ask you to do so, Angela," he retorted. "I ask you to consider yourself. You are in a strange land, working for a living; would you not prefer to have a little house in your native Barcelona, with an assured income?"

"Why do you ask that?" she queried scornfully. "I am not a lady's maid from choice. Why do you say that?"

"If you try to gratify your desire for revenge," proceeded the Count coolly, "you will not even continue to be a lady's maid; my word will be accepted rather than yours, and you will be an outcast; I will see to that! But if you do as I say, the little house and the income will be yours. I shall be able to buy your silence."

"How much?" she asked quietly.

"I will give yon one hundred pounds now—two thousand five hundred pesetas, Angela—and if you help me in my plans you shall share in the profits. You can guess what my plans are. This Wilson is very rich, and I have a fancy to be related to him. It would not surprise you to hear me call him 'father,' eh? No. I like this pretty English girl, and it really is time that I settled down, is it not? My future is assured, whatever you may try to do; but you can help me if you will only study your own interests."

He fancied that he detected a movement of an aggressive nature, and he gripped his pistol. The lynx-like eyes of the woman perceived his action; she knew that he was not a man to stick at trifles, and that she must act accordingly.

"Don't be foolish, Angela," he continued more gently. "You must see that it is better for you to assist me than to try to hinder me. The chances are on my side."

"You speak truly," she said. "I must reflect."

He did not notice anything peculiar in the tone in which she uttered the last sentence; he was too elated at the idea of having again moulded her to his will, as he had so often done in the past. He drew her closer to him, and spoke in the tender manner which he knew so well how to assume.

"What do you want me to do, Esteban?"

"That is my own Angela once more!" he cried, drawing her face to his and kissing her. "What fools these women are!" was his mental observation. But he said aloud: "Listen, sweet, and you will learn how you can help me."

After that interview, the Count's wooing progressed apace. Martha ceased to bestow any attention upon Merstham, who appeared to accept his discomfort with manly dignity, and ceased to dine at the same table.

The flower show was over, but there were various functions to keep the visitors in Relsham—the last being a ball.

The Count and Angela had several interviews, at which she seemed sullen, but ready to do his bidding. That was all he wanted; had she been more agreeable he would have suspected her sincerity.

Three days before the ball, the Count asked Wilson for permisson to sue for the hand of his daughter. The "merchant prince" (as the Spaniard called him—to his face) was delighted, and then and there stated his intention of settling a quarter of a million on Martha on the day she became the Countess of Villanova. "Countess"! The old man rolled the title on his tongue, Martha a Countess! He could scarcely realise it.

Martha herself received the proposal with favour and becoming modesty; but she asked for time to consider, and promised to give him an answer on the evening of the ball. He would have liked to draw her to his breast and caress her—as he had done to Angela—but there was something about this pretty English girl which prevented him from making the attempt.

Digitized by Google

"All the sweeter when it comes," he murmured. "It will not be long now, and I know how to wait."

Great preparations had been made for the ball. Mr. Anthony Wilson had made up his mind that his brilliant stay should have a brilliant finish, and had placed a large sum at the disposal of his daughter for "trimmings." Martha's dress was simple compared with his notion of what it should be, but the material was the best that money could purchase.

The ball was a grand success; Relsham thought those who took part in it would talk about it for many a day.

The Count waited impatiently for the interval, when he was to receive his answer. But when the interval arrived Martha was not to be seen. The Count was perplexed, and Wilson equally so. The Spaniard, wandering about in search of her, became conscious of the fact that Merstham had also disappeared, and began to feel uneasy. He was about to return to the ball-room—the interval was nearly over—when Mr. Yorke, Merstham's friend, came towards him.

"If you will come with me, Count," he said politely, "I can take you to someone who is anxious to see you before the dancing begins again."

The Count looked surprised, but intimated his willingness to accompany Yorke. "Those cold English girls are strange," he murmured. "Ah, there is more in a Spaniard, but the money is wanting."

Yorke conducted him towards a room in which the Count could see a number of gentleman. As they approached the door, the Count saw Merstham coming to meet him.

"I have been requested to introduce you to a lady, Count," he said. "A lady who has something to tell you."

The Spaniard glanced about him in bewilderment. Decidedly, the English girls were strange! Did they usually accept a proposal of marriage before a number of gentlemen witnesses? He noticed that the countenances of those present wore an expectant look. He was about to speak when a hand was placed upon his shoulder; he turned quickly, and found himself confronted by Angela.

"You?" he cried, forgetting himself in his surprise and confusion.

She was dressed in ball costume, and carried a fan in an easy, but indolent manner. Her face was pale, but her eyes gleamed with hate.

"Yes, Conde de Villanova," she said in steady, determined tones. "I have had you brought here to hold you up to the ridicule and contempt of those who have believed you to be a gentleman. You used me as a toy in Madrid, and when you threw me aside I swore to have revenge. You thought that you had won me over to assist you in your wicked design to obtain the hand of Miss Wilson. You wanted her father's money. You offered me a share. But I am not so bad as that! You had your little plot; I had mine. I have been successful; you have failed. Miss Wilson knows all. This is my revenge. I denounce you in front of all these honourable Englishmen as a—as a cowardly villain! I brand you as a scoundrel unfit for the society of men and women, and I do it publicly like this because you dare not deny it. You have betrayed yourself in your surprise, as I thought you would. In private your word would have been accepted before mine."

The short sentences, spoken with a pretty accent and in a tone that indicated deadly determination, spread wonder and indignation among the gentlemen. The Count, hardened rascal as he was, cowered beneath her words like a whipped hound. Not until she had finished speaking did he appear to recover some of his self possession, but one look convinced him that he was condemned. He glared at her as though he would strangle her; then he slunk away amidst the murmurs of the spectators.

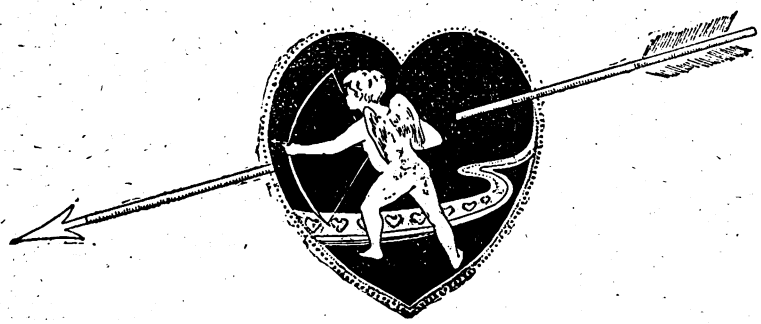
The affair created a tremendous sensation. The Spaniard left Relsham early the next morning, and left for France on the following day. He never dared show his face in English society again.

The plot had been arranged by Angela with the assistance of Merstham. Martha had been told by her maid of the Count's true character, and that it would be exposed, and she had lent herself to the plot to the extent of deceiving the Count as to her real feelings. But she had not known the exact nature of the plot.

Wilson's exasperation had a little disappointment mixed with it—at the loss of a title. But that was quickly dissipated by the announcement that Merstham was a suitor for Martha's hand, and that he was the nephew and prospective heir of the Earl of Helmsdale.

Angela has her house and an assured income in a pretty seaside town in the south of England.

G. E. Lingen.



Digitized by Google

THE GOLD MAGNET.

By GEORGE GRIFFITH.

Author of "Valdar the Oft-Born," "Briton or Boer?" "The Outlaws of the Air," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XLII.

Madame Sybil Shoots.

The Maxims got their work in so quickly that the only reply from the deck of the gold-ship was a scattered, ineffectual volley, which merely resulted in the wounding of two or three of the Minnehaha's crew.

"We may as well go on now we've begun," said Lorrain. "Clear the decks, and then we'll board. We must have that coal at any price."

"Right, Seenyor. Just my idea!" replied the skipper.

And so the murderous work went on for two or three minutes longer. Then the bullet-storm ceased, and the yacht ran up close alongside the State of Oregon, which was still driving ahead at her best speed. As the sides touched half-a-dozen men sprang on board with ropes to lash them fast, and a dozen others armed with revolvers and short bayonet-swords sprang over the rail on to the blood-stained deck.

Captain Peters' idea was not to stop to take the coal out in the dangerous waters of the Strait, but to run the two steamers out towards the open sea and fill his bunkers as they went along. The remainder of the crew and passengers of the State of Oregon were therefore kept below by sentries placed over the companion-ways, and the stokers and engineers were promised their lives and the ship when the pirates had done with her if they would keep at work till the coal was transferred. If they refused they were to be shot, and their places supplied by men from the Minnehaha.

They naturally took the one chance of safety, however slender it was, and went on with their work. Meanwhile the heads of the two vessels were turned westward, and as they steamed along side by side the bunkers were thrown open, the derricks and donkey-engines were set to work, and all available hands were soon busily engaged in transferring the precious fuel from the gold-ship to her captor.

They travelled slowly, as twelve knots was the very best that could be got out of the American steamer's engines; but they ploughed steadily along for over an hour towards Dixon's Entrance, and Captain Peters and Lorrain were congratulating themselves on their smartness and success in getting out of what might have been a very tight place, when suddenly, right ahead, the white gleams of three searchlights, one of which was a good deal higher up than the other two, flashed out of the misty distance and began to sweep to and fro in wide circles over the grey, smooth water.

"Caught, by the great Snake!" said Captain Peters, with a gasp which ended in a snort of disgust. "There's no way out for us there, Seenyor. Stop that coaling, come aboard, all of you, and cast off. Get a wriggle on you, now! Cæsar's ghost, they're coming up pretty slick! Those low lights belong to a couple of destroyers, and I shouldn't wonder if that middle one isn't our old friend the Pocahontas. Ready with those after guns there! Never mind casting off them ropes, cut 'em!"

The little skipper issued his orders with a rapidity which showed how serious the situation seemed to him. Lorrain jumped down from the bridge and made a hurried inspection of the guns and ammunition, and gave strict orders that not a shot was to be fired or a light shown as long as there was a chance of escaping unseen.

The Minnehaha was clear of the State of Oregon in a few minutes, but short as the delay was, it was already too long. A beam from the centre search-light struck her just as she was edging away under cover of the gold-ship's hull. The next instant the report of a cannon boomed out, and a projectile splashed into the water a couple of hundred yards ahead of her. Lorrain was standing near one of the after dynamite guns when this happened. Inspired by a sudden thought he sprang to it, and with his own hand turned it on to the water-line of the State of Oregon, took deliberate aim, and fired. The dynamite exploded just under the quarter, and ripped a great gaping hole in the thin plating. The stricken vessel shuddered and lurched heavily over.

"It's a pity to send so much good coal and gold to the bottom," he said as he rejoined Captain Peters on the bridge, "but that'll keep them busy for half-an-hour or so. They won't come past her without saving what we've left of her people. How much did you get out of her, Captain?"

"About thirty tons I reckon, and I believe seven or eight casks of petroleum. That'll keep the oil-blast going for about twelve hours, so if that isn't the Pocahontas we shall get away all right. If it is we're going to have a darned tight squeeze."

"How much is she making now?" asked Lorrain a trifle anxiously.

"A bit over thirty, Seenyor, and I'm afraid that's her absolute best. Her bottom's as foul as a homeward-bound whaler's. If we get over the other side we'll have to dock her somewhere and have a clean up. Ay, look yonder, that was a good idea of yours. See, they're stopping to investigate. Now they'll know who we are if they weren't sure before. Waal, if that ain't one of the darnedest misfortunes that ever came my way I'll give up pirating and start a dry-goods store—there's the moon, and there's the wind from the land! Now you'll see this mist go like a cloud of steam on a hot day. I reckon they won't want them search-lights much longer."

Lorrain looked up and saw the full moon rising over the wooded slopes of the main-land. He ground out a muttered series of Anglo-Spanish oaths and went down on deck to meet her ladyship and Madame Sybil, who had just come up from the saloon. He told them in a few words what had happened and then Madame Sybil, saying that she had forgotten her shawl, left them and went below again. When she came back she had a light, fleecy woollen shawl doubled round her neck, and in the side pocket of her neatly-fitting ulster was a very business-like little five-chambered Smith-Wesson revolver. There was also a look in her eyes which would have told a close observer that she had not brought the pistol with her for nothing.

Digitized by Google

The Minnehaha was now spinning along at her best possible speed southward. The Quail was standing by the disabled steamer, and the Pocahontas and the Mallard had taken up the chase again at the best sea-speed of the latter, which was about thirty knots. If anything the Minnehaha was doing slightly better than her pursuers, and Captain Peters was beginning to hope that if the fuel only held out they would get away after all, at any rate for the time being, when to his utter disgust a searchlight flashed up from the southward and waved to and fro in a quick, jerky fashion, evidently making a signal.

"I reckon the skipper of that hooker was right when he said that the squadron was down south," he said with a strange calmness which had succeeded his anger and flurry. "Anyhow there are war-ships down there and we're between two fires. I reckon it's a case of running the gauntlet again, so we may as well make the best rush we can for it."

"I suppose you haven't forgotten, Captain, that there's a channel between the two islands?" said the second officer, who was steering in the wheel-house. "We ought to be just off it now. It's a bit risky, even for us, but I think we could get through, and if we could, nothing but one of those small craft could follow us."

"Mr. Lennox," said the skipper in a much more genial tone than he usually used to his subordinates, "I guess you've gone pretty near to saving the ship. If we get through, that suggestion shall be worth something to you. Put her round and let's find it right away. D'you happen to know the channel?"

"I've been through once on a yachting trip, Captain," he replied. "It was a smaller craft than this, but I think I can put this one through too."

"Go ahead then," said the skipper. "Anyhow, the rocks won't shoot at us, and they won't hurt us if we don't hit them first."

"Confound the fellow!" Tristam was saying to Courtland almost at the same moment on the navigating bridge of the Pocahontas. "Confound him, he's going to try for the channel. Well, it's a pretty plucky thing to do. Captain Markham, do you think we can get through there?"

The captain shook his head as he replied:

"I'm afraid not, Mr. Tristam, at least not at this speed.

"I could take the ship through if it were absolutely necessary, taking soundings and all that sort of thing, but I expect he'll go through pretty nearly at full speed, as it's neck or nothing with him. I must say that I think he's made the best choice. He has more chance of getting through there than he was of getting through the squadron without getting sunk."

"Well then," said Courtland, "I reckon the best thing we can do is to let the Mallard go in first and follow her as fast as we can, so as to give her the cover of the guns. We can't stick at a bit of danger, you know, Captain; we're going to see this through somehow, and if the Pocahontas can get into that channel she's going into it. You do all you can and leave the responsibility to me. What do you say, Tristam?"

"If the ship were mine I suppose I should do the same," said Tristam shortly.

"Of course you would," said Courtland. "Let her go, Captain, give her full speed, every yard you've got, and see if you can't cut that little scoundrel off before he gets in. That'll be better than following her. I should think the Commander might try a shot or two at him as we go across. I'll go and see him."

The course of the Pocahontas altered as her speed increased, and the Mallard followed her, making a gallant struggle, but not entirely successful to keep up. The cruiser-yacht now began to gain perceptibly on the Minnehaha, and presently little black shapes surmounted by flaming funnels became visible to the southward, and behind them bigger shapes vomiting volumes of black smoke up into the moonlit air. There were three destroyers now on the heels of the flying Minnchaha, and they were racing after her like dogs after their quarry. But the land was getting very near now, and a dim opening appeared between the two tree-clad shores, which were rising as if by magic up out of the water. It was terribly risky work, rushing at railway speed into the mouth of a narrow, almost unknown channel, but there were worse risks behind, and so Captain Peters, standing by the wheel-house ready to give his second officer at the wheel his bearings, held on to every knot that the panting boilers and grinding engines of the Minnehaha could give him.

The smaller guns of her pursuers soon began to spit fire and smoke at her as they closed in. The big guns were not to be used except in the last necessity, not out of consideration for those on board the pirate, but on account of that priceless little item of her cargo which the explosion of a hundred pound shell on board her might lose beyond all hope of finding. The object was to cripple her with the lighter shot if possible, and then take her by boarding, and so recover both her golden plunder and the Gold Magnet itself.

Captain Peters was not slow in replying with his after dynamite guns and the three-pounder Maxim-Nordenfeldt. But the practice was not very good on either side in the faint, baffling light, and before any great harm had been done the Minnehaha had dashed into the entrance and swung round out of sight behind a point of rock.

At the same moment her search-light flashed out ahead, and a broad fan of white radiance illuminated the narrow, winding channel and the black, wicked-looking little rocks for several hundred yards ahead of her. The skipper, all eyes and nerves, stood in front of the wheel-house ready to give Lennox his course by voice and signal. Madame Sybil was just inside sheltering from the wind, and Lorrain was standing at the star-board end of the bridge smoking a cigar and discussing the chances of escape with her ladyship.

The three destroyers Virago, Vulture and Mallard raced neck and neck for the opening close followed by the Pocahontas, which, having failed to cut off the Minnehaha, had slowed down a little to let the smaller craft show her the way. The Mallard slipped round the point first, just in time to see the chase disappear for the second time round a pine-crowned bluff. The three boats steamed round after her and caught a glimpse of her about a mile ahead, still spinning along with reckless desperation through the rock-strewn waters of the channel, and so for nearly two hours the chase went on, both pursuers and pursued escaping the rocks and banks almost by miracles as they swept past them at a head-long speed, exchanging shots every now and then as they came in sight of each other, but, as far as could be seen, doing no damage on either side.

"Shouldn't wonder if we fooled 'em yet," said Captain Peters, in a brief interval between his constant "Port—starboard—steady a bit—now port again—steady—hold her up!" which had been going on without intermission since they had entered the channel. "Ah! there's the sea at last, and a mighty ugly corner to turn. By Gosh, there's going to be a scrape there! Hold her up, Lennox, and stand by to put her hard over when you get the word. If you let a spoke go you'll smash her."

Dead ahead was a high bluff, with a long black tongue of rock stretching out about half a mile from it. Off the opposite shore was a low, rocky island, which almost met it, and nearer in was another island, which left only a narrow streak of water between itself and the shore, and this streak made a sharp curve that was almost a semi-circle, and the only way to freedom was round this and past the point. Not only her ladyship and Madame Sybil, but every man on deck stared at this perilous passage in breathless suspense as the Minnehaha rushed into it.

Digitized by Google

"Ready now, Lennox! Starboard a bit—now—a bit more—steady—that's nicely—a bit more—more—stand by to shove her round—let go—now port—hard over—hard, I say, hard and we're round!"

Bang!

"Good Heavens, what was that!"

Just as the Minnehaha's bow was about to swing round the rocky point in obedience to her helm, the report of a pistol rang out in the wheel-house, and a few whiffs of smoke drifted out of the door. Lennox, who had dragged the wheel over, hanging on to it with all his weight, let go, and collapsed in a heap under it with a bullet hole in the back of his head. The wheel sprang back, and the Minnehaha seemed to shake her head like a horse released from the rein, and dashed straight at the rocks. Captain Peters instinctively sprang to the engine-telegraph, but before he had put the handle over there was a sharp, grinding, ripping crash. Everyone on deck was hurled prone in an instant, the whirling screws flung out torrents of foam from the stern, but the little Minnehaha would never move again. She had run her last race and almost won, and there, within a few yards of freedom, she was lying helpless, with a fourth of her length out of the water, fast-wedged in the grip of the rocks.

CHAPTER XLIII.

The Magnet Comes Back.

The moment Captain Peters picked himself up he made a rush for the wheelhouse. Madame Sybil was lying on the floor with a pistol in her hand.

"So it was you, was it!" he shouted.

She jerked herself up to a half-sitting position, shot one brief glance at him out of her eyes blazing with hate and loathing, and laughed shrilly:

"Yes, I did it, and I'm glad. You have killed my son and made my life a wreck. Now die yourself!"

She put the revolver up and fired at him, but she made the usual mistake, and although he was not two yards from her and she aimed, as she thought, at his chest, the bullet flew high, knocked his cap off and gashed his scalp. Still it staggered him. The next moment, just as Lorrain ran forward to catch him as he reeled back, there was a sharp, shrill report on the lower deck, followed by an explosion which shook the already sorely-stricken ship from stern to funnel. The Mallard had rounded the last bend and sent a twelve-pounder shell into the deck-cabin. Another from the Vulture hit her close by the stern-post, and smashed her starboard propeller, besides tearing a great hole in her plates, into which the water immediately began to rush.

"We are not going to lie here to be smashed to bits like a log," said Lorrain between his clenched teeth. "Let that woman alone, Peters. She can't get away. We'll take a gun apiece, and go to Kingdom Come in good company."

He had tied his handkerchief round the skipper's head while he was saying this, and given him a good drink of brandy out of his flask, which happened to be in his overcoat pocket. Captain Peters was just the man to die fighting, and the idea agreed perfectly with his mood.

"Right you are, Seenyor," he said. "We've got to pass in our checks, but I reckon the hand is not played out yet. Come on!"

Lorrain helped him down off the bridge on to the upper deck. The two mid-ship dynamite guns were uninjured, and the slope of the deck gave them a good elevation. The ammunition was all ready by them, but the men were running about in something like panic, wondering what to do and doing nothing. Lorrain's clear, steady voice, and his perfect habit of command instantly brought them back to their senses.

"Come along, boys!" he shouted. "We're not going to be hit without hitting back, and if we've got to go under we won't go alone. Get to your stations and give them every gun you can fire—Maxims and all."

The men rallied instantly from panic to the grim desperation of despair. They knew that to be caught was to be hanged, and naturally they preferred to die fighting. There were no cowards among them, for the simple reason that Captain Peters had shot with his own hand every man who on any occasion had showed the white feather. Three dynamite guns, the three-pounder Maxim-Nordenfeldt, and two Maxims were immediately manned, and before the Mallard and the Vulture had reached the narrow bend, through which only one of them could come at once, the crippled Minnehaha, like a wolf at bay, was proving in terrible earnest that she could still bite.

The men at the guns worked as they had never worked before, and within the next terrible minute the dynamite guns had fired thirty rounds, and the machine guns had poured out a hurricane of projectiles. Half a dozen of the dynamite shells had struck the Mallard in the first few seconds, and within forty seconds her boilers had blown up, and she had gone to the bottom a shattered wreck.

The Virago steamed gallantly on, firing her twelve and three-pounders as fast as they could be worked, but a few moments later she too met the same fate. A dynamite shell dropped on the engine-hatch, burst as dynamite always does, downwards, wrecked her engines, and killed every man in the engine-room. Almost simultaneously another hit her conning-tower, wrecking it completely, and disabling the twelve-pounder gun on top of it. Another and another struck her in quick succession, and a hail of three-pound shells and Maxim-bullets swept along her deck, and by the time the way on her had carried her a hundred yards past the post where the Mallard had disappeared, she rolled over with a great gap in her side and began to settle down.

"There goes two of them!" yelled Captain Peters, who by this time was half mad with the lust of slaughter. "There comes the Pocahontas. Blaze away, Seenyor! Let 'em have it, boys! Put some sudden death into 'em! Hooray for us, who's fond of flame!"

Just then a jet of white smoke mingled with flame leapt over the bows of the Pocahontas, which had just rounded the bluff, and the deep, dull bang of a big gun burst through the chorus of the smaller artillery. A hundred-pound six-inch shell came screaming through the air and crashed into the Minnehaha's stern. The next instant her after-deck burst up and her sides bulged out. A charge of dynamite, which was just being put into the skipper's gun exploded with the shock, and literally blew him and his gun's crew to fragments. And so Captain Hiram Peters had his wish and died fighting.

Lorrain's gun was disabled at the same moment, and he himself was hurled, stunned and bleeding, across what remained of the deck. The Pocahontas came on, slowing working her way into the narrow channel, and keeping up an incessant fire with her lighter guns, but before she had got half way, the fire from the Minnehaha stopped, and the once terrible little craft lay silent and harmless, a blackened, shattered wreck, across the narrow reef on which Madame Sybil's pistol-shot had flung her.

But meanwhile another portion of the tragedy of the Gold Magnet was being played out under the smoke-cloud that hung over her ruins. When the cannonade began Madame Sybil and her ladyship were both still on the bridge. Her ladyship came to the door of the wheel-house and, for a moment the two women stared at each other deafened and paralysed by the roar of the guns and the shock of the bursting shells.

Digitized by Google

Both were white to the lips, and both were shivering with uncontrollable physical terror. Sybil still had the revolver in her hand, and Jessie's eyes wandered to it, and then to the dead man under the wheel. She shrank back as though to get behind the wood-work of the wheel-house, and then Sybil took a step towards her and said in a high, shrill voice, which sounded strangely through the din of the guns:

"You needn't be afraid—Lady Pendril, as you thought yourself. I'm not going to kill you although you killed my son. I want us both to get away alive from here. I want to see you taken to England and tried as a thief and a murderess, and I want to read about your being hanged. But first of all I want to see them make you give up that thing you find gold with, the thing that you have committed all these crimes for—you, a servant girl, who wanted to be a lady and made yourself a felon!"

She almost screamed these last words in Jessie's ear. It was thus that Jessie learnt for the first time that Sybil knew of her possession of the Gold Magnet. Sybil's face was close to hers. All its beauty was gone, and for the moment it looked horrible in its white passion. She didn't answer in words, for no words came to her to say, but she raised both her hands and clenched them and struck blindly and savagely at the livid face and great glaring eyes. Sybil reeled back with a scream of rage, and levelled the revolver at her, but before she could fire it a shell from the Pocahontas struck the wheel-house and burst. Jessie remembered seeing a great splash of blood where Sybil's face had been, and then everything went dark and the roar of guns faded away into silence.

About ten minutes later a boat from the Pocahontas pulled up to the reef alongside the silent wreck of the Minnehaha, and Tristam and Courtland, with half a dozen sailors, climbed up on to what was left of her deck. There was not a man on board who was able to stand on his feet. Men dead and dying, maimed and mangled, lay about among the smashed wood-work and broken, twisted iron in horrible confusion. Here and there a few were groaning and moving feebly in their agony, but these were the only signs of life.

"Good Heavens!" said Courtland as they got up to what had once been the upper deck. "What awful work! I reckon this will be about all the pirate-hunting I shall want. Well, those guns of ours seemed to have saved the hangman a good many jobs. I wonder where the women are. I hope we haven't killed them."

"I hope not!" said Tristam as he picked his way across the broken, slippery deck. "Hullo, there's Lorrain! I wonder if he's alive."

Lorrain's body was lying along the deck among the fragments of the funnel. His face was greyish white, his eyes were closed; there was a deep gash across his temple, and his left arm was lying in a position that showed it must be broken. Tristam went and raised his head, and Courtland took out his flask and unscrewed the stopper.

"Try him with a drop of this," he said. "I should like to take one or two of them back with us."

Tristam took the flask and put the mouth of it between Lorrain's teeth. As the brandy trickled into his mouth he coughed and opened his eyes. He drank some more automatically, and then he sat up blinking about him and murmured in Spanish:

"Patricia, have I avenged thee at last?"

Tristam started as he caught the words, and then he said sharply but not angrily:

"It's time you forgot that, Lorrain. There never was anything to avenge, and you've something else to think about now. You're our prisoner. Do you know if there's anyone else alive on board? Where are the women?"

"Oh it's you, is it, it's you!" said Lorrain, looking round with a dull stare at him and trying to struggle to his feet. "Your prisoner, eh—then I've not avenged her! Confound you!"

"I think you'd better let up on that sort of talk, Mr. Lorrain," said Courtland. "I guess there'll be some other people wanting revenge when we come to think about that. Give him a hoist up, Tristam, and let's see if he can stand."

They pulled him up to his feet, his left arm hanging limply by his side, and as they did so the dull stare in his eyes gave place to a glare of hate as he looked round and saw the fearful ruin of what had once been his ship. He walked a few steps with them unresistingly, then his eyes fell upon an unexploded dynamite cartridge lying near the fragments of one of the guns.

The sudden hope of revenge even now gave him new strength. He shook himself free, ran towards it and picked it up. Then he turned with it raised above his head, and was just about to fling it to the deck when Courtland, who was nearest to him, jumped at him, caught his hand just as it was coming down, wrenched the cartridge away from him and tossed it into the water. It was all done in an instant, almost automatically, and before either of them had actually realised how deadly a peril they had been in. The next moment Lorrain stood pinioned between them, gnashing his teeth and cursing with true Spanish-American energy.

Tristam looked at Courtland and said shortly:

"Thanks, old man!"

And Courtland replied: "Just luck—and we're only quits now."

Then a couple of the men came running up and Tristam said to one of them:

"Here, Roberts, this is Mr. Lorrain himself. Tie him up and take him to the boat. Don't let him move on any account."

The two sailors picked up their prisoner with scant regard for his broken arm or his struggles to get free, lashed his right arm to his side, and hurried him off to the boat. Just then another man who had mounted the wreck of the bridge called to Tristam, and they went up and found Jessie and Sybil lying among the ruins of the wheel-house. Sybil was dead and horribly mangled by the splinters of wood and fragments of the shell, but Jessie showed signs of life, though one side of her face was terribly bruised and disfigured, and there was a long, deep cut on the side of her head above her right ear. Courtland's flask came into immediate requisition again, and when they had lifted her out of the debris she coughed and sighed and opened her eyes.

As he picked her up in his arms to take her to the boat, Tristam's thoughts involuntarily went back to the last time he had seen her, at the house in Gower Street in her trim black and white costume and her neat little mob cap. That was really only a few months ago, yet how many years had she lived between that scene and this! When he laid her down gently in the stern-sheets of the boat where Lorrain was already sitting, bound and in sullen silence, she looked up at him and said in her old pretty, gentle voice:

"Thank you, Mr. Tristam! It is very kind of you, but I suppose you are only taking me away to prison?"

"Don't talk about that," he said. "At present you are going on board the Pocahontas to be nursed. You'll find Mrs. Tristam there and someone else you know."

"Oh yes, Miss Gwynneth I suppose!" she said, and then her eyes closed and her wounded head sank back on the cushion that he had put under it.

He gave orders for the boat to return at once to the Pocahontas, as another one was just reaching the wreck. Then the search for the wounded went on, but out of the whole company of the Minnehaha only eight men were carried away with any life in them. When some of the search-party got down into the engine-room they found a man's body lying terribly mangled and scalded among the broken machinery. It was all that was left of Bayard P. Skinner. The shock of striking the rock had flung him down into his beloved engines, and he and they had died together, as no doubt he would have wished to do.

When Tristam got back on board the Pocahontas Muriel came to meet him at the top of the side-ladder. She took him by the arm and led him away to a deserted part of the deck. Then she opened her hand and showed him a thin, shining strip of metal with a glittering, diamond-like point.

Digitized by Google

"What do you think that is?" she said.

"Great heavens!—not the Gold Magnet surely?" he said, taking her hand and looking at it. "How in the name of all that's fortunate ——."

"Yes, it is," she interrupted. "The real, veritable Gold Magnet, my own inheritance, my own father's work, come back to me at last, thanks to you."

"And Courtland," he added. "But how did you get—where did you find it?"

"It was in Jessie's hair!" she said. "I believe the poor little wretch carried it there all the time we were looking for it. Gwynneth and I were dressing the wound in her head, you know, and we had to undo her hair and cut some of it off, and there, buried in the plaits, we found this."

"Well," he said, drawing her out of sight behind the shield of a gun, "it's only right that I should be the first to congratulate you on coming into your lawful inheritance. Allow me also to have the honour of kissing the richest as well as the dearest woman in the world!"

There is little more to add to the present portion of the history of the Gold Magnet. Only Lorrain and three of the wounded pirates reached Victoria alive, and there, after due trial, they were justly hanged by the neck until they were dead. Lorrain walked to the scaffold with as little apparent concern as he had strolled up and down the deck of the Minnehaha chatting to her ladyship, and died with a gameness worthy of a better end.

Jessie recovered her physical health, but it was soon found that the injury to her head had affected her brain, and when she was placed on her trial as a matter of form, she was found incapable of pleading, and was sent to spend the rest of her days in the criminal asylum, where she passed most of her waking life in walking about the wards or the garden, with a piece of straw tied to a thread, and whispering to everyone she met about the untold treasures that were hidden under the floors and in the ground.

The fifty tons of gold were recovered from the wreck of the Minnehaha. What was left of her remained lying rusting and rotting away on the reef which she had so nearly passed to freedom. The gold, as far as possible, was traced to the relatives of its original owners, and handed over to them. Out of the rest the widows and children of the officers and men who had gone down in the destroyers were generously provided for. Naturally neither Tristam or Courtland claimed salvage as they might have done, for after all, what was the value of a few hundredweights of gold to them, now that they had regained the lost key to all the world's hidden treasure?

Here, then, for the present, the story of the Gold Magnet ends. Of the wonders that it wrought in the hands of its new and lawful possessors there will perhaps be more to tell another time.

The End.

NEXT WEEK A NEW SERIAL STORY WILL COMMENCE, ENTITLED

"THE RIVAL QUEENS."

A TALE OF OLD FRANCE.

By MARY FERMOR.

It will be Profusely Illustrated by Mr. E. F. SHERIE.

THE EDITOR.

Funny Pictures!

Good Stories!

Side-Splitting Jokes!

Pocket-Filling Competitions!

YOU WILL FIND THEM ALL IN

DAN LENO'S COMIC JOURNAL.

No. 1 NOW ON SALE. OUT EVERY TUESDAY.

THE PRICE IS ONE HALFPENNY.

Digitized by Google

No Beauty Without White Teeth.

DR. EMY'S
ALBAZENE.

THE PUREST AND MOST ELEGANT DENTIFRICE IN THE WORLD.

TO KEEP YOUR TEETH SOUND KEEP THEM CLEAN.

Absolutely Uninjurious.

In boxes, 1s., of all Chemists, or Post Free from THE ALBAZENE COMPANY, 276 STRAND.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

WHY INDUCE HEART DISEASE TO CURE YOUR HEAD

When you can get a real safe remedy like KAPUTINE?

Dr. Thurston, Licentiate, of the Royal College of Physicians, writes November 16th: "Knowing the formulæ from which KAPUTINE is compounded, I unhesitatingly recommend its use in preference to crude Antifibrin and other synthetic drugs which, unfortunately for sufferers, are so commonly used for Headache, and which have undoubtedly injurious effects on the Heart, Brain, and Vescicle tissues generally."

NOTHING LIKE KAPUTINE. NOTHING SIMILAR. NOTHING AS GOOD.

All leading Chemists sell it. Packets of 18 doses 1s. Sample 1d.

After 13 Years' Suffering, Cured for 1s.

The Rev. T. Taylor, Vicar of St. Bredward, Cornwall, writes: "Owing to a severe accident while riding, my wife has for the past thirteen years been subject to violent attacks of neuralgia. The relief she has experienced from KAPUTINE has been speedy and effectual. KAPUTINE, while it is efficacious in its use, is attended with none of the disagreeable after effects which she has experienced in the case of other drugs."

After 10 Weeks' Suffering, Cured for 1d.

Deer Rectory, Mintlaw, Aberdeen,
From Rev. J. H. Burn. November 8th, 1897.

"My own cure with one dose of KAPUTINE was marvellous after ten weeks incessant neuralgia.

Used also by Her Grace the Countess of Cavan, Lady Dashwood, The Countess of Munster, Surgeon Lieut.-Col. Baker, etc., etc.

Nothing Similar. Nothing as Good. KAPUTINE CURES HEADACHE IN 10 MINUTES.

If you enclose stamped envelope to A. M. Kaputine Ltd., Huddersfield, you will get free samples by return.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

Digitized by Google

AIDS TO ACCURACY.

We want one clean and perfect copy of each of the following numbers of Short Stories: 14, 16, 26, 28, 29, 30, 31, 87, 88, 91, 124, 127 (two copies), 128, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 153, 154 (two copies), 215, 218, 233, 235 (two copies), and will pay sixpence for each of them. Copies should be addressed to the Publisher.

M. N.—Taken bulk for bulk, a man is stronger than an ox.

U. R.—I am afraid you would have great difficulty in obtaining a really good specimen of the Damascus sword, for the art of working and engraving this kind of steel is dead. These swords were made of alternate layers of iron and steel, so finely tempered, that the blade would bend to the hilt without breaking. The edges of these weapons were so keen that no coat of mail could resist them, and the surfaces so highly polished that when a Moslem wished to rearrange his turban he used his sword as a looking-glass.

A. L.—Rice-paper is not made from rice, but from the membranes of the bread-fruit tree.

D. S. M. sends me a post-card bearing the question: "How fast can a man wink?"———By a recent experiment it was proved that a rapid wink occupies about the sixth of a second.

G. G. asks: "Why should a red sunset foretell dry weather?"———Because it indicates that the air towards the west, from which quarter rain may generally be expected, contains little moisture.

Gardener.—You may be surprised to hear that there is a creature even more tenacious of life than the earth-worm, and that is the common sea polyp. If one be cut in two, two creatures are the result; in fact, if it was divided into half-a-dozen sections, the result would be as many animals. They may be turned inside out, and will apparently enjoy themselves as much as if nothing had happened. If two be divided, and placed end to end, the result will be a monster having a head at each extremity.

W. N.—Perhaps your doctor's bill was a bit exorbitant, but you must remember that you are remunerating him not merely for the time occupied in considering your particular case, but for the years of study it cost him to qualify himself to give an opinion.

W. W.—The last time the Tower of London was used as a state prison was in 1820, when the Cato Street conspirators were confined there. You are quite wrong in asserting that "that venerable pile is now no more than a historic relic." It provides accommodation for a whole regiment of soldiers, and is a store for arms.

Guy.—White and yellow are the most frequently recurring colours in precious stones, and the most infrequent is red, which is confined to rubies and garnets.

G. H.—So far as I know only one Englishman has ever been presented by the Chinese Government with the Order of the Yellow Jacket, and that was General Gordon. This distinction was the reward given him for his services in putting down the rising of the Taipings.

Mudlark asks: "How is it that some people can walk through the dirtiest streets and yet scarcely soil their boots, while others, going the same distance, will get their foot-gear splashed with mud from top to bottom?"———Because some people pay a greater amount of care and attention to the way in which they put their feet down, of course. Naturally, a man who walks on a wet day, regardless of puddles, and with no more care than he would if the streets were perfectly clean, cannot expect his boots to be as immaculate as those of the pedestrian who carefully picks his way.

C. H.—You could not do better than choose chrysanthemums for the occasion you mention, for they live longer after being cut than any other flower.

C. G.—Most of the European nations have their nicknames, appropriate and otherwise. British sailors call the Frenchman, in contempt, Johnny Crapaud, but in France he is Jacques Bonhomme. Cousin Michel is the name by which the German is known to the Continental nations. Mynheer sums up the Dutch, Don Whiskerandos the Spaniard, and Lazzaroni the Italian.

H. K. writes to say that in novels he has often come across descriptions of people possessing green eyes, but that he has never yet met anyone in real life with eyes of this colour, and he, therefore, has begun to believe they exist only in the imagination of writers.———Your doubts are quite justifiable, for, strictly speaking, there are none such. There are certain eyes, however, of the iridescent order, which show changing lights and shadows and some sea-green tints, and it is these colour suggestions that have given rise to the popular idea of green eyes.

Sylvia.—It was certainly very "bad form" on your part to dance twice running with the same gentleman. Of course, if he were your fiancé it would have been a different matter altogether. Engaged couples may dance together as often as they like.

W. M.—The quivering of the aspen leaf is said to be due to the fact that the leaf stalk is flat on the sides, and so thin about the middle that the slightest breath of wind sets all the leaves wagging horizontally.

U. R.—It is the bell in Westminster tower, not the clock, that is called "Big Ben."

Cautious wants to know if it would be within the bounds of prudence for a man to escort his recent partner at a dance to her carriage upon her departure, or whether she would be likely to think he had further "intentions."———You certainly might safely conduct the lady to her carriage, and, indeed, would not be more than ordinarily polite in so doing. You might even go a little farther, if you wished, namely, see that her wraps were adjusted properly, and should she be gracious in her manner toward you, you might even ask permission to call the next day.

Pedro is evidently another cautious reader, for he wants to know if it is true that kissing is against the laws of health.———I really cannot give a definite answer to this question. The opinions of the highest authorities differ so widely about it—some say that disease lurks in a kiss, while, on the contrary, others declare that, far from being harmful, kissing is most beneficial and "provides us with microbes useful for digestion." You can, therefore, accept which ever opinion most nearly coincides with your own wishes.

C. C.—Fainting at the sight of blood does certainly appear to be rather an effeminate weakness in a man, but I am afraid there is no remedy for it. It may be some consolation to you to hear that your case is not an isolated one. I have often come across similar and even stranger causes of fainting fits. One case was that of a man who swooned away at the sight of beer, another grew faint at the sight of underdone meat, whilst a third was affected in the same way whenever he came into contact with the fumes of a Turkish or Egyptian cigarette.

Ethel wants to know what is the reason that in an ordinary suite of dining-room furniture, that piece called "a lady's armchair" is in reality never made with any arms at all?———Not being in the furniture line personally, I am therefore unable to give my fair reader any technical reason; but I should suggest that they are probably made that way in order that the dresses of the fair occupants may not run any risk of being crushed.

POSTAL RATES.

Short Stories will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

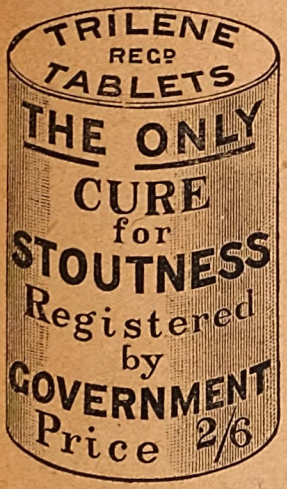
Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

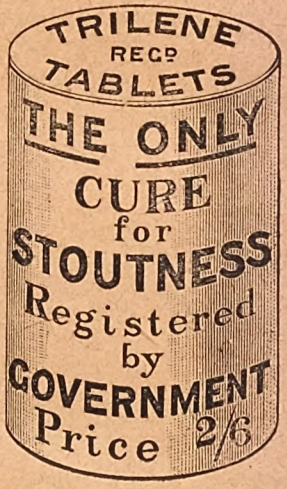
TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY, whether Abdominal or General. They are small, agreeable, harmless, sent privately, and never fail to Improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.



SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87, Alexandra Road, Norwich, Oct. 19th, 1896.
"GENTLEMEN,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them—their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was for many years growing too stout; but although the disease was, I consider, chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely. You have our united thanks; and if I can do anything to promote your interests, I will freely use my utmost endeavours to do so.
"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

PRINCESS LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me directly your excellent Tablets."

SURGEON-COLONEL E. S. BRANDER, M.D., writes from Jhansi, India: "September 12th, 1897. In my experience your Tablets form an efficient remedy for reducing weight."

LADY CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

MRS. BOSTON, of Clifford Street, South Wigston, Leicester, writes: "I am much thinner and lighter in myself since taking your Tablets."

W. G. LOVE, 4, Kirk Street, Peterhead, N.B., says: "I finished Tablets a fortnight ago, and am reduced a great deal—never felt better in my life."

Convalescent Home, New Brighton, Cheshire.
MISS S. J. PRITCHARD says: "They have done me much good. I am 21lb. lighter already."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk either by means of severe dieting or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a case of the wonderful Trilene Tablets, which are guaranteed absolutely harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, or any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing Cure for Obesity. The Tablets are sold in boxes at 2s. 6d., and are obtainable from the Trilene Company, 66, Finsbury Pavement, London."

25, Windsor Terrace, Penarth, Cardiff.
MISS M. FLAVELL says: "I have lost 2st., and am much better in health."

Windsor Hotel, Merthyr Vale, South Wales.
MR. J. THOMAS writes: "When I started the Tablets I weighed 17½st., and have got down to 14st. 9lb."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.
MR. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

MRS. HUTCHINSON, 46, Irwell Street, Widnes, Lancashire, writes: "I have taken three boxes and am reduced 2st."

A. D. BILLINGS, Bell Inn, Aldershot, writes: "Have derived great benefit already. Less in size and weight, breathing greatly improved."

MISS WELLS, Aldeburgh Hall, Saxmundham, writes: "I am pleased to say I receive great benefit from them."

MISS DUGGLEBY, 16, New Road, Driffield, writes: "The girl who took your Tablets is reduced about 2½st."

MISS C. E. SINGLETON, 3, Courtenay Terrace, Teignmouth, says "They have done me a great deal of good, and I will do my best to make them known. You may use this letter as you please."

MISS MACPHERSON, Balnagowan Lodge, Methuen, Perth, says: "I have taken one box, and am reduced 1st."

MRS. EDMONDS, Pontyguesta, Pontyohin, Llantrissant, says: "I have lost more than a stone in a very short time."

MARIAN TAYLOR, Church Farm, St. James, Halesworth, says: "I have lost quite 2st. since taking your Tablets."

MISS GILLESPIE, 50, Chaucer Road, Forest Gate, Essex, says: "I have lost just 3st."

E. NICHOLSON, Crossfield, Staniland, Halifax, says: "I am pleased to say your Tablets are lessening my size very much, and my two sisters are going in for your pleasant treatment."

COUNTESS G. FÜRSTENBERG, of Stammheim, Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

Digitized by Google

"KEEP ME FROM SINKING DOWN."

This is the chorus of an old negro melody, sung in the days of slavery in America. It is full of heartbreaking appeal to Heaven to help the poor slave in his trouble; to lighten his heavy load; to soften the thoughts of his master towards him; and at last to bring him safe to the City of Golden Streets, where there should be no more labour or sorrow or parting. Thus, in their religious meetings in the woods, and from their cabins on the great plantations when the day's work was done, the ear of the passing stranger caught the wild, pathetic refrain—

"Oh, my Lord; oh, my good Lord,
Keep me from sinking down."

The sense of sinking, the feeling that the supports of Nature are giving way beneath us, is one of the most terrifying things imaginable. People who have been in earthquakes, or been half drowned and then rescued, are able to appreciate it. And in certain diseases it is even more appalling than in the outward world.

A woman, describing a long and weary illness, says that the one element of it, which seemed more than any other to take all the ambition and courage out of her, was a feeling of sinking down. It was not physically painful, but something worse than pain—a sense of the approaching collapse of her entire vitality, as though she were about to be overwhelmed.

"All my life," she says, "I had been hindered and oppressed by weakness. To feel languid and tired was an habitual thing with me. I never knew the lightness, strength, and elasticity that so many of the more fortunate of my sex are blessed with. I ate but little, and even that more as a matter of necessity and custom than from desire. The keen relish for food which I saw in others was quite foreign to my experience. But the absence of appetite was by no means the worst feature of my case, for what I did eat gave me great distress at the stomach and often sharp pains in the chest, back, and sides. Added to this was a certain sensation of sinking that was strange and awful. I cannot set it forth in words. It was as though my body had no power to sustain itself. I may say that no medicine relieved this affrighting feeling.

"I became extremely sensitive and nervous, and ceased to take any pleasure in things and people around me. I lived a miserable life all to myself, and was practically alone even in the midst of my family and friends. Such was my history from year to year. Neither doctors nor drugs did me any good.

"I was still in this situation when, in February, 1894, I read in a small book of what Mother Seigel's Syrup had done for so many similarly circumstanced. Hoping, rather than thinking it might help me, I procured a bottle from Mr. Millns, Gipsy Lane, Forest Gate. It did me much good, as I could eat better and food agreed with me. Cheered up by this favourable result, I continued taking the Syrup, and in a few weeks the bad symptoms left me, and I felt better than ever before in my life.

"This medicine seemed to put new life into me, and since using it I have been free from the low, sinking feeling of which I have spoken. My son, who suffers from liver complaint, has taken Mother Seigel's Syrup with the greatest benefit. You are at liberty to publish what I here state. (Signed) (Mrs.) Emma Blatch, 33 Terrace Road, Upton Manor, Plaistow, Essex, February 8th, 1895."

Mrs. Blatch's complaint was chronic dyspepsia, a tendency to which she probably inherited. She, through her disease only, was half starved all her life up to the time she began to use Seigel's Syrup. Her nerves, being badly nourished—the same as the rest of her system—were feeble and disordered; and one of the results was that sense of sinking, as though her body sought a place of rest—even in the bosom of the earth. Alas! how many of her sex are fainting under the same burden—drawn irresistibly downward? Food—food enjoyed and digested—is their imperative need; and the way to it is through the use of the remedy that saved our correspondent. We know of nothing else that so helpfully responds to the cry, "Keep me from sinking down."

Digitized by Google

A ROUSING NEW SERIAL STARTS TO-DAY.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY G. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

NO. 450. FOR WEEK ENDING MARCH 12TH, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

PHYSICIANS AND SCIENTISTS REPORT THAT FROMMS EXTRACT IS A PERFECT FOOD FOR INFANTS AND INVALIDS
AS WELL AS FOR THE STRONG AND HEALTHY.
HALF THE PRICE OF MEAT EXTRACTS.

SOLD BY CHEMISTS AND GROCERS

10/6 THE ALLEN FOSTER HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES 10/6

Acknowledged by Thousands of Delighted Purchasers to be the very Best Half-Guinea Costumes ever offered to the public.

Design No. 545.

Design No. 100.

They stand unrivalled for excellence of style, make and appearance. They are made in the Allen Foster SPECIALITE SERGE. Renowned for its durability and wear. All colours perfectly fast, and do not spot with rain.
COLOURS: Black, Brown, Navy, Myrtle, Ruby, Electric-Blue, Bronze-Green, Fawn, Drab, Cinnamon, Grey, etc.
Design No. 545 is the Fashionable Walking Costume for the Spring Season It consists of a stylish Reefer Jacket with Skirt. It has a velvet-welted collar, tailor stitching, and fashionably made skirt. A Costume any lady can wear. Price 10/6. Skirt only, 5/6. This Costume in our New Venetian Cloth will be 13/6.
Design No. 100 has a bodice shaped to the figure, the lapels are prettily trimmed with braid and large buttons—a marvellous Half-Guinea's worth. This Costume in our New Venetian Cloth will be 13/6.

PRICE COMPLETE, 10/6. SKIRT ONLY, 5/6.

Each Costume securely packed and sent carriage paid, 9d. extra. Skirt only, 6d. extra Regular Stock Sizes are 34, 36, and 38in. round bust under arms. Skirts being 38, 40, and 42in. long. Larger or special sizes to measure, 1/6 extra.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO.'S NEW SKETCH BOOK OF FASHIONS FOR THE SPRING SEASON IS NOW IN CIRCULATION.

This publication contains illustrations of their Mantles and Capes, as well as of their famous Costumes. Ladies are requested to write for same at once. Post free on application.

SKETCHES & PATTERNS POST FREE.
When writing please mention "Short Stories."
BANKERS: LONDON & COUNTY, Aldersgate Street, E.C.
ALLEN FOSTER & CO., The London Manufacturers.
17, ROSCOE ST., GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

"Its food value is double that of Bread made from ordinary wheaten flour."—Lancet.

HOVIS BREAD

will not only help to improve your digestion and consequently your health, but will also bring back that energetic and happy feeling of good health. Man does not live a natural life, so a good portion of a natural food, in the shape of HOVIS, at each meal will largely counteract the bad influence that modern life has upon the health and digestive organs. This is not an idle remark, but a proved statement, daily being verified.

HOVIS is baked and sold by all good class Bakers. No loaf genuine unless stamped HOVIS. 6d. and 1/- samples of Bread and Biscuits sent on receipt of stamps by

S. FITTON & SON, Millers, Macclesfield.

THE John Noble

HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES

Highest Value for Money the World has ever known.

Are supplied in the following two good cloths:

I. John Noble Costume Coating, and in II. John Noble Cheviot Serge.

PATTERNS and New Illustrated Ladies' and Children's Fashion Volume sent post Free to all who name Short Stories.

Model 894.

THE NEW "GORDON" DESIGN.

Well-made Bodice, trimmed fancy stitching à l'Ecosse. Full-wide Tailor skirt. Price 10/6 complete, 10/6. Safely packed and carriage paid 6d. extra. Skirt alone, 5/6. Carriage, 5d.

JOHN NOBLE KNOCKABOUT FROCKS.

Thoroughly well made, with saddle top, long full sleeves and pocket. Lengths and Prices.

21 24 27 30 in.
1/6 2/- 2/6 3/-
33 36 39 42 in.
3/6 4/- 4/6 5/-
Postage 4d. extra.

'Brewer' Caps (all shades), as sketched, 1/-

COLOURS of all Costumes: Black, Navy, Electric, Brown, Ruby, Myrtle, Fawn, Grey, Sage Green and Purple. SIZES IN STOCK are 34, 36, and 38 in. round bust (under arms). Skirts being 38, 40, and 42 in. long in front. Larger or special sizes made to measure, 1/6 extra. Mourning Orders executed and despatched within twelve hours.

Please mention SHORT STORIES when ordering. Bankers: London & Midland Bank Ltd.

JOHN NOBLE LTD., BROOK STREET MILLS, MANCHESTER.

NOSE MACHINE.

This is a contrivance by which the short cartilage of the nose is pressed into shape by wearing the instrument an hour daily for a short time. Price 10/6, sent free for stamps. ALEX ROSS, 62, Theobald's Road, London, opposite Bedford Row. Est. 1850. Parcel free from observation.

£20

Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.

Tobacconists Commencing. See Illd. Guide (250 pages) 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000 Tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (30 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers

A. A sum of from 10/- to 20/- per week offered for spare time to either sex everywhere. Work can be done evenings. Send addressed envelope to Box 60, Eclipse Works, 89, Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.

SILVER QUEEN CYCLES!

Best Value on Earth.

Immense stock of Ladies' and Gents' machines. New and Secondhand. Wonderful bargains. Carriage paid. Easy payments from 10s. monthly, or large cash discount. 1 year's guarantee Illus. price lists post free on application. Old cycles exchanged The SILVER QUEEN CYCLE Co Ltd., 221 Tottenham Court Road, London.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE-TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably"

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

MR. CLAUDE CARTER, of Thorn House, Johnstone, N.B., says: "Your Tablets much reduced my weight and I have been waiting to see if it was permanent, and so it has proved."

MR. CANHAM, 87, Alexandra Road, Norwich, says: "Tablets cured my wife two years ago of extreme stoutness. It has never returned.

MARION TAYLOR, of Church Farm, St. James, Halesworth, says: "Have lost quite two stone."

A. PEEL, of Darley Hydro, Matlock, writes: "They have reduced and benefited me a good deal."

MR. BUTLER, Surgeon, Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient lost more than one stone."

MR. G. LOVE, 4, Kirk Street, Peterhead. "I think them wonderful not only to reduce fat but as a medicine."

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO.
188B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.
63 Seven Sisters Road, N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

"JUNO" CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST.

DIAMONDS from £10. 16/8 monthly. JUNO Lady's or Gents' Safety £12 12/- 21/- monthly. £14 14/-, 24/6 ,, £16 16/-, 28/- ,, Write for New Season's List of JUNO Cycles and Accessories, sent post free to any part.

METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO. LTD., 75 and 76 Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C.; and at Piccadilly Circus, exactly opposite the Criterion, London, W. N.B.—Every JUNO Guaranteed. New JUNO Riding School, 1,700ft., now open.

DR. MACKENZIE'S ARSENICAL SOAP.

Prepared with Arsenic, Zinc, and other ingredients.

Deliciously and expensively perfumed, the most luxurious Soap in the World. Produces a most lovely complexion, eradicates spots, pimples, and all imperfections, makes the skin exquisitely clear, and produces the healthy bloom so much desired. It is absolutely harmless, and each tablet is accompanied by a medical certificate.

6D. & 1S. PER TABLET.

This Soap prevents the growth of superfluous hairs, removes wrinkles, feeds the skin. You can get it at all the Stores and first-class Chemists. The Family Doctor says it is the most economical beautifier known to Modern Dermatology. It clears away all pimples, spots, redness, or roughness, makes the skin smooth and clear as a baby's, and cures shiny and greasy skins. Use it in the bath and for all Toilet purposes; it is most delicious. For irritable or sensitive skins it is matchless and delightfully soothing.

MADAME PATTI sends her best thanks for Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap, which she finds most excellent—Craig-y-nos Castle, South Wales.

USE ALSO DR MACKENZIE'S FACE LOTION.

Beware of many Imitations. Have Dr. MACKENZIE'S or none.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 480.] For the Week ending March 12th, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

New Serial Story.

A TALE OF OLD FRANCE.

By MARY FERMOR.

CHAPTER I.

A STRANGE ENCOUNTER.

TOWARDS the close of the first day of March, in the year 1202, two weary, way-worn travellers were descending the steep, rough road which led past the Hospital of St. Lazare, on the outskirts of Paris. They were still more than a mile from the city walls, and the younger, a fair, fragile youth of about fifteen, was apparently in the last stage of exhaustion, and no wonder, for they had been walking since sunrise. To judge by his dress, he might have been an apprentice, but the gentle voice and slender frame seemed to belie his male attire. It was too dark to distinguish the features of a face encircled as it was by clusters of soft, fair curls.

A striking contrast to him was the companion walking by his side, a tall, straight-limbed youth, whose whole bearing, though not wanting in a certain easy grace, spoke of strength and great staying power. On his shoulder he carried a heavy bundle slung at the end of a stick. He was unarmed, but at his side there hung over his leather jerkin a polished copper trowel.

There were lights in the narrow windows of the hospital, and the boy, thinking they had reached their destination, sank down on a milestone near the great door with a sigh of relief.

"Are you so weary, Eve?"

"I would not tell you before how my feet hurt me, or you would have wanted to carry me, and you have enough already. The stones have cut right through my shoes, and I don't think I could have walked another yard."

"Then I must carry you, dear, for we haven't reached the city yet, I'm afraid."

With that he bent over her, and would have taken her in his arms, but she made another resolute effort and started off again along the road with a little run. He tried to overtake her, but his own limbs were aching and his feet swollen, and after a few steps he stumbled over some loose stones.

For many a long day they had been tramping over the badly-made roads, and Eric had often carried his sister when her bleeding feet had made it impossible for her to walk; but to-night he was beyond that, so they struggled on together afoot, and hand-in-hand. Their way soon led them through a straggling wood, and then across a marshy tract, which had been cleared for the construction of a new road.

They were coming near to the walls, and could see the city lights gleaming before them, as with tottering steps and anxious hearts they painfully pressed on to find, as they hoped, food and shelter.

"Keep a good heart, Eve; God will help us. Think how we have got over our long and toilsome journey," said Eric encouragingly.

"If only we may save Princess Angel, I shall not mind what we suffer," was Eve's answer.

At that moment the sound of approaching horses' hoofs became audible, and in a few seconds they could discern the dim forms of two horsemen coming towards them in the half-lit darkness. One wore the armour of a knight, and the other had a Saracen's turban on his closely-shaven head. The knight was speaking:

"So, comrade, you are coming to Paris to kill a man?"

"Yes, my lord; to kill a man."

"And may I know the name of this man?"

"You may not know it, my lord."

"Not if I use persuasion?"

"It would be useless."

"Would blows avail?"

"They would be dangerous."

"Well, perhaps you are right. Besides, if I killed you I shouldn't learn your secret."

"And supposing I killed you, my lord," replied the

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

"So, comrade, you are coming to Paris to kill a man?"

Saracen, "you would not be any nearer to your desire either."

"Quite so," said the knight grimly. Then, after a pause, he went on:

"This is a strange meeting of ours, for I am going to Paris to kill a woman."

These words struck terror to the hearts of the two unseen listeners, who were creeping along within earshot under cover of the deep shadows.

The Saracen appeared to take it quite as a matter of course, and merely answered with a yawn:

"Oh, you're going to kill a woman, my lord," adding, as an afterthought: "Is it your wife?"

"No," said the knight shortly, and after a few moments' thought he asked:

"Will your man be easy to kill?"

"He is the most difficult man to kill in the kingdom, my lord."

"Then it must be the King."

"I have told you I shall not reveal his name. And your victim?"

"She is the most difficult woman to kill in the kingdom."

"Then it must be the Queen."

The knight gave a loud laugh, and Eric had to put his hand over his sister's mouth to check the cry which had risen to her lips.

The moon now shone out clearly above the towers of St. Martin, and the knight noticed that his companion wore a trowel at his side, and carried a heavy stonemason's hammer over his shoulder.

"Are you going to kill your man with that?" he asked.

"No, my lord. I earn my living with that. I am a mason."

"And your name?"

"Mahmoud-el-Reis."

"Well, Mahmoud-el-Reis, as your man and my woman are the two most closely guarded people in the kingdom, how would it be if we were to work together?"

"I am quite willing."

"Then, suppose you help me to kill my woman and I help you to kill your man?"

"Agreed."

"Where shall I find you when I want you?"

"At Nôtre-Dame, where I shall be carving arabesques."

"That is well. You shall hear from me. Au revoir!"

He was just putting spurs to his horse when the Saracen unceremoniously took hold of his bridle and said:

"You have forgotten to tell me your name, my lord."

The knight hesitated for a moment, then he replied:

"I am Amaury Montruel, Lord of Anet and Friend of the King."

"The Friend of the King!" repeated the Moslem thoughtfully; "and where shall I find you?"

"At the Louvre."

Mahmoud released the bridle and bowed gravely. Montruel set off at a sharp gallop in one direction, and the Saracen, after whispering to his beautiful horse, which responded instantly to its master's touch and voice, was rapidly lost to sight and sound in the intricate paths leading to the city.

As soon as they were alone again on the road, Eric and Eve emerged from the friendly shadow and discussed in a low tone the mysterious conversation they had overheard.

"I am sure they meant Princess Angel," said Eve.

"Yes, I know they did. Mind you remember their two names. The cold-blooded wretches, I wish I could have killed them!" answered her brother.

They reached the walls but found one gate after another shut in their faces, and were driven away by the oaths and threats of the archers on the walls. At last, one more kindly than the rest advised them to try the Porte St. Honoré, which was left open later for the King. As they turned away to follow this advice, Eve's powers of endurance came to an end and the poor girl sank fainting at her brother's side.

He raised her in his arms and struggled on, for he knew that every moment's delay lessened their chance of getting into the city that night, and after a quarter of an hour's painful walking, staggering as he did under his double burden, he came to a road bordered on either side by young elms, where, to his infinite relief, he saw two men riding towards him.

They proved to be a knight and his page, and as they were passing he called out, emboldened by despair:

"If you are Christians, have pity on us."

The men stopped, and, after a few words of kindly inquiry the knight bade his page give up his horse to the wayfarers. Eric refused to ride, but walked beside Eve, who had been lifted to the saddle as soon as she had regained consciousness. Her delicate appearance seemed to attract the attention of both knight and page, and the questions of the former proved, more than once, a trifle embarrassing to Eric, who had no intention of stating his business to an entire stranger. He told his benefactor that he and his young brother had been travelling for some months from Cologne, working at their trade on the way for their own support, and that as he had been admitted to the Freemasons at Aix-la-Chapelle he hoped to obtain work in Paris.

The knight smiled doubtfully as he listened to the part of the story affecting Eve, and glanced searchingly at her little hands, which certainly looked unfit to wield a workman's hammer. He asked their names, and looked somewhat displeased when Eric alluded to the Danish Princess whom the King had repudiated after marriage in order to take another wife whom he found more to his taste.

Digitized by Google

The young man's honest simplicity seemed, however, to win his favour, and before they reached the gate he told Eric to go to the Bishop of Paris the next day, and say that the knight Dieudonné requested that he might be included among the number of masons employed at Nôtre Dame. Eric could hardly find words to express his thanks, and, before he realised what was happening, they had passed through the Porte St. Honoré, between two rows of archers presenting arms, and were following the knight into the dark streets of Paris.

He stopped as soon as they were out of hearing of the guards, and bade the page help Eve to dismount. As he did so, the youth remarked to himself:

"I never came across a boy who weighed so little, or was so neatly built, as that one."

"Come here, little Adam," said the knight; and Eve,

Eric took his sister's hand, and went towards them.

who had given that as her name, came forward somewhat timidly.

"There is a purse containing twelve golden crowns for you to remember me by. Good-bye, and good luck to you." With that he bent down and kissed Eve's forehead before she had time to stammer out her thanks.

In another moment they were alone, and the solitude of the city was more appalling to them than would have been that of one of their native forests.

These two were the children of Atho, personal thrall of Canute, King of Denmark, who had been moved by the news of Princess Ingeburge's unmerited sufferings at the hand of the French King, her husband, to make the long and difficult journey to Paris in the hope that they might succour, or, at least, comfort her in her trouble. Now they had attained their goal, and, for that night at least, the prospect was not inviting.

The Rue St. Honoré, in which they found themselves, was one of the finest in old Paris, but the dingiest thoroughfare of to-day would compare favourably with it. The tall, gloomy houses had no windows facing the street, save one or two narrow, barred slits in the upper part of their projecting gables, for in those days each dwelling was so constructed that it might serve as a fortress in case of need. In the poorer parts of the city trade was carried on in booths, which were closed at sunset, and only the dark doors of the dimly-lighted taverns, whence sounds of ribald laughter issued in wild outbursts, stood open to entice the reveller and the wanton.

A respectable citizen would as soon have thought of throwing himself over the ramparts, as of venturing out into the unlighted streets. And when a noble walked abroad, he was preceded by a servant bearing a torch, and carried a drawn sword in his hand, for thieves and cutthroats lay in the dark corners watching for the drunken and the unwary.

The narrow, winding street was full of ghostly shadows, as the rays of moonlight, chequered by the driving clouds, penetrated here and there between the many gables, and every now and then the silence was broken by the sound of distant orgies.

To the two young strangers it was all so cold, so vast, so unkindly.

They were still in doubt which way to take when the sweet, solemn notes of a familiar German choral, sung by men's voices, fell upon their ears. Eric recognised the melody as one he had often heard among the Freemasons; and, as the sounds came nearer, torches flamed out of the gloom, and they saw a large body of men advancing hand-in-hand, bearing blunt lances wreathed in flowers. Eric took his sister's hand, and went towards them, singing the answering refrain.

The band halted before a gaily-decorated portico, and the leader, striking his lance upon the ground, called out:

"Who art thou, companion?"

"I bear the hammer and trowel."

"Dost thou know one of us?"

"I belong to you."

"What is thy title?"

"I am a free companion."

"Approach, and let thy hand speak to my hand."

Their hands met, and the mystic sign was given.

"Ah," said the chief, turning to his band, "his fingers speak the language of Cologne. Receive him into your ranks, and rejoice at the advent of a brother."

Eric was warmly welcomed by the members of the fraternity, and when they knew that Eve was his sister they extended their protection willingly to her also.

The heavy door of the house was opened in response to three peculiar knocks from the chief's lance, and the whole party entered the building. They proceeded to a large hall which occupied the entire ground floor of the house. The walls were decorated with scroll-work, interspersed with masonic emblems, and at one end of the room was a raised platform on which stood an iron tripod, surmounted by a mason's level.

The members had organised this meeting for the reception of a foreign adept, and when, some moments later, he came in, both brother and sister felt that they had seen him before.

He was a young man, though nearer thirty than twenty, with lithe, symetrically-formed limbs, and a face of remarkable intelligence, from which his brilliant dark eyes gleamed under their strongly-marked, finely-arched brows. He walked lightly and firmly to the tripod and sat down near it. When asked his name, he replied:

Digitized by Google

"Jean Cador."

The moment that he spoke two of those present knew that he was giving an assumed name, for two hours before he had said to Amaury Montruel, under the walls of the Abbey St. Martin:

"My name is Mahmoud-el-Reis."

CHAPTER II.

The Friend of the King.

Six or seven hours after Amaury Montruel had left the Saracen outside the gates of Paris, the "Friend of the King" stopped before the unpretending door of a house situated in one of the darkest corners of the city. It was a curious old place, partially concealed by an ancient tower, and provided with doors opening on to three different streets.

Here Amaury Montruel elected to live whenever his presence was not required by his royal master, and rumour ascribed two cogent reasons for this strange choice of locality. Some said he lived a dissolute life, and found it advisable to carry on his revels at a convenient distance from the Louvre; others maintained that this externally gloomy dwelling was the headquarters of a kind of secret police employed by him in the service of Philip Augustus, whose boast was "The King knows all!" Both these reports contained a good deal of truth, as will be seen later on.

Montruel let himself in, crossed the spacious hall, and went into his own luxuriously furnished room, whose only occupant was a man dressed in the fashion of a law student. He lounged among the cushions of his master's couch, and, though he had not yet reached the age of thirty, his face was drawn and haggard, and lined with deep furrows.

"Maître Samson," said Montruel, "has anyone been here in my absence?"

Hearing himself addressed by name, the man struggled into a sitting posture, rubbed his eyes and stifled a yawn before replying. He then proceeded to give his master a more or less confused account of secret visits that had been paid that night, and received a smart rebuke from Montruel for the inaccuracy of his information, which defect, however, seemed to matter little so far as the latter was concerned, seeing that he could supply every name which had slipped his muddle-headed secretary's memory. The arrival of three strangers in the city that night was also duly recorded, two were masons in search of work named Eric and Little Adam, and the third was a Saracen, who was supposed to have come at the bidding of John of England to assassinate the King. Samson also informed his master that a new adept had been received by the Freemasons that night, but he could not remember his name.

"His name was Jean Cador, wasn't it?" said Montruel.

"Yes, yes, that's it," answered Samson, with a look of relief.

"Well, it is a good thing my other agents have clearer heads than you, or they would profit me little. And, look you, Samson, if I find you in this half-drunken, besotted state again, it will be the worse for you. Go and fetch 'La Fontanelle.'"

When he was left alone Montruel threw himself on to the couch, and for some moments was absorbed in what appeared to be anything but pleasant reflections. Then he rose and began to pace up and down the room impatiently.

